

SECOND EDITION

Dictionary of Jesus and the Gospels

GENERAL EDITOR: Joel B. Green

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

Jeannine K. Brown & Nicholas Perrin

A COMPENDIUM OF CONTEMPORARY BIBLICAL SCHOLARSHIP

SECOND EDITION

Dictionary of Jesus and the Gospels

EDITED BY

Joel B. Green, Jeannine K. Brown
& Nicholas Perrin

 IVP Academic
An imprint of InterVarsity Press
Downers Grove, Illinois

InterVarsity Press

P.O. Box 1400, Downers Grove, IL 60515-1426

World Wide Web: www.ivpress.com

E-mail: email@ivpress.com

©2013 by InterVarsity Christian Fellowship/USA

All rights reserved. No part of this book may be reproduced in any form without written permission from InterVarsity Press.

InterVarsity Press® is the book-publishing division of InterVarsity Christian Fellowship/USA®, a movement of students and faculty active on campus at hundreds of universities, colleges and schools of nursing in the United States of America, and a member movement of the International Fellowship of Evangelical Students. For information about local and regional activities, write Public Relations Dept., InterVarsity Christian Fellowship/USA, 6400 Schroeder Rd., P.O. Box 7895, Madison, WI 53707-7895, or visit the IVCF website at <www.intervarsity.org>.

All Scripture quotations, unless otherwise indicated, are the author's own translation.

Design: Cindy Kiple

Image: Christ with the Doctors in the Temple by (Paolo Caliari) Veronese at Prado, Madrid, Spain. Alinari / The Bridgeman Art Library.

ISBN 978-0-8308-8438-4 (digital)

ISBN 978-0-8308-2456-4 (print)

InterVarsity Press

Project Staff

Senior Editor/Project Editor

Daniel G. Reid

Managing Editor

Benjamin M. McCoy

Copyeditor

Robert G. Maccini

Editorial & Administrative Assistants

Rebecca F. Carhart

Rachel Neftzer Snavelly

Claire VanderVelde

Design

Cindy Kiple

Typesetters

Maureen G. Tobey

Jeanna L. Wiggins

Proofreader

Adam Stevenson

InterVarsity Press

Publisher

Robert A. Fryling

Associate Publisher for Editorial

Andrew T. Le Peau

Associate Editorial Director

James Hoover

Production Manager

Anne Gerth

Print Coordinator

Jim Erhart

Contents

Preface	ix
How to Use This Dictionary	xi
Abbreviations	xiii
Transliterations	xxv
Contributors	xxvii
Dictionary Articles	1
Scripture Index	1025
Subject Index	1071
Articles Index	1088

Preface

Today New Testament students are inundated with a virtual flood of research on Jesus and the Gospels. What does it mean for Jesus to be called God's Son? Why did Jesus have to die? Did Jesus have female followers; if he did, what is their significance? What is a "Gospel"? Was Jesus a Cynic? (What is a Cynic?) How can we make sense of Jesus' parables? Given the need for so much specialized background and knowledge, how do students and pastors even begin to tackle these questions, and others besides?

In recent decades some traditional viewpoints have been transformed, some overturned, others confirmed. New methodologies and approaches have been championed, some becoming commonplace. New studies have helped us to appreciate better the perspectives of the Gospel writers, and they have brought into sharper relief the challenge of Jesus' life and message. Those studies have also grown more numerous and, in many cases, more technical.

How can undergraduate students, seminarians, people in professional ministry, leaders in local churches and other Christian organizations, even academic scholars, stay abreast of the range of contemporary study of Jesus and the Gospels? How can the fruit of vital study of Jesus and the Gospels in recent years help to animate our reading of and interaction with the Gospels?

When it first appeared some twenty years ago, the Dictionary of Jesus and the Gospels was concerned to address exactly these kinds of needs. This revision of the Dictionary follows the same path, though now with new content and up-to-date bibliographies, as well as a host of new contributors. Some ninety percent of the original material has been replaced, with most previous entries assigned to a fresh list of scholars. A number of new articles have been introduced, and a handful of articles from the first edition have been updated in light of ongoing research.

Like its predecessor, this revision of the Dictionary of Jesus and the Gospels provides students with introductory discussions, comprehensive surveys and convenient bibliographies. For pastors and teachers it provides reliable and readable information. For theologians and biblical scholars it provides up-to-date reviews. People interested in Jesus and the Gospels can start here—and from here they will be led back with new insights and questions to the biblical texts themselves. And they may find themselves turning from one article to the next, and on to further studies, as they pursue their questions.

Articles in the Dictionary of Jesus and the Gospels treat questions arising from the Gospels themselves, longstanding traditions of interpretation of Jesus and the Gospels, significant background issues, and the range of methodological approaches used in Gospels study today. These essays concentrate on Jesus and the Gospels, limiting their discussions to the needs of those who study, teach and expound the Gospels. Because of its narrow focus, the Dictionary consists of fewer entries than other one-volume dictionaries. This allows for greater depth of coverage and concentration than would normally be available.

When work began in the late 1980s on the first edition of the Dictionary of Jesus and the Gospels, New Testament scholarship informed by classical Christian faith was on the rise and had begun to make significant contributions to the discourse on Jesus and the Gospels. The landscape has changed since those days. In the intervening years, evangelical study spanning three generations of scholars has contributed to historical inquiry, to explorations of the particular contributions of each of the Gospel writers, and to reflection on the theological and ethical consequences of the fourfold Gospel. If interest in the historical Jesus in the popular media has waned somewhat since the 1990s, it remains no less crucial that critically responsible and theologically evangelical scholarship be placed in the hands of the larger church. In fact, to be evangelical and critical at the same time has been the object of the Dictionary.

We pray that the Dictionary of Jesus and the Gospels will be found useful to those preparing for and engaged in Christian ministry in all its forms—from the small group to the lecture hall, from the marketplace to the seminary, from the local church to the department of religious studies and beyond.

Joel B. Green

Jeannine K. Brown

Nicholas Perrin

How to Use This Dictionary

Abbreviations

Comprehensive tables of abbreviations for general matters as well as for scholarly, biblical and ancient literature may be found on pages xiii-xxiv.

Authorship of Articles

The authors of articles are indicated by their first initials and last name at the end of each article. A full list of contributors may be found on pages xxvii-xxxi, in alphabetical order of their last name. The contribution of each author is listed following their identification.

Bibliographies

A bibliography will be found at the end of each article. The bibliographies include works cited in the articles and other significant related works. Bibliographical entries are listed in alphabetical order by the author's name, and where an author has more than one work cited, they are listed chronologically by publication date. In articles focused on the Gospels themselves, the bibliographies are divided into the categories "Commentaries" and "Studies."

Cross-References

This Dictionary has been extensively cross-referenced in order to aid readers in making the most of material appearing throughout the volume. Four types of cross-referencing will be found:

1. One-line entries appearing in alphabetical order throughout the Dictionary direct readers to articles where a topic is discussed, often as a subdivision of an article:

ARAMAIC LANGUAGE. See LANGUAGES OF PALESTINE.

2. An asterisk before a word in the body of an article indicates that an article by that title (or closely worded title) appears in the Dictionary. For example, "*jubilee" directs the reader to an article entitled JUBILEE. Asterisks typically are found only at the first occurrence of a word in an article. There are few cross-references to articles on the Gospels, since their presence within the Dictionary can be assumed.

3. A cross-reference appearing within parentheses in the body of an article directs the reader to an article by that title. For example, (see God) directs the reader to an article by that title.

4. Cross-references have been appended to the end of articles, immediately preceding the bibliography, to direct readers to articles significantly related to the subject:

See also ABRAHAM, ISAAC AND JACOB; ANTI-SEMITISM; ISRAEL; JUDAISM, COMMON.

Indexes

Since most of the Dictionary articles cover broad topics in some depth, the Subject Index is intended to assist readers in finding relevant information on narrower topics that might, for instance, appear in a standard Bible dictionary. For example, while there is no article entitled "Peter," the subject index might direct the reader to pages where Peter is discussed in the article on "Disciples and Discipleship."

A Scripture Index is provided to assist readers in gaining quick access to the numerous Scripture texts referred to throughout the Dictionary.

An Articles Index found at the end of the Dictionary allows readers to review quickly the breadth of topics covered and select the ones most apt to serve their interests or needs. Those who wish to identify the articles written by specific contributors should consult the list of contributors at the front of the book, where the articles are listed under the name of each contributor.

Transliteration

Greek and Hebrew have been transliterated according to the system set out on page xxv.

Abbreviations

General Abbreviations

//	parallel text(s)	ha	hectare(s)
A.D.	anno Domini	Heb.	Hebrew
Aram.	Aramaic	impv.	imperative
b.	born	kg	kilogram(s)
B.C.	before Christ	km	kilometer(s)
ca.	circa	Lat.	Latin
chap(s).	chapter(s)	m	meter(s)
cm	centimeter(s)	masc.	masculine col(s).	column(s)	MS(S)	manuscript(s)
d.	died	par.	parallel passage(s)
ed.	edition	pl.	plural
ed(s).	editor(s), edited by	r.	reigned
e.g.	exempli gratia , for example	rec.	recension
esp.	especially	repr.	reprint
ET	English translation	rev.	revised
fem.	feminine	sg.	singular
fig(s).	figure(s)	trans.	translator, translated by
frg(s).	fragment(s)	s.v.	sub verbo , under the word
Ger.	German	vol(s).	volume(s)
Gk.	Greek

Ancient Texts, Text Types and Versions

DSS	Dead Sea Scrolls	NT	New Testament
HB	Hebrew Bible	OT	Old Testament
LXX	Septuagint	Theod.	Theodotion
MT	Masoretic Text

Translations of the Bible

CEB	Common English Bible	NET	New English Translation
CEV	Contemporary English Version	NIV	New International Version
ESV	English Standard Version	NLT	New Living Translation
HCSB	Holman Christian Standard Bible	NRSV	New Revised Standard Version
KJV	King James Version	RSV	Revised Standard Version
NCV	New Century Version	TEV	Today's English Version
NEB	New English Bible	TNIV	Today's New International Version

Books of the Bible

Old Testament	1-2 Kings	Is	Mic	Mk	1-2 Thess
Gen	1-2 Chron	Jer	Nahum	Lk	1-2 Tim
Ex	Ezra	Lam	Hab	Jn	Tit
Lev	Neh	Ezek	Zeph	Acts	Philem
Num	Esther	Dan	Hag	Rom	Heb
Deut	Job	Hos	Zech	1-2 Cor	Jas
Josh	Ps (Pss)	Joel	Mal	Gal	1-2 Pet
Judg	Prov	Amos		Eph	1-2-3 Jn
Ruth	Eccles	Obad	New Testament	Phil	Jude
1-2 Sam	Song	Jon	Mt	Col	Rev

Apocrypha and Septuagint

Bar	Baruch	Pr Azar	Prayer of Azariah
Bel	Bel and the Dragon	Sir	Sirach
Jdt	Judith	Sus	Susanna
1-2 Esd	1-2 Esdras	Tob	Tobit
1-4 Kgdms	1-4 Kingdoms	Wis	Wisdom of Solomon
1-4 Macc	1-4 Maccabees

Old Testament Pseudepigrapha

Apoc. Ab.	Apocalypse of Abraham	Liv. Pro.	Lives of the Prophets
Apoc. Mos.	Apocalypse of Moses	Mart. Ascen. Isa.	Martyrdom and Ascension of Isaiah
Apoc. Zeph.	Apocalypse of Zephaniah	Ps.-Phoc.	Pseudo-Phocylides
Apocr. Ezek.	Apocryphon of Ezekiel	Pss. Sol.	Psalms of Solomon
Artap.	Artapanus	Sib. Or.	Sybilline Oracles
Ascen. Isa.	Mart. Ascen. Isa. 6-11	T. 12 Patr.	Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs
As. Mos.	Assumption of Moses	T. Ash.	Testament of Asher
2 Bar.	2 Baruch (Syriac Apocalypse)	T. Benj.	Testament of Benjamin
3 Bar.	3 Baruch (Greek Apocalypse)	T. Dan	Testament of Dan
1 En.	1 Enoch (Ethiopic Apocalypse)	T. Gad	Testament of Gad
2 En.	2 Enoch (Slavonic Apocalypse)	T. Iss.	Testament of Issachar
3 En.	3 Enoch (Hebrew Apocalypse)	T. Jos.	Testament of Joseph
Eup.	Eupolemus	T. Jud.	Testament of Judah
Ezek. Trag.	Ezekiel the Tragedian	T. Levi	Testament of Levi
4 Ezra	4 Ezra	T. Naph.	Testament of Naphtali
Jos. Asen.	Joseph and Aseneth	T. Reu.	Testament of Reuben
Jub.	Jubilees	T. Sim.	Testament of Simeon
L.A.B.	Liber antiquitatum biblicarum (Pseudo-Philo)	T. Zeb.	Testament of Zebulon
L.A.E.	Life of Adam and Eve	T. Ab.	Testament of Abraham
Lad. Jac.	Ladder of Jacob	T. Job	Testament of Job
Let. Arist.	Letter of Aristeas	T. Mos.	Testament of Moses
		T. Sol.	Testament of Solomon

Dead Sea Scrolls

CD-A	Damascus Document^a	2Q24 (2QNJ ar)	2QNew Jerusalem ar
CD-B	Damascus Document^b	2Q26 (2QEnGiants ar)	2QBook of Giants ar
CTL (CTLevi ar)	Cairo Geniza Testament of Levi	3Q15	3QCopper Scroll
1QapGen ar	1QGenesis Apocryphon	4Q28 (4QDeut ^a)	4QDeuteronomy^a
1QH ^a	1QHodayot^a	4Q158 (4QRP ^a)	4QReworked Pentateuch^a
1QpHab	1QPesher to Habakkuk	4Q159 (4QOrd ^a)	4QOrdinances^a
1QS	1QRule of the Community	4Q161 (4QpIsa ^a)	4QIsaiah Pesher^a
1Q22 (1QDM)	1QWords of Moses	4Q162 (4QpIsa ^b)	4QIsaiah Pesher^b
1Q23 (1QEnGiants ^a ar)	1QEnoch Giants^a ar	4Q163 (4QpIsa ^c)	4QIsaiah Pesher^c
1Q24 (1QEnGiants ^b ar)	1QEnoch Giants^b ar	4Q164 (4QpIsa ^d)	4QIsaiah Pesher^d
1Q26	1QInstruction	4Q165 (4QpIsa ^e)	4QIsaiah Pesher^e
1Q27 (1QMyst)	1QMysteries	4Q169 (4QpNah)	4QNahum Pesher
1Q28a (1QSa)	1QRule of the Congregation	4Q171 (4QpPs ^a)	4QPsalms Pesher^a
1Q28b (1Qsb)	1QRule of Benedictions	4Q174 (4QFlor)	4QFlorilegium
1Q29	1QLiturgy of the Three Tongues of Fire	4Q175 (4QTest)	4QTestimonia
1Q32 (1QNJ ar)	1QNew Jerusalem ar	4Q176 (4QTanh)	4QTanhumim
1Q33 (1QM)	1QWar Scroll	4Q176 (4QTanh)	4QTanhumim
1Q34 + 1Q34bis (1QLitPr)	1QFestival Prayers	4Q176 (4QTanh)	4QTanhumim
1Q35 (1QH ^b)	1QHodayot^b	4Q184	4QWiles of the Wicked Woman
2Q18 (2QSir)	2QBen Sira	4Q201 (4QEn ^a ar)	4QEnoch^a ar
2Q21 (2QapMoses?)	2QApocryphon of Moses	4Q202 (4QEn ^b ar)	4QEnoch^b ar
		4Q203 (4QEnGiants ^a ar)	4QBook of Giants^a ar
		4Q204 (4QEn ^c ar)	4QEnoch^c ar

4Q205 (4QEn ^d ar)	4QEnoch ^d ar	4Q378 (4QapocrJoshua ^a)	4QApocryphon of Joshua ^a
4Q206 (4QEn ^e ar)	4QEnoch ^e ar	4Q379 (4QapocrJoshua ^b)	4QApocryphon of Joshua ^b
4Q207 (4QEn ^f ar)	4QEnoch ^f ar	4Q380	4QNon-Canonical Psalms A
4Q208 (4QEnastr ^a ar)	4QAstronomical Enoch ^a	4Q381	4QNon-Canonical Psalms B
4Q209 (4QEnastr ^b ar)	4QAstronomical Enoch ^b	4Q387a (4QpsMoses ^b)	4QPseudo-Moses ^b
4Q210 (4QEnastr ^c ar)	4QAstronomical Enoch ^c	4Q388a (4QpsMoses ^c)	4QPseudo-Moses ^c
4Q211 (4QEnastr ^d ar)	4QAstronomical Enoch ^d	4Q389 (4QpsMoses ^d)	4QPseudo-Moses ^d
4Q212 (4QEn ^g ar)	4QEnoch ^g ar	4Q390 (4QpsMoses ^e)	4QPseudo-Moses ^e
4Q213a (4QLevi ^b ar)	4QAramaic Levi ^b	4Q394 (4QMMT ^a)	4QHalakhic Letter ^a
4Q225 (4QpsJub ^a)	4QPseudo-Jubilees ^a	4Q395 (4QMMT ^b)	4QHalakhic Letter ^b
4Q242 (4QPrNab ar)	4QPrayer of Nabonidus ar	4Q396 (4QMMT ^c)	4QHalakhic Letter ^c
4Q246	4QAramaic Apocalypse	4Q397 (4QMMT ^d)	4QHalakhic Letter ^d
4Q252 (4QcommGen A)	4QCommentary on Genesis A	4Q398 (4QMMT ^e)	4QHalakhic Letter ^e
4Q253 (4QcommGen B)	4QCommentary on Genesis B	4Q399 (4QMMT ^f)	4QHalakhic Letter ^f
4Q254 (4QcommGen C)	4QCommentary on Genesis C	4Q400 (4QShirShabb ^a)	4QSongs of the Sabbath Sacrifice ^a
4Q254a (4QcommGen D)	4QCommentary on Genesis D	4Q401 (4QShirShabb ^b)	4QSongs of the Sabbath Sacrifice ^b
4Q255 (4QpapS ^a)	4QRule of the Community ^a	4Q402 (4QShirShabb ^c)	4QSongs of the Sabbath Sacrifice ^c
4Q256 (4QS ^b)	4QRule of the Community ^b	4Q403 (4QShirShabb ^d)	4QSongs of the Sabbath Sacrifice ^d
4Q257 (4QpapS ^c)	4QRule of the Community ^c	4Q404 (4QShirShabb ^e)	4QSongs of the Sabbath Sacrifice ^e
4Q258 (4QS ^d)	4QRule of the Community ^d	4Q405 (4QShirShabb ^f)	4QSongs of the Sabbath Sacrifice ^f
4Q259 (4QS ^e) + 4Q319 (4QOtot)	4QRule of the Community ^e + 4QOtot	4Q406 (4QShirShabb ^g)	4QSongs of the Sabbath Sacrifice ^g
4Q260 (4QS ^f)	4QRule of the Community ^f	4Q407 (4QShirShabb ^h)	4QSongs of the Sabbath Sacrifice ^h
4Q261 (4QS ^g)	4QRule of the Community ^g	4Q408	4QMorning and Evening Prayer
4Q262 (4QS ^h)	4QRule of the Community ^h	4Q415	4QInstruction ^a
4Q263 (4QS ⁱ)	4QRule of the Community ⁱ	4Q416	4QInstruction ^b
4Q264 (4QS ^j)	4QRule of the Community ^j	4Q417	4QInstruction ^c
4Q264a (4QHalakhah B)	4QHalakhah B	4Q418	4QInstruction ^d
4Q266 (4QD ^a)	4QDamascus Document ^a	4Q418a	4QInstruction ^e
4Q267 (4QD ^b)	4QDamascus Document ^b	4Q418c	4QInstruction ^f
4Q268 (4QD ^c)	4QDamascus Document ^c	4Q423	4QInstruction ^g
4Q269 (4QD ^d)	4QDamascus Document ^d	4Q421	4QWays of Righteousness ^b
4Q270 (4QD ^e)	4QDamascus Document ^e	4Q427 (4QH ^a)	4QHodayot ^a
4Q271 (4QD ^f)	4QDamascus Document ^f	4Q428 (4QH ^b)	4QHodayot ^b
4Q272 (4QD ^g)	4QDamascus Document ^g	4Q429 (4QH ^c)	4QHodayot ^c
4Q278 (4QTohorot C ?)	4QPurification Rules C	4Q430 (4QH ^d)	4QHodayot ^d
4Q280	4QCurses	4Q431 (4QH ^e)	4QHodayot ^e
4Q285 (4QSM)	4QSefer ha-Milhamah	4Q432 (4QH ^f)	4QHodayot ^f
4Q286 (4QBer ^a)	4QBlessings ^a	4Q434 (4QBarki Napshi ^a)	4QBless, Oh my Soul ^a
4Q287 (4QBer ^b)	4QBlessings ^b	4Q435 (4QBarki Napshi ^b)	4QBless, Oh my Soul ^b
4Q288 (4QBer ^c)	4QBlessings ^c	4Q436 (4QBarki Napshi ^c)	4QBless, Oh my Soul ^c
4Q289 (4QBer ^d)	4QBlessings ^d	4Q437 (4QBarki Napshi ^d)	4QBless, Oh my Soul ^d
4Q299 (4QMyst ^a)	1QMysteries ^a	4Q438 (4QBarki Napshi ^e)	4QBless, Oh my Soul ^e
4Q300 (4QMyst ^b)	1QMysteries ^b	4Q444	4QIncantation
4Q301 (4QMyst ^c ?)	1QMysteries ^c (?)	4Q457b	4QEschatological Hymn
4Q318 (4QBr ar)	4QBrontologion	4Q461	4QNarrative B
4Q320 (4QCalendrical Doc A)	4QCalendrical Document A	4Q464	4QExposition on the Patriarchs
4Q321 (4QCalendrical Doc B ^a)	4QCalendrical Document B ^a	4Q491c	4QSelf-Glorification Hymn ^b
4Q364 (4QRP ^b)	4QReworked Pentateuch ^b	4Q503 (4QpapPrQuot)	4QDaily Prayers ^a
4Q365 (4QRP ^c)	4QReworked Pentateuch ^c	4Q504 (4QDibHam ^a)	4QWords of the Luminaries ^a
4Q365a (4QTemple?)	4QReworked Pentateuch ^c	4Q505 (4QpapDibHam ^b)	4QWords of the Luminaries ^b ?
4Q366 (4QRP ^d)	4QReworked Pentateuch ^d	4Q506 (4QDibHam ^c)	4QWords of the Luminaries ^c
4Q367 (4QRP ^e)	4QReworked Pentateuch ^e
4Q369 (4QPEenosh?)	4QPrayer of Enosh (?)
4Q370	4QExhortation Based on the Flood
4Q372 (4QapocrJoseph ^b)	4QApocryphon of Joseph ^b
4Q375 (4QapocrMoses ^a)	4QApocryphon of Moses ^a
4Q376 (4QapocrMoses ^b ?)	4QApocryphon of Moses ^b ?
4Q377 (4QapocrPent B)	4QApocryphon Pentateuch B

4Q507 (4QPrFêtes ^{a?})	4QFestival Prayers ^a (?)	4Q541 (4QapocrLevi ^{b?} ar)	4QApocryphon of Levi ^b (?) ar
4Q508 (4QPrFêtes ^{b?})	4QFestival Prayers ^b (?)	4Q554 (4QNJ ^a ar)	2QNew Jerusalem ^a ar
4Q509 + 4Q505 (4QPrpapFêtes ^c)	4QFestival Prayers ^c	4Q554a (4QNJ ^b ar)	2QNew Jerusalem ^b ar
4Q511 (4QShir ^b)	4QSongs of the Sage ^b	4Q555 (4QNJ ^c ar)	2QNew Jerusalem ^c ar
4Q512 (4QpapRitPur B)	4QRitual of Purification B	4Q558	4QVision ^b ar
4Q521	4QMessianic Apocalypse	4Q560	4QExorcism ar
4Q522 (4QapocrJosué ^{c?})	4QProphecy of Joshua	5Q11 (5QS)	5QRule of the Community
4Q525 (4QBéat)	4QBeatitudes	5Q15 (5QNJ ar)	5QNew Jerusalem ar
4Q530 (4QEnGiants ^b ar)	4QBook of Giants ^b ar	11Q5 (11QPs ^a)	11QPsalms ^a
4Q531 (4QEnGiants ^c ar)	4QBook of Giants ^c ar	11Q10 (11QtgJob)	11QTargum of Job
4Q532 (4QEnGiants ^d ar)	4QBook of Giants ^d ar	11Q11 (11QapocrPs)	11QApocryphal Psalms
4Q533	4QGiants or Pseudo- Enoch ar	11Q13 (11QMelch)	11QMelchizedek
4Q539 (4QapocrJoseph B ar)	4QApocryphon of Joseph B ar	11Q14 (11QSM)	11QSefer ha-Milhamah
		11Q18 (5QNJ ar)	11QNew Jerusalem ar
		11Q19 (11QT ^a)	11QTemple ^a

Wadi Murabbaʿat

Mur 20	papMarriage Contract ar
--------	-------------------------

Naḥal Ḥever

5/6Hev 10	papMarriage Contract ar [P.Yadin 10] (BA bdl. 7c)
5/6Hev 26	papSummons and Reply gr [P.Yadin 26] (BA bdl. 9)
5/6Hev 34	papPetition gr [P.Yadin 34] (BA bdl. 12)
5/6Hev 52	papLetter gr [P.Yadin 52] (BK bdl. 2)

Naḥal Ḥever/Seiyl

XḤev/Se 69	papCancelled Marriage Contract gr
------------	-----------------------------------

Targumic Texts

Frg. Tg.	Fragmentary Targum	Tg. Neof.	Targum Neofiti
Tg. Esth. I, II	First or Second Targum of Esther	Tg. Onq.	Targum Onqelos
Tg. Isa.	Targum Isaiah	Tg. Ps.-J.	Targum Pseudo-Jonathan
Tg. Jon.	Targum Jonathan	Tg. Yer. I	Targum Yeruśalmi I
Tg. Neb.	Targum of the Prophets	Tg. Yer. II	Targum Yeruśalmi II

Tractates in the Mishnah, Tosefta and Talmud

m.	Mishnah	ʿEd.	ʿEduyyot
t.	Tosefta	ʿErub.	ʿErubin
b.	Babylonian Talmud	Giṭ.	Giṭṭin
y.	Jerusalem Talmud	Ḥag.	Ḥagigah
ʿAbod. Zar.	ʿAbodah Zarah	Ḥul.	Ḥullin
ʾAbot	ʾAbot	Kel.	Kelim
ʿArak.	ʿArakin	Ketub.	Ketubbot
B. Bat.	Baba Batra	Kil.	Kilʿayim
B. Mešiʿa	Baba Mešiʿa	Maʿas. Š.	Maʿaśer Šeni
B. Qam.	Baba Qamma	Meg.	Megillah
Bek.	Bekorot	Meʿil.	Meʿilah
Ber.	Berakot	Menah.	Menahot
Bik.	Bikkurim	Mid.	Middot
Demai	Demai	Ned.	Nedarim

Nid.	Niddah	Šeqal.	Šeqalim
’Ohol.	’Oholot	Sotah	Sotah
’Or.	’Orlah	Sukkah	Sukkah
Parah	Parah	Ta’an.	Ta’anit
Pe’ah	Pe’ah	Tamid	Tamid
Pesaḥ.	Pesaḥim	Ṭehar.	Ṭeharot
Qidd.	Qiddušin	Ter.	Terumot
Roš Haš.	Roš Haššanah	Ṭ. Yom	Ṭebul Yom
Šabb.	Šabbat	Yad.	Yadayim
Sanh.	Sanhedrin	Yebam.	Yebamot
Šeb.	Šebi’it	Yoma	Yoma (= Kippurim)
Šebu.	Šebu’ot

Other Rabbinic Works

’Abot R. Nat.	’Abot de Rabbi Nathan	Pirqe R. El.	Pirqe Rabbi Eliezer
Bab.	Babylonian	Rab.	(biblical book +) Rabbah
Mek.	Mekilta	S. Eli. Rab.	Seder Eliyahu Rabbah
Midr.	Midrash (+ biblical book)	Sem.	Semaḥot
Pesiq. Rab.	Pesiqta Rabbati	Sipra	Sipra
Pesiq. Rab Kah.	Pesiqta de Rab Kahana	Sipre	Sipre
Pirqe ’Abot	Pirqe ’Abot	Tanḥ.	Tanḥuma

Apostolic Fathers

1-2 Clem.	1-2 Clement	Ign. Phld.	Ignatius, To the Philadelphians
Barn.	Epistle of Barnabas	Ign. Rom.	Ignatius, To the Romans
Did.	Didache	Ign. Smyrn.	Ignatius, To the Smyrnaeans
Herm.	Shepherd of Hermas	Pol. Phil.	Polycarp, To the Philippians
Ign. Eph.	Ignatius, To the Ephesians

Nag Hammadi Codices

1 Apoc. Jas.	V,3 (First) Apocalypse of James
---------------------	--

New Testament Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha

Acts John	Acts of John	Gos. Nic.	Gospel of Nicodemus
Acts Pet.	Acts of Peter	Gos. Pet.	Gospel of Peter
Acts Thom.	Acts of Thomas	Gos. Thom.	Gospel of Thomas
Ap. Jas.	Apocryphon of James	Inf. Gos. Thom.	Infancy Gospel of Thomas

Papyri

P.Cair.	Papyri in the Cairo Museum	P.Lond.	Greek Papyri in the British Museum
P.Colon.	Köln Papyrus	P.Oxy.	Oxyrhynchus Papyrus
P.Dura	Dura-Europos Papyrus	P.Mur.	Murabba’at Papyrus
P.Egerton	Egerton Papyrus	P.Ryl.	Papyrus in the John Rylands Library
P.Fouad	Fouad Papyrus

Greek and Latin Works

Aelian (Claudius)		Clement of Alexandria
Var. hist.	Varia historia (Various History)	Protr.	Protrepticus (Exhortation to the Greeks)
Aeschylus		Quis div.	Quis dives salvetur (Salvation of the Rich)
Eum.	Eumenides	Strom.	Stromata (Miscellanies)
Appian		Curtius Rufus
Hist. rom.	Historia romana (Roman History)	Hist. Alex.	Historiae Alexandri magni (History of Alexander the Great)
Aristophanes		Cyprian
Plut.	Plutus (The Rich Man)	Ep.	Epistulae (Letters)
Ran.	Ranae (Frogs)	Demosthenes
Aristotle		Lacr.	Contra Lacritum (Against Lacritus)
Ath. pol.	Athenaion politeia (Constitution of Athens)	Mid.	In Midiam (Against Meidias)
Cael.	De caelo (Heavens)	Dio Cassius
Eth. nic.	Ethica nichomachea (Nichomachean Ethics)	Hist.	Historia romana (Roman History)
Pol.	Politica (Politics)	Dio Chrysostom
Rhet.	Rhetorica (Rhetoric)	Hom.	De Homero (Or. 53) (Homer)
Arnobius		Regn.	De regno (Or. 56) (Kingship)
Adv. gent.	Adversus gentes (Against the Heathens)	Diodorus Siculus
Athanasius		Bib. hist.	Bibliotheca historica (Library of History)
Inc.	De incarnatione (On the Incarnation)	Diogenes Laertius
Athenaeus		Vit.	Vitae philosophorum (Lives of Eminent Philosophers)
Deipn.	Deipnosophistae (Banquet of the Learned)	Dionysius of Halicarnassus
Augustine		Ant. rom.	Antiquitates romanae (Roman Antiquities)
Cons.	De consensu evangelistarum (Harmony of the Gospels)	Epictetus
Doctr. chr.	De doctrina christiana (On Christian Instruction)	Ench.	Enchiridion
Quaest. ev.	Quaestionum evangeliorum (Questions on the Gospels)	Epiphanius
Serm.	Sermones (Sermons)	Pan.	Panarion (Adversus haereses) (Refutation of All Heresies)
Serm. Dom.	De sermone Domini in monte (Sermon on the Mount)	Euripides
Tract. Ev. Jo.	In Evangelium Johannis tractatus (Treatise on Gospel of John)	Alc.	Alcestis
Aulus Cornelius Celsus		Eusebius
Med.	De medicina (On Medicine)	Dem. ev.	Demonstratio evangelica (Demonstration of the Gospel)
Cassius Dio		Hier.	Contra Hieroclem (Against Herocles)
Hist.	Historia romana (Roman History)	Hist. eccl.	Historia ecclesiastica (Ecclesiastical History)
Catullus		Praep. ev.	Praeparatio evangelica (Preparation for the Gospel)
Carm.	Carmina (Poems)	Galen
Chariton		Hipp. aph.	In Hippocratis aphorismos (On Hippocrates' Aphorisms)
Chaer.	De Chaerea et Callirhoe (Chaereas and Callirhoe)	Herodotus
Cicero		Hist.	Historiae (Histories)
Agr.	De lege agraria (On the Agrarian Law)	Hippolytus
Amic.	De amicitia (On Friendship)	Haer.	Refutatio omnium haeresium (Refutation of All Heresies)
Att.	Epistulae ad Atticum (Letters to Atticus)	Homer
Dom.	De domo sua (On His House)	Od.	Odyssea (Odyssey)
Fat.	De fato (On Fate)	Horace
Flac.	Pro Flacco (In Defense of Flaccus)	Sat.	Satirae (Satires)
Har. resp.	De harispicum responsis (On the Responses of the Haruspices)	Iamblichus
Nat. d.	De natura deorum (On the Nature of the Gods)	Vit. Pyth.	De vita pythagorica (On the Pythagorean Way of Life)
Orat.	De oratore (On the Orator)	Irenaeus
Prov. cons.	De provinciiis consularibus (On the Consular Provinces)	Haer.	Adversus haereses (Against Heresies)
Verr.	In Verrem (Against Gaius Verres)	Isocrates
		Panath.	Panathenaeus (Orat. 12)

Paneg.	Panegyricus (Orat. 4)		Is Unchangeable)
Jerome		Flacc.	In Flaccum (Against Flaccus)
Vir. ill.	De viris illustribus (On Illustrious Men)	Fug.	De fuga et inventione (On Flight and Finding)
John Chrysostom		Gig.	De gigantibus (On Giants)
Hom. Jo.	Homiliae in Joannem (Homily on John)	Her.	Quis rerum divinarum heres sit (Who Is the Heir?)
Hom. Matt.	Homiliae in Matthaeum (Homily on Matthew)	Hypoth.	Hypothetica (Hypothetica)
Josephus		Leg.	Legum allegoriae (Allegorical Interpretation)
Ag. Ap.	Against Apion (Contra Apionem)	Legat.	Legatio ad Gaium (On the Embassy to Gaius)
Ant.	Jewish Antiquities (Antiquitates judaicae)	Migr.	De migratione Abrahami (On the Migration of Abraham)
J. W.	Jewish War (Bellum judaicum)	Mos.	De vita Mosis (On the Life of Moses)
Life	The Life (Vita)	Mut.	De mutatione nominum (On the Change of Names)
Julius Africanus		Opif.	De opificio mundi (On the Creation of the World)
Frag.	Fragmenta (Fragments)	Plant.	De plantatione (On Planting)
Justin		Post.	De posteritate Caini (On the Posterity of Cain)
1 Apol.	Apologia i (First Apology)	Praem.	De praemiis et poenis (On Rewards and Punishments)
2 Apol.	Apologia ii (Second Apology)	Prob.	Quod omnis probus liber sit (That Every Good Person Is Free)
Dial.	Dialogus cum Tryphone (Dialogue with Trypo)	QE	Quaestiones et solutiones in Exodum (Questions and Answers on Exodus)
Justinian		QG	Quaestiones et solutiones in Genesin (Questions and Answers on Genesis)
Nov.	Novellae (Novels)	Sacr.	De sacrificiis Abelis et Caini (On the Sacrifices of Cain and Abel)
Livy		Somn.	De somniis (On Dreams)
Hist.	The History of Rome (Ab urbe condita libri)	Spec.	De specialibus legibus (On the Special Laws)
Lucian		Virt.	De virtutibus (On the Virtues)
Philops.	Philopseudes (The Love of Lies)	Philostratus
Musc. laud.	Muscae laudatio (The Fly)	Vit. Apoll.	Vita Apollonii (Life of Apollonius)
Marcus Aurelius		Pindar
Comm.	Commentariorum quos ipse sibi scripsit (Meditations)	Isthm.	Isthmionikai (Isthmian Odes)
Martial		Pyth.	Pythionikai (Pythian Odes)
Epig.	Epigrammata (Epigrams)	Plato
Menander		Crat.	Cratylus
Dysk.	Dyskolos (The Misanthrope)	Leg.	Leges (Laws)
Origen		Phaedr.	Phaedrus
Cels.	Contra Celsum (Against Celsus)	Prot.	Protagoras
Comm. Jo.	Commentarii in evangelium Joannis (Commentary on Gospel of John)	Resp.	Respublica (Republic)
Comm. Matt.	Commentarium in evangelium Matthaei (Commentary on Matthew's Gospel)	Soph.	Sophista (Sophist)
Frag.	Fragmenta (Fragments)	Symp.	Symposium
Or.	De oratione (On Prayer)	Plautus
Papias		Trin.	Trinummus (Three Pieces of Money)
Frag.	Fragmenta (Fragments)	Pliny the Elder
Pausanius		Nat.	Naturalis historia (Natural History)
Descr.	Graeciae descriptio (Description of Greece)	Pliny the Younger
Petronius		Ep.	Epistulae (Letters)
Sat.	Satyricon	Plutarch
Philo		Adul. amic.	Quomodo adulator ab amico internoscatur (How to Tell a Flatterer from a Friend)
Abr.	De Abrahamo (On the Life of Abraham)	Adv. Col.	Adversus Colotem (Against Colotes)
Cher.	De cherubim (On the Cherubim)	Aem.	Aemilius Paullus
Conf.	De confusione linguarum (On the Confusion of Tongues)	Ages.	Agesilaus (Life of Agesilaus)
Congr.	De congressu eruditionis gratia (On the Preliminary Studies)
Contempl.	De vita contemplativa (On the Contemplative Life)
Decal.	De decalogo (On the Decalogue)
Det.	Quod deterius potiori insidari soleat (That the Worse Attacks the Better)
Deus	Quod Deus sit immutabilis (That God

Cam.	Camillus (Life of Camillus)	Strabo
Cat. Maj.	Cato Major (Cato the Elder)	Geogr.	Geographica (Geography)
Galb.	Galba (Life of Galba)	Suetonius
Lyc.	Lycurgus (Life of Lycurgus)	Aug.	Divus Augustus (Augustus)
Mor.	Moralia (Morals)	Cal.	Gaius Caligula (Caligula)
Per.	Pericles (Life of Pericles)	Claud.	Divus Claudius (Claudius)
Quaest. conv.	Quaestionum convivialum libri IX (Table Talk)	Dom.	Domitianus (Domitian)
Suav. viv.	Non posse suaviter vivi secundum Epicurum (It is Impossible to Live Pleasantly in the Manner of Epicurus)	Gramm.	De grammaticis (On Grammarians)
Superst.	De superstition (On Superstition)	Vesp.	Vespasianus (Vespasian)
Polybius		Tacitus
Hist.	Historiae (Histories)	Agr.	Agricola
Quintilian		Ann.	Annales (Annals)
Inst.	Institutio oratoria (Institutes of Oratory)	Hist.	Historiae (Histories)
Rufinus		Tertullian
Hist.	Eusebii Historia ecclesiastica a Rufino translate et continuata (Eusebius' Ecclesiastical History Translated by Rufinus and Continued)	Apol.	Apologeticus (Apology)
Seneca		Bapt.	De baptismo (Baptism)
Ben.	De beneficiis (On Benefits)	Marc.	Adversus Marcionem (Against Marcion)
Const. sap.	De constantia sapientis (On the Constancy of the Wise Man)	Thucydides
Marc.	Ad Marciam de consolatione (To Marcia on Consolation)	Pel.	The Peloponnesian War
Ep.	Epistulae morales (Moral Epistles)	Valerius Maximus
Vit. beat.	De vita beata (On a Happy Life)	Fact. dict.	Factorum et dictorum memorabilium libri IX (Memorable Doings and Sayings)
		Virgil
		Ecl.	Eclogae (Eclogues, or Bucolics)
		Xenophon
		Ages.	Agesilaus
		Anab.	Anabasis
		Hell.	Hellenica
		Mem.	Memorabilia

Periodicals, Reference Works and Serials

AARAS	American Academy of Religion Academy Series	ATANT	Abhandlungen zur Theologie des Alten und Neuen Testaments
AASF	Annales Academiae scientiarum fennicae	ATLABS	ATLA Bibliography Series
AB	Anchor Bible	AThRSup	Anglican Theological Review: Supplement Series
ABG	Arbeiten zur Bibel und ihrer Geschichte	ATR	Australasian Theological Review
ABRL	Anchor Bible Reference Library	AUSS	Andrews University Seminary Studies
ABD	Anchor Bible Dictionary , ed. D. N. Freedman (6 vols.; New York: Doubleday, 1992)	AUSTR	American University Studies: Theology and Religion
ACCS	Ancient Christian Commentary on Scripture	AYB	Anchor Yale Bible
AE	Année épigraphique	BABELAO	Bulletin de l'Académie Belge pour l'Etude des Langues Anciennes et Orientales
AGJU	Arbeiten zur Geschichte des antiken Judentums und des Urchristentums	BAFS	The Book of Acts in Its First-Century Setting
AGRL	Aspects of Greek and Roman Life	BAR	Biblical Archaeology Review
AJEC	Ancient Judaism and Early Christianity	BBB	Bonner biblische Beiträge
AJT	Asia Journal of Theology	BBC	Blackwell Bible Commentaries
AnBib	Analecta biblica	BBR	Bulletin for Biblical Research
AnGreg	Analecta gregoriana	BDAG	W. Bauer, F. W. Danker, W. F. Arndt and F. W. Gingrich, Greek-English Lexicon of the New Testament and Other Early Christian Literature (3rd ed.; Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1999)
ANRW	Aufstieg und Niedergang der römischen Welt: Geschichte und Kultur Roms im Spiegel der neueren Forschung , ed. H. Temporini and W. Haase (Berlin: de Gruyter, 1972-)	BEB	Biblioteca de Estudios Bíblicos
ANTC	Abingdon New Testament Commentaries	BECNT	Baker Exegetical Commentary on the New Testament
ARJ	Annual of Rabbinic Judaism	BETL	Bibliotheca ephemeridum theologicarum lovaniensium
ASNU	Acta seminarii neotestamentici upsaliensis
AsTJ	Asbury Theological Journal

BEvT	Beiträge zur evangelischen Theologie	CMRDM	Corpus monumentorum religionis dei Menis , ed. E. Lane (4 vols.; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1971-1978)
BfCT	Beiträge zur Förderung christlicher Theologie
BG	Biblische Gestalten	CNT	Companions to the New Testament
BGBE	Beiträge zur Geschichte der biblischen Exegese	COL	Christian Origins Library
BGU	Aegyptische Urkunden aus den Königlichen Staatlichen Museen zu Berlin, Griechische Urkunden (15 vols.; Berlin: Weidmann, 1895-1983)	ConBNT	Coniectanea biblica: New Testament Series
BHT	Beiträge zur historischen Theologie	ConBOT	Coniectanea biblica: Old Testament Series
Bib	Biblica	COQG	Christian Origins and the Question of God
BibEnc	Biblical Encounters	CPJ	Corpus papyrorum judaicarum , ed. V. Tcherikover (3 vols.; Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, for Magnes, 1957-1964)
BibInt	Biblical Interpretation
BibPost	The Bible and Postcolonialism	CPNIVC	College Press NIV Commentary
BibSem	The Biblical Seminar	CPSSup	Cambridge Philological Society: Supplementary Volumes
BibW	Biblical World
BIS	Biblical Interpretation Series	CRINT	Compendia rerum iudaicarum ad Novum Testamentum
BJS	Brown Judaic Studies
BMI	Bible and Its Modern Interpreters	CSCD	Cambridge Studies in Christian Doctrine
BNTC	Black's New Testament Commentaries	CSHJ	Chicago Studies in the History of Judaism
BR	Biblical Research	CSS	Cistercian Studies Series
BRS	Biblical Resource Series	CurBS	Currents in Research: Biblical Studies
BSac	Bibliotheca sacra	CurTM	Currents in Theology and Mission
BSHJ	Baltimore Studies in the History of Judaism	DJG	Dictionary of Jesus and the Gospels , ed. J. B. Green and S. McKnight (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1992)
BSL	Biblical Studies Library
BTB	Biblical Theology Bulletin	DK	Dialog der Kirchen
BTBCB	Brazos Theological Commentary on the Bible	DSD	Dead Sea Discoveries
		EBC	Expositor's Bible Commentary
BTNT	Biblical Theology of the New Testament	ECC	Eerdmans Critical Commentary
BTS	Biblical Tools and Studies	EcRev	Ecumenical Review
BW	The Bible in Its World	EDNT	Exegetical Dictionary of the New Testament , ed. H. Balz and G. Schneider (3 vols.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1990-1993)
BWANT	Beiträge zur Wissenschaft vom Alten und Neuen Testament
BZAW	Beihefte zur Zeitschrift für die alttestamentliche Wissenschaft	EH	Europäische Hochschulschriften
BZNW	Beihefte zur Zeitschrift für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft	Enc	Encounter
CahRB	Cahiers de la Revue biblique	ESW	Ecumenical Studies in Worship
CBET	Contributions to Biblical Exegesis and Theology	ETL	Ephemerides theologicae lovanienses
		ETSMS	Evangelical Theological Society Monograph Series
CBQ	Catholic Biblical Quarterly	ExAud	Ex Auditu
CBQMS	Catholic Biblical Quarterly Monograph Series	ExpTim	Expository Times
		FB	Forschung zur Bibel
CBR	Currents in Biblical Research	FCNTECW	Feminist Companion to the New Testament and Early Christian Writings
CC	Continental Commentaries
CGTC	Cambridge Greek Testament Commentary	FemTh	Feminist Theology
CGTSC	Cambridge Greek Testament for Schools and Colleges	FF	Foundations and Facets
		FFF	Foundations and Facets Forum
ChrCent	Christian Century	FH	Fides et Historia
CIG	Corpus inscriptionum graecarum	FRC	The Family, Religion, and Culture
CII	Corpus inscriptionum iudaicarum	FTMT	Fortress Texts in Modern Theology
CIJ	Corpus inscriptionum iudaicarum	GBS	Guides to Biblical Scholarship
CIL	Corpus inscriptionum latinarum	GHAW	Gods and Heroes of the Ancient World
CIRC	Cambridge Introduction to Roman Civilization	GIBM	The Collection of Ancient Greek Inscriptions in the British Museum , ed. C. T. Newton (4 vols.; Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1874-1916)
CIS	Corpus inscriptionum semiticarum
CJA	Christianity and Judaism in Antiquity	GNS	Good News Studies
ClAnt	Classical Antiquity	GOTR	Greek Orthodox Theological Review
CLS	Classical Literature and Society

GP	Gospel Perspectives	JETS	Journal of the Evangelical Theological Society
Greg	Gregorianum
GTJ	Grace Theological Journal	JFSR	Journal of Feminist Studies in Religion
HALOT	L. Koehler, W. Baumgartner and J. J. Stamm, The Hebrew and Aramaic Lexicon of the Old Testament , trans. and ed. under the supervision of M. E. J. Richardson (4 vols.; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1994-1999)	JGRCJ	Journal of Greco-Roman Christianity and Judaism
		JHC	Journal of Higher Criticism
		JHS	Journal of Hellenic Studies
		JITC	Journal of the Interdenominational Theological Center
HBT	Horizons in Biblical Theology	JJS	Journal of Jewish Studies
HCS	Hellenistic Culture and Society	JPSTC	JPS Torah Commentary
Herm	Hermeneia	JPT	Journal of Pentecostal Theology
HeyJ	Heythrop Journal	JPTSup	Journal of Pentecostal Theology: Supplement Series
HKAT	Handkommentar zum Alten Testament	JR	Journal of Religion
HSCP	Harvard Studies in Classical Philology	JRS	Journal of Roman Studies
HSM	Harvard Semitic Monographs	JSHJ	Journal for the Study of the Historical Jesus
HSS	Harvard Semitic Series	JSJ	Journal for the Study of Judaism in the Persian, Hellenistic, and Roman Periods
HTKNT	Herders theologischer Kommentar zum Neuen Testament		Journal for the Study of Judaism: Supplements
HTKNTSup	Herders theologischer Kommentar zum Neuen Testament: Supplementbände	JSJSup	Journal for the Study of the New Testament
HTR	Harvard Theological Review	JSNT	Journal for the Study of the New Testament: Supplement Series
HTS	Harvard Theological Studies	JSNTSup	Journal for the Study of the Old Testament
HUCA	Hebrew Union College Annual		Journal for the Study of the Old Testament: Supplement Series
HUCM	Monographs of the Hebrew Union College	JSOT	Journal for the Study of the Old Testament: Supplement Series
HUT	Hermeneutische Untersuchungen zur Theologie	JSOTSup	Journal for the Study of the Pseudepigrapha: Supplement Series
HvTSt	Hervormde theologiese studies	JSPSup	Journal of Semitic Studies
IBMR	International Bulletin of Missionary Research	JSS	Journal of Theological Interpretation
IBRB	Institute for Biblical Research Bibliography	JTI	Journal of Theological Studies
IBT	Interpreting Biblical Texts	JTS	Kerygma und Dogma
ICC	International Critical Commentary	KD	Kirche und Israel
IDB	The Interpreter's Dictionary of the Bible , ed. G. A. Buttrick (4 vols.; Nashville: Abingdon, 1962)	KI	Kritisch-exegetischer Kommentar über das Neue Testament
IEJ	Israel Exploration Journal	KKNT	Key Themes in Ancient History
IG	Inscriptiones graecae: Editio minor , ed. F. H. de Gaertingen and J. Kirchner (Berlin: de Gruyter, 1924-)	KTAH	Library of Biblical Studies
		LBS	Library of Biblical Theology
		LBT	LECTIO divina
IGLS	Inscriptions Grecques et Latines de la Syrie , ed. L. Jalabert and R. Mouterde (Paris, 1929-)	LD	Library of Early Christianity
IKZ	Internationale katholische Zeitschrift (Communio)	LEC	Library of Hebrew Bible/Old Testament Studies
ILS	Inscriptiones Latinae Selectae , ed. H. Dessau (Berlin, 1892-1916)	LHBOTS	Luke the Interpreter of Israel
Int	Interpretation	LII	Lexicon iconographicum mythologiae classicae , ed. H. C. Ackerman and J.-R. Gisler (8 vols.; Zurich: Artemis Verlag, 1981-1997)
IRT	Issues in Religion and Theology	LIMC	Greek-English Lexicon of the New Testament: Based on Semantic Domains , ed. J. P. Louw and E. A. Nida (2nd ed.; 2 vols.; New York: United Bible Societies, 1989)
ISACR	Interdisciplinary Studies in Ancient Culture and Religion	LN	Library of New Testament Studies
ISBE	International Standard Bible Encyclopedia , ed. G. W. Bromiley (4 vols.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1979-1988)	LNTS	Lutheran Quarterly
ITQ	Irish Theological Quarterly	LQ	Louvain Studies
IVPNTC	IVP New Testament Commentaries	LS	H. G. Liddell, R. Scott and H. S. Jones, A Greek-English Lexicon (9th ed., with rev. supplement; New York: Oxford University Press, 1996)
JAAR	Journal of the American Academy of Religion	LSJ	Library of Second Temple Studies
JBL	Journal of Biblical Literature
JBT	Jahrbuch für biblische Theologie
JC	Judaica et christiana
JECH	Journal of Early Christian History	LSTS

LTE	Library of Theological Ethics		graecarum , ed. W. Dittenberger (2 vols.; Leipzig: Hirzel, 1903-1905)
LTT	Library of Theological Translations		Oxford Theological Monographs
MBI	Methods in Biblical Interpretation	OTM	Old Testament Pseudepigrapha , ed. J. H. Charlesworth (2 vols.; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1983, 1985)
MBib	Le monde de la Bible	OTP	Old Testament Studies
MLBS	Mercer Library of Biblical Studies		Oudtestamentische Studiën
MNTS	McMaster New Testament Studies	OTS	Probleme der Ägyptologie
NAC	New American Commentary	OtSt	Paternoster Biblical Monographs
NACSBT	NAC Studies in Bible and Theology	PA	Paternoster Biblical and Theological Monographs
NCamBC	New Cambridge Bible Commentary	PBM	Publications of the Finnish Exegetical Society
NDBT	New Dictionary of Biblical Theology , ed. T. D. Alexander and B. S. Rosner (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2000)	PBTM	Papyri graecae magicae: Die griechischen Zauberpapyri , ed. K. Preisendanz (2 vols.; Stuttgart: Teubner, 1928-1931)
		PFES	Pillar New Testament Commentary
NEA	Near Eastern Archaeology		Presbyterion
Neot	Neotestamentica	PGM	Princeton Readings in Religion
NGS	New Gospel Studies		Perspectives in Religious Studies
NHMS	Nag Hammadi and Manichaean Studies		Princeton Seminary Bulletin
NIB	The New Interpreter's Bible , ed. L. E. Keck (12 vols.; Nashville: Abingdon, 2003)	PNTC	Paternoster Theological Monographs
		Presb	Pittsburgh Theological Monograph Series
NIBC	New International Biblical Commentary	PRR	Quaestiones disputatae
NICNT	New International Commentary on the New Testament	PRSt	Revue biblique
		PSB	Revista catalana de teología
NIDB	The New Interpreter's Dictionary of the Bible , ed. K. D. Sakenfeld (5 vols.; Nashville: Abingdon, 2009)	PTM	Religion and Society
		PTMS	Restoration Quarterly
NIDNTT	New International Dictionary of New Testament Theology , ed. C. Brown (4 vols.; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1975-1985)	QD	Review and Expositor
		RB	Revue de Qumran
NIDOTTE	New International Dictionary of Old Testament Theology and Exegesis , ed. W. A. VanGemeren (5 vols.; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1997)	RCT	Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart , ed. K. Galling (3rd ed.; 7 vols.; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1957-1965)
		RelSoc	Religions in the Graeco-Roman World
NIGTC	New International Greek Testament Commentary	ResQ	Revue d'histoire et de philosophie religieuses
		RevExp	Revista de interpretación bíblica latino-americana
NovT	Novum Testamentum	RevQ	Rivista biblica italiana
NovTSup	Novum Testamentum Supplements	RGG	Reading the New Testament
NRTh	La nouvelle revue théologique	RGRW	Recherches de science religieuse
NSBT	New Studies in Biblical Theology	RHPR	Reformed Theological Review
NTAbh	Neutestamentliche Abhandlungen	RIBLA	Religionsgeschichtliche Versuche und Vorarbeiten
NTD	Das Neue Testament Deutsch		Studien zur aussereuropäischen Christentums-geschichte
NTL	New Testament Library	RivB	Studien zum Alten und Neuen Testaments
NTM	New Testament Monographs	RNT	Scripta antiquitatis posterioris ad ethicam religionemque pertinentia (= Schriften der späteren Antike zu ethischen und religiösen Fragen)
NTMes	New Testament Message	RSR	Stuttgarter biblische Beiträge
NTOA	Novum Testamentum et Orbis Antiquus	RTR	Studies in the Bible and Early Christianity
NTS	New Testament Studies	RVV	Southern Baptist Journal of Theology
NTSCE	New Testament Studies in Contextual Exegesis	SAC	Studies in Biblical Literature
NTSI	The New Testament and the Scriptures of Israel	SANT	Society of Biblical Literature Academia Biblica
		SAPERE	Society of Biblical Literature Dissertation Series
NTT	New Testament Theology		Society of Biblical Literature Early Christianity and Its Literature
NTTS	New Testament Tools and Studies
NTTSD	New Testament Tools, Studies, and Documents	SBB
		SBEC
NVBS	New Voices in Biblical Studies	SBJT
OBO	Orbis biblicus et orientalis	SBL
OBT	Overtures to Biblical Theology	SBLAB
OCM	Oxford Classical Monographs
OCT	Oxford Centre Textbooks	SBLDS
OECGT	Oxford Early Christian Gospel Texts
OGIS	Orientis graeci inscriptiones selectae: Supplementum sylloges inscriptionum	SBLECL

SBLEJL	Society of Biblical Literature Early Judaism and Its Literature	StPB	Studia post-biblica
SBLMS	Society of Biblical Literature Monograph Series	Str-B	H. L. Strack and P. Billerbeck, Kommentar zum Neuen Testament aus Talmud und Midrasch (6 vols.; Munich: Beck, 1922-1961)
SBLRBS	Society of Biblical Literature Resources for Biblical Study	SubBi	Subsidia biblica
SBLSDL	Society of Biblical Literature Studies in Biblical Literature	SUNT	Studien zur Umwelt des Neuen Testaments
SBLSCS	Society of Biblical Literature Septuagint and Cognate Studies	SVTP	Studia in Veteris Testamenti Pseudepigraphica
SBLSP	Society of Biblical Literature Seminar Papers	SwJT	Southwestern Journal of Theology
SBLSymS	Society of Biblical Literature Symposium Series	TAD	Textbook of Aramaic Documents from Ancient Egypt , ed. and trans. B. Porten and A. Yardeni (4 vols.; Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, for Hebrew University, 1986-1999)
SBLTCS	Society of Biblical Literature Text-Critical Series	TANZ	Texte und Arbeiten zum neutestamentlichen Zeitalter
SBLTT	Society of Biblical Literature Texts and Translations	TAPA	Transactions of the American Philological Association
SBLWGRW	Society of Biblical Literature Writings of the Greco-Roman World	TAPS	Transactions of the American Philosophical Society
SBS	Stuttgarter Bibelstudien	TBN	Themes in Biblical Narrative
SBT	Studies in Biblical Theology	TBT	The Bible Today
ScrMin	Scripta minora	TC	TC: A Journal of Biblical Textual Criticism
SEG	Supplementum epigraphicum graecum	TDNT	Theological Dictionary of the New Testament , ed. G. Kittel and G. Friedrich, trans. G. W. Bromiley (10 vols.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1964-1976)
SemSt	Semeia Studies	TDOT	Theological Dictionary of the Old Testament , ed. G. J. Botterweck and H. Ringgren, trans. J. T. Willis, G. W. Bromiley and D. E. Green (15 vols.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1974-2004)
SFACS	South Florida Academic Commentary Series
SFCJ	University of South Florida International Studies in Formative Christianity and Judaism
SFSMD	Studia Francisci Scholten memoriae dicata
SHBC	Smith & Helwys Bible Commentary
SHJ	Studying the Historical Jesus
SHS	Scripture and Hermeneutics Series	TGT	Tesi gregoriana teologia
SJ	Studia judaica	THKNT	Theologischer Handkommentar zum Neuen Testament
SJC	Studies in Judaism and Christianity
SJCA	Studies in Judaism and Christianity in Antiquity	THNTC	Two Horizons New Testament Commentary
SJSI	Studia judaeoslavica	ThTo	Theology Today
SJT	Scottish Journal of Theology	TI	Theological Inquiries
SJTMS	Scottish Journal of Theology Monograph Supplements	TJ	Trinity Journal
SNTI	Studies in New Testament Interpretation	TJT	Toronto Journal of Theology
SNTSMS	Society for New Testament Studies Monograph Series	TLZ	Theologische Literaturzeitung
SNTU	Studien zum Neuen Testament und seiner Umwelt	TPINTC	Trinity Press International New Testament Commentaries
SNTW	Studies of the New Testament and Its World	TS	Theological Studies
SP	Sacra Pagina	TSAJ	Texte und Studien zum antiken Judentum
SPhilo	Studia philonica	TSJTSA	Texts and Studies of the Jewish Theological Seminary of America
SPHS	Scholars Press Homage Series	TTBC	Teach the Text Bible Commentary
SPNT	Studies on Personality in the New Testament	TTZ	Trierer theologische Zeitschrift
SPS	Studies in Peace and Scripture	TU	Texte und Untersuchungen
SR	Studies in Religion	TynBul	Tyndale Bulletin
SSG	Studies in the Synoptic Gospels	TZ	Theologische Zeitschrift
ST	Studia theologica	UBT	Understanding Biblical Themes
StAC	Studies in Antiquity and Christianity	UCNES	University of California Near Eastern Studies
STDJ	Studies on the Texts of the Desert of Judah	UNDLS	University of Notre Dame Liturgical Studies
StJud	Studies in Judaism	UTB	Uni-Taschenbücher
StPatr	Studia patristica	VCSup	Supplements to Vigiliae christianae
		VE	Vox evangelica

VF	Verkündigung und Forschung	WW	Word and World
VT	Vetus Testamentum	YNER	Yale Near Eastern Researches
VTSup	Supplements to Vetus Testamentum	ZECNT	Zondervan Exegetical Commentary on the New Testament
WBC	Word Biblical Commentary
WestBC	Westminster Bible Companion	ZNW	Zeitschrift für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft und die Kunde der älteren Kirche
WMANT	Wissenschaftliche Monographien zum Alten und Neuen Testament
WTJ	Westminster Theological Journal	ZS	Zacchaeus Studies
WUNT	Wissenschaftliche Untersuchungen zum Neuen Testament	ZTK	Zeitschrift für Theologie und Kirche

Transliteration of Hebrew and Greek

HEBREW

Consonants		Short Vowels	Long Vowels
ס = ם	ל = l	ֶ = a	אָ = â
ב = b	מ = m	ֵ = e	ִי = ê
ג = g	נ = n	ִ = i	ִי = î
ד = d	ס = s	ֹ = o	ִי = ô
ה = h	צ = c	ֻ = u	ִי = û
ו = w	פ = p		ֹ = ā
ז = z	צ = ş		ִי = ē
ח = ḥ	ק = q	ֹ = ă	ִי = ō
ט = ṭ	ר = r	ִי = ě
י = y	שׁ = ś	ִי = ě (if vocal)
כ = k	שׂ = š	ִי = ö
	ת = t

GREEK

A = A	θ = th	Π = P	ψ = ps
α = a	Ι = I	π = p	Ω = Ō
B = B	ι = i	Ρ = R	ω = ō
β = b	Κ = K	ρ = r	ῥ = Rh
Γ = G	κ = k	Σ = S	ῥ = rh
γ = g	Λ = L	σ/ς = s	ῥ = h
Δ = D	λ = l	Τ = T	γξ = nx
δ = d	Μ = M	τ = t	γγ = ng
Ε = E	μ = m	Υ = Y	αυ = au
ε = e	Ν = N	υ = y	ευ = eu
Ζ = Z	ν = n	Φ = Ph	ου = ou
ζ = z	Ξ = X	φ = ph	υι = yi
Η = Ē	ξ = x	Χ = Ch
η = ē	Ο = O	χ = ch
Θ = Th	ο = o	Ψ = Ps

Contributors

- Ådna, Jostein, DTheol. Professor of New Testament, School of Mission and Theology, Stavanger, Norway: Temple Act.
- Allison, Dale C., PhD. Richard J. Dearborn Professor of New Testament Studies, Princeton Theological Seminary, Princeton, New Jersey: Mountain and Wilderness.
- Anderson, Garwood P., PhD. Professor of New Testament and Greek, Nashotah House Theological Seminary, Nashotah, Wisconsin: Parables.
- Anderson, Kevin L., PhD. Associate professor, Asbury University, Wilmore, Kentucky: Resurrection.
- Bauckham, Richard, PhD, FBA, FRSE. Emeritus professor of New Testament, University of St Andrews, Scotland, and senior scholar, Ridley Hall, Cambridge, United Kingdom: Christology.
- Bauer, David R., PhD. Ralph W. Beeson Professor of Inductive Bible Studies and dean of the School of Biblical Interpretation, Asbury Theological Seminary, Wilmore, Kentucky: Genealogy.
- Baum, Armin D., DTheol. Professor of New Testament, Freie Theologische Hochschule Giessen, Giessen, Germany: Synoptic Problem.
- Bayer, Hans F., PhD. Professor and department head of New Testament, Covenant Theological Seminary, St. Louis, Missouri: Predictions of Jesus' Passion and Resurrection.
- Beaton, Richard, PhD. Founding partner, Marigold Associates LLC, Los Angeles, California: Authority and Power.
- Beers, Holly, PhD. Assistant professor of religious studies, Westmont College, Santa Barbara, California: Servant of Yahweh.
- Bell, Richard H., DTheol. Professor of theology, University of Nottingham, Nottingham, United Kingdom: Demon, Devil, Satan.
- Bennema, Cornelis, PhD. Senior lecturer in New Testament, Wales Evangelical School of Theology, Bridgend, Wales, United Kingdom: Wisdom.
- Bird, Michael F., PhD. Lecturer in theology, Ridley Melbourne Mission and Ministry College, Parkville, Australia: Christ; Sin, Sinner; Synoptics and John.
- Black, Stephanie L., PhD. Lecturer in biblical studies, Nairobi Evangelical Graduate School of Theology, Nairobi, Kenya: Sign of Jonah.
- Bock, Darrell L., PhD. Senior research professor of New Testament studies and executive director of cultural engagement at the Howard G. Hendricks Center for Christian Leadership and Cultural Engagement, Dallas Theological Seminary, Dallas, Texas: Blasphemy; Son of Man.
- Bond, Helen K., PhD. Senior lecturer in New Testament, University of Edinburgh, Edinburgh, United Kingdom: Herodian Dynasty; Pontius Pilate.
- Brown, Colin, PhD, DD. Senior professor of systematic theology, Fuller Theological Seminary, Pasadena, California: Quest of the Historical Jesus.
- Brown, Jeannine K., PhD. Professor of New Testament, Bethel Seminary San Diego, San Diego, California: Elder; Chronology; Justice, Righteousness; Matthew, Gospel of; Narrative Criticism.
- Burge, Gary M., PhD. Professor of New Testament, Wheaton College and Graduate School, Wheaton, Illinois: Commandment.
- Burnett, Fred W., PhD. Professor of religion, Anderson University, Anderson, Indiana: Wisdom.
- Burridge, Richard A., PhD. Dean and professor of biblical interpretation, King's College London, London, United Kingdom: Gospel: Genre.
- Carey, Holly J., PhD. Professor of biblical studies, Point University, West Point, Georgia: Amen.
- Chapman, David W., PhD. Professor of New Testament and archaeology, Covenant Theological Seminary, St. Louis, Missouri: Burial of Jesus.
- Chennattu, Rekha M., PhD. Professor of New Testament, Jnana-Deepa Vidyapeeth, Pontifical Institute of Philosophy and Religion, Pune, India: Lazarus.
- Clarke, Andrew D., PhD. Senior lecturer, University of Aberdeen, Aberdeen, United Kingdom: Slave, Servant.
- Cohick, Lynn H., PhD. Professor of New Testament, Wheaton College, Wheaton, Illinois: Judaism, Common; Pharisees; Trial of Jesus.
- Crump, David M., PhD. Professor of religion, Calvin College, Grand Rapids, Michigan: Prayer.
- Cummins, S. A., DPhil. Professor of religious stud- ies, Trinity Western University, Langley, British Columbia, Canada: John the Baptist.

- Dennis, John A., PhD. Lecturer in New Testament and director of the MA in Integrative Theology, London School of Theology, Middlesex, United Kingdom: Bread; Death of Jesus; Glory; Lamb of God.
- deSilva, David, PhD. Trustees' Distinguished Professor of New Testament and Greek, Ashland Theological Seminary, Ashland, Ohio: Clean and Unclean.
- Downs, David J., PhD. Associate professor of New Testament studies, Fuller Theological Seminary, Pasadena, California: Economics; Hellenism.
- du Toit, David S., DTheol, Habil. Professor, Faculty of Protestant Theology, Ludwig-Maximilians-Universität, Munich, Germany: Salvation.
- Dunn, James D. G., DD. Emeritus Lightfoot Professor of Divinity, Durham University, Chichester, United Kingdom: Law.
- Eddy, Paul R., PhD. Professor of biblical and theological studies, Bethel University, St. Paul, Minnesota: Cynics; Orality and Oral Transmission.
- Evans, Craig A., PhD. Payzant Distinguished Professor of New Testament, Acadia Divinity College, Wolfville, Nova Scotia, Canada: Jesus in Non-Christian Sources; Midrash; Typology.
- Ferguson, Everett, PhD. Distinguished Scholar in Residence, Abilene Christian University, Abilene, Texas: Baptism.
- Fitzgerald, John T., PhD. Professor of New Testament and Early Christianity, University of Notre Dame, Notre Dame, Indiana: Chreia/Aphorism.
- Fletcher-Louis, Crispin, DPhil. Independent scholar (independent.academia.edu/CrispinFletcher-Louis): Angels; Priest and Priesthood.
- González-Tejera, Awilda, ThD. Dallas, Texas: Latino/Latina Criticism.
- Goodacre, Mark, DPhil. Associate professor of religion, Duke University, Durham, North Carolina: Redaction Criticism.
- Graves, Michael W., PhD. Armerding Chair of Biblical Studies and associate professor of Old Testament, Wheaton College, Wheaton, Illinois: Languages of Palestine.
- Green, Joel B., PhD. Associate dean for the Center for Advanced Theological Studies and professor of New Testament interpretation, Fuller Theological Seminary, Pasadena, California: Gethsemane; Heaven and Hell; Historicisms and Historiography; Joy; Jubilee; Luke, Gospel of; Kingdom of God/Heaven; Passion Narrative; Transfiguration.
- Gupta, Nijay, PhD. Associate professor of biblical theology and exegesis, Northeastern Seminary of Roberts Wesleyan College, Rochester, New York: Fasting.
- Gurtner, Daniel M., PhD. Associate professor of New Testament, Bethel Seminary, St. Paul, Minnesota: Temple.
- Hagner, Donald A., PhD. George Eldon Ladd Professor Emeritus of New Testament and senior professor of New Testament, Fuller Theological Seminary, Pasadena, California: Anti-Semitism.
- Hartsock, J. Chad, PhD. Assistant professor of religion, Carson-Newman University, Jefferson City, Tennessee: Blindness and Deafness; Light and Darkness.
- Hays, Christopher M., DPhil. Profesor extraordinario, Institutio Universitario ISEDET, Buenos Aires, Argentina: Rich and Poor.
- Henderson, Timothy P., PhD. Adjunct professor of New Testament, North Central University, Minneapolis, Minnesota: Gospels: Apocryphal.
- Hernández, Juan, PhD. Professor of New Testament and early Christianity, Bethel University, St. Paul, Minnesota: Textual Criticism.
- Hill, Charles E., PhD. Professor of New Testament, Reformed Theological Seminary, Orlando, Florida: Canon.
- Hoehner, Harold W., PhD. Late professor of New Testament Studies, Dallas Theological Seminary, Dallas, Texas: Chronology.
- Huizenga, Leroy A., PhD. Chair, Department of Theology, University of Mary, Bismarck, North Dakota: Abraham, Isaac and Jacob.
- Humphrey, Edith M., PhD. William F. Orr Professor of New Testament, Pittsburgh Theological Seminary, Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania: Worship.
- Instone-Brewer, David, PhD. Senior research fellow in Rabbinics and the New Testament, Tyndale House, Cambridge, United Kingdom: Divorce; Rabbinic Traditions and Writings.
- Iverson, Kelly R., PhD. Associate professor of New Testament, Baylor University, Waco, Texas: Gentiles.
- Johnson, Andy, PhD. Professor of New Testament, Nazarene Theological Seminary, Kansas City, Missouri: Canon.

- souri: Theological Interpretation of the Gospels.
Kartveit, Magnar, DTh. Professor of Old Testament, School of Mission and Theology, Stavanger, Norway: Samaritans.
- Keener, Craig S., PhD. Professor of New Testament, Asbury Theological Seminary, Wilmore, Kentucky: John, Gospel of.
- Kellum, L. Scott, PhD. Associate professor of New Testament and Greek, Southeastern Baptist Theological Seminary, Wake Forest, North Carolina: Farewell Discourse.
- Klink III, Edward W., PhD. Associate professor of biblical and theological studies, Talbot School of Theology, Biola University, La Mirada, California: Freedom; Water.
- Koperski, Veronica, PhD, STD. Professor emerita of biblical theology, Barry University, Miami Shores, Florida: Mary, Mother of Jesus.
- Köstenberger, Andreas J., PhD., Dr. rer. soc. oec. Senior research professor of New Testament and biblical theology, Southeastern Baptist Theological Seminary, Wake Forest, North Carolina: Abiding; New Birth; Wine; Witness.
- Lawrence, Louise, PhD. Senior lecturer in New Testament studies, University of Exeter, Exeter, United Kingdom: Social Scientific Criticisms.
- Lewis, Karoline M., PhD. Alvin N. Rogness Chair of Homiletics and associate professor of biblical preaching, Luther Seminary, St. Paul, Minnesota: Shepherd, Sheep.
- Litwak, Kenneth D., PhD. Adjunct professor of New Testament, Azusa Pacific University, Azusa, California: Elijah and Elisha.
- Marshall, Maureen Yeung, PhD. Emeritus professor of biblical studies, Evangel Seminary, Hong Kong: Faith.
- McCabe, David R., PhD. Assistant professor of New Testament, Bethel College, Mishawaka, Indiana: Oaths and Swearing.
- McKnight, Scot, PhD. Professor of New Testament, Northern Seminary, Lombard, Illinois: Ethics of Jesus.
- McWhirter, Jocelyn, PhD. Associate professor of religious studies, Albion College, Albion Michigan: Bride, Bridegroom.
- Meadors, Edward P., PhD. Professor of New Testament, Taylor University, Upland, Indiana: Hardness of Heart.
- Mendez-Moratalla, Fernando, PhD. Professor of New Testament and academic vice-dean, Facultad Protestante de Teología Uebe, Madrid, Spain: Repentance.
- Miller, John B. F., PhD. Professor of religion, McMurry University, Abilene, Texas: Dreams and Visions.
- Miller, Susan E., PhD. Lecturer, Centre for Lifelong Learning, University of Aberdeen, Aberdeen, United Kingdom: Anointing.
- Miura, Yuzuru, PhD. Minister, Yokohama Yamate Christian Church, Yokohama, Japan: Son of David.
- Nicholson, Suzanne, PhD. Associate professor of biblical studies, Malone University, Canton, Ohio: Mercy.
- Nolland, John, PhD. Professor, Trinity College, Bristol, United Kingdom: Blessing and Woe; Sabbath.
- Novakovic, Lidija, PhD. Associate professor of religion, Baylor University, Waco, Texas: Israel; Mishnah; Typology.
- Oakes, Peter S., DPhil. Greenwood Senior Lecturer in the New Testament, University of Manchester, Manchester, United Kingdom: Rome.
- Olmstead, Wesley G., PhD. Academic vice president and associate professor of New Testament, Briercrest College and Seminary, Carleton Place, Saskatchewan, Canada: Judgment.
- Omiya, Tomohiro, PhD. Associate professor, Nagoya Gakuin University, Nagoya, Japan: Leprosy.
- Osborne, Grant R., PhD. Professor of New Testament, Trinity Evangelical Divinity School, Deerfield, Illinois: Elder; Life, Eternal Life.
- Painter, John, PhD. Professor of theology and research biblical scholar, Charles Sturt University, Canberra, Australia: Beloved Disciple; Wisdom; World.
- Pao, David W., PhD. Professor and chair of New Testament, Trinity Evangelical Divinity School, Deerfield, Illinois: Old Testament in the Gospels.
- Parsenios, George L., PhD. Associate professor of New Testament, Princeton Theological Seminary, Princeton, New Jersey: Incarnation.
- Perrin, Nicholas, PhD. Franklin S. Dyrness professor of biblical studies, Wheaton College, Wheaton, Illinois: Form Criticism; Jubilee; Last Supper; Mark, Gospel of; Q; Temple.
- Peters, Dorothy M., PhD. Adjunct professor, Trinity Western University, Langley, British Columbia, Canada: Dead Sea Scrolls; Essenes.

- Piotrowski, Nicholas G., PhD. Professor of biblical and theological studies, Crossroads Bible College, Indianapolis, Indiana: Nazarene.
- Pitre, Brant J., PhD. Professor of Sacred Scripture, Notre Dame Seminary, New Orleans, Louisiana: Apocalypticism and Apocalyptic Teaching.
- Popkes, Enno Edzard, DTheol. Professor of history and archeology of early Christianity, Institut für Neutestamentliche Wissenschaft und Judaistik, University of Kiel, Germany: Love, Love Command.
- Porter, Stanley E., PhD. President, dean and professor of New Testament, McMaster Divinity College, Hamilton, Ontario, Canada: Criteria of Authenticity.
- Powell, Mark Allan, PhD. Professor of New Testament, Trinity Lutheran Seminary, Columbus, Ohio: Table Fellowship.
- Powery, Emerson B., PhD. Professor of biblical studies, Messiah College, Mechanicsburg, Pennsylvania: Post-Colonial Criticism.
- Reeder, Caryn A., PhD. Associate professor, Westmont College, Santa Barbara, California: Child, Children; Family.
- Reynolds, Benjamin E., PhD. Associate professor of New Testament, Tyndale University College, Toronto, Ontario, Canada: Logos.
- Riesner, Rainer. DTheol, Habil. Professor of New Testament, Institut für Evangelische Theologie, University of Dortmund, Dortmund, Germany: Archeology and Geography; Galilee; Teacher.
- Rowland, Christopher, PhD. Dean Ireland's Professor of the Exegesis of Holy Scripture, University of Oxford, Oxford, United Kingdom: Prophets, Prophecy.
- Runesson, Anders, PhD. Associate professor, McMaster University, Hamilton, Ontario, Canada: Synagogue.
- Schadick, Stefan, DTheol. Privatdozent, University of Bonn, Bonn, Germany: Moses.
- Schellenberg, Ryan S., PhD. Assistant professor of biblical studies, Fresno Pacific University, Fresno, California: Eschatology; Peace.
- Schenck, Kenneth L., PhD. Dean and professor of New Testament, Wesley Seminary at Indiana Wesleyan University, Marion, Indiana: Gospel: Good News.
- Schnabel, Eckhard J., PhD. Mary F. Rockefeller Distinguished Professor of New Testament, Gordon-Conwell Theological Seminary, Hamilton, Massachusetts: Apostle; Mission.
- Scott, James M., DTheol. Professor of religious studies, Trinity Western University, Langley, British Columbia, Canada: Exile and Restoration; Gods, Greek and Roman.
- Shepherd, Michael B., PhD. Assistant professor of Old Testament and Hebrew, Louisiana College, Pineville, Louisiana: Targums.
- Smith, Mitzi J., PhD. Associate professor of New Testament and early Christian studies, Ashland Theological Seminary/Detroit, Southfield, Michigan: African-American Criticism; Feminist and Womanist Criticisms.
- Spencer, F. Scott, PhD. Professor of New Testament and biblical interpretation, Baptist Theological Seminary at Richmond, Richmond, Virginia: Forgiveness of Sins; Women.
- Spilsbury, Paul, PhD. Professor of New Testament and Christian origins, Ambrose University College, Calgary, Alberta, Canada: Josephus.
- Stanton, Graham N., PhD, DD. Late Lady Margaret's Professor of Divinity, University of Cambridge, Cambridge, United Kingdom: Q.
- Strauss, Mark L., PhD. Professor of New Testament, Bethel Seminary San Diego, San Diego, California: People, Crowd; Sadducees.
- Thellman, Gregory S., MA, PhD candidate. Lecturer in New Testament, Evangelical Theological Seminary, Osijek, Croatia: Scribes.
- Thompson, Marianne Meye, PhD. George Eldon Ladd Professor of New Testament, Fuller Theological Seminary, Pasadena, California: God.
- Twelftree, Graham H., PhD. Charles L. Holman Professor of New Testament and Early Christianity, Regent University, Virginia Beach, Virginia: Church; Feasts; Miracles and Miracle Stories; Sanhedrin.
- Van der Watt, Jan G., DD, DLitt. University professor for source texts of Christianity, Radboud University Nijmegen, Nijmegen, The Netherlands: Salvation.
- Van Voorst, Robert E., PhD. Professor of New Testament, Western Theological Seminary, Holland, Michigan: Jesus in Non-Christian Sources.
- Vinson, Richard B., PhD. Associate dean and professor of religion, Salem College, Winston-Salem, North Carolina: Hypocrite; Songs and Hymns.

- Wahlen, Clinton L., PhD. Professor of New Testament and associate director, Biblical Research Institute, Silver Spring, Maryland: Healing.
- Wall, Robert W., DTheol. Paul T. Wells Professor of Scripture and Wesleyan Studies, Seattle Pacific University, Seattle, Washington: Canonical Criticism.
- Walton, Steve, PhD. Honorary Research Fellow, Tynedale House, Cambridge, United Kingdom: Ascension; Jerusalem.
- Watson, Duane F., PhD. Professor of New Testament studies, Malone University, Canton, Ohio: Gospels: History of Interpretation.
- Watts, Rikk E., PhD. Professor of New Testament, Regent College, Vancouver, British Columbia, Canada: Triumphal Entry.
- Wenk, Matthias, PhD. Lecturer in biblical studies, InstitutPlus, Baar, Switzerland, and pastor, BewegungPlus, Burgdorf, Switzerland: Holy Spirit.
- Wilkins, Michael J., PhD. Distinguished Professor of New Testament and dean of the faculty, Talbot School of Theology, Biola University, La Mirada, California: Disciples and Discipleship; Temptation of Jesus.
- Williams, Catrin H., PhD. Senior lecturer in New Testament studies, University of Wales Trinity Saint David, Lampeter, Wales, United Kingdom: “I Am” Sayings.
- Williamson, H. G. M., PhD, DD, FBA. Regius Professor of Hebrew and Student of Christ Church, University of Oxford, Oxford, United Kingdom: Samaritans.
- Winn, Adam, PhD. Affiliate faculty, lecturer in New Testament, Fuller Theological Seminary, Pasadena, California: Son of God.
- Witherington, Ben III, PhD. Professor of New Testament, Asbury Theological Seminary, Wilmore, Kentucky: Lord.
- Yamazaki-Ransom, Kazuhiko, PhD. President, Revival Biblical Seminary, Shinshiro, Japan: Lord; Revolutionary Movements.
- Yang, Seung Ai, PhD. Associate professor of New Testament, Chicago Theological Seminary, Chicago: Sermon on the Mount/Plain.
- Young, Stephen E., PhD. Assistant professor of New Testament, Fuller Theological Seminary, Houston, Texas: Birth of Jesus.

A

ABIDING

“Abiding” is the Johannine way of speaking of believers’ need to live their lives in close communion with Christ. Over half of the 118 NT occurrences of the word menō (“to abide” or “to remain”) are found in the Johannine corpus (40x in John’s Gospel and 27x in the Johannine Epistles, compared with three references in Matthew, two in Mark and seven in Luke). Believers’ need to “abide” in Christ, in turn, is presented as part of John’s trinitarian mission theology, according to which Jesus’ followers are taken up into the love, unity and mission of Father, Son and Spirit and charged to continue Jesus’ mission until he returns.

1. Old Testament Roots
2. “Abiding” in John’s Gospel
3. Affinities with Other New Testament Teaching and the Question of “Johannine Mysticism”

1. Old Testament Roots.

John’s teaching, for its part, builds on the OT teaching that God “remains forever” (Ps 9:7), as do his authority, counsel and word (Ps 33:11; 102:12; Is 40:8). What is more, the Davidic offspring and his authority will endure (Ps 89:36), and just as the new heavens and the new earth will remain, the offspring and name of the faithful will last as well (Is 66:22). Building on this foundation, John teaches that Jesus, the *Son and the *Christ, remains forever (Jn 8:35; 12:34), and that he will enable his followers to bear fruit that remains as long as they remain in him (Jn 15:16).

More broadly, John’s “abiding” theology is part of the biblical trajectory of new-covenant theology, which promises a “new heart” and the presence of God’s *Spirit in the new-covenant community, cleansing believers both individually and corporately and enabling them to obey God’s *commandments (e.g., Jer 31:31-34; Ezek 11:19-20; 36:25-27) (see

New Birth). Although this expectation will find its ultimate consummation in the eternal state (Rev 21:3; cf. Lev 26:11-12), John makes clear that it is already a reality in the community of Spirit-indwelt believers in Jesus the Messiah.

2. “Abiding” in John’s Gospel.

Particularly in the first part of his Gospel John casts Jesus’ relationship with his followers as a typical first-century Palestinian rabbi-disciple relationship. Jesus is frequently and habitually addressed by his disciples and others as “rabbi” (Jn 1:38, 49; 3:2; 4:31; 6:25; 11:8; 20:16), which indicates that Jesus’ contemporaries perceived him first and foremost as a Jewish religious *teacher. Accordingly, Jesus is shown to relate to his followers in keeping with the pattern observed by first-century A.D. Jewish rabbis: teaching by example, verbal instruction and didactic actions (Jn 2:13-22; 13:1-17), and providing for and protecting those under his charge. The disciples’ relationship with Jesus involved living with him (Jn 1:39; 3:22) and following him wherever he went. They made inquiries regarding the significance of Jesus’ actions and engaged in extended dialogue with him, performed acts of service (Jn 4:8; 6:5, 10, 12), and buried their deceased teacher.

In keeping with this characterization of Jesus’ relationship with his disciples, Jesus in John’s Gospel, and here particularly in his *farewell discourse, urges his followers to remain (menō) faithful to him after his departure. Initially, “remaining with Jesus” had simply meant for Jesus’ first followers to spend the evening with Jesus (Jn 1:38-39). Yet already in John 6:56 the term occurs with a more comprehensive connotation. In John 8:31 “remaining in Jesus” involves continual holding to his teaching. The majority of theologically significant instances of menō are found in John 14–15, with ten references in John 15:4-10 alone. The disciples must abide in Jesus, in particular in his love, by obeying his commandments (Jn 15:9-10). The vine metaphor in John 15 illustrates the close-knit relationship that Jesus desires with his disciples (cf. Jn 10). The absence of the otherwise ubiquitous word pisteuō ("to believe") in John 15 suggests that "to remain" is the metaphorical equivalent of "to believe" in John's Gospel (see Faith).

3. Affinities with Other New Testament Teaching and the Question of "Johannine Mysticism."

John's teaching on believers' needing to remain in Christ finds little precedent in the Synoptic Gospels. The only thing said with regard to discipleship there is that Jesus' followers are called to be "with Jesus" during his earthly ministry (Mk 3:14), and that they must continue to follow him until he returns (e.g., Mk 8:34; 13:13). John's "abiding" theology fleshes out how believers will be able to sustain spiritual communion with Christ subsequent to his *ascension. In its original setting—the farewell discourse, which is unique to John's Gospel—Jesus is shown to prepare his followers for the period following his exaltation subsequent to the events surrounding the *crucifixion (e.g., Jn 14:12, 28).

By speaking of believers' need to remain in Christ, John is not espousing a form of Christian mysticism. To the contrary, a stark contrast obtains between the kind of mutual indwelling spoken of in John's Gospel and the pagan notion of a person's absorption into the divine as part of entering into some form of mystical spiritual communion. John's theology of "abiding" does not involve an immersion into a trancelike state or other forms of ecstasy. Instead, John speaks of remaining in Jesus' teaching and of abiding in his love by remaining united with Jesus in and through the "other helping presence" (paraklētos), the *Holy Spirit, once Jesus has been exalted with God (Jn 14:16, 26; 15:26; 16:7).

See also FAITH; HOLY SPIRIT.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. I. de la Potterie, "L'emploi du verbe 'demeurer' dans la mystique johannique," NRT 117 (1995) 843-59; C. S. Keener, "The Johannine Meaning of 'Abiding,'" in The Gospel of John: A Commentary (2 vols.; Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 2003) 2:999-1000; A. J. Köstenberger, "Jesus as Rabbi in the Fourth Gospel," BBR 8 (1998) 97-128; idem, The Missions of Jesus and His Followers According to the Fourth Gospel (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1998); idem, John (BECNT; Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2004); idem, A Theology of John's Gospel and Letters (BTNT; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 2009); A. J. Köstenberger and S. R. Swain, Father, Son and Spirit: The Trinity and John's Gospel (NSBT 24; Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2007);

E. Malatesta, Interiority and Covenant: A Study of εἶναι ἐν and μένειν ἐν in the First Letter of Saint John (AnBib 69; Rome: Biblical Institute Press, 1978); J. W. Pryor, "Covenant and Community in John's Gospel," RTR 47 (1988) 44-51; H. Ridderbos, The Gospel According to John: A Theological Commentary, trans. J. Vriend (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1997); B. Whitefoord, "Abiding," in A Dictionary of Christ and the Gospels, ed. J. Hastings (2 vols.; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1906) 1:5-6.

A. J. Köstenberger

ABRAHAM, ISAAC AND JACOB

Jews and Christians regarded Abraham as the first Jew, and therefore it was incumbent on Jewish and Christian parties and sects to show how their particular communities, practices and beliefs were rooted in the patriarchal witness. The Gospels thus appropriate and interpret Abraham, Isaac and Jacob both as a collective triad and as individuals. The patriarchal triad appears in eschatological contexts. As the figure of Abraham is paradigmatic and thus constitutive for construals of religious identity, Abraham is presented as the father of Jewish Christian tradition. Allusions to Isaac identify him as a type of Christ. The figure of Jacob finds little mention as an individual, save for references to *Israel as a nation.

1. The Patriarchs in the Old Testament and Jewish Tradition
2. Matthew
3. Mark
4. Luke
5. John

1. The Patriarchs in the Old Testament and Jewish Tradition.

Whereas the OT portrays the divine covenants made with Adam and Eve and then Noah and his family as universal, the promises made to Abraham in Genesis 12-25 concern the establishment of a covenant with a particular people through a particular line (though that covenant will have universal import [see Gen 12:3; 17:4-6, 16; 18:18; 22:18]). Beginning with Abraham, the line runs through his son Isaac and Isaac's son Jacob, who receives the name "Israel," whose sons become the twelve tribes. In the OT the patriarchal triad functions to bind the God of Israel and his covenant people together, as either party calls on the other to remember their covenant commitments in times of distress (e.g., Ex 2:24) and in times of sin and rebellion (e.g., 2 Kings 13:23). Later tradition regards Abraham as the first Jew, who either never committed idolatry (L.A.B. 4:16-17) or who turned from it as the first proselyte to faith in the one true creator God of Israel (Jub. 11:16-17; Philo, Virt. 219; Her. 93-95; Josephus, Ant. 1.154-156; Apoc. Ab. 7-8; Gen Rab. 38:13). Abraham keeps the law's festivals and ordinance of circumcision before Moses (Jub. 15:20-34; Philo, Abr. 3-6, 275-76; Mig. 129-30; Josephus, Ant. 1.214; m. Ned. 3:11, t. Ned. 2:5; t. Ber. 6:12) as the one with whom God originally established the covenant (Jub. 14:20; 15:1-20; 22:1, 10-24; Pss. Sol. 9:9; 18:3; 4Q225 1, 4). Abraham is also an eschatological figure in some texts (Sib. Or. 2:245), while the legendary seven Maccabean brothers enduring martyrdom under Antiochus IV encourage themselves with the thought that the three great patriarchs "will welcome us" upon the deaths that they suffer for the sake of the law (4 Macc 13:13-17).

2. Matthew.

Matthew's Gospel evinces concern for true Abrahamic descent, establishes an Isaac typology and presents the patriarchal triad in eschatological contexts. R. Moberly contends that the Matthean Jesus is presented as the new Abraham, emulating the patriarch's obedience.

2.1. Abraham in Matthew. Abraham is mentioned in the *genealogy (Mt 1:1-17) and in *John the Baptist's words to the *Pharisees and *Sadducees (Mt 3:7-10). The Matthean genealogy begins with Abraham (Mt 1:2), suggesting to readers that the Gospel of Matthew is a particularly Jewish story. Salvation history begins with Abraham and culminates in Jesus, Abraham's ultimate heir and descendant (Mt 1:17). Through its references to the *Gentiles (e.g., Rahab in Mt 1:5; "the wife of Uriah" in Mt 1:6) the genealogy also provides hints of Gentile inclusion that come to fuller fruition later in Matthew (cf. Is 9:1-2 in Mt 4:12-16; Is 42:1-4 in Mt 12:17-21), finally realized by Jesus after the *resurrection (Mt 28:16-20), thus fulfilling the universal aspects of the divine promise to Abraham.

In Christian understanding incorporation into Abraham is crucial but is achieved through incorporation into Christ. Thus, in the Matthean story John's warning that Abrahamic descent is insufficient (Mt 3:7-10) is not merely concerned with the necessity of repentance and good works in general but particularly with Jesus Christ, the coming one, "who will baptize you with the Holy Spirit and with the fire" of the eschatological judgment (Mt 3:11-12).

2.2. Isaac in Matthew. Although Matthew's Gospel presents Isaac through the mechanism of allusion alone, his figure is crucial for Matthean *Christology (Huizenga). Both the Jesus of Matthew and the Isaac of Jewish tradition are promised children, irregularly conceived, on whom depend the divine promises; beloved sons who go obediently to their sacrificial deaths at the hands of their respective fathers at the season of Passover, at the location of the *temple, for salvific purposes (for Jewish interpretations of Isaac, see 2 Chron 3:1; Jub. 17:15-18:19; Jdt 8:24-27; 4Q225 2 II, 4-10; Philo, Mut. 131; Det. 124; Somn. 1.173; Leg. 3.219; Abr. 167-198; Sacr. 110; L.A.B. 18:5, 32:1-4; 40:1-5; 4 Macc 7:13-14; 13:8-12; 16:18-20; 18:10-11; Josephus, Ant. 1.222-36; Tg. Neof. Gen 22:10; Gen Rab. 56:8; see also 1 Clem. 31:1; Barn. 7:3).

2.2.1. The Figure of Isaac in Matthew 1. Matthew 1 alludes to Isaac three times. First, "Son of Abraham" (Mt 1:1) may evoke Isaac if the first verse is a title for the entire Gospel; two names are mentioned while the genealogy is tripartite, and hearing echoes of Isaac here presents a sacrificial typology complementing the messianic typology established by "Son of David." Second, R. Rosenberg contends that the gematria of the genealogy (Mt 1:2-17) points to Isaac, as it presents forty-two generations (three divisions of fourteen [Mt 1:17]), and as Jubilees 13:16; 17:15; 19:1 suggest that the binding of Isaac occurred at the outset of the forty-second *Jubilee after creation. Third, as both L. Huizenga and R. Erickson observe, the angel's birth announcement to Joseph (Mt 1:20-21) alludes to LXX Genesis 17:19 (see Birth of Jesus). In the former text the angel of the Lord says to Joseph, "Do not fear to take Mary as your wife [Marian tēn gynaiika sou]. . . . She will bear a son, and you will call his name Jesus [texetai de huion kai kaleseis to onoma autou Iēsoun]," while in the latter text God says to Abraham, "Sarah your wife will bear you a son, and you will call his name Isaac" (Sarra hē gynē sou texetai soi huion kai kaleseis to onoma autou Isaak). God becomes a type of the angel, Abraham a type of Joseph, Sarah a type of *Mary, and Isaac a type of Jesus. Rhetorically, the allusion buttresses the possibility of the virginal conception: if God opened the womb of elderly, barren Sarah, God also is able to open the womb of young, healthy Mary.

2.2.2. Hearing Heavenly Voices. The heavenly voices at the *baptism (Mt 3:17) and *transfiguration (Mt 17:5) allude to Genesis 22:2, 12, 16. The former texts call Jesus "my beloved son" (ho huios mou ho agapētos), while the latter texts employs the same Greek with reference to Isaac. The Isaac typology established by the allusion in the scene of the Matthean baptism informs both the crowd and Jesus himself of his sacrificial vocation, whereas the typology in the scene of the transfiguration reminds Peter of Jesus' sacrificial vocation in the face of overwhelming *glory.

2.2.3. Gethsemane and the Arrest of Jesus (Mt 26:36-56). The Matthean passion narrative emphasizes Jesus' obedience, part and parcel of which is an Isaac typology found in the *Gethsemane and arrest sequence. In Matthew 26:36-56 Jesus tells the disciples with him, "Sit here [kathisate autou] while I go over there and pray" (Mt 26:36), while in LXX Genesis 22:5 Abraham tells his servants to "sit here" (kathisate autou) while he and Isaac worship. More decisively, in the Matthean sequence a crowd "with swords and clubs" (meta machairôn kai xylôn [Mt 26:47, 55]) comes and lays hands on Jesus (epebalon tas cheiras epi ton Iēsoun [Mt 26:50]), after which one of the Twelve stretches forth his hand to take his sword (ekteinas tēn cheira . . . tēn machairan [Mt 26:51]), precipitating Jesus' warning about the fate befalling those who take the sword (hoi labontes machairan [Mt 26:52]). In Genesis 22 Abraham wields a "knife" (machairan [LXX Gen 22: 6, 10]) and "wood" (xyla [LXX Gen 22:3, 6, 7, 9]) as sacrificial implements, and he stretches forth his hand (exeteinen Abraam tēn cheira [LXX Gen 22:10]) to take his sword (labein tēn machairan [LXX Gen 22:10]) to slay Isaac, but he is stopped by an angel who tells him not to lay hands on his son (mē epibalēs tēn cheira sou epi to paidarion [LXX Gen 22:12]). As Abraham the father wielded knife and wood to bring about the sacrifice of his beloved son, God the Father wielded the crowd with its swords and clubs to bring about the sacrifice of his beloved Son.

2.3. The Patriarchal Triad in Matthew: Resurrection. Abraham, Isaac and Jacob are mentioned collectively only twice in Matthew, first in the story of the healing of the centurion's servant (Mt 8:5-13) and then in the controversy with the *Sadducees about the *resurrection (Mt 22:23-33). Both instances concern the eschaton. In the former, the faith of the centurion elicits Jesus' words about many coming "from east and west and reclining at table with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob in the kingdom of heaven" (Mt 22:11), while "the sons of the kingdom" are excluded; here the reader encounters the themes of Gentile inclusion and reversal first adumbrated in the genealogy (Mt 1:2-17) and the story of the pagan magi worshipping Jesus while Herod and "all Jerusalem . . . troubled" along with him reject Jesus (Mt 2). In the latter, Jesus draws on the fact that in Exodus 3:6 God speaks to Moses in the present tense about his relationship with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob well after their deaths (cf. Ex 3:15) in order to suggest to the Sadducees that these three abide still and thus that the resurrection is a reality. Here, Jesus' logic implies that "resurrection" is equivalent to eternal life immediately after death, as God spoke those words well before the eschaton; or Jesus may understand those words in a promissory sense, anticipating a resurrection at the end of time.

3. Mark.

The patriarchs play little role in Mark, finding explicit mention only in Mark 12:26 within the controversy with the Sadducees about the resurrection (Mk 12:18-27), which differs little from the Matthean account. Their general absence may be explained by Mark's Gentile orientation (cf. Mk 7:3) and compression of other events in the Synoptic tradition. Nevertheless, Mark's Gospel does present an Isaac typology similar to that which Matthew's Gospel presents, as M. Rindge has shown: "You are my beloved son" (ho huios mou ho agapētos) in Mark 1:11 alludes to Isaac the beloved son in Genesis 22:2, as does the phrase's use in the Markan transfiguration (Mk 9:7) as well as the use of huion agapēton in Mark 12:6 in the parable of the wicked tenants (Mk 12:1-12). In the Markan Gethsemane scene the reader encounters allusions to Genesis 22 ("swords and clubs" in Mk 14:43, 48, alluding to the "knife" and "wood" of Gen 22:3, 6, 7, 9, 10). Moreover, Jesus' express wish to be spared the cup because "all things are possible" (Mk 14:36) reflects Philo's presentation of Isaac's question in Genesis 22:7 as a request to be spared sacrifice, to which Abraham responds, "All things are possible with God" (Abr. 175). The Isaac typology in Mark serves a theology of lament, the presentation of a picture of a *God estranged from his Son at the moment of his sacrificial death (Mk 15:34).

4. Luke.

In Luke's Gospel the figure of Abraham is fully to the fore, while any presentation of an Isaac typology is obscure, and Jacob remains relegated to the patriarchal triad. The emphasis on Abraham is fitting for a Gospel that emphasizes, more than all other NT documents, continuity among Judaism, Jesus and the church (see Dahl).

4.1. Abrahamic Descent. Three Lukan passages concern Abrahamic descent. Mary and Zechariah's respective words in Luke 1:55 and Luke 1:73 emphasize the fulfillment of the Abrahamic covenant with the births of Jesus and John. John's warning regarding Abrahamic descent is directed to "the multitudes coming to be baptized" (Lk 3:7), in line with the more positive Lukan estimation of Israel. The genealogy mentions Abraham (Lk 3:34) but does not emphasize him, in accord with the Lukan emphasis on the universality of the Christian message.

4.2. The Patriarchs and Eschatology in Luke. The patriarchal triad is employed in an eschatological context in two Lukan passages: Jesus' warning about entering by the narrow door (Lk 13:22-30) and the controversy with the Sadducees over the resurrection (Lk 20:27-40). Unique to Luke is the parable of "Lazarus and the rich man" (Lk 16:19-31), in which the deceased Lazarus is received into "Abraham's bosom" (Lk 16:22; cf. Lk 16:23, the abode of the faithful departed; "bosom" suggests an eschatological feast, as guests of honor recline on the hosts' breasts while dining [cf. Jn 13:23]). Abraham converses with the deceased rich man, now tormented in Hades; Abraham's final words (Lk 16:31) suggest continuity between Moses, the prophets and the risen Jesus.

4.3. Reconciliation in the Community of Abraham Through Jesus. Unique to Luke's Gospel are the story of "a daughter of Abraham" healed on the Sabbath (Lk 13:10-17) and the story of Zacchaeus, "a son of Abraham" (Lk 19:1-10). In both stories Jesus reintegrates a "daughter/son of Abraham" fully into the community of God's people from which they have been marginalized, she through infirmity, he on account of his reputation as a "sinner" (Lk 19:7). Taking these stories together with the story of Lazarus in Luke 16:19-31, we find that for Luke, "children" of Abraham include those who are defined by others as outside the boundaries of God's people, yet are the very people to whom God extends his fidelity and brings salvation. In the case of Zacchaeus it is crucial to observe that his status as "son of Abraham" is demonstrated through behaviors that conform to the "fruits worthy of repentance" sketched earlier in the Gospel by John the Baptist (Lk 3:7-14): he gives to the needy and he collects no more than he ought (Lk 19:8).

5. John.

John's Gospel employs the figures of all three patriarchs as individuals but does not mention the patriarchal triad.

5.1. Isaac. In Jewish tradition the binding of Isaac takes place at Passover, and Isaac is compared to the Passover lamb (see 1 above). Therefore, John the Baptist's calling Jesus "the Lamb of God who takes away the sins of the world" (Jn 1:29, 36) coupled with the possibility that Johannine chronology has Jesus die at the time of the slaughter of the Passover lambs (cf. Jn 18:38; 19:14) suggests an Isaac *typology (see Lamb of God). Since John's Gospel takes pains to suggest Jesus' superiority over other figures (note the comparisons of Jesus with Moses in Jn 1:17, John the Baptist in Jn 5:36, Abraham in Jn 8:53-58), the typology may imply Jesus' superiority over Isaac; it is Jesus' decisive sacrifice that takes away the sins of the world.

5.2. Jacob. John 1:51 alludes to Jacob's dream at Bethel (Gen 28:12), and J. Neyrey suggests that the allusion makes the disciples parallel to Jacob, who saw Jesus in his vision as the disciples see Jesus, the manifestation of God (Neyrey 1982). In Jesus' encounter with the Samaritan woman in John 4:1-30, then, her question concerning whether Jesus is greater than Jacob (Jn 4:12) resounds with a certain irony. Jesus is indeed greater than Jacob: supplanting the supplanter (see Neyrey 1979), it is his divine identity that enables him to provide those who believe in him with waters flowing with the divine life (zōē [Jn 4:14; cf. Jn 1:4]) that he possesses. Here too the reader sees the repeated Johannine motif of Jesus' interlocutors concerning themselves with earthly things (e.g., Nicodemus referring to physical birth in Jn 3:4; "the Jews" concerned with the earthly temple in Jn 2:20; the crowd seeking perishable food in Jn 6:26-27), while Jesus points them to heavenly things.

5.3. Abraham. In John 8:31-59 Jesus claims not only that physical descent from Abraham is insufficient (as John the Baptist does in Mt 3:8; Lk 3:8), but also that as a manifestation of God, he is superior to Abraham. The passage suggests that belief in Jesus is contingent: Jesus admonishes them to "continue in [his] word" so that the truth will make them free (Jn 8:31-32). Yet they double down twice on Abrahamic descent (Jn 8:33, 39) before finally asserting divine patrimony in the face of Jesus' denial of the former (Jn 8:41), upon which Jesus informs them of their diabolical patrimony (Jn 8:44). While Jesus affirms continuity with Abraham, who rejoiced and was glad to see Jesus' day (Jn 8:56), the point of the passage is not that Jesus is the true heir of Abraham, but rather that as God manifest (Jn 8:58: egō eimi [the name of God from Ex 3:14]), Jesus is superior to Abraham.

See also ELIJAH AND ELISHA; GENEALOGY; ISRAEL; MOSES; OLD TESTAMENT IN THE GOSPELS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. N. A. Dahl, "The Story of Abraham in Luke-Acts," in Jesus in the Memory of the Early Church: Essays (Minneapolis: Augsburg, 1976) 66-86; R. J. Erickson, "Joseph and the Birth of Isaac in Matthew 1," BBR 10 (2000) 35-51; J. B. Green, "Jesus and a Daughter of Abraham (Luke 13:10-17): Test Case for a Lucan Perspective on Jesus' Miracles," CBQ 51 (1989) 643-54; A. T. Hanson, "John's Use of Scripture," in The Gospels and the Scriptures of Israel, ed. C. A. Evans and W. R. Stegner (JSNTSup 104; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1994) 358-79; L. A. Huizenga, The New Isaac: Tradition and Intertextuality in the Gospel of Matthew (NovTSup 131; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2009); E. Kessler, Bound by the Bible: Jews, Christians and the Sacrifice of Isaac (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2004); J. D. Levenson, The Death and Resurrection of the Beloved Son: The Transformation of Child Sacrifice in Judaism and Christianity (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1993); M. J. J. Menken and S. Moyise, Genesis in the New Testament (LNTS 466; New York: T & T Clark, 2012); R. W. L. Moberly, The Bible, Theology, and Faith: A Study of Abraham and Jesus (CSCD; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2000); J. H. Neyrey, "Jacob Traditions and the Interpretation of John 4:10-26," CBQ 41 (1979) 419-37; idem, "The Jacob Allusions in John 1:51," CBQ 44 (1982) 586-605; M. S. Rindge, "Reconfiguring the Akedah and Recasting God: Lament and Divine Abandonment in Mark," JBL 130 (2011) 755-74; R. Rosenberg, "Jesus, Isaac, and the Suffering Servant," JBL 84 (1965) 381-88.

L. A. Huizenga

ADULTERY. See DIVORCE.

AFRICAN AMERICAN CRITICISM

The African American church and African American Christians have a long history of appropriating the sacred Scriptures as God's word despite their use by white Christians to support ideologies sanctioning slavery, disenfranchisement and racism. Biblical depictions of God and Jesus as liberator, "heavy load bearer" and "way maker" who exalt the oppressed struck a resounding chord with African Americans. This liberator God and Jesus side with the oppressed, affirming their humanity and offering strength for today and hope for a better tomorrow. At the same time, African Americans have historically rejected oppressive Scriptures and biblical interpretations (e.g., "Slaves, obey your masters as unto God") and critically (re)interpreted Scriptures within the context of the existential realities of slavery and racism. Before the first biblical scholars earned doctoral degrees, slave songs or spirituals, prayers and slave narratives testify to a long interpretive history of resistance, affirmation and hope. African Americans appropriated Scriptures used against them to transform their own lives (Callahan 2006). They prioritized their own experiences, artifacts and traditions as legitimate sources and resources for theological construction and biblical interpretation. People such as Sojourner Truth and Frederick Douglas and nineteenth-century black preaching women such as Zilpha Elaw and Jarena Lee interpreted the Bible in ways that legitimized their full humanity as God-ordained and God-gifted.

1. Foundational Work
2. Further Developments
3. Moving Forward

1. Foundational Work.

Early African American biblical criticism (ca. 1970–1990) focused on reaffirming the humanity of black people living under slavery and racism undergirded by the ideology that claimed that God created black peoples as inferior beings designed for slavery. Many African Americans insisted that God and Jesus sided with the enslaved and oppressed, as J. Cone would later systematically articulate in God of the Oppressed (Cone 1975; see also Cone 1969; 1970). This early interpretive legacy of resistance and creativity, the existential reality of racism and disenfranchisement, and the emergence of black theology challenged African American biblical scholars to move beyond traditional biblical scholarship that focused on what the text meant in order to ask what the text means today (Hoyt). Early African American biblical scholars attempted to demonstrate the positive presence and contribution of dark-skinned peoples in the Bible, such as Simon of Cyrene, who helped Jesus carry his cross (Mt 27:32; Mk 15:21; Lk 23:26). C. Felder's Troubling Biblical Waters (Felder 1989; see also Snowden 1970; 1983; Copher 1993) meticulously explored and affirmed the significant contribution and presence of blacks in the Bible, such as the Queen of Sheba (1 Kings 10:1-13; Mt 12:42; Lk 11:31). Felder demonstrated that the Queen of Sheba hailed from Africa, not from South Arabia, and emphasized that Egypt, where Joseph fled with Mary and the baby Jesus, was always in Africa, thus rejecting the "de-Africanization" of Egypt. African Americans seeking racial affirmation received Troubling Biblical Waters and the Original African Heritage Study Bible (1993) with open hearts and minds. Both texts attempted to recover the authority of the Bible within those segments of the black community that had rejected it as a white people's book, particularly, for example, incarcerated black men and women.

Stony the Road We Trod (Felder 1991), another seminal text, resulted from a five-year collaboration among African American biblical scholars. This volume of essays, edited by Felder, argued for a plurality of interpretive approaches as demonstrated in the Scriptures themselves and addressed the rift between mainstream biblical interpretation and marginalized voices created by a long tradition of Eurocentricism in biblical interpretation. For example, W. Myers argues against exalting one cultural worldview above another; against locking the interpretive task in the past; for the acceptance of legitimate methodologies rather than one valid methodology; and for including materials that have impacted African American perspectives: spirituals, call narratives, slave narratives, testimonials. R. Weems asserts the significance of both context and the reader's pretext for reading the Bible. Weems argues that black women have a history of resistance to the Bible or portions of it, particularly those texts that implored slaves to obey their masters. She cites Howard Thurman's grandmother, a former slave, who permitted young Thurman to read the Gospels to her but not the Pauline Epistles, except 1 Corinthians 13. Accordingly, African American biblical criticism is concerned primarily with how the text speaks in liberating ways to the African American experience, rather than focusing myopically on what lies behind the text. Some African American biblical scholars interpret the Scriptures and critique interpretations of the Scriptures with a hermeneutics of suspicion—that is, reading while consciously focusing on oppressive language, characterizations and plot. Also operative are a hermeneutics of survival—that is, reading with an awareness of how God enables the survival of the oppressed and not necessarily their liberation, as in the case of Hagar (Williams); and a hermeneutics of wholeness—that is, reading with a concern for the health of the entire community (St. Clair). With the publication of Stony the Road We Trod, African American biblical criticism emerged as an academic discipline focusing on the concerns and struggles of black scholars, attempting to link black scholarship and the black church and to maintain continuity between the historical past and the present.

While African American biblical scholars reject the claim that the historical-critical method yields disinterested, objective, value-neutral and decontextualized biblical readings, many employ historical criticism together with an African American interpretive framework that prioritizes African American experience, culture and artifacts. B. Blount argues that the reader's interpersonal context impacts his or her reading of the Bible, and this interpersonal dynamic is as important and legitimate as the sociolinguistic and ideational contexts of biblical interpretation (Blount 1993). Potential meanings, not just a single meaning, can be drawn from the text. O. Hendricks argues that exegesis is about setting the oppressed free, making new readings and truths from old things, asking questions unapologetically, and challenging interpretations void of representation (Hendricks 1994).

V. Wimbush, in an essay in Stony the Road We Trod (Felder 1991), explored how slaves and free blacks read the Bible. The Bible was a language world that African Americans, throughout history, could identify with, be strengthened by, and employ for self-affirmation. Wimbush later resumed this theme, arguing for biblical interpretation that begins with the present and the sacred text's impact on or in the present, rather than a mythical past retrievable only by specialists employing exegetical skills (Wimbush 2003). Wimbush challenges all biblical scholars to read "darkly" because African American experience as an interpretive lens offers an exemplary reading because of the trauma, marginality, pain and exile experienced by African Americans (Wimbush 2003; 2011).

True to Our Native Land (Blount 2007) constitutes the first African American commentary of the NT written by a core of black biblical scholars and with the African American church in view. The essays draw on and demonstrate historical, social, cultural, religious and political realities unique to African American experience. African American experience is foregrounded as an interpretive lens for reading the Bible, offering a challenge to the unacknowledged contextual and ideological readings of Eurocentric biblical interpretation. Here it is asserted that "race still matters" (Blount 2007, 2). Our contexts, the space that we inhabit and from which we develop, influence our interpretations. The volume represents a call and response: it is a response to a call from the African American context to address particular themes. Contributors to True to Our Native Land weave sociohistorical and literary insights together with African Americans concerns and voices, including slaves, artists, poets, historians, philosophers, theologians, musicians, composers and activists. For example, E. Powery interjects Zora Neale Hurston's imaginative recreation of the dialogue between *Herod and Herodias, which ends with Herod confessing his undying love and loyalty of Herodias and his position regarding the prophet John. M. Brown, in a subsection entitled "The Great Commission," inserts a counternarrative from womanist scholar D. Williams: "Suppose evangelism was understood as community building, rather than just 'saving souls'? . . . The goal of this community building is, of course, to establish a positive quality of life—economic, spiritual, educational—for black women, men, and children" (Blount 2007, 117). S. Crowder allows Sojourner Truth's "Ain't I a Woman?" speech to demonstrate how women should be emboldened by Luke's portrayal of Mary.

2. Further Developments.

African American biblical scholarship is concerned with broader ancient rhetorical and historical contexts that speak to African Americans concerns. For example, G. Byron explores the rhetorical function of images of "blacks/blackness," "Egyptians/Egypt" and "Ethiopians/Ethiopia" in early Christian literature. These images, Byron argues, were rhetorically constructed as idealized and pejorative symbols that came to signify extreme forms of difference within early Christianity—how early Christians constructed a world based on assumptions about extreme difference. M. Smith surveys first-century Roman *slavery and asserts that NT authors uncritically inscribe slavery in their writings (M. Smith 1999; 2007). This is particularly true of the *parables in which *God and Jesus are likened to cruel and exacting slave masters. Ancient slavery is the socio-historical and political context for interpreting Scriptures in which the master/slave relationship is asserted as a metaphor, as prescriptive, or as descriptive for relationships between God, Jesus and humans. M. Brown argues that biblical texts, including some parables (e.g., the landowner and the wicked tenants [Mt 21:33-46; Mk 12:1-12; Lk 20:9-19]) should be critiqued for their nonliberative stance toward the marginalized, even when such texts characterize Jesus or God as an oppressive landlord or master. As C. Martin has argued, African Americans have rejected literal readings of the NT that sanction slavery as divine or natural; they have chosen to proclaim the biblical witness about a powerful and just God who demonstrates in Jesus Christ a concern for the liberation of all humankind.

The slave songs and narratives demonstrate a Christocentrism that characterizes Jesus as a liberator (M. Smith forthcoming). Salvation history in the spirituals is not, as H. Conzelmann has argued, a linear progression. In the slave songs Jesus transcends the boundary between NT and OT; he is the liberator present with Moses at the Reed Sea (M. Smith forthcoming). Much of African American biblical interpretation is christocentric, asking about the meaning of Jesus for black people today: how do Jesus' life, ministry, suffering and glorification speak to complex issues such as victimization and suffering, as well as liberation? T. Smith argues that just as Jesus offered transformation to victims and victimizers through the process of victimization, people such as Zora Neale Hurston and Martin Luther King Jr. functioned like conjurors ordering biblical symbols and signs in hopes of transforming or curing the African American reality of victimization. King's nonviolent strategy, according to T. Smith, is paradigmatic of this transformative process. Jesus' life as a boundary breaker, equalizer and liberator embodies ethical reflection (Blount 2001). Womanist scholar J. Terrell privileges the hope and liberation that derive from Jesus' cross over sacrifice and suffering, eschewing the glorification of suffering in the context of oppression. R. St. Clair asserts that the cross and Jesus' pain were an inevitable consequence of his ministry but were not God's predetermined will. St. Clair argues for deconstructing interpretations of Jesus that assist in black women's oppression specifically (and all oppression). She asserts that our response to Jesus' call to discipleship inevitably results in pain.

African American biblical scholars struggle to bridge biblical interpretations with appropriate contemporary African American ethical and theological (theoethical) responses. Blount argues that Simon of Cyrene is an image of *discipleship as one who carried Jesus' burden that the disciples rejected; that Simon was transformed from outsider to insider as part of Luke's inclusive strategy (Blount 1993). Blount reads the Gospels through the lens of antebellum slavery in order to construct a NT ethics (Blount 2001). John's Gospel, according to Blount, testifies about a group struggling with oppression and unable to count on help from the outside world. Blount likens the world constructed in John's text to the world of African Americans. As in John's Gospel, African Americans should turn to each other and construct for themselves a viable community of countercultural resistance and sustenance from mutual love. A. Callahan asserts that the author of John's Gospel shuns slavery language to characterize discipleship, and John's Jesus rejects slavery as a metaphor (Callahan 2007). S. Crowder reads Luke's Gospel "as a document of African American faith," arguing that its theology is analogous with African American "God-talk," emanating from and witnessing about suffering and oppression (Crowder, 158). Luke's Gospel, Crowder argues, like African American faith, is concerned with spiritual enhancement and with political, economic and social development. E. Powery explores the meaning of neighbor love and its limitations through the interpretive lens of Harriett Jacobs's articulations about love of neighbor in her slave narrative (Powery 2008). Jacobs's slave mistress taught her that one of the precepts of God's word was to love one's neighbor as one's self. Harriett reasoned that her mistress did not see her slave as her neighbor, which was evidenced in the way she treated her. The teachings of Jesus, Paul and James teachings about "love of neighbor" transcended ethnic boundaries, but they did not cross gender and socioeconomic boundaries. M. Smith argues that a soteriological hermeneutical circle is at work in Luke (Smith forthcoming 2). Individuals whom Jesus heals emerge from the crowds, and consequently the crowds are positively affected, as evidenced by their rejoicing. M. Smith reads the relationship between individuals whom Jesus healed and the crowds from which they emerge through a womanist framework (Smith forthcoming 2). African American women, particularly, have historically promoted racial uplift; individuals who emerge from the black masses have an ethical responsibility to give back or uplift the masses from which they emerge (Smith forthcoming 2).

3. Moving Forward.

Felder wrote, "African American biblical scholarship is steadily becoming a fully grown tree near the dense forest of Eurocentric biblical exegesis and interpretation" (Felder 1991, 1). This remains an appropriate metaphor to describe African American biblical criticism. African American biblical scholars continue to privilege African American experience, traditions and artifacts as legitimate hermeneutical lenses and sources for theoethical reflection. They continue the tradition begun by people such as Howard Thurman's grandmother of critiquing the canon, the biblical text itself, and the nature of its authority. African American biblical criticism will continue to struggle with the Bible as divine testimony, as an authoritative source, and as a dynamic word through which God continues to speak a relevant, prophetic and living word; to explore how African Americans read texts and contexts; to challenge mainstream biblical scholars to read "darkly" through the lens of black people's experiences; to exercise the gift of questioning the biblical text and of critical self-reflection; and to strive for critical and liberative engagement with black churches, the larger African American community and the global reality.

See also FEMINIST AND WOMANIST CRITICISMS; GOSPELS: HISTORY OF INTERPRETATION; LATINO/LATINA CRITICISM; POSTCOLONIAL CRITICISM; SLAVE, SERVANT; SOCIAL-SCIENTIFIC CRITICISMS; THEOLOGICAL INTERPRETATION OF THE GOSPELS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. B. K. Blount, "A Socio-Rhetorical Analysis of Simon of Cyrene: Mark 15:21 and Its Parallels," Semeia 64 (1993) 171-98; idem, Cultural Interpretation: Reorienting New Testament Criticism (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1995); idem, Go Preach! Mark's Kingdom Message and the Black Church Today (Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1998); idem, Then the Whisper Put on Flesh: New Testament Ethics in an African American Context (Abingdon: Nashville, 2001); idem, ed., True to Our Native Land: An African American New Testament Commentary (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2007); M. Brown, Blackening the Bible: The Aims of African American Biblical Scholarship (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 2004); G. L. Byron, Symbolic Blackness and Ethnic Difference in Early Christian Literature (London: Routledge, 2002); A. D. Callahan, The Talking Book: African Americans and the Bible (New Haven: Yale University Press, 2006); idem, "John," in True to Our Native Land: An African American New Testament Commentary, ed. B. K. Blount (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2007) 186-212; J. H. Cone, Black Theology and Black Power (New York: Harper & Row, 1969); idem, A Black Theology of Liberation (Philadelphia: Lippincott, 1970); idem, God of the Oppressed (New York: Seabury, 1975); C. B. Copher, Black Biblical Studies: Biblical and Theological Issues in the Black Presence in the Bible; An Anthology of Charles B. Copher (Chicago: Black Light Fellowship, 1993); S. B. Crowder, "Luke," in True to Our Native Land: An African American New Testament Commentary, ed. B. K. Blount (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2007) 158-85; C. H. Felder, Troubling Biblical Waters: Race, Class and Family (Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1989); idem, ed., Stony the Road We Trod: African American Biblical Interpretation (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1991); O. M. Hendricks Jr., "Guerrilla Exegesis: A Post-Modern Proposal for Insurgent African American Biblical Interpretation," JITC 22 (1994) 92-109; idem, The Politics of Jesus: Rediscovering the True Revolutionary Nature of the Teachings of Jesus and How They Have Been Corrupted (New York: Three Leaves, 2006); idem, The Universe Bends toward Justice: Radical Reflections on the Bible, the Church, and the Body Politic (Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 2011); T. Hoyt Jr., "Biblical Interpreters and Black Theology," in Black Theology: A Documentary History, 2: 1980-1992, ed. G. S. Wilmore and J. H. Cone (Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1996) 196-209; C. Martin, "The Haustafeln (Household Codes) in African American Biblical Interpretation: 'Free Slaves' and 'Subordinate Women,'" in Stony the Road We Trod: African American Biblical Interpretation, ed. C. H. Felder (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1991) 206-31; E. B. Powery, "Under the Gaze of Empire: Who Is My Neighbor?"

Int 62 (2008) 134-44; idem, "Reading the Bible as a Minority," Brethren in Christ History and Life 33, no. 1 (2010) 177-94; M. J. Smith, "Roman Slavery in Antiquity," in The African American Jubilee Bible (New York: American Bible Society, 1999) 157-86; idem, "Slavery in the Early Church," in True to Our Native Land: An African American New Testament Commentary, ed. B. K. Blount (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2007) 11-22; idem, "Give Me Jesus: Salvation History in the Spirituals," in African American Voices, ed. T. Slater (2 vols.; Lewiston, NY: Edwin Mellen, forthcoming); idem, "Minjung, the Black Masses and the Global Imperative: A Womanist Reading of Luke's Soteriological Hermeneutical Circle," in Ochlos and Minjung, ed. Yung Suk Kim (Eugene, OR: Wipf & Stock, forthcoming 2) T. H. Smith, Conjuring Culture: Biblical Formations of Black America (New York: Oxford, 1994); F. M. Snowden, Blacks in Antiquity: Ethiopians in the Greco-Roman Experience (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1970); idem, Before Color Prejudice: The Ancient View of Blacks (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1983); R. St. Clair, Call and Consequences: A Womanist Reading of Mark (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2008); J. M. Terrell, Power in the Blood? The Cross in the African American Experience (Eugene, OR: Wipf & Stock, 2005); D. Williams, Sisters in the Wilderness: The Challenge of Womanist God-Talk (Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1995); V. L. Wimbush, African Americans and the Bible: Sacred Texts and Social Textures (New York: Continuum, 2003); idem, "Interpreters—Enslaving/Enslaved/Runagate," JBL 130 (2011) 5-24. M. J. Smith

AMEN

"Amen" is a transliteration of the Hebrew word ʾāmēn and carries with it a range of meanings, including "dependable," "certain," "true." The LXX interpreters often substituted the term with the Greek word genoito ("so be it") and occasionally with alēthōs ("truly"). Similarly, many English translations substitute "verily" or "truly" rather than adopting the transliteration. In the Gospels "amen" appears one hundred times (31x in Matthew, 13x in Mark, 6x in Luke, 25x [always doubled] in John).

1. Background in Judaism and the Old Testament
2. Jesus' Use in the Gospels
3. Narrative Impact in the Gospels

1. Background in Judaism and the Old Testament.

In the OT "amen" functions as a response of confirmation to what has been said by another. This can involve prophecy, curses and blessings (Num 5:22; Deut 27:15-26; Jer 11:5). It usually is a public affirmation, and often it occurs in a liturgical setting. This is demonstrated by the presence of "amen" in Psalm 41:13; 72:19; 89:52; 106:48, each of which marks the doxological climax of its respective book of psalms within the Psalter. In these instances an emphasis is placed on the participation of the audience in affirming what has previously been said.

2. Jesus' Use in the Gospels.

Jesus' use of "amen" is unique in the Gospels, where the word appears only on his lips and refers to his own sayings/teachings exclusively. Additionally, the term introduces his words rather than ends them. For Mark, the term is used in a variety of scenarios, such as in statements sparked by a challenge to Jesus (Mk 3:28; 8:12), lessons for the disciples (Mk 9:1, 41; 10:15), examples of faith and failure (Mk 10:29; 12:43; 14:9), and prophetic words that appear more frequently during his Jerusalem ministry, particularly on the night of his betrayal (Mk 13:30; 14:18, 25, 30). In Matthew's Gospel it is found in teachings directed to the crowds (Mt 5:18, 26), teachings for the disciples in particular (Mt 10:15, 23; 16:28), shocking countercultural statements (Mt 8:10; 18:3), object lessons and *parables (Mt 18:13; 21:21; 24:47), and predictions and *prophetic words (Mt 23:36; 24:2; 26:21, 34). Luke includes only two uses not already found in the other Synoptic Gospels in some way: in Jesus' exclamation that no prophet is accepted in his hometown (Lk 4:24) and in his reply to the criminal's request for remembrance when Jesus comes into his *kingdom (Lk 23:43). In John's Gospel "amen" always appears in doublets, often in the midst of important teachings of Jesus, where the term is used twice or three times within a singular topic (Jn 5:19, 24, 25; 6:26, 32, 47, 53). Other instances of the term occur in sayings that respond to challenge (Jn 8:34, 51, 58), in individual teaching moments (Nathanael [Jn 1:51], Nicodemus [Jn 3:3, 5, 11], Peter [Jn 21:18]) and in several predictions and promises of the *farewell discourses (Jn 13:21, 38; 14:12; 16:20, 23).

3. Narrative Impact in the Gospels.

A survey of occurrences of "amen" in each Gospel fails to result in a clear and singular function for the term. Some speculation might be made as to why Luke rarely uses the term (perhaps this reflects his concern to write a Gospel that makes sense to his target audience, which is predominantly Gentile), or why Matthew includes it so frequently (his target audience is Jewish). Conversely, given Mark's emphasis on Jesus' authority early in his Gospel, it is interesting to note that he does not include the term to bolster Jesus' authoritative image at a point when one might otherwise expect it. As for John's Gospel, the presence of the "amen" statements reflects his dramatic style, coming in doublets and often at crucial points in the narrative (e.g., when Jesus is challenged [Jn 8] or when he leaves parting words for his followers [Jn 13–16]).

What does "amen" signify in the Gospels? Suggestions by scholars include that the word (1) indicates Jesus' divinity, (2) highlights the *authority of Jesus' teachings, (3) portrays Jesus as one who has the authority of a messenger of God (prophetic emphasis), (4) reflects a liturgical background (particularly in John's Gospel), (5) strengthens the force of Jesus' words, (6) indicates the faithful transmission of tradition (authenticates the words of Jesus as historically accurate), (7) conveys a sense of solemnity to Jesus' words.

Although we may never know with certainty what kinds of meanings this term might have had for Jesus, the Gospel writers or their audiences, at the very least it can be said that the "amen" statements call attention to Jesus' words, highlighting the emphatic nature of his teaching and assertions about God's work in the world through his life, death and resurrection.

See also AUTHORITY AND POWER; TEACHER.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R. E. Brown, The Death of the Messiah: From Gethsemane to the Grave; A Commentary on the Passion Narratives in the Four Gospels (2 vols.; ABRL; New York: Doubleday, 1994) 1:137; D. Doriani, "Jesus' Use of Amen," Presb 17 (1991) 125–27; J. Jeremias, New Testament Theology: The Proclamation of Jesus (New York: Scribner, 1971) 35–36; H. Schlier, "ἀμήν," TDNT 1:335–38; R. H. Stein, The Method and Message of Jesus' Teachings (rev. ed.; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1994) 121–22; J. Strugnell, "Amen, I Say unto You' in the Sayings of Jesus and in Early Christian Literature," HTR 67 (1974) 177–82. H. Carey

ANCESTORS. See ABRAHAM, ISAAC AND JACOB; GENEALOGY.

ANGELS

There is a lively interest in angels in late Second Temple Judaism that extends and broadens the themes already present in the OT. There are both explicit references to angels and other places where contemporary Jewish angelology or OT angel passages are reflected. After some years of neglect, angels have been the subject of much scholarly discussion in the last twenty years, with a focus on two key issues: the angels' nature in relation to both *God and humanity, and the significance of angel traditions for the origins and shape of early *Christology.

1. Terminology in the Old Testament and in Jewish Antiquity
2. The Nature of Angels in Jewish Antiquity
3. The Synoptic Gospels
4. The Gospel of John
5. Angels and Christology

1. Terminology in the Old Testament and in Jewish Antiquity.

Though parallels with motifs surrounding various divine beings in Greco-Roman literature can be identified, the language in the Gospels is essentially biblical and Jewish. The English "angel" translates the Greek word angelos in the NT and the word mal'āk in the OT. Both the Hebrew and the Greek words refer, essentially, to one who is sent with a message. In the OT the mal'āk and in the LXX the angelos is usually a heavenly being sent by God (e.g., Gen 16:7; Judg 2:1) but may also be a human being sent by another human being (e.g., Gen 32:3) or a human being who is sent by and represents God (e.g., LXX Is 9:5 [ET 9:6]; Mal 2:7; cf. Zech 12:8; LXX Ex 23:20–22). Some texts are ambiguous (Is 63:9; Mal 3:1–3).

While the usual translation for mal'āk is angelos, the LXX reflects a tendency to use angelos as an umbrella term for a variety of spiritual beings when it uses angelos to translate other Hebrew expressions, such as ēlōhīm (e.g., LXX Ps 8:6 [ET 8:5]; 96:7 [ET 97:7]; 137:1 [ET 138:1]) and bēnē 'ēlōhīm/bar 'ēlāhīn (e.g., Job 1:6; 2:1; 38:7; Dan 3:92 [ET 3:25]). It is not clear what interpretive significance should be given to this homogenizing translation pattern, since the late Second Temple period also reveals a widening out of the terminology that could be employed for spiritual beings, especially in Hebrew and Aramaic texts (reflected especially in the DSS). For example, we regularly read of "watchers" (already in Dan 4:13, 23; see also, e.g., 1 En. 1:2, 5; 6:2), "authorities," "glorious ones," angelic "spirits" and other terms. So, it is just possible that Jesus himself used a variety of terms all of which were conveyed in the Gospels with the one Greek word angelos.

2. The Nature of Angels in Jewish Antiquity.

2.1. Angels in the Bible. In the OT angels primarily appear as messengers of divine revelation and as interpreters of visionary experiences (e.g., Ezek 40–48; Zech 1–6). The living creatures of God's throne (Ezek 1), the cherubim (e.g., Ex 25:19; 2 Sam 22:11) and winged seraphim (Is 6:2–7) are not, strictly speaking, “angels,” since they do not function as messengers. However, the messenger role of angels is complemented by a wider set of responsibilities and themes. Yahweh is surrounded by a “host” of angels (Deut 33:2; 1 Kings 22:19–22)—his military force—and those who serve him in worship (Ps 103:20; 148:2). They protect (Ps 34:7; 91:11) or rescue (1 Kings 19:5; Dan 3:28; 6:22) the righteous and threaten (Ps 35:5–6) or exercise judgment on God's enemies (Gen 19; Num 22:33; 1 Chron 21; Ps 35:5–6; 78:49; Is 37:36). They have human form (Gen 18–19) and often are not immediately recognized as super-human beings.

In pentateuchal texts there is one specific principal angel (see 2.2 below), and it can be unclear whether the angel is a distinct being or simply Yahweh in human form (Gen 16:7–11; 18–19). In those texts, and indeed throughout the biblical material, angelology expresses belief in God's presence (his immanence) while maintaining his transcendence and the belief that he cannot safely be seen by human beings (e.g., Judg 6:22–23; 13:22).

2.2. Postbiblical Developments in Jewish Angelology. Angels appear in all forms of Jewish literature, and there was a tendency to add references to angels in the retelling of biblical stories. Angels appear predominantly in visionary (or “apocalyptic”) texts, and authors writing for a Greco-Roman audience tend to avoid the standard language about angels (without denying their existence). *Josephus, for example, speaks of a neanias or neaniskos (“young man” [Ant. 5.213, 277] and a phantasma (“phantom” [Ant. 1.325, 333]). Philo translates a biblical “angel” into a “divine word” (theion logos [e.g., Fug. 5; Cher. 3]).

But beyond a shared and universal belief in angels, disagreement abounded. Sadducees, who must have taken references to angels in the Hebrew Bible at face value, did not believe that after death (and resurrection) the righteous were transformed into angel-like beings (Mk 12:18–27; Acts 23:6–9). Some texts speak of four archangels (1 En. 9–10; 40), while others speak of seven (1 En. 20–36; 81:5; 87:2–4; Tob 12:15; T. Levi 8:2). According to Josephus, the Qumran community believed that angelic matters constituted secret, esoteric revelation (J.W. 2.142). There was no one defined Jewish angelology as such, and we should resist the temptation to impose organization, consistency and systemization on “quite unsys-tematic literature” (Mach 2000, 25). Indeed, the Gospels appear to have their own, distinctive perspective on the angelic realm, its place in God's purposes in general and in relation to Jesus in particular.

Beyond the limited range of roles and characteristics found in the OT, in the Jewish material we encounter a vigorous expansion of angelic functions and themes. Sometimes there is an extension of ideas that are present, undeveloped in the OT. At other times new ideas appear without obvious biblical precedent.

With an expansion of the number and names for angels there come also specific roles or offices (cf. already Josh 5:14). Where the OT speaks of one principal angel, there now appears an executive team of named angels (Michael, Gabriel [see already Dan 10:13, 21; 12:1; 8:16; 9:21], Raphael, Uriel, Sariel and others). Some angels have particular responsibilities in the sphere of creation: overseeing the workings of the sun, moon, planets, rain, snow, hail, fire, earthquakes, winds, lightning (Jub. 2:2; 1 En. 60:16–21; 2 En. 14:3; 19:4–5).

In the realm of history the “host” of angels has a special responsibility empowering and fighting with the righteous against their enemies. The evidence of Maccabean literature (2 Macc 3:24–26; 10:29–30; 11:5–12; 15:22–23; 3 Macc 6:16–29; 4 Macc 4:10), the Qumran War Scroll (esp. 1QM XII, 7–17; XVII, 5–8), Josephus (J.W. 6.298–300) and other texts (e.g., 1 En. 90:14; T. Levi 5:3; T. Jud. 3:10; L.A.B 27:10–11; 61:7–9) suggests that revolutionary movements were particularly interested in angels and their powers.

New themes in postbiblical angel material illustrate the more than primarily functional, message-bearing role of the angels. In various ways, angel texts articulate aspirations for a lifestyle that transcends ordinary or “fallen” human life. The righteous look to share life with the angels and to emulate them. There is intense interest in, for example, their permanent state of worship, around God's throne and in the sanctuary (1 En. 14; the Songs of the Sabbath Sacrifice of Qumran; 2 En. 22:2). Angels do not need food, or at least not ordinary earthly food (see Jos. Asen. 16:14; L.A.E. 4:2; cf. Ps 78:25), they do not sleep (they are “watchers” or “wakeful ones” [Dan 4:13, 23; 1 En. 1:2, 5; 39:12–13]), and they have no need of sexual intercourse and conjugal relations (1 En. 6–15). By fasting, avoiding sexual intercourse, and taking up heavenly patterns of worship, the righteous could take on an angelic lifestyle or identity (see Fletcher-Louis 1996). Not only do the angels inspire distinctive religious practices, but they also validate Israel's specific obligations under Torah. In one text angels, like Israelites, keep Torah: they are circumcised and they rest on the Sabbath (Jub. 2:17-21; 15:25-27).

On the other hand, some texts envisage a rivalry between angels and human beings, or the superiority of the latter over the former (a theme that is expanded in the literature from the rabbinic period [cf. L.A.B. 32:1-2; 3 En. 1:4; 4:6-10; 5:10—6:3]). And there develops the notion that nations (Dan 12:1; L.A.B. 15:5) and individuals (L.A.B. 59:4) have guardian angels. In one tradition there is even the belief that God required that the angels worship Adam, before his fall, in his capacity as God's image, as his representative idol (šelem) (L.A.E. 12—16; cf. 4Q381 1, 10-11; Philo, Opif. 83).

2.3. Matters of Scholarly Debate. Some matters regarding angels that are relevant to Gospel interpretation are debated today.

2.3.1. Did Jews Believe That Humans Could Be Angelic? The Latin Vulgate used two words (nuntius for human messenger, and angelus for supernatural being) where Greek and Hebrew had just one. English translations carry on that distinction, and interpreters of the NT traditionally have assumed that there is a clear difference between “human messengers” (see, e.g., angelos in Mt 11:10; Mk 1:2; Lk 7:24, 27; 9:52) and “angels.” Some recent scholarship suggests that this linguistic separation obscures the fact that oftentimes Jews could describe human beings using “angel” language because they believed these human beings were, in fact, now heavenly humans. C. Fletcher-Louis and C. Gieschen have explored traditions where human beings have an “angelomorphic” identity—that is, “wherever there are signs that an individual or community possesses specifically angelic characteristics or status, though for whom their identity cannot be reduced to that of an angel” (Fletcher-Louis 1996, 14-15).

Many Jews clearly cherished the prospect of a communion with angels, especially in common worship, and this seems to have fostered also a belief in transformation to an angelic identity for the human worshipers (in this life). At Qumran, for example, the priest is called to be “as an Angel of the Presence in the abode of holiness” (1Q28b IV, 25). A range of past heroes, aspiring mystics, individuals and communities claim, in various ways, an angelomorphic identity. In particular, the (high) priesthood stands out as the office most frequently described in angelic hues (see already Mal 2:7; cf. Hecataeus of Abdera in Diodorus Siculus, Bib. hist. 40.3.5; T. Mos. 10:2; 1Q28b IV, 24-28; 4Q511 35, 4).

For some, this identity was viewed as a recovery of the identity that Adam had before his fall (e.g., 1 En. 69:11; L.A.E. 4:2), and that further motivated forms of asceticism, such as fasting, to emulate the life of the angels (see 2.2 above). This “angelomorphic” theme has implications for our understanding of the portrayal of both Jesus and his followers in some Gospel texts (see 3.1. below). However, some studies have minimized the extent of these ideas in early Christianity's formative context (e.g., Sullivan).

2.3.2. Do Angels Bear God's Presence or Just Do His Bidding? The nature of the angels has been much debated. Are they simply messengers, God's agents, or do they have an identity that is more than functional because, on occasion, they can carry something of God's presence?

In favor of the first view is the fact that the words malāk and angelos basically describe one who conveys a message, and angelos is used to translate other Hebrew words where theoi (“gods”) might have been a more literal translation of the underlying Hebrew. Biblical angelology, in other words, expresses a firm rejection of polytheism: Jewish tradition accepts the existence of a divine council, albeit God's throne room is populated by angels, not by other gods. And those angels are “created beings,” which surely means that they are not divine.

On the other hand, many Jews could still use divine language for “angels.” First, the Hebrew words ēlīm and ēlōhīm (“gods”) are used for angels in Qumran literature (compare the archangel who is “a god” in Jos. Asen. 17:9), Josephus refers to a “divine angel” (theios angelos [e.g. Ant. 1:219, 332]), other texts use the expression “divine logos” for an angel (e.g., Ezek. Trag. 99; Philo, Fug. 5; Cher. 3; Deus 182). Second, while the words malāk and angelos are essentially an expression of function, that function can include a bearing of God's presence (not just a conveying of his messages). In the ancient world the ambassador can be the one whom he represents (see m. Ber. 5:5). Third, language and imagery for the glory of God in biblical theophanies (the fire, light and precious stones/metals in Ezek 1) are transferred to angels (see Dan 10:5-6; 2 Macc 3:25-26; Jos. Asen. 14:9; 2 En. 1:3-5; Apoc. Ab. 11:1-3; Apoc. Zeph. 6:11-15). Typically, the human being reacts in fear and trembling in the presence of the angel (Dan 10:7-9; 2 En. 1:3-8; Apoc. Ab. 11:2-6), and, understandably, makes the mistake of thinking that the angel should be worshiped (Jos. Asen. 15:11-12; Apoc. Zeph. 6:11-15; cf. Rev 19:10; 22:8-9). It is by no means certain that Jews in antiquity would assume that a created being could not possess something of God's own character or nature (cf. Wisdom in Sir 24). Indeed, in Luke 2:9 there seems to be a clear connection between an angelophany and the presence of the Lord.

On the other hand, texts explicitly prohibit worship of angels (Apoc. Zeph. 6:11-15; Asc. Isa. 7:21), in line with the biblical prohibition against the worship of other gods. In the wider Greco-Roman world divine beings receive song, sacrifice and diverse expressions of devotion. Jewish angels are not recognizably “divine” by those standards.

2.4. The Angel of the Lord and a Principal Angel in Jewish Tradition. The OT, especially the Pentateuch, describes a singular, principal “angel of Yahweh,” who is indistinguishable from Yahweh himself (see Gen 16:11, 13; 22:1-18; Num 22:22-35). In one important passage this angel is said to carry God’s name (Ex 23:20-21). While some postbiblical texts envisage a team of four or seven archangels, in other traditions there is particular interest in this principal angel; the relevant biblical texts are reread in creative ways, and the angel of the Lord is given new characteristics and responsibilities (see Rowland 1982; Barker).

On the one hand, more than in any other case, there developed here the belief in an angelic being who carried God’s presence and who, like the OT “angel of Yahweh,” was indistinguishable from God himself. For example, in one tradition he is called “Iaoel” (Apoc. Ab. 10:3, 8; cf. L.A.B. 26:12; 3 En. 48D:1) which can be the name both of the angel and of God himself (compare Apoc. Ab. 10:3, 8 with 17:13 and see Apoc. Mos. 29:4; 33:5; Lad. Jac. 2:18). In turn, the name “Iaoel” derives from the description of an angel who bears God’s name (in the form “Yaho” or “lao”) in Exodus 23:20-22. Other texts identify the angel of the Lord with the Word (logos) (Ezek. Trag. 99) or with Wisdom (e.g., Ex 14:19 in Sir 24:4).

On the other hand, there are texts where biblical “angel of Yahweh” traditions are associated with a particular human being. A. van der Kooij has argued that already in the Old Greek (LXX) the angel who carries God’s name in the Hebrew of Exodus 23:20-22 is identified with the high priest who has the name “on him” (on his turban).

2.5. The Gospels’ Angelology in Jewish Context. All the references to angels in the Gospels reflect either biblical ideas about angels or well-attested post-biblical developments. Their characterization is conventional: they have human form (Mk 16:5; Lk 24:4), are robed in white garments (Mt 28:3; Mk 16:5; Jn 20:12), radiate light (Mt 28:3; Lk 24:4), praise God (Lk 2:13-14), bring messages to God’s people, and cause fear and trembling in those who encounter them (Mt 28:1-8; Mk 16:5-8; Lk 1:11-12; 2:9-10; 24:5).

Frequently, their appearance reflects contemporary Jewish traditions. For example, the Son of Man’s coming with angels (Mk 8:38 = Lk 9:26; Mt 16:27; 25:31) reflects the belief that the angels around God’s throne in Daniel 7:9 would accompany the “one like a son of man” when he received power and authority (Dan 7:14). Their appearance with the Son of Man perhaps assumes their role as end-time judge and executioner (see 1 En. 62:11).

On the other hand, there is much in contemporary Jewish tradition that is not picked up in the Gospels. For example, the rich terminology for heavenly beings (ēlīm, watchers, holy ones, glorious ones, cherubim, seraphim, ōpannīm, living creatures, spirits) is missing. There is no exploration of the place of different orders of angels in a multilayered cosmos. There is just one named angel (Gabriel in Lk 1:19, 26). Angels do not act as intercessors (contrast Zech 1:12-17; 1 En. 15:2; 99:3; 3 Bar. 11—16), nor do they commission anyone (cf. Ex 3:2; Judg 6:11-24; 1 En. 81:5-10; T. Levi 5:3; 8). Jesus is aware of angels of protection, but he chooses not to appeal to them (Mt 4:5-7; 26:53; Lk 4:9-12; cf. Gen 48:16; Ex 14:19-20; 23:20; Ps 34:7; 91:11; Dan 3:25, 28; 1 En. 100:5; L.A.B. 38:3; 59:4; 3 Macc 6:18-19). Angels appear with instructions (in the birth narrative and resurrection story), but there is little to compare with their familiar role as the interpreter of mysteries (as in Dan 7—12; Zech 1—6; 1 En. 17—36; Jos. Asen. 14—16; Jub. 1:27-29; 10:10-14; Apoc. Ab. 10—18; 4 Ezra 3—14).

Several Gospel texts reflect classic “angel of the Lord” passages (compare Gabriel’s announcement of the birth of Jesus in Lk 1:26-38 with Gen 16:11, on the birth of Ishmael; Judg 13:3-5, on the birth of Samson). However, these passages do not seem interested in the postbiblical speculation on the angel of the Lord. The Gospels speak of an angel of the Lord (Mt 1:20, 24; Lk 2:9-12) and reflect the belief that there were in fact a number of principal angels who represented the Lord (e.g., Gabriel in Lk 1:19, 26).

The absence of these Jewish angelological themes in the Gospels is best explained as an expression of their Christology (see 5 below). It is also consistent with the peculiar ways angels and other angelological traditions do appear in the Gospels.

3. The Synoptic Gospels.

With an appreciation for the breadth and creativity of Jewish angel traditions, we find that besides the explicit angel references, the Gospels draw implicitly on diverse angel traditions.

3.1. Angel Texts Shared Across the Synoptics. Angels set the scene of eschatological fulfillment in all three of the Synoptic Gospels. In Matthew and Luke angels announce God's intentions through the *birth of Jesus (and *John the Baptist), much as the angel of the Yahweh had done at the births of Ishmael (Gen 16:11-12), Isaac (Gen 18:9-15) and Samson (Judg 13:3-5). Luke's opening angelophanies stress God's purposes in and for true *temple and Torah piety: Zechariah's meeting with Gabriel in the sanctuary is natural because it is God's house, the headquarters of his angelic executive (cf. Is 6; Zech 3; Josephus, J. W. 6:299-300; Liv. Pro. 23:2; 1 En. 14:8-25).

In his own way, as C. Rowland points out (in Rowland and Murray-Jones 2009, 113-16), Mark also has an angel prepare the way for the Lord Jesus: John the Baptist is an angelos (Mk 1:2; cf. the priest angel in LXX Ex 23:20-22) and eats special food, honey—the ambrosia reserved for the angels (cf. Jos. Asen. 16:14; Origen, Comm. Jo. 2.25 on Jn 1:6).

In the wilderness Satan invites Jesus to put his trust in the angelic protection promised in Psalm 91:11-12 (Mt 4:5-7; Lk 4:9-12) and to force a dramatic divine demonstration of his special status as God's son. Jesus rejects the offer in Luke and Matthew (see further below). However, Matthew and Mark still have angels serve him (Mt 4:11; Mk 1:13). Jesus' faithfulness under duress means that he succeeded where Adam capitulated to the serpent. So, Matthew's and Mark's scene with the ministering angels perhaps evokes the tradition that the angels rendered worshipful service to Adam at his creation (see 2.2 above).

Jesus' authoritative reply to the testing legal case posed by the Sadducees shows that he and his followers adopted the emerging majority view that after the resurrection the righteous would live a new kind of existence: an angelomorphic existence free from conjugal commitments and sexual activity (Mt 22:30; Mk 12:25; Lk 20:34-36; cf., e.g., Dan 12:3; 4 Ezra 7:97; 2 Bar. 51:10). It is not that angels were believed to be incapable of sexual intercourse (cf. Gen 6:1-4; 1 En. 6-15), but rather that sexual intercourse is both unnecessary and improper for the heavenly life that the righteous will experience after resurrection.

Mark 13:27 (// Mt 24:31, but not Lk 21) predicts that the *Son of Man will send out his angels to gather the elect from the four winds when he comes in *glory. In a thoroughgoing A.D. 70, temple-destruction reading of Mark 13, N. T. Wright has argued that these angels are the apostles sent out on Christian mission (Wright 1996, 362-63). This is plausible, especially in view of those texts that describe Christian leaders behaving like angels (Acts 6:15; 8:26-40; cf. Gal 4:14) and also the use of angelos for the apostles in Luke 9:52 (cf. Lk 10:1 with Ex 23:20; Mal 3:1).

Across the Synoptic tradition there is evidence of an interest in angels in Gethsemane. In some manuscripts of Luke 22:43-44 Jesus is strengthened by an angel as he sweats like drops of blood; in Matthew 26:53 Jesus claims that he can call on the help of twelve legions of angels; and in Mark 14:51-52 the "young man" (neaniskos) fleeing naked may be an angel. The first two, and perhaps the third, of these texts reflect the tradition of angelic help offered to righteous heroes in battle (see above).

The angels reappear on stage in the *resurrection narratives, echoing their role in the infancy narratives. The resurrection (and death itself) is an *apocalyptic moment: the Easter garden tomb is a "thin" place and time. Mark and Luke refrain from explicit identification of the (young) men who greet the women at the tomb as the angels (Mk 16:5; Lk 24:4-7), though their description is stereotypical of heavenly beings (see Josephus's "young men" as angels in 2.2 above). The absence of explicit identification may also serve to create suspense, echoing the way the heroes of old often are greeted by angels unawares (Judg 6; Tobit).

3.2. The Gospel of Matthew. Matthew has a particular interest in the protective, guarding role of angels (see Mt 4:5-7; 26:51-53). The angels in his infancy narrative effectively protect Jesus (Mt 2:13, 19-21), and Jesus speaks of the "little ones" having angels who represent and protect them as they have direct access to God in heaven (Mt 18:10). Here there may be belief in an individual's guardian angel, though in Matthew 18:10 it may be that the righteous have a kind of angelic double or heavenly angelic self (cf. 2 Cor 12:2; Eph 2:6; Phil 3:20).

In Matthew 13:39, 41, 49 there are angels of end-time judgment (see 2.1 above), and Matthew 25:41 notes that the devil has angels (cf. 1 En. 6—18; 2 En. 29:4-5). D. C. Allison has made a strong case that the star that guided the magi was in fact an angel (cf. Ex 14:19; 23:20).

3.3. The Gospel of Luke. In the context of the first two chapters of Luke, which are steeped in the hopes for Israel's redemption, the "multitude of a heavenly army [stratia]" (Lk 2:13) consists of warrior angels whose praise signals God's power to defeat his enemies and bring "peace" (Lk 2:14). There is another scene of angelic *joy and *worship in Luke's "lost and found" chapter (Lk 15:10). There, at the announcement to the shepherds and at the triumphal entry, Luke probably assumes that the angels' worship is reflected or imitated by the righteous: the shepherds "praise and glorify God" (Lk 2:20) just like the angels (Lk 2:13-14), and lyrics of the angelic song (Lk 2:14) are reprised by the crowds at the *triumphal entry (Lk 19:38) (see Fletcher-Louis 1996, 72-78).

An interest in the angelic life as a model for the ideal human life is also present in Luke's version of Jesus' debate with the *Sadducees about the resurrection life. In several ways, his version is different from that in Mark (and Matthew), including that in Luke 20:34-36 Jesus describes the righteous, the "sons of God," as those who already express an angelic existence by not marrying (see Fletcher-Louis 1996, 78-86).

After his resurrection Jesus appears to his disciples, and they think that he is a spirit, which for Luke is much the same as an angel (cf. Acts 23:8-9). To prove that he is no spirit, Jesus eats some grilled fish (Lk 24:36-43). This story probably reflects the contemporary Jewish belief that angels do not eat (see Tob 12:19; Apoc. Ab. 13:4; T. Ab. 4:9-10; Philo, Ab. 118; Josephus, Ant. 1.197) (see Fletcher-Louis 1996, 63-70), at least not ordinary earthly food (cf. Ps 78:5; Jos. Asen. 16:15-16).

4. The Gospel of John.

There are comparatively few references to angels in John. The image of angels ascending and descending on the Son of Man in John 1:51 probably relies on Jewish interpretive traditions around the meaning of Genesis 28:12, where angels ascend and descend on a ladder (or "on Jacob") as the patriarch sleeps at Bethel (see Rowland 1984). This background suggests that the angels go up to heaven, where they see the same face on the throne of God as they see in the Son of Man. Here, and in other ways (see 5 below), angelology serves John's distinctive high Christology.

5. Angels and Christology.

There has been lively debate in recent decades about ways in which angel traditions contributed to NT Christology (see Fletcher-Louis 1996; Gieschen; Hannah; Sullivan; Garrett). Clearly, Jesus is not an angel in the Synoptics (contrast Gos. Thom. 13), but angels contribute in various ways to his identity.

Some believe that in Daniel 7:13 the "one like a son of man" is an angel. In Luke 9:26 Jesus speaks of the Son of Man having the glory of the angels (contrast Mt 16:27; Mk 8:38), but he also has the Father's and his own glory. As the Son of Man, Jesus suffers unto death in a way that would not be expected of an angel, and in some sayings angels are clearly distinguished from the Son of Man in a way that reflects the belief that he is exalted over them (Mk 8:38; 13:26-27; Mt 13:41; 25:31; Jn 1:51; cf. Lk 12:8). Similarly, the presence of a large company of angels, outside the temple, at Jesus' birth in Luke 2 signals the presence of one who is superior to the angels.

The *transfiguration (Mt 17:1-13; Mk 9:2-13; Lk 9:28-36) can be understood on analogy to texts that describe a this-life transformation, including those in which a righteous individual is given an angelomorphic identity (e.g., 2 En. 22:8-10) (Fletcher-Louis 2001).

While Luke's postresurrection stories claim that Jesus is no disembodied angel (Lk 24:36-43), the Emmaus story also echoes the way the angel of Yahweh behaves in Genesis 18-19, Judges 6; 13 (and Tob 5-12) (see Fletcher-Louis 1996, 62-63). It is also possible that in the Synoptic tradition in general and, especially, in John the pattern of an angel coming from heaven to earth has contributed to sayings in which Jesus describes how he (or the Son of Man) "has come" (to earth) (on John's Christology, see Gathercole, 113-47; Ashton; Fossum; Gieschen, 270-93).

The relative absence of angelic activity during Jesus' ministry in comparison to the infancy and resurrection stories, and Jesus' rejection of angelic help at the temptation, are best explained as an implicit christological motif: while Jesus is on earth, angels are not needed, for one greater is here. It is a mistake to see a need for angels during this time (Jn 12:29).

See also APOCALYPTICISM AND APOCALYPTIC TEACHING; DEMON, DEVIL, SATAN; DREAMS AND VISIONS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. D. C. Allison Jr., "The Magi's Angel (Matt. 2:2, 9-10)," in Studies in Matthew: Interpretation Past and Present (Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2005) 17-41; J. Ashton, "Bridging Ambiguities," in Studying John: Approaches to the Fourth Gospel (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1994) 71-89; M. Barker, The Great Angel: A Study of Israel's Second God (London: SPCK, 1992); C. Fletcher-Louis, Luke-Acts: Angels, Christology and Soteriology (WUNT 2/94; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1996); idem, "The Revelation of the Sacral Son of Man: The Genre, History of Religions Context and the Meaning of the Transfiguration," in Auferstehung—Resurrection: The Fourth Durham-Tübingen Symposium; Resurrection, Transfiguration, and Exaltation in Old Testament, Ancient Judaism, and Early Christianity, ed. F. Avemarie, and H. Lichtenberger (WUNT 135; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2001) 247-98; idem, All the Glory of Adam: Liturgical Anthropology in the Dead Sea Scrolls (STDJ 42; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2002); idem, "Jewish Mysticism and the New Testament," in The New Testament and Rabbinic Literature, ed. R. Bieringer et al. (JSJSup 136; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2010) 429-

70; J. E. Fossum, “In the Beginning Was the Name: Onamology as the Key to Johannine Christology,” in The Image of the Invisible God: Essays on the Influence of Jewish Mysticism on Early Christology (NTOA 30; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1995) 109-34; S. R. Garrett, No Ordinary Angel: Celestial Spirits and Christian Claims About Jesus (New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 2008); S. J. Gathercole, The Pre-existent Son: Recovering the Christologies of Matthew, Mark, and Luke (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2006); C. A. Gieschen, Angelomorphic Christology: Antecedents and Early Evidence (AGJU 42; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1998); D. D. Hannah, Michael and Christ: Michael Traditions and Angel Christology in Early Christianity (WUNT 2/109; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1999); W. Horbury, Jewish Messianism and the Cult of Christ (London: SCM, 1998); M. Mach, Entwicklungsstadien des jüdischen Engelglaubens in vor-rabbinischer Zeit (TSAJ 34; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1992); idem, “Angels,” in Encyclopedia of the Dead Sea Scrolls, ed. L. H. Schiffman and J. C. VanderKam (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2000) 24-27; C. C. Rowland, “John 1.51, Jewish Apocalyptic and Targumic Tradition,” NTS 30 (1984) 498-507; idem, The Open Heaven: A Study of Apocalypics in Judaism and Early Christianity (New York: Crossroad, 1982); C. C. Rowland and C. R. A. Murray-Jones, The Mystery of God: Early Jewish Mysticism and the New Testament (Leiden: Brill, 2009); K. P. Sullivan, Wrestling with Angels: A Study of the Relationship Between Angels and Humans in Ancient Jewish Literature and the New Testament (AGJU 55; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2004); A. van der Kooij, “LXX Exod 23 and the Figure of the High Priest,” in On Stone and Scroll: Essays in Honour of Graham Ivor Davies, ed. J. K. Aitken, K. J. Dell and B. A. Mastin (BZAW 420; Berlin: de Gruyter, 2012) 537-49; N. T. Wright, Jesus and the Victory of God (London: SPCK, 1996).

C. Fletcher-Louis

ANOINTING

In the Gospels anointing is associated with *healing (Mk 6:13; Lk 10:34), the celebration of meals (Mt 6:17-18), hospitality (Lk 7:46) and the burial of Jesus (Mk 16:1; Lk 24:1; Jn 19:39-40). All four Gospels include an account of the anointing of Jesus by a woman (Mt 26:6-13; Mk 14:3-9; Lk 7:36-50; Jn 12:1-8). In the OT the anointing of the head was associated with the consecration of kings (1 Sam 9:15-10:1; 16:12-13; 1 Kings 1:38-40) and of priests and prophets (Ex 28:41; 1 Kings 19:16); the term “messiah” (christos) has the literal meaning “anointed one.” The verb chriō (“anoint”) occurs in the Gospels only once, in the account of the anointing of Jesus by the *Spirit (Lk 4:18; cf. LXX Isa 61:1; see also Acts 10:38), and the Gospels employ the verb aleiphō (“anoint”) [Mt 6:17; Mk 6:13; 16:1; Lk 7:38, 46; Jn 11:2; 12:3]). The OT background, however, raises the question of whether the evangelists intend to depict the woman’s action as the anointing of Jesus as the Messiah.

1. Anointing of Jesus in Mark (Mk 14:3-9)
2. Anointing of Jesus in Matthew (Mt 26:6-13)
3. Anointing of Jesus in Luke (Lk 7:36-50)
4. Anointing of Jesus in John (Jn 12:1-8)
5. Conclusion

1. Anointing of Jesus in Mark (Mk 14:3-9).

In Mark’s Gospel an anonymous woman interrupts a meal, breaks open a jar of perfume, and pours the perfume over Jesus’ head in the house of Simon the leper. Mark has employed his characteristic literary technique of intercalation to place the account of the anointing of Jesus between the plot of the chief *priests and *scribes to arrest Jesus (Mk 14:1-2) and the betrayal of Jesus by Judas (Mk 14:10-11) (Barton). The location of this episode at the beginning of the *passion narrative and the woman’s act of anointing Jesus’ head in the middle of the meal suggest that her action is to be interpreted as the anointing of Jesus as the Messiah. The woman remains silent throughout the account, and Jesus is the one who interprets the anointing as the preparation of his body for burial. The woman is portrayed as a prophetic figure, since her act of anointing Jesus’ head alludes to his kingship, which is revealed at his death.

Some of those present object that the perfume could have been sold for more than three hundred denarii and the money given to the poor (Mk 14:5) (see Rich and Poor). Jesus defends the woman by arguing that she has performed a “good deed” because she has anointed his body for burial. In rabbinic tradition “good deeds” take precedence over almsgiving because they require immediate action (Daube). Jesus does not ignore the needs of the poor, since he cites the commandment that requires the care of the poor (Deut 15:11). The woman’s critics describe the gift as a “waste” (apōleia [Mk 14:4]), but this term recalls Jesus’ teaching on *discipleship in which the cognate verb apollymi (“lose”) is used to demonstrate that only those willing to lose their lives will save life (Mk 8:35). The loss of the perfume paradoxically reflects the extravagant gift of Jesus’ life to bring life to others (Miller).

2. Anointing of Jesus in Matthew (Mt 26:6-13).

Matthew follows Mark’s Gospel closely in his portrayal of an anonymous woman who anoints Jesus' head in the house of Simon the leper. Matthew's account focuses on the significance of the anointing of Jesus as a teaching episode for the disciples. In Mark's Gospel the woman's critics are unnamed, but Matthew identifies the disciples as the ones who question the waste of perfume. Jesus responds to the disciples directly, implying that they have a responsibility to care of the poor. The woman has performed a "good deed" for Jesus, who is identified with the poor. Her action looks forward to the teaching of Jesus in which those who care for the hungry, the thirsty, the stranger, the naked, the sick and the prisoner care for Jesus (Mt 25:31-46) (Wainwright).

3. Anointing of Jesus in Luke (Lk 7:36-50).

In Luke's Gospel an anonymous woman who is described as a sinner in the city anoints Jesus' feet in the house of Simon, a Pharisee. Luke has connected his account of the anointing of Jesus to a parable of Jesus about forgiveness. The woman weeps over Jesus' feet and loosens her hair to dry them before anointing them with oil. Luke downplays the prophetic role of the woman by presenting her in the conventional role of a penitent *sinner. Jesus, however, reverses the status of the woman and his host by comparing the service of the woman favorably to the hospitality offered to him by Simon (Seim).

4. Anointing of Jesus in John (Jn 12:1-8).

In John's Gospel Mary of Bethany anoints the feet of Jesus at a dinner in Bethany, and Judas is the disciple who objects to the cost of the perfume. Mary anoints Jesus as a sign of her gratitude toward Jesus for the raising of her brother, *Lazarus. Her act of anointing Jesus' feet and drying them with her hair foreshadows Jesus' act of washing and drying his disciples' feet at the *Last Supper (Jn 13:1-20). Jesus carries out a symbolic action expressing the *salvation that he brings to humankind, and Mary's act of anointing Jesus' feet points to his identity as the suffering Messiah. Mary carries out a prophetic action that prepares Jesus for his death (Conway). The scent of the perfume spreads through the house, and the Greek term osmē ("scent") recalls the scent of the sacrifices pleasing to God (Jn 12:3; cf. LXX Gen 8:21; Ex 29:18; Lev 2:2), thus alluding to the sacrificial nature of Jesus' death.

5. Conclusion.

In Mark, Matthew and John a woman anoints Jesus as the Messiah, and Jesus connects the act of anointing with his death, since he is revealed as the Messiah through his willingness to give his life for others. Luke, however, downplays the prophetic role of the woman and associates the anointing with repentance and forgiveness. The similarities and differences between the narratives suggest that two stories may have been combined. In one tradition a repentant woman weeps at Jesus' feet in Galilee, and in the second a woman anoints Jesus' head in Bethany (Legault). In Mark, Matthew and John the anointing of Jesus is associated with his imminent death. Jesus does not disregard the needs of the poor, since he is about to give his life to bring abundant life to all people.

See also BAPTISM; MESSIAH.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. S. C. Barton, "Mark as Narrative: The Story of the Anointing Woman (14:3-9)," ExpTim 102 (1991) 230-34; C. M. Conway, Men and Women in the Fourth Gospel: Gender and Johannine Characterization (SBLDS 167; Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature, 1999); D. Daube, The New Testament and Rabbinic Judaism (London: Althone, 1956) 315; T. J. Hornsby, "Anointing Traditions," in The Historical Jesus in Context, ed. A.-J. Levine, D. C. Allison Jr., and J. D. Crossan (PRR; Princeton: Princeton University Press, 2006) 339-42; A. Legault, "An Application of the Form-Critique Method to the Anointings in Galilee and Bethany," CBQ 16 (1954) 131-45; S. Miller, Women in Mark's Gospel (JSNTSup 259; London: T & T Clark, 2004); T. K. Seim, The Double Message: Patterns of Gender in Luke-Acts (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1994); E. Wainwright, Women Healing / Healing Women: The Genderization of Healing in Early Christianity (London: Equinox, 2006) 155-58. S. Miller

ANTI-JUDAISM. See ANTI-SEMITISM.

ANTIPAS. See HERODIAN DYNASTY.

ANTI-SEMITISM

The despicable horror of anti-Semitism is the antithesis of the Christian teaching of love. The Shoah (the Holocaust), perpetrated in a nominally Christian country, was a contradiction of the very heart of Christianity. So-called Christian anti-Semitism is an oxymoron. It is therefore a tragic irony that anti-Semitism has been encouraged by the unfortunate and improper use of NT texts, especially, but not only, from the Gospels. A quick, popular conclusion seems plausible: the NT is broadly responsible for anti-Semitism. Although this argument is frequently heard from both Jews and non-Jews, it is simplistic and unjustifiable. The issue is complex and requires careful definitions and distinctions.

1. Anti-Semitism and Anti-Judaism
2. Mark and Matthew
3. Luke
4. John
5. Anti-Semitism, Anti-Judaism and the Death of Jesus

1. Anti-Semitism and Anti-Judaism.

It is of great importance to distinguish anti-Semitism from anti-Judaism. The former is a broadly based racial/cultural hatred and hostility toward Jews as a people that may include, but is not limited to, the religion of the Jews. Anti-Judaism, on the other hand, is specifically disagreement with the religious views and practices of Judaism as a religion, or, more accurately, with some of these views and practices. Accepting this distinction, we may conclude that the negativity that we encounter in the NT is not anti-Semitism, but rather an expression of anti-Judaism. And since it is certain that almost all the NT writers were Jews, it makes no sense to speak of racial/cultural hatred of the Jews on their part, for that would be a form of self-hatred.

It is anti-Judaism that we encounter in the NT. Even this conclusion is highly problematic, however. Jesus was a Jew, the Twelve were Jews, and earliest Christianity consisted exclusively of Jews. These Jews never would have regarded their faith as an anti-Judaism. Indeed, Christianity itself can be construed as a form of Judaism. Jewish believers in Jesus did not stop being Jews. They did not regard themselves as having converted to a new religion. Instead, they regarded their new faith as the fulfillment of their Judaism. It was the true Judaism.

At the same time, however, we must not downplay the newness implicit in their new faith in Jesus. There were aspects of their new convictions that were hardly compatible with their previous views, especially in such areas as Christology and soteriology, with obvious implications for the law and the temple. Very quickly these views began to make it impossible to regard these believers in Jesus as a sect within *Judaism—that is, as another manifestation of the diversity of Second Temple Judaism. To the extent that these views differed from those of the emerging, formative Judaism, one may indeed see indications of a necessary anti-Judaism. It is important to note, however, that anti-Judaism is not equivalent to being anti-Jewish. This must be kept in mind in the use of the word anti-Judaism in what follows. The early Jewish believers in Jesus, including the evangelists, cannot be considered anti-Jewish.

At first, disagreements between the Jews who believed in Jesus and those who did not constituted an intramural argument: Jews arguing with Jews. This certainly was the case within the NT itself, where criticism of Judaism can no more be labeled as anti-Semitism than can the prophets' denunciations of Israel. It was not long, however, before these Jewish believers in Jesus were ostracized from *synagogues. Although the subject is much disputed, very probably the so-called parting of the ways began well before the end of the first century and increasingly became an undeniable reality with the passing of time (for a review of the discussion, see Hagner). During the same period, the church had taken in large numbers of *Gentile believers, and Jewish believers in Jesus became a distinct minority. Here for the first time we have the real potential for anti-Semitism.

2. Mark and Matthew.

Mark's narrative presents aspects of anti-Judaism that are picked up and heightened by Matthew. Neither in Mark nor Matthew is the term hoi Ioudaioi ("the Jews") significant in this regard. Far more important are the references to the *Pharisees, who are most representative of Judaism.

The Pharisees dispute with Jesus in order to "test" him (Mk 8:11; 10:2) and to "entrap" him (Mk 12:13 // Mt 22:15). Already in Mark 3:6 the Pharisees join the *Herodians in plotting the death of Jesus (so too Mt 12:14, but without mention of the Herodians), although surprisingly the Pharisees are not mentioned in the arrest, *trial and *passion narratives.

The Gospel of Matthew picks up most of Mark's polemic against the Jews. This is all the more interesting because Matthew, unlike Mark, is written to Jewish rather than Gentile Christians. The negative portrayal of the Pharisees is intensified in Matthew, especially in the well-known chapter Matthew 23. Jesus, according to Matthew, repeatedly calls them *"hypocrites," but also "child(ren) of hell," "blind guides," "blind fools," "serpents" and "brood of vipers" (cf. Mt 3:7, where the Pharisees are linked with the *Sadducees). Although the Pharisees are portrayed negatively in Mark, this particular language is not used of them in that Gospel, except for the single reference to "hypocrites" in Mark 7:6 (expressly alluding to Is 29:13). Matthew notes that the Pharisees attributed Jesus' ability to exorcize *demons to "the prince of demons" (Mt 9:34; 12:24; cf. Mk 3:22).

Apart from the negative mention of these groups, Markan anti-Judaism can also be seen in the dispute over the *law. The Pharisees were distressed by Jesus' stance toward the law. Mark notes the freedom of Jesus vis-à-vis the *Sabbath (Mk 2:23—3:6 // Mt 12:1-14) and dietary law (Mk 7:1-23 // Mt 15:1-20, where Mark adds the comment "Thus he declared all foods clean" [Mk 7:19], a comment not picked up by Matthew, however) and his disallowance of *divorce, thereby contradicting *Moses (Mk 10:2-9 // Mt 19:3-9). So too, Jesus is critical of the *temple: he cleanses it (Mk 11:15-18 // Mt 21:12-13), he prophesies its destruction (Mk 13:1-2 // Mt 24:1-3), and at his crucifixion the temple curtain is torn apart (Mk 15:38 // Mt 27:51), implying the end of the cultus as the means of atonement.

Mark also contains the parable of the wicked tenants (Mk 12:1-12 // Mt 21:33-46). The tenants, representing the Jews, or at least the Jewish authorities, kill the son of the vineyard owner, with the result that the vineyard is taken away from them and given to others. With this motif of the transference of the kingdom we may compare Matthew 8:10-11, where it is stated that many (Gentiles, like the centurion) from east and west will sit at table with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, while "the sons of the kingdom will be thrown into the outer darkness."

It is important to note that the negative view of the Jews in all four Gospels is a result of the Jewish rejection of Jesus, and this motif finds its focus primarily in the Jewish authorities. In Mark 11:18 the chief *priests and *scribes seek a way to destroy him. Jesus predicts his sufferings and death at the hands of "the elders, the chief priests, and the scribes" (Mk 8:31 // Mt 16:21) or of "the chief priests and the scribes" (Mk 10:33 // Mt 20:18); it is they who will "deliver him to the Gentiles." It is specifically the chief priests, scribes and *elders (Mk 14:43, 53; 15:1, 3, 11, 31), the members of the *Sanhedrin (Mk 14:55) and the high priest (Mk 14:60-63) who are implicated in the death of Jesus. Toward the end of the narrative the Pharisees appear together with the chief priests only in Matthew 27:62.

Throughout Mark and Matthew, however, the Pharisees are also linked with Jewish authorities: the Herodians (Mk 3:6; 12:13; cf. Mk 8:15; Mt 22:15-16) and the scribes (Mk 7:1, 5). In Matthew it is the "scribes" who are most often linked with the Pharisees (e.g., Mt 12:38; 15:1; 23:2), most notably in the seven woes against the Pharisees in Matthew 23. In Matthew 3:7 the Pharisees are mentioned together with the Sadducees, as also in Matthew 16:1, 6, 11-12; 22:34. They are linked with the chief priests in Matthew 21:45.

It is the blame for the death of Jesus that constitutes the most virulent anti-Judaic theme in the Gospels. Without question, one of the most grievous statements is that of Matthew 27:25, where "all the people [laos]" cry out, "His blood be on us and on our children." It cannot be denied that this statement, unfortunately, has been used to promote anti-Semitism. It should be noted, however, that the statement is formulaic, and the reference to "our children" does not make them guilty of the death of Jesus, let alone children or Jews of later generations. It must strongly be emphasized that it is wrong to generalize these words by applying them to all Jews of every place and every time.

3. Luke.

The opening two chapters of Luke speak eloquently of how the *birth of Jesus is the initial fulfillment of the hope of *Israel (Lk 1:13-17, 30-33, 46-55, 67-79; 2:10-11, 25-38). At the opening of his Galilean ministry, however, Jesus is rejected in his hometown of Nazareth (Lk 4:28-29). As also in Mark and Matthew, the Pharisees are the main antagonists of Jesus. In Luke 5:21 the Pharisees accuse Jesus of *blasphemy because he forgives the sins of the paralytic whom he had healed. A passage unique to Luke notes that "the Pharisees and the lawyers rejected the purpose of God for themselves" (Lk 7:30). In Luke 16:14-15 the Pharisees are described as "lovers of money," and Jesus says to them, "You are those who justify yourselves in the sight of others, but God knows your hearts; for what is prized by human beings is an abomination in the sight of God." Luke 18:9-14 contains the parable of the Pharisee and the tax collector, addressed "to some who trusted in themselves that they were righteous and despised others." The concluding verse focuses on the self-exaltation of the Pharisee. In another Lukan parable the compassion of a *Samaritan is contrasted with the indifference of a priest and a Levite (Lk 10:29-37).

In Luke too the Pharisees are upset by Jesus' failure to observe the Sabbath to their satisfaction (Lk 6:1-11; cf. Lk 14:1-6). In Luke 6:7 the scribes and the Pharisees "watched him, to see whether he would heal on the sabbath, so that they might find an accusation against him." They were "filled with fury and discussed with one another what they might do to Jesus" (Lk 6:11). The ruler of the synagogue was "indignant because Jesus had healed on the sabbath" (Lk 13:14). Luke 15:2 reports that "the Pharisees and the scribes murmured, saying, 'This man receives sinners and eats with them.'"

The only reference in Luke that associates the Pharisees explicitly with hypocrisy is in Luke 12:1, where Jesus says to his disciples, "Beware of the leaven of the Pharisees, which is hypocrisy." Immediately after Luke's parallel to Matthew 23, containing woes against the Pharisees and lawyers (see Lk 11:37-52; cf. Lk 20:45-47), Luke writes, "As he went away from there, the scribes and the Pharisees began to press him hard, and to provoke him to speak of many things, lying in wait for him, to catch at something he might say" (Lk 11:53).

At a few points Luke uses the word "lawyers" (nomikoi, synonym for "scribes") where Matthew refers to the scribes and Pharisees. Thus, in Luke 11:46 it is "lawyers" who load people down with burdens hard to bear (cf. Mt 23:4). So too in the following woe oracle: "Woe to you lawyers! For you have taken away the key of knowledge; you did not enter yourselves, and you hindered those who were entering" (Lk 11:52 // Mt 23:13). In Luke 20:46-47 (// Mt 23:5-7) Jesus warns his disciples concerning "the scribes, who like to go about in long robes, and love salutations in the marketplaces and the best seats in the synagogues and the places of honor at feasts, who devour widows' houses and for a pretense make long prayers. They will receive the greater condemnation" (cf. similar material concerning the Pharisees in Lk 11:43).

At the same time, and rather paradoxically, the picture of the Pharisees and scribes in Luke is not consistently negative. Several times Pharisees invite Jesus to dinner (Lk 7:36; 11:37; 14:1). In one instance scribes are described as appreciating the teaching of Jesus: "Some of the scribes answered, 'Teacher, you have spoken well.' For they no longer dared to ask him any question" (Lk 20:39). And strikingly, some Pharisees warn Jesus concerning a threat to his life: "Get away from here, for Herod wants to kill you" (Lk 13:31).

As in Mark and Matthew, those responsible for the death of Jesus are the Jewish authorities. In the first passion *prediction Luke follows Mark closely: "The Son of Man must be rejected by the elders and chief priests and scribes, and be killed, and on the third day be raised" (Lk 9:22). Again, when Jesus was teaching in the temple, "the chief priests, the scribes and the leaders of the people sought to destroy him" (Lk 19:47). The chief priests and the scribes with the elders question the source of Jesus' authority (Lk 20:2). In Luke 20:19-20 it is the scribes and the chief priests who "tried to lay hands on him . . . for they perceived that he had told this parable [of the wicked tenants] against them. So they watched him, and sent spies, who pretended to be sincere, that they might take hold of what he said, so as to deliver him up to the authority and jurisdiction of the governor"

(cf. Lk 22:2). It is "the chief priests and captains of the temple and elders" who initially take Jesus captive in the garden (Lk 22:52). And finally, "the assembly of the elders of the people, both chief priests and scribes," "brought Jesus before Pilate" (Lk 22:66-23:1). The chief priest and scribes vehemently accuse Jesus before Herod (Lk 23:10).

Although in fact it was the Romans who crucified Jesus, since they did so at the bidding of the Jewish authorities, it is possible to connect the latter with the crucifixion. This happens in Luke 24:19-20, where the Emmaus disciples say, "Our chief priests and rulers delivered him up to be condemned to death, and crucified him." The connection becomes particularly strong in Luke's second volume, where the people of Israel in general are repeatedly held accountable for the death of Jesus: Acts 2:22-23, 36; 3:13-15; 4:8-10 ("rulers of the people and elders"); Acts 5:30 (the council and high priest); Acts 7:51-52; 10:39; 13:27-28 ("those who live in Jerusalem and their rulers"). In Acts Paul speaks three times of a turning from the Jews to the Gentiles (Acts 13:46; 18:6; 28:28).

4. John.

In the whole of the NT it is perhaps in John that we come closest to anti-Semitism. Here the polemic often focuses more generally on "the Jews." It is possible to translate hoi Ioudaioi, which appears frequently in John, as "the Judeans," as some translations occasionally do, but this hardly alleviates the problem. As in the Synoptic Gospels, very early in the narrative the Pharisees become anxious about Jesus. Thus, although in John 1:19 "the Jews sent priests and Levites from Jerusalem" to interrogate Jesus, in John 1:24 it is said that "they had been sent by the Pharisees." What disturbs the Pharisees is not only Jesus' attitude toward the Sabbath (Jn 7:23; 9:16), but also, far more, what are regarded as his personal claims: "This was why the Jews persecuted Jesus, because he did this on the sabbath. . . . This was why the Jews sought all the more to kill him, because he not only broke the sabbath but also called God his own Father, making himself equal with God" (Jn 5:16-18). "The Jews then murmured at him, because he said, 'I am the bread which came down from heaven'" (Jn 6:41).

The personal claims of Jesus result in the Jews taking up stones to stone him. In John 8:58-59, when Jesus says, "Before Abraham was, I am," "they took up stones to throw at him." The same thing happens when Jesus says, "I and the Father are one" (Jn 10:30). They regarded this as blasphemy: "You, being a man, make yourself God" (Jn 10:33). Already in John 4:1

the Pharisees are the cause of Jesus leaving Judea for Galilee. The hostility increases as the narrative proceeds. The Jews seek to kill Jesus (Jn 7:1, 19, 25; 8:37). "The chief priests and Pharisees sent officers to arrest him" (Jn 7:32; cf. Jn 7:30, 45; 10:39).

It is in a dialogue between the Jews and Jesus that undoubtedly the most vitriolic words are spoken against the Jews: "You are of your father the devil, and your will is to do your father's desires" (Jn 8:44). The reaction of the Jews is to ask, "Are we not right in saying that you are a Samaritan and have a demon?" (Jn 8:48 [cf. Jn 8:52]). The evangelist speaks of a division over Jesus among the Jews, some saying, "He has a demon, and he is mad," others asking, "Can a demon open the eyes of the blind?" (Jn 10:20-21).

In the account of Jesus' arrest Judas brings with him to the garden "a band of soldiers and some officers from the chief priests and the Pharisees" (Jn 18:3 [cf. Jn 18:12, referring to "the officers of the Jews"]). When Jesus is eventually brought before him, Pilate remarks, "Your own nation and the chief priests have handed you over to me" (Jn 18:35). The Jews say to Pilate, "We have a law, and by that law he ought to die, because he has made himself the Son of God" (Jn 19:7). When Pilate wanted to release Jesus, "the Jews cried out, 'If you release this man, you are not Caesar's friend. Everyone who makes himself a king sets himself against Caesar'" (Jn 19:12) (see Pontius Pilate).

It is important to note that the portrayal of the Pharisees and the Jewish authorities is not consistently negative in John. Nicodemus, "a ruler of the Jews," is set forth as a famously good Pharisee who acknowledges that Jesus is "a teacher come from God" (Jn 3:1-2; see also Jn 7:50-51; 19:39). In John 12:42 the evangelist notes rather surprisingly that "many even of the authorities believed in him, but for fear of the Pharisees they did not confess it, lest they should be put out of the synagogue" (cf. Jn 9:22).

As in the Synoptic Gospels, the strong anti-Judaism of John is the result of the rejection of Jesus by the Jews and their responsibility for the death of Jesus. The prologue of John makes the point at the beginning: "He came to his own home, and his own people received him not" (Jn 1:11). And in John 5:43 Jesus says, "I have come in my Father's name and you do not receive me." In rejecting Jesus, the Jews were in effect turning away from God: "He who rejects me rejects him who sent me" (Jn 10:16).

Above all, what prevents the easy conclusion that the Gospel of John is anti-Semitic is a statement made by Jesus during his dialogue with a Samaritan woman: "You [Samaritans] worship what you do not know; we [Jews] worship what we know, for salvation is from the Jews" (Jn 4:22).

5. Anti-Semitism, Anti-Judaism and the Death of Jesus.

In conclusion, several points are worth stressing.

(1) It is widely claimed that the Gospels contain anti-Semitic texts. More accurately put, however, these texts are anti-Judaic rather than anti-Semitic. It cannot be denied that these texts have the potential to be taken in an anti-Semitic way. But that is fundamentally to misunderstand and misuse these texts. (2) The negative view of the Jews in the Gospels is not universal. There is no condemnation of Jews simply because they are Jews, because of their Jewish identity, as tends to be the case in anti-Semitism. Not even in John does the reference to "the Jews" indicate all Jews. It is only some Jews, in particular the Pharisees and Jewish authorities, the elders, members of the Sanhedrin, together with the chief priests and the high priest, that are spoken of negatively—that is, those who were directly involved in Jesus' arrest, trial and deliverance to Pontius Pilate, the Roman procurator. (3) Contrary to the claims of some (e.g., Carter), there is no way, short of ignoring the texts altogether, of making the Romans primarily responsible for the death of Jesus. The Romans crucified Jesus at the instigation of the Jewish authorities. (4) Although there have been calls to reject outright the anti-Judaism of the NT, this would be to revise the Christian faith out of existence. It is undeniable that anti-Judaism has fueled anti-Semitism. But that fact, and even the evil of the Holocaust, must not be allowed to nullify Christian theology. Anti-Judaism is intrinsic to the claims of Christianity. Just because of this, it is of the greatest importance to take measures against the misuse of the NT texts. The anti-Semitic potential of these texts must be opposed, not by altering them, but rather by understanding them correctly. In light of the history of anti-Semitism, it is now incumbent upon all Christians constantly to emphasize what these anti-Judaic texts do not mean. (5) A fixed point in Scripture is the special importance of the Jews in God's eyes. Jesus was a Jew; the *apostles were Jews. These facts alone should rule out anti-Semitism. When a Samaritan village would not receive Jesus, James and John asked Jesus, "Lord, do you want us to bid fire come down from heaven and consume them?" (Lk 9:54). The response of Jesus was a rebuke, to which some early manuscripts added "And he said, 'You do not know what manner of spirit you are of; for the Son of Man came not to destroy lives but to save them.” Hatred and vindictiveness have no place in those who would follow Jesus. (6) The role of the Jews in killing Jesus, wrongly called “deicide,” is only an immediate or instrumental one. The ultimate cause of the death of Jesus is the sin of the human race, Jews and Gentiles together. All are guilty. From the cross the crucified Jesus says, “Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do” (Lk 23:34), and this no doubt applies to the Jewish authorities, not only to the Romans.

See also BLASPHEMY; ELDER; ETHICS OF JESUS; GENTILES; ISRAEL; JERUSALEM; JUDAISM, COMMON; LAW; PEOPLE, CROWD; PHARISEES; PRIESTS AND PRIESTHOOD; SABBATH; SADDUCEES; SANHEDRIN; SCRIBES; SYNAGOGUE; TEMPLE; TRIAL OF JESUS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R. J. Allen and C. M. Williamson, Preaching the Gospels Without Blaming the Jews: A Lectionary Commentary (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2004); G. Baum, The Jews and the Gospel: A Re-examination of the New Testament (Westminster, MD: Newman Press, 1961); J. Beutler, Judaism and the Jews in the Gospel of John (SubBi 30; Rome: Pontificio Istituto Biblico, 2006); R. Bieringer, D. Pollefeyt and F. Vandecasteele-Vanneuville, eds., Anti-Judaism and the Fourth Gospel: Papers of the Leuven Colloquium, 2000. (Assen: Van Gorcum, 2001); W. Carter, Pontius Pilate: Portraits of a Roman Governor (Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 2003); T. L. Donaldson, Jews and Anti-Judaism in the New Testament: Decision Points and Divergent Interpretations (Waco, TX: Baylor University Press, 2010); J. D. G. Dunn, “The Question of Anti-Semitism in the New Testament Writings of the Period,” in Jews and Christians: The Parting of the Ways, A.D. 70 to 135; The Second Durham-Tübingen Research Symposium on Earliest Christianity and Judaism (Durham, September 1989), ed. J. D. G. Dunn (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1999) 177-211; C. A. Evans and D. A. Hagner, eds., Anti-Semitism and Early Christianity: Issues of Polemic and Faith (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1993); W. R. Farmer, ed., Anti-Judaism and the Gospels (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 1999); P. Fredriksen and A. Reinhartz, eds., Jesus, Judaism and Christian Anti-Judaism: Reading the New Testament After the Holocaust (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2002); L. C. Freudmann, Anti-semitism in the New Testament (Lanham, MD: University Press of America); D. A. Hagner, “Another Look at ‘The Parting of the Ways,’” in Earliest Christian History: History, Literature, and Theology; Essays from the Tyndale Fellowship in Honor of Martin Hengel, ed. M. F. Bird and J. Maston (WUNT 2/320; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2012) 381-427; J. Nolland, “Matthew and Anti-Semitism,” in Built upon the Rock: Studies in the Gospel of Matthew, ed. D. M. Gurtner and J. Nolland (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2008) 154-69; P. Richardson, ed., Anti-Judaism in Early Christianity, 1: Paul and the Gospels (Waterloo, ON: Wilfrid Laurier University Press, 1986); A. Saldarini, “Reading Matthew Without Anti-Semitism,” in The Gospel of Matthew in Current Study: Studies in Memory of William G. Thompson, ed. D. E. Aune (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2001) 166-84; S. Sandmel, Anti-Semitism in the New Testament? (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1983); D. M. Smith, The Fourth Gospel in Four Dimensions: Judaism and Jesus, the Gospels and Scripture (Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 2008); J. A. Weatherly, Jewish Responsibility for the Death of Jesus in Luke-Acts (JSNTSup 106; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1994). D. A. Hagner

APHORISM. See CHREIA/APHORISM.

APOCALYPTIC ESCHATOLOGY. See APOCALYPTICISM AND APOCALYPTIC TEACHING.

APOCALYPTICISM AND APOCALYPTIC TEACHING

In contemporary English usage the word apocalyptic often carries a negative connotation. It is commonly used to describe people of a radical millenarian outlook, who are obsessed with speculation about the end of the world, which they tend to consider both calculable and imminent. Used in this negative fashion, it is a term that many Christians would be reluctant to associate with Jesus of Nazareth.

Nevertheless, in modern scholarly parlance the term has a more nuanced usage, and it has become a fixed part of the study of not only the Gospels but also the historical Jesus, his Jewish context, his expectations about the future and the way in which he used language to describe that future. Unfortunately, even contemporary scholarly discussion is plagued by a good bit of ambiguity when it comes to the exact meaning of the word apocalyptic. The term is derived from the Greek word apokalypsis, which means “revelation,” or “unveiling” (cf. Gal 1:12; Rev 1:1). However, in modern scholarship the root word apocalypse is used in at least three different ways, which are important to distinguish in any discussion of the apocalyptic teaching of Jesus and the Gospels (Aune).

First, the term apocalypse is commonly used to refer to a genre of literature in existence at the time of Jesus, characterized by written works from the Second Temple period and beyond. Second, the terms apocalyptic and apocalypticism often are used to describe a social and religious worldview shared by many of Jesus' Jewish contemporaries and often, though not exclusively, present in written apocalypses (e.g., Koch; Russell). Third, the term apocalyptic eschatology refers to those features of apocalypses and the apocalyptic worldview that focus on the cataclysmic end of the cosmos.

This article maintains these distinctions and examines each of these aspects of apocalyptic and their bearing on Jesus.

1. Jesus and the Apocalyptic Genre
2. Jesus and the Apocalyptic Worldview
3. Jesus and Apocalyptic Eschatology
4. Jesus, the Olivet Discourse and Apocalyptic Language
5. Apocalyptic Teaching in the Four Gospels
6. The Apocalyptic Death and Resurrection of Jesus

1. Jesus and the Apocalyptic Genre.

According to one influential definition, the literary genre of apocalyptic may be described as "a genre of revelatory literature with a narrative framework, in which a revelation is mediated by an otherworldly being to a human recipient, disclosing a transcendent reality which is both temporal, insofar as it envisages eschatological salvation, and spatial, insofar as it involves another, supernatural world" (Collins, 4-5). Although this definition has not gone without criticism, it remains perhaps "the most complete and systematic attempt to define the genre at the pragmatic level" that we possess (Aune, 42). There are numerous examples of ancient Jewish apocalypses outside the Bible that conform to this genre and are relevant to Jesus research. The most important of these for the study of Jesus and the Gospels are 1 Enoch, 4 Ezra, 2 Baruch, Testament of Moses and Apocalypse of Abraham. They are significant both because they were in circulation in the centuries surrounding the time of Jesus (ca. second century B.C. through the second century A.D.), and because they contain numerous thematic and linguistic parallels with the teachings of Jesus in the Gospels.

On the one hand, the apocalyptic genre as such may not appear to be directly relevant to Jesus research. For one thing, the teachings of Jesus during his public ministry are not preserved in the genre of an apocalypse. Instead, they are found in the four Gospels of the New Testament, whose literary genre is closest to the ancient Greco-Roman biography, or bios (Burridge) (see Gospel: Genre). Moreover, despite certain thematic parallels among the extra-biblical apocalypses from the Second Temple period, there is no evidence that Jesus read, knew or quoted any of these ancient Jewish texts. For example, unlike the Epistle of Jude, which quotes 1 Enoch directly (Jude 9), we find no such quotations in any of the four Gospels.

On the other hand, there is one apocalypse that is of central importance for the study of Jesus: the book of Daniel. Daniel is the only book of Jewish Scripture that is regularly classified by modern scholars as fitting the genre of apocalypse (Collins). Significantly, it is also the one extant Jewish apocalypse that Jesus alludes to or quotes directly in the four Gospels. The influence of this particular apocalypse on Jesus in the Gospels can be seen in at least four ways.

First, there is the evidence that Jesus drew directly on the Danielic "son of man" (see Son of Man). It is widely agreed by scholars that Jesus' most characteristic way of referring to himself was by means of the mysterious expression "the son of man" (ho huios tou anthrōpou). Admittedly, many of the Son of Man sayings in the Gospel have no parallel with Daniel beyond the expression "son of man" itself (e.g., Mt 8:20; Lk 9:58), but other Son of Man sayings clearly are based on the Danielic apocalypse. For example, the various sayings about the "com[ing]" of "the Son of Man" (Mt 10:23; Mk 8:38; Lk 18:8) harken back to the "coming" of the "one like a son of man" in Daniel 7:14. By far the most momentous example of this is Jesus' declaration before Caiaphas and the Sanhedrin that they would see "the Son of Man" seated at the right hand of God and/or coming on the clouds of heaven (Mt 26:64; Mk 14:62; Lk 22:69), an image unmistakably derived from the "one like a son of man" who "comes" with "the clouds of heaven" to take his seat beside the Ancient of Days in Daniel 7:13-14.

Second, and equally important, is Jesus' emphasis on the coming of the "kingdom of God." As one scholar puts it, "The centrality of the kingdom of God (basileia tou theou) in Jesus' preaching is one of the least disputable, or disputed, facts about Jesus" (Dunn, 383). Yet there is only one book of Hebrew Scripture that explicitly focuses on the coming of the "kingdom" of "God": the apocalypse of Daniel. In contrast to the writings of other biblical prophets, which speak not of a future "kingdom" but rather of the ingathering of the exiles (see Exile and Restoration), the coming of a new "temple, a second exodus or a new creation (e.g., Is 9; 11; 40; 54; 64-66; Jer 3; 16; 30; Ezek 36-37; 40-48), the opening vision in the book of Daniel climaxes with the “God of heaven” establishing his future “kingdom” (Dan 2:44-45). Later on in the book, this same everlasting “kingdom” is given by God to the “one like a son of man” after being exalted to his throne (Dan 7:14-16). Indeed, even in the Gospel of John, the one occasion on which Jesus speaks about “the kingdom of God” (in his exchange with Nicodemus [Jn 3:1-15]), we also find a teaching about “the Son of Man” ascending into “heaven” (Jn 3:13), just as the “one like a son of man” in Daniel 7:13-15. In light of such evidence, it seems that Jesus’ most characteristic teaching on the kingdom of God is derived directly from the apocalypse of Daniel. In other words, when Jesus speaks of the coming of the kingdom, he is speaking of the Danielic kingdom of God (Evans).

Third, some scholars have also suggested that Jesus’ *predictions of the suffering and death of “the Son of Man” (Mk 8:31; 9:30-31; 10:33-34 par.) are also influenced by Daniel. Although one is hard pressed to find explicit evidence in Jewish Scripture for a suffering and dying messiah, a case can be made that Jesus’ description of the suffering Son of Man is based on a combination of two figures in the book of Daniel: (1) the “one like a son of man” who comes during the eschatological tribulation (Dan 7:13-14, 24-25); (2) the Danielic “messiah” (mašīah) who dies during the eschatological tribulation later in the book (Dan 9:24-25) (Pitre). In support of this messianic interpretation of the Danielic son of man, it is critical to note that in the book of Daniel itself the one like a son of man is contrasted with the four “beasts,” which are explicitly identified as both “four kings” (Dan 7:17) and as four “kingdoms” (Dan 7:23-24). If the beasts in Daniel explicitly represent both kings and their kingdoms, there is no reason to deny that the Danielic son of man functions in the same way. The one like a son of man is a king (individual dimension) who embodies his people (collective dimension) (Bird). This would explain why the most ancient Jewish interpretations of Daniel 7 that we possess unanimously identify the Danielic son of man as the Messiah (1 En. 47; 62; 4 Ezra 13).

Fourth, Jesus’ oracle about the appearance of the “abomination of desolation” (Mt 24:15; Mk 13:14; cf. Lk 21:20), arguably one of the most characteristically apocalyptic sayings ascribed to him, is taken straight from the book of Daniel (see Dan 9:24-26). This imagery will receive closer attention later in the examination of the Olivet discourse (see 4 below).

In sum, to the extent that the book of Daniel fits the genre of an apocalypse, its influence on Jesus’ characteristic teachings about the Son of Man and the kingdom of God manifest the central significance of at least one text from this literary genre for the study of Jesus.

2. Jesus and the Apocalyptic Worldview.

In addition to being influenced by the written apocalypse of Daniel, there is also abundant evidence in the Gospels that Jesus shared in a more general way the religious worldview known as “apocalyptic” or “apocalypticism.”

Before an examination of this evidence is undertaken, however, two caveats are necessary. For one thing, it is not the case that any single feature listed below, when taken in isolation, justifies identifying Jesus as sharing an apocalyptic worldview. For example, a belief in the existence of *angels and *demons is by no means restricted to Jewish apocalypticism. Rather, it is the combination of various ideas that merit ascribing an apocalyptic worldview to Jesus in the Gospels. Moreover, the authenticity or inauthenticity of virtually all the material in the four Gospels continues to be debated. Hence, the following catalogue is given without prejudice to the question of authenticity of any particular piece of evidence, but rather simply to showcase those words and deeds attributed by the Gospels to Jesus that, when taken together, constitute or cohere quite well with what we know of early Jewish apocalypticism.

First, as the Greek word apokalypsis (“revelation”) suggests, the apocalyptic worldview is often marked by a prominent interest in otherworldly revelation (Rowland). By means of such revelation, a *prophet or visionary often is given access to or tours of invisible realities such as heaven or hell, angelic and demonic activities, and the future of humanity (e.g., Dan 2; 7; 9; 11-12; 1 En. 1-36; 4 Ezra 3-14; 2 Bar. 1-3; 53-74). Along similar lines, in the Gospels visionary experiences (see Dreams and Visions) are attributed to Jesus in events such as his *baptism by John in the Jordan River (Mt 3:13-17; Mk 1:10-11; Lk 3:21-22; cf. Jn 1:32-34), Jesus’ *transfiguration on the mountaintop (Mt 17:1-8; Mk 9:2-8; Lk 9:28-36) and the voice of the Father speaking from heaven at Passover time (Jn 12:27-30). With regard to his teachings, Jesus speaks of “mysteries of the kingdom” (Mt 13:11-12; Mk 4:10-12; Lk 8:10) and of revelations that are “hidden” from the wise but revealed to infants (Mt 11:25-27; Lk 10:21-22). On one occasion Jesus even refers to the fact that he “saw” Satan “fall from heaven like lightning” (Lk 10:18), apparently a reference to the Jewish tradition of the “fall” of the wicked angels (cf. Jude 6). In the Gospel of John, Jesus “bears witness to what he has seen and heard” (Jn 3:31), and as one who has descended from heaven (Jn 3:13), he declares what he has “seen and heard” from the heavenly Father (Jn 8:28, 38). With this said, however, it is worth noting that the accounts of Jesus’ revelations and visions in the Gospels are relatively veiled when compared with the often elaborate descriptions of similar visions found in Jewish apocalyptic literature.

Second, the apocalyptic worldview is often marked by a pronounced belief in the existence and activity of otherworldly beings, especially angels and demons. Throughout the early Jewish apocalypses such beings play a prominent role in the workings of human history, both personal and political (e.g., Dan 7–10; 1 En. 1–5; 7–8; 17–36; 56; 90–100; Apoc. Ab. 10–18; 4 Ezra 3–14; 2 Bar. 6–7). Along similar lines, in the Gospels Jesus not only assumes the existence of angels and demons; he also gives them an especially prominent place in both his words and actions. For example, the holy angels act as guardians over God’s “little ones” (Mt 18:10); they rejoice when a sinner repents (Lk 15:10); they carry the soul of the dead Lazarus to Abraham’s bosom (Lk 16:22); they gather God’s elect from the four corners of the world (Mt 24:31; Mk 13:27); they separate the righteous from the wicked in the final judgment (Mt 13:36–42); they assist in punishing the wicked (Mt 13:41–42, 49–50); and they are directly associated with the glory of the heavenly Son of man (Mt 25:31; Jn 1:51). In response to one of his disciples using physical force, Jesus declares that he could call down “more than twelve legions of angels” (i.e., over seventy-two thousand) to assist him (Mt 26:53).

Significantly, Jesus’ emphasis on demons is in some ways even more pronounced than his teachings on angelic beings. Indeed, in the Synoptic Gospels a remarkably large swath of Jesus’ public ministry is given teaching about “Satan” (Lk 10:18), “the evil one” (Mt 5:37) and “Beelzebul, the prince of demons” (Mt 12:24–29; Mk 3:22–27; Lk 11:15–22). In all these passages the existence and power of demonic beings is assumed (Mk 9:38–41; Lk 9:49–50). In keeping with this, many of Jesus’ actions are focused on the overthrow and casting out of these evil spirits (e.g., Mk 1:23–28 // Lk 4:33–37; Mt 8:28–34 // Mk 5:1–17 // Lk 8:26–37; Mt 17:14–18 // Mk 9:14–27 // Lk 9:37–43). And although the Gospel of John has no account of an exorcism, Jesus refers to the devil as “the ruler of this world” (Jn 13:30) and even describes his impending passion and death as a kind of exorcism in which “the prince of this world” shall be “cast out” (Jn 12:30–32). Clearly, in the four Gospels Jesus shares the early Jewish apocalyptic belief that angels and demons are real and active in the lives of human beings.

Third, early Jewish apocalypticism is also known for its prominent interest in otherworldly realms, such as heaven, hell (or Hades), Gehenna, Abraham’s bosom and paradise. Once again, one standard feature of early Jewish apocalypses that reflect an apocalyptic worldview is spiritual “tours” of these various spiritual realms (e.g., 1 En. 14–16; 17–36; Apoc. Ab. 15–17; T. Lev. 2–5; 2 En. 1–9) (Himmelfarb). Although in the Gospels Jesus nowhere speaks of such tours, his teachings not only assume the existence of these realms but also give them an extremely prominent if not central role. For example, there are more references to Gehenna as a place of spiritual punishment in the Gospels than in the rest of the New Testament combined (e.g., Mt 5:27–30; Mk 9:43–48; Mt 10:26–33; Lk 12:2–7; cf. Mt 18:8–9). In most of these cases Gehenna is described as a place of everlasting punishment. In at least one case, however, Jesus appears to describe Gehenna as a realm of temporary punishment by fire, likening it to a spiritual “prison” from which one will eventually be set free (Mt 5:21–26; cf. t. Sanh. 13:3; m. ‘Ed. 2:10) (Jeremias, TDNT 2:657–58). In other cases, Jesus speaks of “Abraham’s bosom” as a postmortem place of rest and peace, which is contrasted with “Hades,” a postmortem place of torment (Lk 16:19–31).

Significantly, despite the popular insistence that the “kingdom of God” is not a realm but rather a reign (Perrin; Crossan), recent scholarship shows that in certain sayings the kingdom of God is in fact described as a supernatural realm into which one can “enter” or from which one can be “cast out” or barred entry (Allison 2010). Indeed, in many cases “the kingdom of God seems to be a way of speaking of heaven” (Dunn, 425). For example, Jesus teaches that the righteous will feast with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob in “the kingdom,” while the wicked are thrown into the “outer darkness,” the spiritual realm of the damned (Mt 8:11–12; Lk 13:28–29; cf. Mt 22:1–14). Likewise, those who do not rid themselves of causes of sin will not “enter” the kingdom (equated with eternal “life”); rather, they will “go” instead into the fiery realm of Gehenna (Mk 9:42–48). In his response to Peter’s confession Jesus sets the “the kingdom” over against the spiritual realm of “Hades” (Mt 16:18–19). At the Last Supper Jesus promises his disciples that he will drink again “in the kingdom,” clearly describing it as a place of feasting (Mt 26:29; Mk 14:25; Lk 22:16–18, 28–30). Along similar lines, when the crucified Jesus is asked by the thief to be remembered when Jesus comes into his “kingdom,” Jesus responds by promising the thief to be with him “in paradise” (Lk 23:43). Finally, even in the Gospel of John Jesus describes the kingdom as a realm into which a person cannot “enter” unless born of water and spirit (Jn 3:5), and his last words to Pilate before being crucified are that his “kingdom” is “not of this world” (Jn 18:36). Indeed, throughout John’s Gospel Jesus emphasizes that he himself is “not of this world” (Jn 8:23); instead, as Son of man, he has “descended from heaven” (Jn 3:13; cf. Jn 6:62). In sum, taken together, Jesus’ teachings in the Gospels about otherworldly realms are perfectly consistent with an apocalyptic worldview.

Fourth, apocalypticism is perhaps most widely known for its interest in the end of this present world and the beginning of the world to come. This interest manifests itself in descriptions of latter-day events such as a period of unparalleled tribulation, the rise of false messiahs and deceptive leaders of the people, war and strife, the final definitive judgment, the resurrection of the dead, and the establishment of a new heaven and new earth (e.g., Dan 7–9; 11–12; 1 En. 85–90; 91:11–17; 93; 4 Ezra 7; 13; 2 Bar. 26–30). One may note a few examples of the same interest in the Gospels in which Jesus shares this apocalyptic interest in the end-time events. For example, he speaks about “this generation” as a generation of wicked persecutors (Mt 23:34–36), in which the kingdom suffers “violence” (Mt 11:12; Lk 16:16). Likewise, he draws a stark contrast between “this age” or “this time” of suffering and the glory of “the age to come” (Mk 10:29–31; Lk 17:30). He also speaks of a coming time of tribulation in which wars, strife, persecutions and false messiahs will arise (Mt 24:3–8; Mk 13:3–8; Lk 21:5–9). Beyond the pale of the present age, Jesus looks forward to the resurrection of the dead (Mt 11:20–24; Lk 10:13–15) and their final judgment (Mt 12:38–42; Lk 11:29–32; Jn 5:24–25), on which day men will give account for every word they utter (Mt 12:36–37), before God establishes the “new world” (palingenesia) (Mt 19:28).

Taken together, these four aspects—emphasis on supernatural revelation, pronounced belief in the activity of angels and demons, focus on the invisible spiritual realms, forecasts of the end of this world—are what have led many to associate Jesus in the Gospels with the early Jewish outlook known as apocalypticism.

However, there is at least one notable difference between Jesus and early Jewish apocalypticism. As a general rule, apocalyptic movements are often intensely focused on earthly powers and political events, especially Gentile powers that persecute the chosen people of God (e.g., Dan 2; 7; 11–12) (Vielhauer). Despite the contention of certain scholars that Jesus is engaged in a direct and extensive critique of the Roman Empire (Wright 1996; Horsley), we do not find anywhere near the same amount of explicit attention given to political events or the pagan empires in the teachings of Jesus as we do in early Jewish apocalypses, or even in the biblical prophets. Apart from a brief teaching about giving to Caesar what belongs to Caesar (Mk 12:13–17), and the forecast of political strife and “wars and rumors of wars” in the Olivet discourse (Mt 24:3–8; Mk 13:3–8; Lk 21:5–9), Jesus’ teaching in the Gospels as a whole is far more focused on the otherworldly forces behind visible personal and political events—the angels and demons, the kingdom of God, the “kingdom” of Satan—than on the visible political forces and earthly powers themselves. Earthly political forces apparently have “no power” except that given them “from above” (Jn 19:11).

3. Jesus and Apocalyptic Eschatology.

In contrast to widespread agreement about Jesus and the general apocalyptic worldview, a vigorous debate has raged over the last century and a half regarding the issue of Jesus and apocalyptic eschatology. The question has largely been framed in terms of how Jesus understood the coming of the kingdom of God and the Son of Man, and whether Jesus, like other apocalyptic visionaries, set a timeline for the cataclysmic end of this world within his own lifetime and, as such, was proven wrong by history. As is always the case with complex matters such as this, scholars differ over details and nuances. Nevertheless, the points of view in what has come to be referred to as the debate over “the apocalyptic Jesus” (Miller) can be organized as follows.

First, on one side of the debate stands the apocalyptic Jesus. This position is historically rooted Albert Schweitzer’s famous portrait in The Quest of the Historical Jesus (1906), in which all that Jesus did and said was completely determined by his anticipation of the imminent end of the world. From this point of view, Jesus shared not only the apocalyptic worldview of his contemporaries, but also the apocalyptic eschatology of an imminent destruction and renewal of the cosmos (Bultmann; Vermes; Ehrman; Allison). Based on key pieces of evidence in the Gospels in which Jesus speaks of the kingdom as being “at hand” (Mt 4:17; Mk 1:15) and even appears to set a timeline for the coming of the Son of Man in glory and/or the advent of the kingdom of God (e.g., Mt 10:23; Mk 9:1; Mk 13:24–27 par.), this perspective holds that Jesus taught that the future kingdom of God, which is to be equated with the cataclysmic end of this world, would come very soon, within the lifetime of his contemporaries. The upshot of this view can be summed up well in the words of Jesus' Olivet discourse: "This generation will not pass away before all these things," including the end of the world, "take place" (Mt 24:34; Mk 13:31; Lk 21:32). From this point of view, the coming of the kingdom and the Son of Man would be accompanied by the final time of unparalleled eschatological tribulation, the dissolution of the cosmos, and the resurrection and final judgment of the dead. In a word, the apocalyptic Jesus expected the imminent "end of the world as we know it," and history has proven him wrong (Schweitzer, 371).

Second, on the other side is the nonapocalyptic Jesus. From this point of view, Jesus did not prophesy the imminent cataclysmic end of the cosmos. Instead, he emphasized the present kingdom of God, by which he referred to the inbreaking of God's power in the world here and now (Dodd; Crossan; Borg; Patterson). This present kingdom is manifest in various ways: through Jesus' exorcisms (Mt 12:28; Lk 11:20), in his teachings on love of God and neighbor (Mk 12:28-34), in the poor and persecuted (Mt 5:3-12; Lk 6:20-23) and in the righteous ones who suffer violence (Mt 11:2-11; Lk 16:16). Here the emphasis is placed on the present "Son of Man" sayings, in which the expression is not a title based on the book of Daniel but simply an Aramaic expression for "a man" (cf. Mk 3:27-28). In light of all this, Jesus can say to his contemporaries that the kingdom is not coming "with signs to be observed"; rather, "the kingdom of God is among you [entos hymōn]" (Lk 17:21). Indeed, in terms of quantity, the number of teachings ascribed to Jesus that forecast the imminent end of the world are very few when compared the number of teachings that have nothing to do with the end of the world or that suggest a realized eschatology. This view is also critical of the apocalyptic Jesus hypothesis for consistently failing to pay sufficient attention to the parables of Jesus, in which the coming of the kingdom of God is repeatedly described as a process of growth. Parables such as those of the mustard seed (Mt 13:31; Mk 4:30; Lk 13:18), the leaven (Mt 13:33; Lk 13:20), the seed growing secretly (Mk 4:26-29) and the weeds and the wheat (Mt 13:24-30; cf. Mt 13:36-43) suggest that the coming of the kingdom takes place in stages and over an extended period of time. Finally, advocates of the nonapocalyptic Jesus argue that the teachings in the Gospels in which Jesus sets a timeline for the future advent of the Son of Man and the kingdom of God (Mt 10:23; Mk 9:1; Mk 13:30 par.), as well as the so-called apocalyptic discourse on the Mount of Olives (Mt 24; Mk 13; Lk 21), are not authentic. Instead of originating with Jesus, they are later creations of the early church, generated decades after the crucifixion in the context of the religious crisis of the rejection of the gospel by the Jewish people as a whole and the political crisis of Roman persecution.

Third, in something of a middle position, there are scholars who advocate what might be broadly described as an eschatological Jesus. On the one hand, this view can be distinguished from the non-apocalyptic Jesus because it affirms that Jesus did anticipate the "end" (eschaton) of the present age and the future consummation of the kingdom of God. Hence, Jesus can be accurately described as "eschatological" in outlook because, as a first-century Jew, he shared the eschatological hopes of many of his contemporaries for the restoration of Israel (Mt 19:28; Lk 22:28-30), the ingathering of the lost tribes (Mt 8:11-12; Lk 13:28-29), the coming of a new temple (Mt 26:61; Mk 14:58) and the resurrection and final judgment of the dead (Mt 12:38-42; Lk 11:29-32) (Sanders). On the other hand, this view can be distinguished from the apocalyptic Jesus because it holds that Jesus did not set a timeline for the imminent destruction of the cosmos. Instead, Jesus spoke of the eschatological hope for the kingdom both as already present in the powers manifested in his exorcisms and "healings" (Mt 4:17; Mk 1:15; Mt 12:28; Lk 11:20) and as not yet consummated in the world at large, so that Jesus can even instruct his disciples to pray, "Your kingdom come" (Mt 6:9-13; Lk 11:2-4) (Meier; Keener). In this way, advocates of an eschatological Jesus try to strike a balance between future and realized eschatology in the words and deeds of Jesus. Such scholars shy away from the adjective "apocalyptic" with reference to Jesus' eschatology: "The more popular use . . . of 'apocalyptic' for a future scenario of supernatural interventions in human history involving unprecedented violence and horror should be resolutely avoided. 'Eschatological' is much the more appropriate term" (Dunn, 401 [cf. Reiser, 321]).

With that said, it is important to emphasize that scholarly proponents of an eschatological Jesus vary widely in their opinions about the material in the Gospels in which Jesus appears to set a timeline for the end (Mt 10:23; Mk 9:1; Mk 13:30 par.). Some simply ignore the timeline texts, placing all of the emphasis on Jesus positive hopes for the imminent restoration of *Israel, the coming of a new temple, and/or the ingathering of the exiles (Sanders; Reiser).

Others argue that the evidence in which Jesus sets a timeline for the imminent end is not authentic; it was created by the early church (Perrin; Meier). Still others argue while Jesus prophesied the tribulation leading up to the destruction of Jerusalem would take place before “this generation” passes away (Mt 24:34; Mk 13:30; Lk 21:32), he did not set a similar timeline for the cosmic destruction of “heaven and earth” (Mt 24:35; Mk 13:31; Lk 21:33). Instead, Jesus stressed that “that day and hour” remain unknown (Mt 24:36; Mk 13:32) and taught that the final judgment and end of the cosmos would be unexpected, like the cosmic destruction of the world “in the days of Noah” (Mt 24:37-42; Lk 17:26-35) (Beasley-Murray; France). Indeed, if Jesus’ insistence that none knows the final day or hour is taken into account, then it follows that he taught neither the conjunction nor disjunction of the destruction of the temple and the end of the world; rather, he taught that the chronological relation between the two events was unknown, and that his disciples should be ready for them both (Geddert).

In short, a case can be made that Jesus spoke of imminent eschatological tribulation and fulfillment, as well as an undetermined future eschatological consummation. In support of this position, it is worth noting that this combination of both expectation and delay is not found only in early Jewish apocalyptic literature (Holman); it is also evidenced in the *parables of Jesus. On the one hand, there are parables that emphasize the imminent fulfillment of eschatological events, such as those of the fig tree (Mt 24:32-33; Mk 13:28-29; Lk 21:29-31) and the signs in the sky (Mt 16:2-3; Lk 12:54-56). On the other hand, there are parables emphasizing the unknown time of the final consummation and the danger of laxity in the face of apparent delay, such as those of the householder and the thief (Mt 24:43-44; Lk 12:39-40), the wicked servant who thinks that his master is delayed (Mt 24:45-51; Lk 12:41-48), the talents (Mt 25:14-30; Lk 19:11-27) and the ten virgins (Mt 25:1-13). Although one could argue that only the parables of imminence are authentic, recent parables scholarship has made a strong case for both sets originating with Jesus (Snodgrass). Of equal importance is that Jesus’ institution of a new “covenant” in his blood at the *Last Supper (Mt 26:26-28; Mk 14:24-25; Lk 22:16-19; cf. 1 Cor 11:23-24) suggests that he anticipated a substantial interim period between his own death and the passing away of heaven and earth, although the length of this period remains unclear (Glasson). Finally, Jesus’ appointment of the twelve disciples (Mt 10:1-11; Mk 6:7-13; Lk 9:1-5) reflects the intention to establish the nucleus of a community that would perpetuate his teachings and actions in his absence (Keener).

4. Jesus, the Olivet Discourse and Apocalyptic Language.

As the foregoing discussion makes clear, much of the debate over the apocalyptic eschatology of Jesus hangs on how one interprets the most famous and extensive apocalyptic teaching attributed to him: the so-called Olivet discourse (Mt 24-25; Mk 13; Lk 21). In this regard, recent scholarship is marked by at least two significant developments.

First, although scholars have differed in their interpretations, a number of recent studies have argued that much if not all of the Olivet discourse (Mt 24:1-36; Mk 13:1-32; Lk 21:1-33) originated with Jesus himself (Wenham; Evans; Wright; Pitre). In many twentieth-century studies of Jesus the Olivet discourse was considered to be so obviously and patently inauthentic that it is widely ignored, even in books purportedly interested in Jesus’ eschatology (e.g., Allison). This widespread disregard for the Olivet discourse in books on Jesus was often based on the influential theory that the material originated as a pre-Christian Jewish “apocalypse,” and that, as such, it was too Jewish to be authentic to Jesus (Bultmann; see Beasley-Murray 1993, 32-79). Skepticism toward the origin of the material with Jesus also seems to have been influenced by form-critical assumptions that, although a prophet, Jesus spoke not in extended discourses but rather in isolated aphorisms. (The Olivet discourse is the longest uninterrupted teaching of Jesus in the entire Gospel of Mark.) However, when the teachings in this discourse are examined in light of parallels from the OT and early Jewish literature, a case can be made that the substance of the discourse is historically plausible within a first-century A.D. Jewish context and coheres well with other teachings of Jesus. Indeed, given the widespread emphasis in recent scholarship on situating Jesus within his Jewish context, it is ironic that many scholars continue to ignore or dismiss indications that the Olivet discourse is at home on the lips of a first-century A.D. Jewish prophet such as Jesus.

For example, Jesus’ forecast of the destruction of the Jerusalem temple (Mk 13:1-2) fits well with early Jewish prophecies of the destruction of the second temple (1 En. 90:28-30; Josephus, J.W. 6.301-309; T. Levi 16:4; Sib. Or. 3:665). It also coheres perfectly with other evidence in the Gospels that Jesus intimated the future destruction of the sanctuary (Mt 23:37-38; Lk 13:34-35; 19:41-44; Jn 2:18-21). Likewise, Jesus' description of the "birth pangs" of imminent tribulation (Mt 24:4-8; Mk 13:5-8) is consistent with the widespread Jewish expectation of a period of eschatological tribulation and strife that would precede the age of salvation (1 En. 56-57; 62; CD-A XII-XIII; 1QM XVI-XVII; Sib. Or. 3:182-95; Pss. Sol. 17:11-21; T. Mos. 8:1-5). It also squares with other teachings in which Jesus forecasts a time of imminent tribulation, strife and widespread deception (Mt 10:34-36; Lk 12:51-53; Mt 24:26; Lk 17:23-24). In a similar vein, Jesus' prophecies of the suffering of his disciples and the conversion of the "Gentiles" (Mt 24:9-14; Mk 13:9-13; Lk 21:10-19) seem to be rooted in prophetic oracles of the eschatological ingathering of the nations in Jewish Scripture (Is 52:7-12; 66:5; Mic 7:6-18). They are also consistent with other material attributed to him regarding the conflict that his mission would engender (Mt 10:19-20; Lk 12:11-12; Jn 15:26-16:2) and the eventual ingathering of Israelites and Gentiles "from east and west" into the kingdom of God (Mt 8:11-12; Lk 13:28-29). Finally, there is perhaps no more characteristically "apocalyptic" image in all the Gospels than Jesus' forecast of the appearance of the "abomination of desolation" and the unparalleled tribulation that would follow its appearance (Mt 24:15-25; Mk 13:14-23). Even this image fits squarely into a first-century A.D. Jewish context, since Jesus takes it directly from the apocalypse of Daniel, in which "the abomination of desolation" and the destruction of the temple follow the death of the "messiah" (mašiah) (Dan 9:24-27; cf. Dan 11:31-35; 12:11). Indeed, one could argue that Jesus saw his own death as the Danielic messiah as inaugurating the eschatological tribulation and destruction of the temple (Pitre).

Second, much recent study of the Olivet discourse revolves around the apocalyptic language of the sun and moon being darkened and the stars falling from heaven at the coming of "the Son of Man" on the clouds (Mt 24:29-29; Mk 13:24-27; cf. Lk 21:26). For some scholars, this describes the destruction of the Jerusalem temple and the vindication and exaltation of Jesus into heaven. Interpreted in this way, it has nothing to do with the cataclysmic end of the cosmos (Wright 1996; Hatina; France). In support of this view are OT prophecies that use similar language about the sun, moon and stars being shaken to describe the overthrow of earthly empires and cities (Is 13; 34; Ezek 32). It is also supported by the book of Daniel, in which the coming of the "son of man" on the clouds describes his ascension to "the Ancient of Days," not his descent to earth (Dan 7:13-14). For other scholars, the climax of the Olivet discourse describes the actual collapse of the cosmos and the descent of the Son of Man from heaven, not just the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple (Bock; Allison; Adams). In support of this view are abundant ancient Jewish texts that use similar language of global catastrophe to describe the destruction and/or renewal of the cosmos (1 En. 1:3-9; 83:3-5; 91:16; 1QH^a XI, 19-36; T. Mos. 10:4-6; L.A.B. 3:10; 4 Ezra 7:30-32), as well as important NT passages that envision the final return of Jesus from heaven to earth (Acts 1:9-11; 1 Thess 4:16-17) and the passing away of heaven and earth (Heb 12:25-29; 2 Pet 3:5-13; Rev 21:1). One scholar takes something of a middle ground, arguing that the apocalyptic language describes the actual cosmic effects of the destruction of the temple cult and the exaltation of Jesus into the heavenly temple as the Danielic son of man (Fletcher-Louis 1997; 2011). In support of this view is clear evidence that ancient Jews saw the temple as a microcosm of "heaven and earth" (Ps 78:69; Josephus, Ant. 3.181), so that the desecration of the sanctuary can be described as causing "stars" to be "cast down" out of heaven (Dan 8:9-11). It is also supported by early Jewish and Christian texts that purport to describe the actual cosmic effects of cultic events such as the death of a high priest, the destruction of Jerusalem and the death of Jesus (Josephus, J.W. 6.288-300; Mt 27:51; Mk 15:33, 38). These cultic events "shake" the cosmos but do not necessarily bring it to an end.

It remains to be seen whether the discussion of apocalyptic language and imagery will provide a way beyond the impasse in the continued debate over the authenticity of the Olivet discourse and the interpretation of Jesus' eschatological outlook.

5. Apocalyptic Teaching in the Four Gospels.

Although much of the apocalyptic material in the four canonical Gospels has already been catalogued above, it is important also to examine each of them in order to highlight their distinctive emphases and unique material.

5.1. Matthew. The Gospel of Matthew is widely regarded as the most apocalyptic of the four Gospels. For one thing, this Gospel displays a particular predilection for the memorable description of the realm of the damned as the "outer darkness" into which the wicked are cast, where there is "weeping and gnashing of teeth" (Mt 8:11-12; 13:42, 50; 22:13; 24:51). Matthew has a strong interest in the otherworldly fate of the righteous and the fate of the wicked, emphasizing both "eternal punishment" as well as “eternal life” (Mt 25:46). In light of this emphasis on the suffering of the damned, it is perhaps unsurprising that Matthew’s special material provides us with what might be called “apocalyptic parables” of judgment: the weeds and the wheat, with its explanation (Mt 13:24-30, 36-43); the five wise and the five foolish virgins (Mt 25:1-13); the talents (Mt 25:14-30); the king and his servants (Mt 18:23-35); the sheep and the goats (Mt 25:31-46). With regard to apocalyptic eschatology, Matthew’s Gospel alone provides us with an explicit use of the Greek word parousia to describe the final advent of the Son of Man (Mt 24:3; 24:27). He also reflects the combination of ardent expectation and possible delay manifest in other Jewish apocalyptic texts (e.g., Mt 24:45-51) and distinguishes between the imminent destruction of the Jerusalem temple and the unknown time of the parousia (Gibbs). In keeping with the emphasis of Jewish apocalyptic worldview on the invisible transcendent realm of “heaven,” recent scholarship has argued the distinctively Matthean expression “the kingdom of the heavens” (hē basileia tōn ouranōn) is not just a customary Jewish periphrasis for avoiding the name of *God, but rather a technical phrase for emphasizing the kingdom of God as a transcendent realm (Pennington). Others see Matthew’s particular predilection for apocalyptic teaching as evidence that this Gospel was penned during a time of social conflict and persecution (Sim).

5.2. Mark. In comparison with Matthew’s Gospel, the Gospel of Mark contains somewhat less apocalyptic teaching, and what it does contain is often present in Matthew and Luke (the so-called triple tradition). Instead, much of Mark’s Gospel is taken up recounting the mighty deeds and exorcisms of Jesus. In this regard, however, the focus on Jesus’ exorcisms is consonant with the emphasis in Jewish apocalypticism on angelic and demonic beings. Jesus in Mark’s Gospel is bent not only on “casting out Satan” as an individual unclean spirit, but also on launching his assault on the spiritual “kingdom” of Satan, which stands in opposition to the spiritual “kingdom” of God (Mk 3:22-27). With regard to apocalyptic eschatology, there is a distinctively Markan emphasis on the call to disciples to “watch” (blepete) (Mark 13:33) and “keep awake” (gregoreite) (Mk 14:34) in eschatological expectation (Geddert). In light of the widespread view that the Olivet discourse is a veiled catalogue of contemporary events in the Markan community (Mk 13:1-27), many scholars conclude that the apocalyptic character of Mark’s Gospel reflects the tumultuous events leading up to and/or surrounding the Jewish-Roman war that culminated in the destruction of the Jerusalem temple in A.D. 70 (Marcus).

5.3. Luke. Since the influential twentieth-century work of H. Conzelmann, the Gospel of Luke has been widely regarded as having “de-apocalypticised” the earlier Gospel material in order to deal with the problem of the “delay of the parousia” (Bovon). As a result, it is often regarded as the least apocalyptic of the four Gospels. However, a close examination shows that this verdict is somewhat exaggerated, if not completely wrong. For one thing, Luke preserves much of the apocalyptic teaching found in the other Synoptics, such as *John the Baptist’s oracle about the coming fires of judgment (Lk 3:7-9, 15-17), the description of Jesus’ exorcisms as an assault on Satan’s “kingdom” (Lk 11:14-23), the description of the present generation as “an evil generation” (Lk 11:29), Jesus’ striking declaration that he has come not to bring peace but rather the “sword” of eschatological strife (Lk 11:51-53) and even the description of the damned who “weep and gnash” their teeth (Lk 13:28). It is Luke’s Gospel alone that preserves the apocalyptic revelation of Jesus that he “saw Satan fall like lightning from heaven,” in the context of emphasizing the disciples’ power over unclean “spirits” (Lk 10:18-19), as well as the startling declaration of Jesus that he has come “to cast fire upon the earth” (Lk 12:49), and the parable of Lazarus and the rich man, which contains the most explicit description of the invisible spiritual realms of “Hades” and “Abraham’s bosom” in the entire NT (Lk 16:19-31). Finally, with regard to apocalyptic eschatology, Luke contains teaching that emphasizes the imminent advent of the kingdom of God and the coming of the Son of Man (Lk 9:26-27) as well as the unexpected and incalculable nature of these events (Lk 12:35-40; 17:20). In this regard, Luke makes explicit both that certain of Jesus’ prophecies refer to the imminent siege and destruction of Jerusalem (Lk 19:41-44; 21:20-24) and that there must be an interim period of “the times of the Gentiles” before the ultimate end (Lk 21:24). However, this is very much in keeping with Matthew and Mark’s teaching that “the good news” must be preached to all nations before the end comes (Mt 24:14; Mk 13:20). Indeed, Luke preserves what is arguably Jesus’ most famous apocalyptic teaching: the prophecy that “this generation” would not pass away before “these things” take place, but that “heaven and earth will pass away” (Lk 21:32-33).

5.4. John. Finally, apocalyptic teaching in the Gospel of John is no less present than in the Synoptics, but in its own particular mode and with its own distinctive terminology and emphases. Perhaps more than any other Gospel, John emphasizes Jesus' references to himself as the apocalyptic son of man from the book of Daniel (Reynolds). For one thing, in keeping with the apocalyptic interest in otherworldly beings and otherworldly realms, Jesus in the Gospel of John declares that the Son of Man is a pre-existent heavenly being (Jn 3:14; 6:62; cf. Jn 1:1); upon his person "angels" both ascend and descend (Jn 1:51); he himself has descended "from heaven" and will ascend "into heaven" (Jn 3:13-14; 6:62); he acts as the eschatological judge at the resurrection of the good and the evil (Jn 5:24-27); he has the power to give "eternal life" to whoever eats his flesh and drinks his blood (Jn 6:53-58); like the son of man in Daniel's apocalypse, the Son of Man in John's Gospel receives "glory" (Jn 13:31-32) and "worship" (Jn 9:35-38; cf. Dan 7:14-15). Moreover, in line with apocalyptic interest in otherworldly revelations, Jesus strongly emphasizes that he is a revealer of "heavenly things" (Jn 3:12, 32-35) because he alone "has seen the Father" (Jn 6:46). Although he is identified with the Messiah (Jn 12:34), his mysterious identity and glory will be fully revealed to his opponents only when he is exalted (Jn 8:28). Finally, in John, as in the Synoptics, we find both sayings focused on the realization of eschatological hopes in the present (Jn 3:19; 5:24) and sayings focused on the consummation of eschatological hopes in the future (Jn 5:28-29; 6:39-40, 44, 54; 12:48). Indeed, both present and future eschatology can occur together within the same saying (Jn 5:25-29). In short, although John's Gospel does not contain any extended apocalyptic teaching similar to the Olivet discourse in the Synoptics, it does retain a remarkable amount of apocalyptic teaching in almost every chapter.

6. The Apocalyptic Death and Resurrection of Jesus.

In closing, it is important to highlight that in the four Gospels apocalyptic teaching is not restricted to the teaching of Jesus; it is also contained in the accounts of Jesus' passion, death and resurrection (Allison 1985).

For example, in the Synoptic accounts Jesus' passion, death and resurrection are accompanied by all of the typical trappings of the end of the age in Jewish apocalypticism: the darkening of the sun's light (Mk 15:33); various earthquakes (Mt 27:51; 28:2-4); the rending of the veil in the temple, signifying its demise (Mk 15:38); the confession of faith in Israel's God by representatives of the Gentiles (Mt 27:54); the appearance of angels (Mt 28:2-4); and, of course, the bodily resurrection of Jesus (Mt 28; Mk 16; Lk 24), in which the bodily resurrection that was expected for all Israel at the end of the age was accomplished in the person of Jesus on Easter (Wright 2003). Indeed, in the Gospel of Matthew the death of Jesus is so efficaciously eschatological that it actually triggers the bodily resurrection of "the holy ones," who come forth from their "tombs" after his individual resurrection (Mt 27:51-53). From this point of view, the Gospel narratives of Jesus' passion and death are modeled on the twofold movement of Jewish apocalyptic eschatology: (1) the sufferings of the righteous in the eschatological tribulation (the so-called messianic woes) are followed by (2) the glorification of the elect in the eschatological resurrection. Indeed, even the Gospel of John portrays the passion, death and resurrection of Jesus in categories taken from Jewish apocalypticism. Jesus' passion and death are likened both to the "tribulation" (thlipsis) suffered by a woman in her birth pangs (Jn 16:16-22; cf. Mk 13:5-6) and to a great "exorcism" of the chief of the evil angels, in which "the ruler of this world" will be judged and "cast out" (Jn 12:31). Indeed, Jesus' death and resurrection are nothing less than the destruction and restoration of the true temple, ushering in the age of the new temple, "the temple of his body" (Jn 2:21).

See also ANGELS; DEMON, DEVIL, SATAN; DREAMS AND VISIONS; ESCHATOLOGY; EXILE AND RESTORATION; JUDGMENT; KINGDOM OF GOD/HEAVEN; PROPHETS, PROPHECY; RESURRECTION; SON OF MAN; TEMPLE.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. E. Adams, The Stars Will Fall from Heaven: Cosmic Catastrophe in the New Testament and Its World (LNTS 347; London: T & T Clark, 2007); D. C. Allison Jr., The End of the Ages Has Come: An Early Interpretation of the Passion and Resurrection of Jesus (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985); idem, Jesus of Nazareth: Millenarian Prophet (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1998); idem, "Jesus and the Victory of Apocalyptic," in Jesus and the Restoration of Israel: A Critical Assessment of N. T. Wright's Jesus and the Victory of God, ed. C. C. Newman (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1999) 126-41; idem, Constructing Jesus: Memory, Imagination, and History (Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2010); D. E. Aune, Apocalypticism, Prophecy, and Magic in Early Christianity (WUNT 199; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2006); G. R. Beasley-Murray, Jesus and the Kingdom of God (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1986); idem, Jesus and the Last Days (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1993); M. Bird, Are You the One Who Is to Come? The Historical Jesus and the Messianic Question

- (Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2009); D. Bock, Jesus According to Scripture: Restoring the Portrait from the Gospels (Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2002); M. Borg, "A Temperate Case for a Non-Eschatological Jesus," in Jesus in Contemporary Scholarship (Valley Forge, PA: Trinity Press International, 1994) 47-68; F. Bovon, Luke 1: A Commentary on the Gospel of Luke 1:1-9:50, trans. C. M. Thomas, ed. H. Koester (Hermeneia; Minneapolis: Fortress, 2002); R. Bultmann, Theology of the New Testament (2 vols.; New York: Scribner, 1951-1955); R. Burridge, What Are the Gospels? A Comparison with Graeco-Roman Biography (2nd ed.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2004); J. J. Collins, The Apocalyptic Imagination: An Introduction to Jewish Apocalyptic Literature (2nd ed.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1998); J. D. Crossan, The Historical Jesus: The Life of a Mediterranean Jewish Peasant (San Francisco: Harper-Collins, 1991); J. D. G. Dunn, Jesus Remembered (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2003); B. Ehrman, Jesus: Apocalyptic Prophet of the New Millennium (New York: Oxford University Press, 1999); C. A. Evans, Mark 8:27-16:20 (WBC 34B; Nashville: Thomas Nelson, 2001); idem, "Daniel in the New Testament: Visions of God's Kingdom," in The Book of Daniel: Composition and Reception, ed. J. J. Collins and P. W. Flint (Boston: E. J. Brill, 2002) 2:490-549; C. H. T. Fletcher-Louis, "The Destruction of the Temple and the Relativization of the Old Covenant: Mark 13:31 and Matthew 5:18," in "The Reader Must Understand": Eschatology in the Bible and Theology, ed. M. Elliott and K. Brower (Nottingham: Apollos, 1997) 145-69; idem, "Jesus and Apocalypticism," in Handbook for the Study of the Historical Jesus, 3: The Historical Jesus, ed. T. Holmén and S. E. Porter (Leiden: Brill, 2011) 2877-909; R. T. France, The Gospel of Mark (NIGTC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2002); idem, The Gospel of Matthew (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2007); T. J. Gedder, "Apocalyptic Teaching," DJG 20-27; J. A. Gibbs, Jerusalem and Parousia: Jesus' Eschatological Discourse in Matthew's Gospel (St. Louis: Concordia Academic Press, 2000); T. F. Glasson, Jesus and the End of the World (Edinburgh: Saint Andrew Press, 1980); T. R. Hatina, "The Focus of Mark 13:24-27—The Parousia, or the Destruction of the Temple?" BBR 6 (1996): 43-66; M. Himmelfarb, Ascent to Heaven in Jewish and Christian Apocalypses (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1993); C. Holman, Till Jesus Comes: Origins of Christian Apocalyptic Expectation (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1996); R. Horsley, Jesus and Empire: The Kingdom of God and the New World Disorder (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2002); J. Jeremias, "γέεννα," TDNT 1:657-58; idem, New Testament Theology, 1: The Proclamation of Jesus, trans. J. Bowden (London: SCM, 1971); C. S. Keener, The Historical Jesus of the Gospels (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2009); K. Koch, The Rediscovery of Apocalyptic: A Polemical Work on a Neglected Area of Biblical Studies and Its Damaging Effects on Theology and Philosophy (SBT 22; Naperville, IL: Allenson, 1972); J. Marcus, Mark: A New Translation with Introduction and Commentary (2 vols.; AB 27; New York: Doubleday, 2002; AYB 27A; New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 2009); J. P. Meier, A Marginal Jew, 2: Mentor, Message, and Miracles (ABRL; New York: Doubleday, 1994); R. J. Miller, ed. The Apocalyptic Jesus: A Debate (Santa Rosa, CA: Polebridge, 2001); S. Patterson, "The End of Apocalypse: Rethinking the Eschatological Jesus," ThTo 52 (1995) 29-48; J. T. Pennington, Heaven and Earth in the Gospel of Matthew (NovTSup 126; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2007); N. Perrin, Rediscovering the Teaching of Jesus (London: SCM, 1967); B. J. Pitre, Jesus, the Tribulation, and the End of the Exile: Restoration Eschatology and the Origin of the Atonement (WUNT 2/204; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck; Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2005); M. Reiser, Jesus and Judgment: The Eschatological Proclamation in Its Jewish Context, trans. L. M. Maloney (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1997); B. E. Reynolds, The Apocalyptic Son of Man in the Gospel of John (WUNT 2/249; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2008); C. Rowland, The Open Heaven: A Study of Apocalyptic in Judaism and Early Christianity (London: Crossroad, 1982); D. S. Russell, The Method and Message of Jewish Apocalyptic (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1964); E. P. Sanders, Jesus and Judaism (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1985); A. Schweitzer, The Quest of the Historical Jesus: A Critical Study of Its Progress from Reimarus to Wrede, trans. W. Montgomery (New York: Macmillan, 1968 [1906]); D. C. Sim, Apocalyptic Eschatology in the Gospel of Matthew (SNTSMS 88; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1996); K. R. Snodgrass, Stories with Intent: A Comprehensive Guide to the Parables of Jesus (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2008); G. Vermes, The Religion of Jesus the Jew (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1993); P. Vielhauer, "Apocalypses and Related Subjects," in New Testament Apocrypha, ed. E. Hennecke, W. Schneemelcher and R. McL. Wilson (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1991) 2:542-68; D. Wenham, Paul: Follower of Jesus or Founder of Christianity? (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1995); N. T. Wright, Jesus and the Victory of God (COQG 2; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1996); idem, The Resurrection of the Son of God (COQG 3; Minneapolis: Fortress, 2003).

B. J. Pitre

APOSTLE

The term apostle designates, in the Gospels, twelve men whom Jesus called, trained, sent and commissioned for the particular task of proclaiming the good news of the kingdom of God. The relative scarcity of the Greek term apostolos in the Gospels needs to be viewed in balance with the frequency of the term in the book of Acts, the second volume of Luke-Acts, whose author describes both the call of the apostles by Jesus (Lk 6:13; cf. Acts 1:2) and the work of the apostles as Jesus' envoys after his death, resurrection and exaltation and his granting of the Holy Spirit on Pentecost (e.g., Acts 2:42-43; 4:33). The "sending" of the Twelve and eventually of other envoys such as Paul was of foundational importance for the emergence of congregations of followers of Jesus.

1. The Meaning of the Term apostolos
2. Jesus' Call and Commission
3. The Twelve Apostles
4. The Role and Significance of the Apostles

1. The Meaning of the Term apostolos.

Of the eighty occurrences of the noun apostolos ("apostle") in the NT, nine occur in the Synoptic Gospels (Mt 10:2; Mk 3:14; 6:30; Lk 6:13; 9:10; 11:49; 17:5; 22:14; 24:10), one in the Gospel of John (Jn 13:16), twenty-eight in Acts (e.g., Acts 1:2, 26; 2:37, 42, 43; 4:33, 35, 36, 37) and thirty-four in Paul's letters. The verb apostellō ("to send") occurs 132 in the NT: sixty-eight times in the Synoptic Gospels and twenty-eight in John's Gospel; the verb pempō ("to send") occurs seventy-nine times in the NT: fifteen times in the Synoptic Gospels and thirty-two times in John's Gospel. Not all of these passages refer to Jesus' sending of the Twelve (e.g., in Mt 2:8, 16 King Herod "sent" his troops to kill the infants of Bethlehem).

1.1. Terminology. The term apostolos has a wide range of meanings in secular Greek (see LSJ; BDAG; Rengstorff); it can designate a naval expedition, a commander of a naval force, a colony, an order for dispatch, an export license, a letter of authorization (in shipping) or a bill of lading (thus often in the papyri); on occasion the term also designates a messenger or envoy (a herald, designated as apostolos, is sent to arrange a truce [Herodotus, Hist. 1.28]). Josephus uses the noun apostolos once, describing a delegation sent from Jerusalem to the emperor in Rome (Josephus, Ant. 17.300). In the NT the term is used exclusively of persons, mostly with the meaning "someone who has been sent"—that is, an envoy or messenger or ambassador. While apostolos was readily understandable for speakers of Greek, the frequent use of the relatively rare Greek word by the early Christians reflects the importance of the apostles in the early church. In a Jewish context, the terms šeliḥa' (Aram.) or šaliḥ (Heb.) would have been used. Both the Aramaic/Hebrew and the Greek nouns are derived from verbs that mean "to send": the Greek verb apostellō means "to dispatch someone for the achievement of some objective" (BDAG), and the Hebrew verb šālah means "to send, dispatch" (HALOT, s.v. šālah 3).

1.2. Use in the New Testament. The meaning of apostolos in the NT takes up the rare secular usage with the meaning "envoy" or "messenger." Two main areas of use can be distinguished. (1) "Envoy" in the secular sense of "courier": messengers are "lower" than the person who has sent the messenger (Jn 13:16). (2) "Envoy" with extraordinary status: (a) prophets are apostoloi sent by God to his people (Lk 11:49; Eph 3:5; Rev 18:20); (b) Jesus the heavenly high priest is the apostolos of our confession (Heb 3:1); (c) the twelve disciples chosen and sent out by Jesus are apostoloi (Mt 10:2; Mk 3:14; Lk 6:13; 9:10; 17:5; 22:14; Rev 21:14; thus often in Acts [e.g., Acts 1:26; 2:37; 5:29]); (d) Paul is an apostolos called and sent by Jesus (e.g., Rom 1:11; 1 Cor 1:1; 9:1-2; 15:9; Gal 1:1); (e) other apostoloi with pastoral and missionary responsibilities such as Barnabas (Acts 14:4, 14), James the brother of Jesus and leader of the church in Jerusalem (Gal 1:19), envoys of churches who are active as Paul's coworkers for periods of time such as Titus (2 Cor 8:23), Silvanus and Timothy (cf. 1 Thess 1:1 with 1 Thess 2:7), Epaphroditus (Phil 2:25) and Andronicus and Junia (Rom 16:7); it is disputed whether this last understanding of apostolos (2e) should be distinguished from the first one (1).

The distinction between apostles who had an encounter with the risen Jesus (the Twelve [2c above], Paul [2d above]) and apostles who were commissioned by churches (2e above) is helpful only in a very general sense. It cannot explain the fact that Paul uses the term apostolos both in the titular sense of the witnesses commissioned by the risen Lord Jesus to proclaim the gospel (1 Cor 1:1; 15:9) and in the ecclesial sense of workers commissioned by churches (2 Cor 8:23; 1 Thess 2:7) without insisting on a different meaning of the term. The fact that Paul knew himself to be called and commissioned by the risen Lord when his life was turned around on the road to Damascus (Gal 1:1, 15-17) and that he was active together with Barnabas as an apostolos of the church in Antioch (Acts 14:4, 14; cf. Acts 13:2-3) suggests that the early Christians did not sharply distinguish between apostles commissioned by the risen Jesus and apostles commissioned by churches; the reference to apostoloi in 1 Corinthians 4:9 also denotes a larger group of witnesses who preach the gospel and who endure opposition and suffering (Frey).

1.3. Origin of New Testament Usage. The suggestion that the NT concept of “apostle” derives from a Jewish institution in which the religious authorities in Jerusalem sent envoys (šēlūḥīm, sg. šāliah) to the Jewish communities in the Diaspora (Billerbeck; Rengstorf, who assumes that the term šāliah was fixed legally and institutionally; note m. Ber. 5:5: “The one whom a person sends [šāliah] is like the sender”) has been proven to be historically anachronistic (Bühner). The theory that the title “apostle” derives from gnostic mythology (Schmithals) has been shown to be mistaken (Agnew). The attempt to widen the explanation on the basis of a Jewish šāliah concept in terms of a popular juridical understanding of an “authorized representative” derived from oriental law and Semitic concepts (Bühner) has been criticized as well (Lohmeyer).

The recognition that the early Christian term apostle can be best explained on the basis of the use of the verb apostellō and thus with reference to a general concept of envoys renders the derivation from Jewish parallels unnecessary. The concept of the sending of envoys found in Jewish, Greek and Roman contexts includes, in varying degrees, elements such as (1) the commission with a particular task, (2) the representation of the sender in the execution of the assignment, (3) the authorization for particular actions that the envoy could not carry out in the context of his own juridical status (Lohmeyer).

The fact that Paul speaks of apostles who were apostoloi before him (Gal 1:17) shows that he neither coined the titular use of the term nor devised the office of apostle. The earliest followers of Jesus who were active as his witnesses in Jerusalem and Judea immediately after his death and resurrection evidently used the Greek designation apostoloi already, presumably besides the Hebrew term šēlūḥīm (note that the church in Jerusalem was bilingual [Acts 6:1]). In addition to the Twelve, these early witnesses who were called apostoloi included Silvanus (identical with Silas of Acts 15:22, 27), who, if he belonged to the Jerusalem church, might have been among those who saw the risen Jesus. The same may be true for Andronicus and Junia, who were followers of Jesus before Paul (Rom 16:7), evidently Greek-speaking Jewish believers from Jerusalem who presumably had been active as missionaries from earliest times.

Whether or not Jesus himself used the designation “apostles” or “envoys” (šēlūḥīm) for those whom he called and sent out, he certainly appointed twelve of his *disciples, “sending” them (Lk 9:2) into the towns and villages of Galilee to proclaim the message of the *kingdom of God and to *heal, and whom he commissioned to continue his mission. While in Luke 9:2; 10:1 the verb apostellō is used by Luke (cf. Mt 10:5, 16; Mk 3:14; 6:7), in Luke 10:3 the verb is placed on the lips of Jesus as he appoints and sends out seventy disciples as his representatives (Lk 10:16) (see Mission). The identity of the first apostles (the Twelve), their function as Jesus’ representatives, their work as his witnesses and their message as his envoys derive from his own mission and from his call extended to the Twelve and to other disciples. Both for Jesus and for the apostles, function was more important than title.

2. Jesus’ Call and Commission.

The meaning of the term apostle is intricately linked with Jesus’ own self-understanding and mission. Jesus asserted that he has been “sent” (apostellō) by God to his people *Israel (Mt 15:24; 21:37; Mk 9:37; 12:6). Jesus understood himself as the prophetic-messianic *servant of the Lord who has been anointed by God with the Holy Spirit, “sent” (Heb. šēlāḥanī; LXX apestalken, perfect tense of apostellō) by God “to proclaim good news to the poor . . . to bind up the brokenhearted, to proclaim freedom for the captives and release to the prisoners” (Is 61:1-2) (see Jubilee)—a passage that Jesus quotes and explains at the beginning of his ministry (Lk 4:16-21; see the reference to Is 61:1-2 in Lk 6:20-21; 7:22). Luke relates Jesus asserting, “I must proclaim the good news of the kingdom of God also in the other towns, because I was sent for this purpose” (Lk 4:43). The passive of apostellō, translated “I was sent” (apestalēn), describes God’s action of sending Jesus to the people living in the towns and villages of Galilee. Jesus’ mission as God’s messianic envoy to Israel initiates the mission of Jesus’ followers whom he called and commissioned. Since the later, more narrowly defined significance of apostolos as a witness of the risen Jesus is not an integral part of the lexical meaning of the Greek term, there is no a priori reason why Jesus, who called, commissioned and “sent” his disciples on a particular mission, could not have used the noun šēlūḥīm (apostoloi) for the Twelve (Mk 3:14; Lk 6:13).

2.1. Jesus’ Call of the Twelve. The ministry and the message of the apostles were contingent on Jesus’ call and the commission. The circle of the Twelve is not a later creation of the church. Doubts that Jesus formed a circle of twelve disciples (Guenther) are unfounded (for a defense of the historicity of the Twelve as a group formed by Jesus himself, see McKnight; Meier, 128-47). (1) The description of a group of twelve disciples close to Jesus is firmly rooted in the tradition (e.g., Mt 10:2 // Mk 3:16 // Lk 6:13; Mt 20:17 // Mk 10:23 // Lk 18:31; Mk 4:10; 11:11; Lk 8:1; 9:12; Jn 6:67, 70-71; 20:24; Acts 6:2; 1 Cor 15:5) (criterion of multiple attestation). (2) The uncertainty of some of the names in the list of the Twelve (the position of Andrew, Thomas and Simon the Cananean is uncertain, and Matthew and Mark have Thaddaeus, whereas Luke-Acts have Judas son of James) and the insignificance of the majority of the names support a pre-Easter origin. (3) The circle of the Twelve disappears as a group from the NT tradition after Acts 6:2, with the exception of the brief reference of Paul in 1 Corinthians 15:5. If the group of the Twelve was a creation of the early church, we would expect more numerous references to this group and their significance. (4) The inclusion of Judas Iscariot, the traitor, as a member of the original Twelve (Mt 26:14; Mk 14:10, 20, 43; Lk 22:3; Jn 6:71) makes no sense if the circle of the Twelve was a later invention (criterion of embarrassment).

The lists of the Twelve (Mt 10:2-4; Mk 3:16-19; Lk 6:14-16; Acts 1:13) divide the names of the twelve disciples into three groups of four names (except the list in Acts 1:13, which omits the name of Judas Iscariot, who was deceased) (see Table 1). Peter always heads the first group, Philip the second, and James son of Alphaeus the third. In the first group, Matthew and Luke keep the two pairs of brothers together, while Mark may have wanted to place in first position the names of the three disciples to whom Jesus gave nicknames and who form the inner circle of the Twelve (cf. Mk 5:37; 9:2; 14:33); in Acts Luke places Peter and John first as the leading members of the Twelve (cf. Acts 3:1—4:31; 8:14-25). In the third group, Thaddaeus probably is identical with Judas son of James (the former, Greek name used to distinguish this Judas from Judas Iscariot) (Bauckham, 97-101).

In contrast to the rabbinic model of the teacher-student relationship (note Jehoshua b. Perachja: “Provide yourself with a teacher and get yourself a fellow-[disciple]” [m. ’Abot 1:6]), the Twelve did not choose Jesus as their teacher, but Jesus chose the Twelve. The Gospel writers emphasize the initiative of Jesus. Matthew describes how Jesus “walked” by the Sea of Galilee, “saw” Simon called Peter and Andrew his brother, who were fishing, approached them and “said” to them, “Follow me, and I will make you fishers of people” (TNIV: “I will send you out to fish for people”). It is telling that in the three instances in which people approached Jesus with the request of being accepted as disciples, Jesus does not automatically admit the candidate into the circle of his disciples. In one case he flatly refuses the request, in the second case he gives an answer that amounted to a refusal, and in the third case he dismisses the reservations that accompany the request (Mk 5:18 // Lk 8:38-39; Mt 8:19-20 // Lk 9:57-58; Lk 9:61-62; cf. Jn 15:16).

Jesus’ call to the Twelve, recounted for five of the core disciples—Peter and Andrew, James and John (Mt 4:18-22 // Mk 1:16-20 // Lk 5:1-11; cf. Jn 1:37-42) and Matthew/Levi (Mt 9:9 // Mk 2:14-15 // Lk 5:27-28)—exhibits the following elements.

(1) Jesus calls the first disciples in a situation where they had experienced their own helplessness as fishermen who had not caught any fish (thus the context in Lk 5:4-5) and where they subsequently witnessed the miracle of a huge catch of fish (Lk 5:6-

Table 1. The Three Groups of the Twelve

Matthew 10:2-4	Mark 3:16-19	Luke 6:13-16	Acts 1:13
Simon Peter	Simon Peter	Simon Peter	Peter
Andrew (brother of Peter)	James (son of Zebedee)	Andrew (brother of Peter)	John
James (son of Zebedee)	John (brother of James)	James	James
John (brother of James)	Andrew	John	Andrew
Philip	Philip	Philip	Philip
Bartholomew	Bartholomew	Bartholomew	Thomas
Thomas	Matthew	Matthew	Bartholomew
Matthew	Thomas	Thomas	Matthew
James (son of Alphaeus)	James (son of Alphaeus)	James (son of Alphaeus)	James (son of Alphaeus)
Thaddaeus	Thaddaeus	Simon the Zealot	Simon the Zealot
Simon the Cananean	Simon the Cananean	Judas (son of James)	Judas (son of James)
Judas Iscariot	Judas Iscariot	Judas Iscariot	[vacancy, filled by Matthias]

9). Peter's recognition of his unworthiness on the one hand and of the presence of God on the other hand is reminiscent of the call narratives of the OT prophets who recognized their unworthiness in view of God's self-revelation and commission (1 Kings 19:19-21; Is 6:1-10; Jer 1:4-10).

(2) Jesus calls the disciples to a radical change of life and work with the expectation of immediate obedience—that is, with divine authority. Only God has the authority to extend as unconditional a call to a new way of life as Jesus did.

(3) Peter, and presumably the other disciples, recognized the presence of God in the words of Jesus, resulting in his willingness to leave his fishing boat and his business partners (Lk 5:7) and to follow Jesus immediately and unconditionally (Lk 5:11).

(4) Jesus' call is life-changing. He summons the disciples to follow him, which implies that they are called away from their work; Simon Peter and Andrew leave their nets, James and John leave their boat, Matthew/Levi leaves his tax station. The fact that both the trade of the disciples and Jesus' imperative are formulated in the durative present and imperfect tense means that the actions that are described and the actions that are demanded form a sharp opposition, which underlines the life-changing implications of Jesus' call (Landmesser). The Twelve leave their social environment as they travel with Jesus from town to town and from village to village.

(5) Jesus calls these men to follow after him (opisō mou). The call to follow Jesus comes before the commission and the assignment of a specific task. The apostles are the constant companions of Jesus who observe what he does and who learn from him. This is why they are called "disciples": a mathētēs is a person who learns through instruction from a teacher. As they follow Jesus (Mk 1:18; 6:1; 10:28), they leave their families (Mk 1:20; 10:29), risking their hostility (Mk 13:12) but gaining a new home and a new family: the community of Jesus' followers (Mk 10:30).

The itinerant ministry of the disciples who follow Jesus from town to town has been compared with the lifestyle of *Cynic philosophers (Georgi; Theissen). There are indeed some parallels: the minimal equipment (which included a cloak, a bag and a club), the divine calling, the homelessness, the commission to teach, reflection on social relationships that represent obligations that hinder a person from carrying out the divinely given task. However, since the sources for this suggestion are literary texts written by Stoic philosophers, since the Cynic movement was very diverse, since Cynic philosophers have not been demonstrated to have been active in first-century *Galilee, since some parallels are not exclusively Cynic or not Cynic at all, and since the presuppositions and the motivations of Cynic philosophers differed considerably from those of Jesus and his followers, these parallels do not explain the itinerant ministry of Jesus and the Twelve. Some suggest that the activities of Levitical Torah teachers (cf. 4 Ezra 13:54-56; Philo, Leg. 2.49-52) explains the itinerant ministry of Jesus and the Twelve. Since the primary evidence for the existence of organized Levitical Torah teachers is very limited, and since the relationship between Jesus and the Twelve has no parallels in the activities of the Levitical teachers, the assumed parallel explains little. The same holds true for the scenario of rabbinical students who lived with their rabbi in a community context, if the advice of Rabbi Chisda (b. A.D. 309) to change teachers was followed in the first century ("He who studies the law only from one teacher will never see in his life a sign of victory" [b. 'Abod. Zar. 19a]). Jesus' call and commission of twelve disciples whom he sent into the towns and villages and whom he trained for a later mission was unique in the ancient world. This is hardly surprising when we consider the symbolism of the figure "twelve" (see 4.1 below).

2.2. Jesus' Commission of the Twelve. Three series of texts formulate the purpose of Jesus' call of the Twelve: the call narratives in which Jesus asserts that he will make the disciples "fish for people" (Mt 4:19 // Mk 1:17 // Lk 5:10; Mk 3:13-15); the narratives of the sending of the Twelve into the towns and villages of Galilee in which Jesus commands the disciples to proclaim the good news, to liberate people from evil spirits, and to heal the sick (Mt 10:1-4 // Mk 6:7-13 // Lk 9:1-6); and the narratives of the sending of the Twelve to all nations after Jesus' resurrection (Mt 28:18-20 // Lk 24:46-49; Jn 20:21; Acts 1:8). The commission of the Twelve involves both a command ("follow me") and a promise ("I will make you fish for people"). The following elements of the commission of the twelve apostles stand out.

(1) The twelve apostles are commissioned to "fish for people." The term "fishers of people" (halieis anthrōpōn [Mt 4:19 // Mk 1:17]) has no genuine parallels in ancient literature, including the OT. The fishermen in Jeremiah 16:16 are connected with the gathering of the children of Israel in the context of God's judgment; Jesus may be implying with the term "fishers of people" that he calls the disciples in view of the approaching divine *judgment, commissioning them to proclaim his message of the kingdom of God and gather Israel for a new exodus. Hardly plausible is the suggestion that OT passages that refer to fishing and to hooks (Ezek 29:4-5; Amos 4:2; Hab 1:14-17; cf. 1QH^a XI, 26; XIII, 7-8) in a context of war and judgment explain Jesus' commission to "fish for people" as a call to participate in God's holy war in the last days. The reference to Greco-Roman and Jewish-Hellenistic texts that use the metaphor of fishing with the positive connotation of a teacher (Plato, Soph. 218d-222d; Diogenes Laertius, Vit. 2.67; Let. Arist. 2.23; 'Abot R. Nat. rec. A 40) captures only part of Jesus' commission: the Twelve certainly teach, but they are also called to drive out evil spirits, to heal and to establish communities of disciples. Jesus probably coined the metaphor of "fishers of people" himself, as he calls and commissions twelve disciples, some of whom are fishermen on the Sea of Galilee. The commission to "fish for people" is an assignment to assist Jesus, who gathers the "lost sheep of the house of Israel" (Mt 10:6; cf. Mt 15:24; Lk 15:4, 6) in view of the dawn of the kingdom of God. The Twelve are commissioned to bring people to accept the message that Jesus proclaims, with the result that more and more people follow Jesus and join the movement of messianic fulfillment that Jesus has set in motion. The "people" (anthrōpoi) of Jesus' commission would have initially been understood to refer to the people of Israel, given Jesus' ministry in Galilee among the Jewish people. It seems significant, however, that Jesus describes the target of the disciples' future preaching and teaching activity not with ethnic terms or cultural terms, such as "Jews" (Ioudaioi), "Israelites" (Israelitai), "people of God" (laos) or "your brothers," but rather in the most general terms.

(2) The twelve disciples are commissioned to "go" (poreuesthe [Mt 10:6; cf. Mt 10:7; 28:19]); Luke speaks of Jesus "sending out" (apostellō) the Twelve (Lk 9:2). They do not stay at home; they go to the people who live in the towns and villages into which Jesus is sending them. Their "going" involves a journey (Mt 10:10, where the term hodos describes the action of traveling on a road) on foot to places where they need to find accommodations (Mt 10:11-13). In the parable of the wedding banquet the king "sends" (apesteilen) his slaves to go to the invited guests and tell them that it is time to come, and eventually he commands them to "go" (poreuesthe) to the streets that lead out of town (diexodoi) and to invite to the banquet anyone they find (Mt 22:3-4, 9; Lk 16:17, 21, 23 with the verb exerchomai ["to go out"]).

(3) The Twelve are commissioned to "proclaim" (kēryssō) the good news of the nearness of the kingdom of God, following the lead of Jesus' own proclamation (Mt 10:7; Lk 9:2). The proclamation of the dawn of the kingdom of God involves teaching, as Mark's description of the disciples' report upon the return indicates (Mk 6:30). As the Twelve teach what Jesus taught, they initiate and consolidate the tradition of Jesus' sayings and message already before Easter.

(4) The Twelve are commissioned to cast out unclean spirits and to cure diseases (Mt 10:1, 8; Mk 6:7; Lk 9:1). They will be able to do what Jesus is doing because Jesus grants them the power and authority to perform these miracles. As the sick are cured, the dead raised, the lepers cleansed and the demons cast out (Mt 10:8), the people to whom the Twelve are sent experience the reality of God's power and thus are challenged to acknowledge that the kingdom of God is becoming a reality in connection with Jesus and his message, which is conveyed to them through Jesus' envoys (see Healing, Miracles and Miracle Stories).

(5) The Twelve are sent out in pairs of two (dyo dyo [Mk 6:7])—that is, in six groups of two disciples each. The pairing of the disciples serves mutual encouragement and support, attests the veracity of the testimony of two *witnesses (cf. Deut 19:15; Num 35:30) and represents the new community that is being established (see Mission).

(6) The Twelve are warned that they will not be welcomed by every house or every town (Mt 10:13-14; Mk 6:11; Lk 9:5). Jesus sends them "like sheep into the midst of wolves" (Mt 10:16). This prediction reflects Jesus' own experience: the proclamation of the presence of God's kingdom provokes opposition. The phrase that introduces this prediction—"See, I am sending you" (idou egō apostellō [Mt 10:16]) emphasizes the protection that Jesus promises his disciples: he does not send them to their death, although he sends them into a potentially dangerous situation. The lesson is that they should be "wise as serpents" (i.e., behave circumspectly so that their reliance on God's protection becomes evident without seeking martyrdom or playing tactical games) and "innocent as doves" (i.e., not to be overly cautious or suspicious of everybody and anything). The Twelve are instructed to avoid conflicts, and they are encouraged to be unafraid.

(7) The Twelve are sent as Jesus' envoys to all nations in Matthew 28:18-20 (cf. Lk 24:47), or, in Acts 1:8, from Jerusalem, Judea and Samaria to the end of the earth. This happens only after Jesus' resurrection. The missionary work of the Twelve includes *Gentiles, but it does not exclude Jews. They are directed to begin reaching the Jewish people with the good news of *salvation in Jesus, Israel's Messiah (see Christ), in Jerusalem and Judea, but they are directed to reach the *Samaritan people and all other peoples as well. As Jesus sends out the Twelve, he assures them of his continued presence, which is the presence of the *Holy Spirit of God, who will empower their mission with divine *authority.

(8) The mission of the apostles whom Jesus sends is patterned on the mission of Jesus, whom God had sent (Jn 20:21). The disciples are the envoys of Jesus, in whom God reveals himself to the world: "Whoever sees me sees him who sent me" (Jn 12:45), and "No one comes to the Father except through me" (Jn 14:6). The shape and the purpose of the sending of the disciples are determined by the content of Jesus' mission: as Jesus reveals the Father when he risks his life for the world like a good shepherd and eventually lays down his life (Jn 10:11, 15) so that the world might be "sanctified in the truth" that is Jesus himself (Jn 17:17), the envoys whom Jesus sends into the world (Jn 17:18) are directed to help people find *forgiveness of sins, salvation and eternal *life (Jn 3:16) (Köstenberger). By virtue of being sent by Jesus, they are coworkers of God the Father; they do the work of the Son (Jn 13:12-14), by whose ministry all of God's creatures are to believe in God and receive salvation (Jn 6:29). The Spirit empowers their mission in a hostile world (Jn 15:25-26), guaranteeing the effectiveness of their witness (Jn 16:8-11).

3. The Twelve Apostles.

The authors of the Gospels do not provide much detail about the Twelve, nor does Luke in the book of Acts provide information about either the background or the work of the Twelve, whom he lists in Acts 1:8 (note in Acts 1:26 the addition of Matthias replacing Judas Iscariot). Due to Luke's biographical focus on Peter in the first half of Acts, we have information about Peter for the first twelve years of his ministry (before he leaves Jerusalem in A.D. 41/42) and some information about John. The apocryphal Acts of various apostles provide little in the way of historically reliable information about the members of the circle of the Twelve. The treatment of the Twelve here follows the sequences of names in Matthew 10:2-4.

3.1. Simon Peter. The first man called by Jesus as his disciple (Mk 1:16-18) was Simon and his brother Andrew. The name "Simon" (Heb. Šim'ôn) was the most popular male name among Palestinian Jews. The name of the father was "Jonah" (Mt 16:17) or "John" (Jn 1:42; 21:15-17). The family came from Bethsaida (Jn 1:44) and owned a house in Capernaum (cf. Mt 8:14; Mk 1:21, 29; Lk 4:38). The family business was fishing on the Sea of Galilee (Mk 1:16). Peter was married (Mk 1:29-31; 1 Cor 9:5). Jesus called Simon "Peter" (Gk. Petros [Lk 6:14]), the Greek equivalent of the Aramaic surname "Cephas" (Kêph'â, transliterated in Greek as Kêphas), which means "rock" and thus constitutes a play on words: both the Aramaic term kêph'â and the Greek term petra mean "rock," and petros means "stone." This change of name highlights Simon's task and responsibility: he was appointed as the leader and spokesman of the Twelve and thus the "rock" or foundation of the new "house" of the messianic community, a role that he is portrayed as fulfilling in Acts, where he is described as the spokesperson of the Twelve (Acts 2:14; 5:1-11, 17-39) and the leader of the Jerusalem church (Acts 1:15-25; 9:32-43; 11:2-13; 15:7) and its mission in Jerusalem (Acts 3:12), Judea (Acts 9:32, 35), Samaria (Acts 8:14, 25) and Caesarea (Acts 10:5-48), who preaches at Pentecost (Acts 2:14-40), on the Temple Mount (Acts 3:11-26) and before the Jewish leaders in the Sanhedrin (Acts 4:8-12; 5:29-32). The Gospel writers portray Peter as the first disciple to confess Jesus as the Messiah (Mt 16:13-20 // Mk 8:27-30 // Lk 9:18-21; cf. Jn 6:69), an acknowledgment marred by a lack of understanding of the necessity of Jesus' death (Mt 16:21-23 // Mk 8:31-33; cf. Lk 9:22). He is afraid to acknowledge his association with Jesus during Jesus' trial when confronted by a slave girl (Mt 26:69-75 // Mk 14:66-72 // Jn 18:25-27). After Pentecost, Peter is bold enough to defy the orders of the high priest and the Sanhedrin (Acts 5:29).

In A.D. 41, Peter was arrested in Jerusalem by Herod Agrippa I, who wanted to execute him (Acts 12:3). After a miraculous escape from prison, Peter left Jerusalem and went to "another place" (Acts 12:17) that Luke does not specify; he could have gone to Rome, to northern Asia Minor (cf. the regions mentioned in 1 Pet 1:1) or to other cities with large Jewish communities. Some suggest that the major disturbances in Rome that evidently were connected with the proclamation of Jesus as the Messiah, prompting the emperor Claudius to issue an edict evicting the Jews from Rome in A.D. 49 (Suetonius, Claud. 25.3-4), can most plausibly be explained with the presence and activity of a major Christian figure such as Peter. There is no direct evidence that can support this suggestion, however. We know that after leaving Jerusalem, Peter was active as a missionary, traveling with his wife (1 Cor 9:5); he was active in Antioch probably in A.D. 48 (Gal 2:11-14), and he participated in the apostles' council in Jerusalem in A.D. 48 (Acts 15:7), where he reminded the believers that God had used him in the early days of the church to proclaim the gospel to the Gentiles without requiring them to become Jews (Acts 15:7). Early traditions place Peter in Rome, at least by the time of Nero, during whose reign he is said to have died as martyr, being crucified upside down (Acts Pet. 38). If this information is reliable, Peter's death is best dated during the Neronian persecution in A.D. 64.

The apocryphal Gospel of Peter, written in the second century A.D., is dependent on the canonical Gospels. The main aim of the author seems to have been to blame the Jews for Jesus' death and to exonerate Pilate, and the text adds nothing to our knowledge about the historical Peter. The same holds true for the apocryphal Acts of Peter, written at the end of the second century A.D., which relates stories about Peter's ministry in Rome.

3.2. Andrew. Andrew (Gk. Andreas) was Simon's brother (Mk 1:16) and thus also a fisherman from Bethsaida and Capernaum. He was a disciple of John the Baptist (Jn 1:35, 40) before he met Jesus. According to the Fourth Gospel, Andrew was the first follower of Jesus, identified by name when he brought Simon Peter to Jesus, and the first to recognize Jesus as the Messiah (Jn 1:35-42). Mark relates Andrew's call by Jesus in connection with Peter's (Mk 1:16-18). He is present when Jesus cures Peter's mother-in-law (Mk 1:29-31), and he is among the four disciples who hears Jesus predict the destruction of the *temple (Mk 13:3-4). John relates that Andrew brought the boy with the bread and the fishes to Jesus on the occasion of the feeding miracle (Jn 6:8); still later, he and Philip took the Greeks to Jesus who wanted to see his master (Jn 12:22). Matthew and Luke mention Andrew only in connection with his call (Mt 4:18) and the list of the Twelve (Mt 10:2 // Lk 6:14), which should not be taken to mean that they regarded Andrew as less important.

The apocryphal Acts of Andrew, written in the late second century A.D., contains only minimal historical information; the original author claims to know that the apostle Andrew preached the gospel in northern Asia Minor in the cities of Amaseia and Sinope in the region of Pontus, that he traveled from Pontus to Nicea (freeing the city from dangerous demons), that he visited Nicomedia and Byzantion and then traveled through Thrace and via Perinth, Philippi and Thessalonica in Macedonia to Patras, Corinth and Megara in Achaia, where he converted the proconsul and his family to the Christian faith, and eventually died as martyr in Patras. Origen claims to know that the apostle Andrew went to Scythia, the Bosporan kingdom on the north coast of the Black Sea (Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 3.1.1), which agrees with the apocryphal Acts of Andrew and Matthias, written in the fourth century A.D., whose author asserts that the apostle Andrew engaged in missionary work among the "man-eaters" (the Greeks localized the cannibals on the north coast of the Black Sea [see Herodotus, Hist. 4.106]). Acts of Andrew does not mention a mission of Andrew to Scythia. It is impossible to verify these pieces of information in terms of their historical accuracy.

3.3. James the Son of Zebedee. James (Heb. Ya'āqōb, transliterated in Greek as lakōbos) is always among the first three disciples in the four lists of the Twelve, indicating that he belonged to the inner circle of Jesus' disciples. Since he is always mentioned before his brother John, presumably he was the elder of the two. His father's name was "Zebedee," the family business was fishing on the Sea of Galilee (Mt 4:21 // Mk 1:19); Luke reports that the Zebedee family was a partner with Peter and Andrew (Lk 5:10). The mother of the Zebedee brothers was one of the women at the cross (Mt 27:55-56); if her name was "Salome," as the reference in Mark 15:40 suggests, she was the sister of Jesus' mother, which makes James and his brother John Jesus' cousins. James was among the first men to be called to follow Jesus; when he and his brother John accepted Jesus' call, their father, Zebedee, was left behind in the boat together with the hired men (Mk 1:20).

Jesus gave James and his brother John the nickname "Boanerges," meaning "sons of thunder" (Mk 3:17), evidently because of their sometimes impetuous personalities: when Samaritan villagers refused entry to Jesus, the brothers asked Jesus for permission to command fire to come down from heaven and consume the villagers (Lk 9:51-56), and as they approached Jerusalem, they asked Jesus for places of honor in the kingdom to be established (Mk 10:35-45 [according to Mt 20:20-28, it was their mother who made the request]). Jesus prophesies that James and his brother will "drink the cup" that he has to drink—that is, that they will suffer (Mt 20:23 // Mk 10:39). James was the first of the Twelve to die on account of his allegiance to Jesus; he was executed by Herod Agrippa I in A.D. 41 (Acts 12:2).

3.4. John the Son of Zebedee. John (Gk. Iōānnēs, Heb. Yōhānān), the brother of James, was the younger son of Zebedee, also a fisherman from Bethsaida. He was called from his fishing boat along with his brother to follow Jesus (Mk 1:19-20). In Mark, John is one of the three disciples closest to Jesus (with his brother James and with Simon Peter): at the raising of Jairus's daughter (Mk 5:37), at Jesus' *transfiguration (Mk 9:2) and in *Gethsemane (Mk 14:33). In the Synoptic Gospels, John is once mentioned alone: he reports that the disciples stopped someone who was not a follower of Jesus from casting out *demons in Jesus' name (Mk 9:38 // Lk 9:49). John was chosen by Jesus alongside Peter to prepare the Passover meal (Lk 22:8 [anonymous in Mk 14:13]). In the Gospel of John, he is mentioned once explicitly in the reference to the "sons of Zebedee" in the list of some disciples who encountered the risen Jesus in Galilee (Jn 21:2). Traditionally, since the latter part of the second century A.D., John has been identified with "the disciple whom Jesus loved," the so-called Beloved Disciple in John's Gospel, mentioned for the first time when he is reclining beside Jesus at the *Last Supper (Jn 13:23); he was the only disciple among the Twelve who witnessed Jesus' crucifixion (Jn 19:25-26), and he was the first disciple to see the empty tomb (Jn 20:2-5); he perhaps was the disciple with Peter in the courtyard at Jesus' trial, described as being known to the high priest (Jn 18:15). According to John 21:24-25, the writing of the Fourth Gospel is attributed to the Beloved Disciple.

In Acts, John appears in association with Peter, praying in the temple and healing a crippled man (Acts 3:1-10), forced to justify their activities before the *Sanhedrin (Acts 4:7, 13), whose leaders describe him as uneducated (in the law). When Samaritans are converted through the ministry of Philip, John accompanies Peter to confirm, consolidate and expand the work in Samaria (Acts 8:14-17, 25). Paul describes John, together with James and Cephas (Simon Peter), as one of the "pillar apostles" (Gal 2:9), confirming John's leading role in the Jerusalem church. The suggestion that John the son of Zebedee was arrested when Paul persecuted the followers of Jesus in Jerusalem and was executed on Paul's vote in Jerusalem (Witherington, who argues from the absence of John from Acts 9—28 and from alleged clues in Acts 8:1-3; 22:4; Gal 1:13, 23; 1 Tim 1:13, 15) is entirely hypothetical. Irenaeus (A.D. 130–200) defended the view that the apostle John wrote the Johannine Epistles and Gospel in Ephesus, the latter to answer the errors of Cerinthus and the Nicolaitans (Irenaeus, Haer. 3.3.4). Justin Martyr, who lived in Ephesus ca. A.D. 150, asserted that the John who wrote Revelation (Rev 1:1, 4, 9; 22:8) was the apostle John (Justin, Dial. 81). Polycrates of Ephesus (A.D. 189–198) claims to know that John was buried at Ephesus (Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 3.31.3; 5.24.1-3). Various apocryphal texts, including Acts of John, written in the second century A.D., emphasize John's triumph over pagan worship (e.g., Acts John 37-55 relates that he destroyed the temple of Artemis in Ephesus) but do not provide reliable historical information about the ministry of John.

3.5. Philip. Philip (Gk. Philippos, a name popular among Greeks as the name of Alexander the Great's father) came from Bethsaida, as did Peter and Andrew, and John and James (Jn 1:44). In the Synoptic Gospels, Philip is mentioned only in the lists of the Twelve. According to John's Gospel, he was one of the first disciples of Jesus (Jn 1:43-44). When he recognized Jesus to be the Messiah, he shared his conviction with his friend Nathaniel and invited him to come and see Jesus (Jn 1:45-46). When challenged by Jesus to feed five thousand people, Philip acknowledged that even six months' wages could not buy enough food for so many people (Jn 6:5-7). In Jerusalem he introduced Greeks to Jesus who wanted to see him (Jn 12:21-22), and he participated in the dialogue about the meaning of Jesus' announcement that he would go to the Father (Jn 14:8-9). He was with the other disciples in the upper room waiting for the arrival of the Holy Spirit (Acts 1:13). Philip the apostle must not be confused with the Philip who was one of the seven men appointed to distribute food (Acts 6:5) and who preached the gospel in Samaria (Acts 8:4-24).

The apocryphal Acts of Philip, written in the fourth century A.D., claims to know that the apostle Philip preached the gospel in Parthia and also traveled to Ethiopia and from there to Azotus (Ashdod) on the Mediterranean coast, presupposing a journey from Palestine via the Sinai to Nubia. It is impossible to verify these claims.

3.6. Bartholomew. The name "Bartholomew" (Gk. Bartholomaios) is the transliteration of the Aramaic patronymic "bar Talmi" ("son of Talmay" [cf. Num 13:22; 2 Sam 3:3]). Traditions from the ninth century A.D. onward identify him with the Nathanael mentioned in John 1:43-46; 21:2, which, however, has no basis in the text. Bartholomew is mentioned only in the four lists of the Twelve. Eusebius claims to know that Bartholomew, who was in India before Pantaenus, left the people a copy of the Gospel of Matthew written "in Hebrew letters" (Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 5.10); since multiple traditions place the apostle Thomas in India, this seems to be a confused piece of information that could be due to a misunderstanding: Pantaenus might have understood "Bar Thoma" (Bartholomew) instead of "Mar Thoma" (Thomas, with "Mar" being an oriental honorific title).

3.7. Thomas. The Greek name "Thomas" (Thōmas) is translated in John 11:16; 20:24; 21:2 with the Greek equivalent Didymos, which means "twin" and was used by the Greeks as a personal name, which was not the case for the Hebrew and Aramaic terms meaning “twin” (tē’ōm and tē’ōmā’); John never tells his readers who was Thomas’s twin. In the Synoptic Gospels, Thomas is mentioned only in the lists of the Twelve. In the Gospel of John, he is mentioned as a courageous disciple who is willing to die with Jesus (Jn 11:16; cf. Jn 14:5). He doubted the reports concerning Jesus’ resurrection from the dead (note that the other disciples had refused to believe the women’s reports about having encountered Jesus as risen from the dead); after he encountered Jesus, he confessed him as the divine Messiah (“My Lord and my God!” [Jn 20:28]). According to later tradition, both written (the apocryphal Acts of Thomas) and oral (the so-called Thomas Christians in India), Thomas went to India as a missionary (see Schnabel, 1:880–95). The apocryphal Gospel of Thomas, composed in the second century A.D. and consisting of 114 sayings (logia) mainly by Jesus, is linked by many scholars with the oral Jesus traditions (which have to be reconstructed by translating the Coptic text of the document back into Greek and eventually into Aramaic); the gnosticizing tendency of the document, its world-denying outlook and the emphasis on an esoteric and ascetic faith for which the words of Jesus are important (they give eternal life to those who discover their esoteric truth) but not his works or his cross and resurrection account for the fact that we learn nothing about the historical Thomas.

3.8. Matthew. The name “Matthew” (Gk. Maththaios, Heb. Matityā or Matityāhū) appears in the lists of the Twelve. Since the First Gospel describes Matthew in the list of the Twelve as a tax collector (Mt 10:3) and replaces the name of Levi the tax collector, whom Jesus called (Mk 2:13–17 // Lk 5:27–32), with “Matthew” (Mt 9:9), Matthew and Levi are regarded as identical (though this is implausible to some [see, e.g., Meier, 201; Bauckham, 108–11]). Early tradition credits Matthew/Levi with the authorship of the First Gospel. Rufinus claims to know that the apostle Matthew went to Ethiopia (Rufinus, Hist. 1.9–10).

3.9. James the Son of Alphaeus. The patronymic “son of Alphaeus” (Gk. Alphaios is the transcription of the Hebrew name Ḥalḥāy) distinguishes this James (Heb. Ya’āqōb [“Jacob”]) from James the son of Zebedee. If he is identical with “James the younger,” his mother was called “Mary,” and he had a brother with the name “Josés” (Mk 15:40), but this cannot be confirmed. Since Levi is also described as “son of Alphaeus” (Mk 2:14), it is possible that this James and Levi were brothers; however, because the disciple lists mention the other brothers in pairs, but not James and Levi, this is uncertain.

3.10. Thaddaeus. A disciple with the name “Thaddaeus” (Gk. Thaddaios, Heb. Taddai) is mentioned in the last group of four names in the list of the Twelve in Matthew 10:3; Mark 3:18, while Luke lists a Judas (Heb. Yēhūdā [“Judah”]) son of James (Lk 6:16; Acts 1:13). It is possible that this is the same individual bearing both a Greek and a Hebrew name, which was not uncommon among the Jews of the time. John mentions Judas son of James in connection with the Last Supper, relating that “Judas, not Iscariot” asks Jesus how he will reveal himself to the disciples and not to the world (Jn 14:22). According to the apocryphal Acts of Thaddaeus, a disciple with the name “Thaddaeus” engaged in missionary work in Edessa in the region of Osroene, a vassal state of the Parthians east of the Euphrates River; this tradition is known to Eusebius, who identifies Thaddaeus as one of the seventy disciples sent to proclaim Christ (Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 1.13.4; 2.1.6). Scholars identify this Thaddaeus with the Jewish Christian missionary Addai, who engaged in missionary work in Edessa and in Adiabene (1 Apoc. Jas. 36:15–24; Doctrina Addai), dating this mission to around A.D. 100. Some scholars are prepared to reckon with a mission of Thaddaeus to Edessa around A.D. 33/34, pointing to the exchange of letters between Abgar and the emperor Tiberius mentioned in the Doctrina Addai (for discussion, see Schnabel, 1:900).

3.11. Simon the Cananean. Since the leading disciple also had the name “Simon” (Peter), this Simon is identified as “the zealot” (Gk. ho zelōtēs [Lk 6:15; Acts 1:13]) and “the Cananean” (Gk. ho Kananaios [Mt 10:4 // Mk 3:18]); the term “the Cananean” is to be derived from Aramaic qan’ānā’ (“enthusiast, zealot”). Both the Aramaic term and the Greek term have a broad range of meanings; every person who was committed to fulfilling the *law could be described with the term (cf. 4 Macc 18:12; Philo, Spec. 2.253). The term itself does not prove that this Simon belonged to the political movement of the Zealots—that is, the nationalist Jewish group that was willing to engage in active resistance against the Romans (see Revolutionary Movements). Many scholars regard this assumed association as questionable because the Zealot party emerged only in A.D. 66. We do not know how Simon’s zeal for God and the law manifested itself. The fact that he was willing to live and work in the company of Jesus, who was reviled for being “a glutton and a drunkard, a friend of tax collectors and sinners” (Mt 11:19 // Lk 7:34), indicates his willingness to have his attitude and his behavior changed by Jesus’ example and authority.

3.12. Judas Iscariot. “Judas” (Heb. Yēhūdā) is a venerated Hebrew name, the name of one of the patriarchs. The second name (or nickname) “Iscariot,” which distinguishes him from other early disciples with the name “Judas/Jude,” probably refers to the place Kariot (Tell Qiriath in the Negev, or Askaroth near Shechem?). He was the treasurer of the Twelve (Jn 12:6), which means that he was regarded as competent in money matters. Like the other members of the Twelve, he was called and sent by Jesus “to proclaim the kingdom of God and to heal” (Lk 9:2). According to Acts 1:17, Peter reminded the other disciples that Judas “belonged to our number and received a share in our ministry.”

All four Gospel writers relate Judas’s betrayal of Jesus to the Jewish authorities (Mt 26:14 // Mk 14:10 // Lk 22:4) who subsequently arrest Jesus in Gethsemane. Mark provides no motive for Judas’s betrayal; money is mentioned only after he went to the chief priests (Mk 14:10-11; cf. Lk 22:5). Matthew specifically mentions greed as Judas’s motivation (Mt 26:14-15), while Luke provides a demonic explanation: “Then Satan entered into Judas” (Lk 22:3). John combines the two motivations: he portrays Judas Iscariot as greedy (Jn 12:4-5) and notes that “Satan entered into him” (Jn 13:2, 27).

Matthew provides a fuller version of the events (Mt 26:14-15; 27:3-10) than Luke: he relates that Judas repented, and that he threw the thirty pieces of silver that he had received into the temple before committing suicide by hanging; the priests used the money to purchase a piece of property. Luke is mostly interested in the horrible fate of Judas, relating that Judas acquired a piece of land (which may simply mean that it was Judas’s money that bought the plot of land with the gruesome name “Akeldama,” meaning “field of blood”), and that he fell headlong, bursting open in the middle with the result that all his entrails spilled out (Acts 1:18-19). Judas Iscariot was replaced by Matthias in the circle of the Twelve after Jesus’ resurrection and before Pentecost (Acts 1:12-26).

Revisionist theories that seek to rehabilitate Judas Iscariot have been suggested since early on. The apocryphal Gospel of Judas, a gnostic text dating to the third or fourth century A.D., while recognizing that Judas was the betrayer of Jesus, portrays him as a necessary functionary in the grand divine plan in which Jesus is rescued and released from the constraints of earthly existence for heavenly existence. The fact that the content of the document is “almost entirely derivative from the canonical Gospels and Acts” (Porter and Heath, 95), combined with the consistently gnostic outlook of its theology, suggests the conclusion that we learn nothing new about the historical role of Judas. More recent attempts to portray Judas Iscariot as a good disciple of Jesus who wanted to arrange a meeting between Jesus and the high priests, each with their own hopes for the outcome of such an encounter (Klassen), are equally unconvincing.

4. The Role and Significance of the Apostles.

In discussing the significance of the apostles in the Gospels, the focus needs to go beyond the concept of the apostolos to include the group of the Twelve—Luke, who often speaks of the apostles in Acts, not surprisingly connects the term apostolos with the Twelve (Lk 6:13; 9:1, 10; 22:3, 14, 47; 24:9-10)—and include the evidence of the book of Acts. The significance of the Twelve as a group can be seen in Mark’s description of the calling of the Twelve by Jesus: “And he appointed twelve, whom he also names apostles” (Mk 3:14); the term “appointed” translates the Greek verb poieō, which can be interpreted in terms of Jesus “creating” the Twelve and can be compared with Exodus 18:25-26 (Moses) and 1 Kings 12:6 (Moses and Aaron), as well as with statements in which Yahweh appears as the creator of his people (Is 43:1; 44:2).

4.1. The Nucleus of Restored Israel. The Twelve were not biological descendants of the twelve tribes of Israel: note the two pairs of brothers and the fact that “Israel” in the first century A.D. consisted of only two or three tribes (Judah/Benjamin, the priests from Levi). The Twelve correspond symbolically to the twelve princes of the tribes of Israel in the wilderness (Num 1:4-16) (Horbury). They represent Israel’s hope for a restoration in the messianic age (cf. Ezek 37:15-22; see also Jas 1:1; Rev 7:4-8; 22:2), a symbolism often linked with the Qumran community, in which twelve lay leaders symbolized their claim to be the covenant community of the last days (cf. 1QS VIII, 1; 1Q28a I 11-22; 4Q159 2-4, 3-4; 1Q33 II, 1-3; cf. 11Q19 LVII, 11-14, referring to twelve princes, twelve priests and twelve Levites). In Matthew 19:28 // Luke 22:29-30 the Twelve are explicitly linked with the twelve tribes of Israel, as dispensing judgment. Jesus’ appointment of twelve disciples was a programmatic action, symbolizing the claim that in his ministry the messianic restoration of *Israel had begun had begun in embryonic form (Bryan).

Luke’s portrayal of the activities of the apostles in Acts confirms their significance as constituting the nucleus of a restored Israel, suggesting that Jesus’ announcement that the Twelve will “judge” Israel (Lk 22:30) includes the exercise of leadership authority (Clark). Luke's description of the work of the Twelve in Jerusalem after Pentecost and their encounters with the Jewish leaders in Acts 3–5 portrays the latter as leaders without credibility and authority, as leaders who have killed the promised Messiah and are now threatening Jesus' envoys without the courage to punish the apostles because they are afraid of the people (Acts 4:5–22). And he describes the apostles as the effective leaders of the Jewish people who defy the Jewish leaders in the Sanhedrin (Acts 4:13), who are willingly heard by the people of Jerusalem (Acts 4:2; 5:25) and whose preaching leads thousands of Jews to come to faith in Jesus as the Messiah. Luke portrays the apostles as effective leaders of the new messianic community of Jesus' followers (see Acts 2:42; 4:35, 37; 5:2; 6:1–6; 8:14). He draws a close connection between the apostles and the city of Jerusalem (Lk 24:49; Acts 1:4), in which their ministry is initially focused (Acts 1–6). He describes the apostles as legitimizing new developments in the expanding mission that includes the fulfillment of the prophetic expectation that in the last days the nations will come to Zion and receive salvation (Acts 8:14, 15–17; 11:1, 18; 15:5–6, 22–23).

The role of the Twelve seems to be less important after Peter's departure from Jerusalem in A.D. 41/42, which appears to have coincided with a change of leadership in the Jerusalem church from the apostles to the "elders" (the latter are mentioned in Acts 11:30; 15:2, 4, 6, 22, 23; 16:4; 21:18), presumably prompted by the departure of all or most of the Twelve after the martyrdom of James.

4.2. The Twelve Apostles as Authoritative Eyewitnesses. The role of the apostles as witnesses to the fact that the crucified and buried Jesus rose from the dead is central for Luke. This role is emphasized in the commissioning of the apostles (Lk 24:48; Acts 1:8), and it is central both in the description of the criteria of apostleship when the need arose to replace Judas Iscariot (Acts 1:21–22) and in Peter's preaching and teaching (Acts 2:32; 3:15; 4:2, 10, 33; 5:32; 10:41). The apostles are "distinctive in their role as Jesus' authorized delegates, witnesses to the reality of his resurrection and expounders of its significance" (Clark, 178). The witness is confirmed by God in the signs and wonders that happen in their ministry (Acts 2:43; 3:1–10; 4:16; 5:12, 14; cf. Acts 4:30).

4.3. The Twelve Apostles as Authoritative Transmitters of Jesus Tradition. The calling of the Twelve, all of whom evidently lived in Galilee, at least at the time of their first encounter with Jesus, should not be understood as the calling of rural, illiterate peasants and laborers. At least for Levi/Matthew, a collector of tolls, some degree of education can be assumed; he probably would have been able to take written notes during the three years of Jesus' teaching and preaching ministry, and he may have been among the Jerusalem believers who were capable of sophisticated scribal activity (Bauckham, 287–89). The status of the Twelve symbolizing the messianic restoration of Israel explains their status in the early church as "authoritative transmitters of the sayings of Jesus and authoritative eyewitnesses of the events of Jesus' history" (Bauckham, 95–96).

See also AUTHORITY AND POWER; BELOVED DISCIPLE; DISCIPLES AND DISCIPLESHIP; GOSPELS: APOCRYPHAL; ISRAEL; JOHN, GOSPEL OF; MATTHEW, GOSPEL OF; MISSION.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. H. Agnew, "The Origin of the NT Apostle-Concept: A Review of Research," JBL 105 (1986) 75–96; R. J. Bauckham, Jesus and the Eyewitnesses: The Gospels as Eyewitness Testimony (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2006); J. K. Brown, The Disciples in Narrative Perspective: The Portrayal and Function of the Matthean Disciples (SBLAB 9; Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature, 2002); R. E. Brown, K. P. Donfried and J. Reumann, eds., Peter in the New Testament: A Collaborative Assessment by Protestant and Roman Catholic Scholars (Minneapolis: Augsburg, 1973); S. M. Bryan, Jesus and Israel's Traditions of Judgement and Restoration (SNTSMS 117; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2002); J. A. Böhner, "ἀπόστολος," EDNT 1:142–46; C. C. Caragounis, Peter and the Rock (BZNW 58; Berlin: de Gruyter, 1990); A. C. Clark, "The Role of the Apostles," in Witness to the Gospel: The Theology of Acts, ed. I. H. Marshall and D. Peterson (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1998) 167–90; R. A. Culpepper, John, the Son of Zebedee: The Life of a Legend (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2000); J. Frey, "Apostelbegriff, Apostelamt und Apostolizität," in Das kirchliche Amt in apostolischer Nachfolge, 1: Grundlagen und Grundfragen, ed. T. Schneider and G. Wenz (DK 12; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 2004) 91–188; D. Georgi, The Opponents of Paul in Second Corinthians (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1986; orig. 1964), 151–164; H. O. Guenther, The Footprints of Jesus' Twelve in Early Christian Traditions: A Study in the Meaning of Religious Symbolism (AUSTR 7; New York: Peter Lang, 1985); K. Haacker, "Verwendung und Vermeidung des Apostelbegriffs im lukanischen Werk," NovT 30 (1988) 9–38; R. W. Heron, "The Origin of the New Testament Apostolate," WTJ 45 (1983) 101–31; W. Horbury, "The Twelve and the Phylarchs," NTS 32 (1986) 503–527; L. Iwuamadi, "He Called unto Him the Twelve and Began to Send Them Forth": The Continuation of Jesus' Mission According to the Gospel of Mark (TGT 169; Rome: Editrice Pontificia Università Gregoriana, 2008); W. Klassen, Judas: Betrayer or Friend of Jesus? (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1996); A. J. Köstenberger, The Missions of Jesus and the Disciples According to the Fourth Gospel (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1998); C. Landmesser, Jüngerberufung und Zuwendung zu Gott: Ein exegetischer Beitrag zum Konzept der matthäischen Soteriologie im Anschluss an Mt 9,9-13 (WUNT 133; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2001); M. Lohmeyer, Der Apostelbegriff im Neuen Testament: Eine Untersuchung auf dem Hintergrund der synoptischen Aussendungsreden (SBB 29; Stuttgart: Katholisches Bibelwerk, 1995); S. McKnight, "Jesus and the Twelve," BBR 11 (2001) 203-31; J. P. Meier, A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus, 3: Companions and Competitors (New York: Doubleday, 2001); P. Perkins, Peter: Apostle for the Whole Church (SPNT; Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1994); S. E. Porter and G. L. Heath, The Lost Gospel of Judas: Separating Fact from Fiction (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2007); K. H. Rengstorf, "ἀπόστολος," TDNT 1:407-47; W. Schmithals, The Office of Apostle in the Early Church, trans. J. E. Steely (Nashville: Abingdon, 1969); E. J. Schnabel, Early Christian Mission (2 vols.; Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2004); G. Theissen, Sociology of Early Palestinian Christianity (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1978), 8-16; T. Wiarda, Peter in the Gospels: Pattern, Personality and Relationship (WUNT 2/127; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2000); B. Witherington III, "The Martyrdom of the Zebedee Brothers," BAR 33 (2007) 26-27; J. Ysebaert, Die Amtsterminologie im Neuen Testament und in der Alten Kirche: Eine lexikographische Untersuchung (Breda: Eureia, 1994).

E. J. Schnabel

ARAMAIC LANGUAGE. See LANGUAGES OF PALESTINE.

ARCHANGELS. See ANGELS.

ARCHELAUS. See HERODIAN DYNASTY.

ARCHEOLOGY AND GEOGRAPHY

We begin with a short discussion of the actual or presupposed geographical data, most of which is contained in the Gospels. Special attention will be devoted to the question of whether the results of archaeological investigations can shed light on NT and early church traditions referring to details of locale. In conclusion we will consider what theological significance can be attributed to geographic factors, and whether these factors furnish any grounds for drawing conclusions about the historical reliability and the origin of the Gospels.

1. Infancy Narratives
2. Areas of John the Baptist's Activity
3. Public Ministry of Jesus in Galilee
4. Withdrawal Areas around Galilee
5. Journeys to Jerusalem
6. Jerusalem
7. Historical and Theological Significance

1. Infancy Narratives.

1.1. The Birthplace of John the Baptist. To visit Elizabeth, Mary went "into the hill country [oreinē], to a city of Judah" (Lk 1:39). The Greek word describes the district around Jerusalem (Pliny, Nat. Hist. 5.14). A literary tradition that can be traced back to the sixth century identifies the birthplace with En-Kerem (Arabic Ain Karim), seven kilometers west of Jerusalem (ELS 44ff.). Remains of two fourth-century churches indicate, however, that the tradition stretches back to a still earlier time (GBL 2.776). The identification of this site with the priestly city of Juttah (Josh 15:55; 21:16) ten kilometers south of Hebron is ruled out on philological grounds alone.

1.2. Bethlehem. According to Matthew 2:1 and Luke 2:4 Jesus was born in Bethlehem (Gk. Bēthleem), the native city of the house of David (see Birth of Jesus). It has often been argued that this is nothing more than a deduction from the prophecy of Micah 5:2, and that Jesus actually hailed from Nazareth. Against this is the fact that Bethlehem as Jesus' birthplace appears in two traditions that are totally different from each other. When John 7:42 is taken as indicating that the Fourth Evangelist knew nothing of Jesus' birth in the city of David, the intentional ambiguity found throughout John's Gospel is being misunderstood. That Joseph set out for Bethlehem because of a tax census (Lk 2:14) is explicable only if he had land holdings thereindeed, it is probable that it was his place of residence (cf. Mt 2:11, 22-23). This is not necessarily contradicted by Luke's presentation, since katalyma (Lk 2:7) need not refer to a guest house but far more commonly connotes a large room. Worth mentioning only as a curiosity is the occasional claim that Jesus' birthplace was the Bethlehem that lay eleven kilometers northwest of Nazareth.

A somewhat independent reference to Jesus' origin in the city of David is the early Christian local tradition, not derivable from the Gospels, placing Jesus' birth in a cave in Bethlehem (GBL 1.196-97).

The present Church of the Nativity, lying at the west edge of the hill that marked the old city, was erected over a large rock cave, some 12 x 3 meters in size. This cavern is one of several that were located near houses and served as stalls or for storage of supplies (cf. Lk 11:33) in the first century. Already at the beginning of the second century, the local tradition was so well established that Hadrian (in c. A.D. 135) made the cave into a sanctuary to Adonis in order to eliminate veneration of it by Jewish Christians (ELS 83ff.). Jerome still remembered the original "manger" (phatnē) of Luke 2:7 consisting of a rock groove with plain clay walls (ELS 91) in a sidecave some 3 x 3 meters in size (GBL 2.847). Due to the marble paneling and rebuilding, today it is very difficult to envision the original appearance of this grotto.

1.3. The Shepherd Fields. Based on Genesis 35:21 and Micah 4:8, some Jews expected the Messiah to appear at a place called the "shepherd's tower" (Heb. migdalēder) east of Bethlehem (GBL 2.977-78). Luke 2:8 may envision the shepherds at this site. From the fourth century at the latest, the shepherd fields were sought east of Bethlehem near the village of Beth Sahur (ELS 90ff.). Excavations in this area have brought to light a small shepherd settlement dating to the first century (GBL 1.197).

1.4. Rachel's Tomb. Already in NT times, this tomb near Bethlehem was venerated based on Genesis 35:19. This is probably the same site as the present one at the junction that leads to Jerusalem (GBL 1.197). There may have been a connection between the tradition surrounding this tomb and Matthew 2:16-18.

1.5. The Tomb of Herod the Great. Matthew 2:19 mentions the death of the Jewish king. Originally he had foreseen a family burial site a little north of the modern Damascus gate in Jerusalem in a rotunda modeled after Augustus' mausoleum in Rome. Herod was transferred, however, to the Herodium, his refuge located southwest of Bethlehem on a hill partially constructed from rubble (Josephus, J.W. 1.673). For a long time his grave was suspected to lie in the main tower, but excavations located it at the base of the fortress, where a prestigious sarcophagus has been found.

2. Areas of John the Baptist's Activity.

2.1. The Desert John Inhabited. As the parallelism to Jesus' birth narrative shows, the Baptist was already "in the desert" as a small child (Lk 1:80). Some researchers have suspected that John was brought up in Qumran or another Essene settlement, since the Essenes adopted youths and instructed them in their doctrine (Josephus, J.W. 2.120; cf. 1QH 9:35-36). The local Christian traditions regarding the desert frequented by the Baptist are of late origin and contradictory (ELS 62ff.). Even if John was in contact with the Essenes during his youth, after his prophetic calling from God he turned away from their exclusivist teaching to preach repentance to the populace at large (see Mountain and Wilderness).

2.2. The Baptism of Jesus. According to Matthew 3:13-17 Jesus was baptized (see Baptism) at the Jordan River where it forms the eastern border (cf. Mk 1:4-5) of the desert of Judea (Mt 3:1). This points to the area between the mouth of the wadi Farah and the site where the Jordan enters the Dead Sea. Already in the third century Origen (Comm. Joh. 6.104) knew a local tradition on the heights of Jericho on the east bank of the river. This tradition connected the site with the name Bethabara (probably a ford). Subsequently the Byzantine tradition without exception transferred Jesus' baptismal site to this location, more precisely to the wadi el-Charrar (ELS 171ff.). A Jewish local tradition, quite independent of Christian tradition, located *Elijah's ascension (2 Kings 2:5-14) in this very area (GBL 1.193). It is quite possible that John chose this baptismal site deliberately in order to hint that he was the eschatological Elijah (cf. Mt 11:14; 17:11-13; Mk 9:12-13; Lk 1:17). Recent excavations have confirmed the very early veneration of this place.

2.3. The Mountain of the Temptation. While a symbolic understanding would also be possible (Mt 4:8; cf. Lk 4:5), it appears that early Byzantine tradition regarded this mountain to have been the Djebel Qarantal northwest of Jericho, on which the Hasmonean fortress of Dok lay (ELS 189-90). Perhaps the Jerusalem Talmud polemicalizes against such a veneration (y. Abod. Zar. 39c). According to the Qumran Copper Scroll it seems possible that there was an Essene hideaway there (3Q15 7:11-13). Local Christian tradition preserves, perhaps, the memory that Jesus withdrew (Mk 1:12-13 par.) in a similar manner to the peaceful solitude of this deserted place (GBL 2.659).

2.4. Aenon and Salim. John also baptized at another site, by a sizable spring Aenon (Heb. ʿynōn; Gk. Ainōn) in the vicinity of Salim (Gk. Saleim; Jn 3:23). Baptizing in the Jordan could have been hazardous during high water, but also its tributaries were considered as waters of the Jordan (GBL 1.64). Because of the travel route presupposed by the Fourth Evangelist (cf. Jn 3:22; 4:16), modern researchers have tried to identify Salim with Ain Farah twelve kilometers northwest of Sichem. The early Byzantine tradition (ELS 214ff.), however, places the site twelve kilometers southeast of Scythopolis (Bethshan), where the lush springs of Ed Der arise near Tel Shech Salim (GBL 3.1318). In favor of the Baptist's having chosen this site is the fact that Elisha's birthplace, Abel Mehola where Elijah made him his disciple (1 Kings 19:15-21), was not far distant. The Copper Scroll suggests (3Q15 12:6-7) that an Essene group that practiced baptism settled in this area (DJD IV.262). Early Christian pilgrims were shown the palace of Melchizedek near Salim, a feature which may point to a tradition formed by this Essene group (cf. 11QMelch) in competition with Jerusalem. Since the area lay in the jurisdiction of Scythopolis, a city of the Decapolis, the Baptist was safe here from persecution by Herod Antipas.

2.5. Bethany Beyond the Jordan. At this place (topos) east of the Jordan (Jn 1:28: en Bēthania peran tou Iordanou), a delegation from Jerusalem interrogated John the Baptist regarding who he claimed to be (Jn 1:19-28). At Bethany Jesus called his first personal followers from among the Baptist's adherents (Jn 1:35-51; cf. Acts 1:21-22). There he tarried, obviously to avoid harassment, shortly before the passion. In so doing he gained still more followers from among John's ranks (Jn 10:40-42). In the third century Origen found no place by this name on the east bank of the Jordan. He therefore opted for the reading Bēthabara that appears in a few texts (Origen, Comm. Joh. 4.204). The oldest manuscripts (*p*⁶⁶, *p*⁷⁵), however, support Bēthania, and the transition from John 10:40-42 to 11:1-2 shows that the Evangelist was aware of how similar Bethany (on the far side of the Jordan) and Bethany (near Jerusalem) sounded (Jn 11:1, 18). The distances presupposed in John 1-2 and 10-11 speak in favor of a location nearer *Galilee than Judea. In recent time various more precise attempts to pin down the location have not succeeded (GBL 1.193-94).

One explanation that clarifies much holds Bethany to have been the district of Batanaea (Gk. Batanaia), the Bashan of the OT, which is designated in the LXX as peran tou Iordanou (Num 32:32-33; Deut 3:8; 4:47). A Greek transliteration as Bēthania would not be surprising given the surfeit of various spellings in the *targums and rabbinic literature (see Rabbinic Traditions and Writings). Batanaea belonged to the tetrarchy of the tolerant Herod Philip (Josephus, Ant. 18.106-7) and thus furnished Jesus a safe refuge. This attempted explanation does not necessarily conflict with Jesus' baptism at the south end of the Jordan valley, since his baptism is only presupposed in John 1:32-34, not depicted. John 1:35-

51 is parallel to the calling of the first *disciples recorded in the Synoptics (Mk 1:16-20 par.) in the vicinity of the Sea of Galilee. Locating Bethany in the north of the Holy Land would fit in well with this. In this northerly setting (Hermon area, "Damascus") certain groups with Essene ties appear to have expected the onset of the eschaton (see Galilee). Occasionally the appearance of the eschatological Elijah was also looked for in the north (cf. 1 Kings 19:15; SDtn 41 [79b]). That could explain why John began baptizing here (Jn 10:40). Perhaps John 10:16 and 11:52 refer to a mission Jesus had among such Jewish fringe groups. If one accepts a connection between the Mandaean and the Baptist's followers, then the role played in the Mandaean writings (GBL 2.648) by the river Yarmuk on the Batanaean border is interesting. Luke 3:3 also presupposes that the Baptist's impact was felt throughout the entire Jordan area.

2.6. Death and Burial. The site of the Baptist's execution is not given in the Gospels. But Josephus cites the fortress Machaerus east of the Dead Sea (Ant. 18.119). Mark 6:22-25 may preserve a recollection of this site when it speaks of separate celebrations for men and women on Herod Antipas' birthday. At Machaerus two large dining halls (triclinia) have been excavated. Rapid communication (cf. Mt 11:2-3 par.) between the fortress and other parts of the country was facilitated by a very well constructed access road (GBL 2.905-6).

Since no later than the fourth century, the Baptist's burial site was presumed to be in Samaria (Jerome, Ep. 43.13; 108.13). This location, independent of the Gospels (cf. Mk 6:29), is probably correct. The grave site, uncovered under churches of the twelfth and fourth centuries, reflects a first-century Jewish arrangement. It is obvious that prior to this the grave of Elijah was venerated at the same spot. The choice of this site by John's disciples could have been entirely deliberate since their master's life so closely followed Elijah traditions. In view of the Baptist's ministry in Aenon near Salim, the existence of John's followers in Samaria is not surprising.

3. Public Ministry of Jesus in Galilee.

3.1. Nazareth. Since Nazareth (Gk. Nazaret) is not mentioned in the OT, in the Apocrypha or in rabbinic literature, some during the nineteenth century disputed its existence in NT times. In addition to an inscription mentioning it as a settlement for priests in the third to fourth century (IEJ 12, 1962, 137-39), excavations of recent years have removed every doubt (GBL 2.1031-37). The name is sometimes derived from the Aramaic nāṣṣēraṭ, "lookout," “watchtower.” Against this, however, speaks its setting in a fertile high valley. Matthew 2:23 connects the messianic branch (Heb. nēšer) of Isaiah 11:1 with the name Nazareth (see Nazarene). Perhaps members of the house of David from Babylon or the area around Damascus resettled the area in late Hellenistic times and gave it a consciously messianic name (cf. Julius Africanus [Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. 1.7.612]; GBL 2.801-2).

Remains dating from NT times consist especially of cisterns and silos hewn from rock, along with tombs. Rather well preserved ground walls of a house from Jesus’ time were unearthed in 2009 and can be seen under the International Marian Center. They show that that the people of Nazareth were not cave-dwellers as some scholars assumed. Ritually clean clay stone vessels were also found pointing to pious Jewish inhabitants. As it expanded, Nazareth may have grown to a settlement of some 200 persons. It is unfounded to imagine it as remote for two reasons. First, it was only an hour’s walk from the former district capital of Galilee, Sepphoris (GBL 3.14-29). Second, it lay near one of the most important trade routes of the Roman empire, the road from Egypt to Damascus. If the so-called Nazareth inscription actually comes from there (GBL 2.1037), then Greek was a language understood among the populace.

The connection between Jesus and Nazareth, the birthplace of his mother Mary (Lk 1:26), is verified in such various Gospel traditions (e.g., Mk 1:9; Lk 2:39; 4:16; Mt 2:23; 4:13; Jn 1:45-46) that it is disputed only by outsiders. After an obviously successful expulsion from his extended family (Lk 4:16-30; cf. Mk 3:21, 31-35; 6:4), Jesus switched his residence to Capernaum (Mt 4:16; cf. Jn 2:12). As yet no sure signs of what is likely to have been the quite modest *synagogue presupposed by the Gospels (Mk 6:1-2 par.) have been found. The precipice (ophrys) of the hill on which Nazareth was built, and from which some attempted to hurl Jesus (Lk 4:29), has been confirmed archeologically on the west side of the present-day Church of the Annunciation. When Matthew (Mt 2:23) and Luke (Lk 1:26 and elsewhere) call Nazareth a city (polis), it may be due to their sources containing the ambiguous Hebrew expression šr, which may mean either city or village. Under the Church of the Annunciation lie the remains of a fifth-century Byzantine basilica and a still older, obviously Jewish, worship structure. A fragmentary inscription containing Luke 1:28 indicates that already in pre-Byzantine times there was common knowledge of the annunciation to Mary in this area. Remains of another Byzantine structure along with remains from NT times lie under the convent of the Dames de Nazareth. Byzantine pilgrims possibly sought Joseph’s house here. An old Jewish Christian baptistry is located under Joseph’s Church. A bath-house near Mary’s Well connected by some to Mary and Jesus dates only from the Crusader period. An Archaeological Garden, called Nazareth Village, contains agricultural installations from Jesus’ time and good reconstructions of contemporary houses.

3.2. Cana. To distinguish this Cana (Gk. Kana) from the Kanah southeast of Tyre (Josh 19:28), John calls it “Cana in Galilee” (Jn 2:1, 12; 4:46; 21:2). Jesus did two *miracles and obviously had relatives there. The place visited by pilgrims today, Kafr Kennā six kilometers north of Nazareth, was not regarded as the NT Cana until the seventeenth century and is based on a local, philologically impossible identification of names. Most researchers identify it rather with the site of the ruins at Khirbeth Qānā, twelve kilometers north of Nazareth, which was a burgeoning settlement especially in the first six centuries A.D. Ancient pilgrim reports (ELS 206f.) can also be related to this location. Cana was a strategically vital center on the Roman road from Ptolemais (Akko) on the Mediterranean to Magdala on the Sea of Galilee (Josephus, Life 86). Recent excavations speak against the frequently alleged connection between John 2:1-12 and the cult of Dionysius. Cana is shown as a Jewish place by ritual baths, ritual stone vessels and possibly the remains of a synagogue, and was, at least after the Bar Kokhba revolt (A.D. 132-135), a settlement of Jewish priests (GBL 2.75153). John 2:12 indicates an awareness that one “descended” from Cana to Capernaum.

3.3. Nain. The site Nain (Gk. Nain) has occasionally been identified with a [N]ain in Judaea (Josephus, J.W. 4.511). Textually, however, this is uncertain. The place Josephus mentions may be the Ain of Joshua 15:32 and 19:7, near Hebron. According to the context of Luke 7:1-11, Nain should be sought in the Galilee region (GBL 2.1022-23). Early Byzantine tradition points unwaveringly to the present-day Arabic village Nein, eight kilometers southeast of Nazareth (ELS 341ff.). During NT times this probably belonged to the Galilean portion of the plain of Jezreel. Nain was hardly a city (polis); the city gate mentioned in Luke 7:11-12 could have been no more than the outlet of a street. Excavations have not yet been possible, however. Five kilometers north of Nazareth lies Shunem, where Elisha raised a youth from the dead (2 Kings 4:18-37). The parallel resurrection story about Elijah (1 Kings 17:17-24) could have affected the formulation of Luke 7:11-12, but the witnesses of Jesus' miracle themselves saw a connection with Elijah (cf. Lk 7:18).

3.4. The Sea of Gennesaret. An essential portion of Jesus' ministry was concentrated on the shore of the Sea of Gennesaret (Gk. Gennēsaret). Matthew and Mark call it the "Sea of Galilee" (Mt 4:18; Mk 1:16 and elsewhere) or simply the "sea" (Mt 8:24; Mk 4:39 and elsewhere). Since the Hebrew yāmm can mean either the high seas or an inland sea, this mode of expression shows the connection of both Evangelists with ancient Palestinian tradition. Luke, in contrast, chose the proper Greek literary designation limnē (Lk 5:1-2 and elsewhere). The name "Sea of Tiberias" (Jn 21:1; cf. 6:1) is not necessarily an anachronism in the first century (cf. Josephus, J.W. 3.57; 4.456-57). The "twenty-five or thirty stadia" (five or six kilometers) of John 6:19 probably depicts (accurately) the middle of the northern portion of the sea, with the entire body of water measuring about twenty-one kilometers (thirteen miles) north to south and thirteen kilometers (eight miles) at its widest point.

Occasionally Gospel reports that mention the sea preserve clear examples of local color. Due to the elevation well below sea level (212 meters), temperatures that permit sleeping outdoors are common (cf. Mk 8:2). The lowlying setting results in sudden violent downdrafts and storms (cf. Mt 8:24; Mk 4:37; Lk 8:23; Jn 6:18). Especially notorious is a wind that blows from the east (cf. Mt 14:22-24; Mk 6:45-48), which arises mostly when the seasons are changing, e.g. around Passover (cf. Mk 6:39; Jn 6:4). Most notably, the Gospels on the whole present the sea's fishing industry in an expert fashion. An outstanding example of boat travel on the sea is furnished by two recent finds dating to NT times: a boat mosaic from Magdala, and a derelict boat, with place enough for a dozen people, raised from beneath the water near Nof Ginnosar (GBL 3.1371-72).

3.5. Tiberias. Herod Antipas established Tiberias (Gk. Tiberias) ca. A.D. 17-18 in the vicinity of the OT Hammath (Josh 19:35) as the new regional capital of Galilee. He named it after his patron Tiberius. It is striking that the Gospels make no mention of Jesus' ministry in Tiberias. Some pious Jews considered the city to be unclean (Josephus, Ant. 18.38), but that would hardly have deterred Jesus. In addition not everyone shared this view, as the strong support enjoyed by the nationalist-religious revolutionary Zealots (see Revolutionary Movements) in Tiberias proves (Josephus, Life 32-42; 87-101; 271-335). Furthermore, the assumption that Jesus avoided hellenized cities is untenable, because Magdala, Jericho and, not least, Jerusalem all belonged in that category. Jesus at least had devotees in Tiberias (cf. Jn 6:23), among whom may have been the wife of the Herodian steward Chuza (Lk 8:3). Presumably the reason that Jesus made no public foray into Tiberias lies in the danger posed by Herod Antipas (cf. Lk 13:31-33). The Jerusalem Talmud presupposes a Jewish Christian community in Tiberias (y. Sanh. 25d), presumably at about the end of the first century. Of the synagogues discovered to date, one may date back as far as the second or third centuries A.D. (GBL 3.1554-56).

3.6. Magdala. This architecture hellenized site lay five kilometers northeast of Tiberias. Because of its important dried fish industry, its Greek name was Taricheia (Josephus, Life 403-4). Excavations have confirmed the urban character of Magdala (GBL 2.909-10). A small building from NT times had been originally identified as synagogue, but was a fountain house. In 2009 considerable remains of a synagogue of the Second Temple era were excavated. Later rabbis criticized the supposed immorality of Magdala's inhabitants (Str-B I.1047), but most of them sided with the Jews in the revolt against Rome (Josephus, Life 142). Magdala receives direct mention only in a few late manuscripts at Matthew 15:39 and Mark 8:10. The places mentioned in the original text (see 3.8. below), however, are not scribal slips for Magdala; they rather refer to a region lying further to the north. One of Jesus' most loyal followers, Mary Magdalene (Mt 27:55-56; 28:1 par.), hailed from Magdala; the second portion of her name may give a clue that Jesus ministered there.

3.7. Gennesaret. The NT site, in contrast to the OT city of Chinnereth (Josh 19:35), is located south of (not at) Tell el'Oreimeh, on the northeastern edge of the exceedingly fertile (Josephus, J.W. 3.516-21) plain of Gennesaret. It is not entirely clear whether the Gospels refer to the site (cf. Mt 14:34) or the plain (cf. Mk 6:53-56). The late Byzantine textform at Matthew 14:34 (eis tēn gēn Gennēsaret) provides the first unambiguous reference to it as an area.

3.8. Dalmanutha/Magadan. Except at Mark 8:10 Dalmanutha (Gk. Dalmanoutha) is not attested as a site where Jesus went ashore. The parallel (Mt 15:39) speaks of "the region of Magadan." The rest of the narrative (Mt 16:14; Mk 8:11-13) seems to indicate a place on the west shore of the sea of Galilee. It has been proposed that Mark understood "Dalmanutha," which in Aramaic could mean "area of his [Jesus'] stay," as a specific place name (GBL 1.247-48). Some derive Magadan (Gk. Magadan) from may-gad, "water of (the Canaanite god of springs) Gad [plus the common local ending -an]"; this would fit in well with the abundant springs of Tabgha two kilometers southwest of Capernaum. Josephus calls them the “spring of Capernaum” (J.W. 3.517), and Byzantine sources speak of the seven springs (Gk. Heptapēgon, from which the garbled Arabic Eṭ Ṭābghahâis derived). This appears to have been, in fact, one of Jesus’ preferred locations for ministry, one at which he was able to reach large crowds (GBL 2.767). A branch of the important trade and pilgrim’s route from Caesarea Maritima to Damascus bordered the Sea of Galilee at this point, and there was sufficient drinking water available. As early as the end of the fourth century, the Christian pilgrim Egeria found here three firmly grounded local traditions (ELS 281-82): the *Sermon on the Mount, the feeding of the five thousand, and the postresurrection appearance of Jesus related in John 21. These traditions deserve to be taken seriously because there was a continuous Jewish Christian presence in Capernaum from NT times until the fourth century (Str-B 1.159-560), providing a means by which the traditions could be passed along.

3.9. The Sermon on the Mount. In the fourth century Egeria found the place of remembrance for Matthew 5–7 to be a cave not uncommon for Jewish Christian memorial sites—which can only have been the so-called cave of Job 200 meters east of the Church of the Miraculous Feeding (or Multiplied Loaves) (GBL 2.767). The “level field” (Gk. topos pedinos) mentioned in Luke 6:17 below a hill (Lk 6:12; cf. Mt 5:1) bears identification with the level stretches, large enough to hold several thousand, lying above this cave. Not until later did the local tradition (influenced by Mt 5:1) shift the scene further up the hill. In favor of a location in Tabgha are: (1) the mention of Capernaum (Lk 7:1; cf. Mt 8:5) following directly after the sermon on the plain and (2) the fact that here is one of the few places where the hills extend right down to the seashore.

3.10. First and Second Miraculous Feeding. The Jewish Christians thought of the first feeding (Mt 14:13-21 par.) as taking place at an exposed rock at the edge of a small, fertile plain in Tabgha. The pilgrim Egeria found that the rock had been incorporated into a church building, serving as the altar, as it is today in the reconstructed Byzantine basilica. Since the area was uninhabited in NT times, one could speak of a “lonely place” (Mt 14:13; Mk 6:32). Now it appears, nevertheless, that John presupposes that the feeding of the five thousand took place on the eastern shore (cf. Jn 6:1, 17, 22, 24). The Greek text has multiple variants at this point, however, and John can just as easily be understood to assume a location on the western shore (R. E. Brown, The Gospel of John, 1971 1.231-59). Luke 9:10 also can be understood to say that the feeding took place not in but on the way to Bethsaida. Perhaps behind Luke 9:12 (episitismos, “food,” “something to eat”) stands a Hebrew wordplay (bêṭ šedâ, “house of food”). The view that the feeding of the four thousand is not simply a doublet may be upheld by topographical considerations: Matthew 15:31 seems to presuppose the presence of *Gentiles, and Mark 7:31 appears to have the Decapolis in mind. Late Byzantine traditions (ELS 278-79) actually transfer the second feeding to the area of Kursi (see 4.1. below) on the eastern shore (GBL 1.442).

3.11. Jesus’ Appearance by the Sea. Egeria located the encounter between the resurrected Jesus and his disciples (Jn 21) in Tabgha at some rock staircases still visible today (cf. Jn 21:9). A small church had been erected in the immediate vicinity already in the fourth century. The beach of Tabgha was an especially good fishing area, since the water of the warm springs and the vegetation they carry attract many fish, especially at night (cf. Jn 21:3). Another indication of fishermen’s fondness for this site is a small, ancient boat harbor (GBL 2.767).

3.12. Capernaum. This site (Gk. Kapharnaoum) is mentioned by Josephus (J.W. 3.517; Life 403) and became Jesus’ place of residence for a time at the beginning of his public Galilean ministry (Mt 4:13-17; 9:1; cf. Jn 2:12). Excavations of the twentieth century established beyond any doubt that Capernaum is to be identified with the site of the ruins at Telūm (GBL 2.764-68), which was still visited by pilgrims in the seventh century (ELS 296ff.). The large village of some 1500 residents consisted of individual living quarters containing large families. Beneath an octagonal fifth-century Byzantine church and a fourth century Jewish Christian house synagogue, the remains of a private house were uncovered. It had, as early as the second half of the first century, served as an assembly hall for religious meetings. Inscriptions and the reports of early Christian travelers (ELS 299) make it possible to identify the building as Peter’s house (cf. Mt 9:27-31; Mk 1:29; 2:1; 3:20; 9:33). Remains from synagogues of the third and first centuries A.D. (Lk 7:5, cf. Mk 1:21-29) have been found beneath the celebrated white limestone synagogue that dates to the end of the fourth century. The tradition reflected in Mark 1:29-39, which probably goes back to Peter, is characterized by notable local color: the synagogue lay not far (Mk 1:29) from the house of Peter’s large family (Mk 1:29-30), at the door of which there really was an open area (Mk 1:33). Mark

2:4 (otherwise Lk 5:19) presupposes correctly a building method utilizing clay roofs.

Apparently separated by vacant land from the Jewish village, a small Roman-style settlement stood at the present site of Greek Orthodox property. One can easily envision the residence of the Gentile centurion (cf. Lk 7:6). An imperial road passed nearby. The toll booth (Gk. telōnion, Mk 2:14) manned by Matthew/Levi may have demanded heavy taxes from fishermen rather than road tolls. Halfway between Capernaum and Tabgha lies a small inlet whose acoustic qualities may have served well as Jesus preached at water's edge (Lk 5:1-3). Capernaum was not destroyed in either of the two Jewish revolts. It was gradually deserted beginning in the tenth century. Jesus' pronouncement of woe (Mt 11:20-24; Lk 10:13-15; see Blessing and Woe) has Capernaum's eschatological fate in view; it says nothing about a temporal destruction.

3.13. Chorazin. Although no story from Chorazin (Gk. Chorazin) has been preserved, Jesus' pronouncement of judgment (Mt 11:20-24; Lk 10:12-15) indicates an extensive ministry there. Excavations have so far found vestiges of a Jewish village dating from the second to fourth century A.D., but as yet hardly any evidence from NT times.

3.14. Bethsaida. The Jewish village of Bethsaida (Gk. Bēthsaida) was declared a polis by the tetrarch Herod Philip and named Julias, probably not after the daughter of Augustus, Julias (Josephus, Ant. 18.28), but rather after Augustus' wife Livia-Julia, sometime after A.D. 30. So it may be not without significance for the age of the Gospel traditions that they use only the old Jewish name. The city lay on the east bank of the Jordan, not far from where it flows into the Sea of Galilee in the district of Gaulanitis (Josephus, J.W. 3.515). Excavations on the mound of ruins called et-Tell have uncovered extensive remains of houses dating from NT times. Some have contained fishing gear. This establishes the location of the city, even if the existence of a Roman temple is disputed. West of where the Jordan flowed in former times, right at the edge of the sea, lies the small site of the ruins of El-Aradj. Presumably it was already settled in NT times. It contains the remains of a Byzantine synagogue or church.

It is not easy to decide which of the two cites should be connected with the longer ministry of Jesus in this area (Mt 11:21; Lk 10:13; cf. Lk 9:10). The *healing of the blind man outside the "village" (kōmē) of Bethsaida (Mk 8:22-26) may favor the El-Aradj location. John gives as the birthplace of several disciples, "Bethsaida in Galilee," but he calls it a polis (Jn 1:44;

12:21). Now Josephus also calls the rebel leader Judas, who hailed from near Gamla in Gaulanitis, "the Galilean" (Ant. 17.341; J.W. 2.118). The references in John, therefore, could relate to the Julian city. A semitically influenced, loose usage of polis is, however, also a possibility. In this case El-Aradj is a viable choice; it fell to Antipas after the death of Herod the Great and thus became part of the political region of Galilee.

3.15. The Mountain in Galilee. According to Matthew 28:16 an important appearance of the resurrected Jesus took place "on the [definite article] mountain in Galilee." An identification with Mount Tabor, which was apparently uninhabited in Jesus' day, goes back to Theodosius early in the sixth century (ELS 321). The same identification may, however, be presupposed also in the fourth century by Eusebius (In Ps 88:13) and Epiphanius of Salamis (GBL 3.1517-19). Mount Tabor ranks among the mountains possessing eschatological significance in rabbinic literature (Str-B IV/2.930-31).

4. Withdrawal Areas Around Galilee.

4.1. The Land of the Gerasenes. According to Mark 5:1-20, Jesus healed a *demon-possessed Gentile man here, an area on the east shore of the Sea of Galilee. Mark could hardly have had in mind the far distant Decapolis city of Gerasa; he rather makes use of a semitic designation, "land of the expelledes" (Heb. gērûšim; Gk. Gerasēnoi), as the name for an entire region (GBL 1.442-43). The city of the Decapolis presupposed in Mark 5:14, 20, must be Hippos. The "country of the Gadarenes" (chōra tōn Gadārēnōn) of Matthew 8:28-34 is found to bear the name for the regional capital Gadara that had a stretch of shore in the southeast of the Sea of Galilee. If the reading "country of the Gergesenes" in Luke 8:26-39 (Sinaiticus) is original, this perhaps reflects the Semitic name for Hippos (Gergesa). Or it may refer to the Gargasites, who according to Deuteronomy 3:14 and Joshua 12:5 (LXX) settled in this area and this was still remembered by Origen (Comm. Joh. 6.24) and the Jerusalem Tamud (y. Šeb. 36c). A local tradition that has received some archeological support locates the miracle at El-Kursi.

4.2. Tyre and Sidon. Upper Galilee bordered on the territory of the Gentile city Tyre (Gk. Tyros). When threatened, Jesus found this to be a natural place to withdraw (Mt 15:21; Mk 7:24). Mark 7:24-30 mirrors quite authentically the ethnic tensions that obtained in the border area between Tyre and Galilee (Theissen, 61-80).

4.3. The Decapolis. Another nearby place of refuge (Mk 7:31, Gk. Dekapolis) for Jesus was that area lying east of the Jordan comprised of hellenistic Gentile cities loosely linked by various alliances and political associations (GBL 1.263-64). A Jewish minority lived there as well (cf. Mt 4:25).

4.4. Caesarea Philippi. Matthew 16:13 and Mark 8:27 use this name (Kaisareias tēs Philippou), not the later name Neronias, for the capital city of Herod Philip, whose tolerance was well known and in whose jurisdiction Jesus could accordingly feel himself to be secure. Recent excavations have shown the wealth of the city, including two magnificent temples at a cave where one of the Jordan springs originated. In this region around Hermon, Jewish groups expected the arrival of the age to come (GBL 1.225-26). It may therefore be no accident that Jesus chose the area of “the towns [near] Caesarea Philippi” to elicit from Peter, who expressed the sentiments of the entire band of *disciples, a confession of his messiahship (Mt 16:13-20 par.) (see Christ).

4.5. The Mount of Transfiguration. The geographical context favors identifying this with Hermon (GBL 2.562-63), the highest mountain of the Holy Land (2814m), rather than Tabor (GBL 3.1517-19). In favor of this are the words of Matthew 17:1 and Mark 9:2, “a very high mountain” (horos hypsēlos), which is reminiscent of Testament of Levi 2:5 (cf. Deut 4:48 MT; 4Q213:16-17) with its clear reference to Hermon. This conclusion appears to receive additional support from the most ancient local tradition (Eusebius, In Ps 88:13) (see Transfiguration).

5. Journeys to Jerusalem.

5.1. The Journey Through Samaria. Luke 9:51-56 accurately depicts the tensions between *Samaritans and Jewish pilgrims bound for Jerusalem (Josephus, J.W. 2.232-33). Luke 17:11 presents difficulties, for it asserts that Jesus passed dia meson Samareias kai Galilaias to Jerusalem. It is preferable to think of Jesus passing through the Samaritan Galilee border area (cf. Lk 17:12-19); the notion that he journeyed first through Samaria and then through Galilee is highly unlikely.

5.2. Sychar and Jacob's Well. There was no doubt in the local tradition of the early church that Jacob's well was to be located one-half kilometer southeast of OT Shechem (ELS 219ff.). This permits confirmation of John's outstanding knowledge of that locale, as borne out in John 4:4-42 (GBL 3.15035). There is an artificial (Jn 4:11, phrear), very deep (Jn 4:11) well at the junction of important roads (cf. Jn 4:3-4, 6) near the traditional site of Joseph's tomb (cf. Jn 4:5) which Samaritans considered sacred. By “woman of Samaria” (Jn 4:7) is not meant an inhabitant of the ancient imperial city of Israel, which had generally been called Sebaste since Herod the Great, but rather an adherent to Samaritan religious views and practices. Her home was in Sychar (Gk. Sychar, Jn 4:5, 8, 28), which is to be identified with Askar at the foot of Mount Ebal some 1.5 kilometers away. At that time it was probably the major Samaritan settlement. The holy mountain of the Samaritans (cf. Jn 4:20) was Gerizim. Recent excavations make it clear that the Samaritan sanctuary at Jesus' time, already in ruins, stood not at Tell er-Ras on the slope of Mt. Gerizim, but on top of this mountain, where later a Byzantine church was erected.

5.3. Ephraim. Jesus withdrew to this location (Gk. Ephraim) before the passion. It is to be identified with Ophrah in the territory of Benjamin (Josh 18:23) and the modern Arabic Christian village Et-Taibbeh (formerly Afra) some thirty kilometers north of Jerusalem (GBL 1.322). Here, “near the wilderness,” as John 11:54 rightly notes, a group must have existed among which Jesus did not feel threatened.

5.4. Jericho. In Jesus' day the OT Jericho (Gk. Ierichō) was only a deserted heap of rubble. To the south, at the mouth of the Wadi Qilt, Herod the Great had constructed his winter residence, whose opulence is attested by excavations (GBL 2.659). The chief tax collector Zacchaeus belonged to the upper class of this hellenistic city (see Hellenism). Priests dwelled there too (cf. Lk 10:30-31), however, as spacious burial accommodations indicate. According to Luke 18:35-43 Jesus healed a blind man as he entered Jericho on the way to Jerusalem; Mark 10:46-52 (cf. Mt 20:29-34) has it that the healing took place as Jesus left. Some suggest that Luke speaks of the NT site, Mark and Matthew of the Jericho site of the OT. But if the local tradition of Byzantine vintage is correct (Jerome, Ep. 108.12), the healing occurred (as Matthew and Mark have it) as Jesus exited the Herodian city.

5.5. Bethphage and Bethany. The setting of Bethany (Gk. Bēthania), whose distance from Jerusalem is correctly given in John 11:18 as fifteen stadia (ca. 3 kilometers) from Jerusalem, has been ascertained by modern excavations (GBL 1.193). Inscriptions in a former Jewish ritual bath suggest that there was a Jewish Christian presence well into Byzantine times. The local tradition that touts a tomb in the area as belonging to Lazarus (cf. Jn 11:1-44) may, therefore, be reliable. The home of the obviously unmarried siblings Lazarus, Mary and Martha (Jn 11:1) furnished a secure place for Jesus to stay (Mt 21:17; Mk 11:11; cf. Lk 21:27), even in the last days. Perhaps Bethany was one of the three sites east of Jerusalem to which the Qumran Temple Scroll assigned lepers (11Q19 XLVI, 1618; cf. Mt 26:6; Mk 14:3; see Leprosy). The Evangelists locate Bethany, just as they do Bethphage (Gk. Bēthphagē; which rabbinic sources place on the outer fringe of Jerusalem; Str-B I.839-40), in the vicinity of the Mount of Olives (Mt 21; Mk 11:1; Lk 19:29). Even if the precise location of Bethphage still remains unknown, its placement before Bethany (Mk 11:1; Lk 19:29) could be correct, depending of the way one approaches Jerusalem from Jericho (GBL 1.196).

6. Jerusalem.

6.1. The Temple. The Lukan birth narrative underscores the significance of the Temple for devout Jews of NT times. Zecharias learned of the birth of his son John through an angel appearance at the altar of incense (Lk 1:8-20). The newly born Jesus was presented in the Temple by his parents, and godly Jews uttered prophecies about him on that occasion (Lk 2:22-38). Jesus' family made an annual pilgrimage from Galilee to Jerusalem (Lk 2:41-51); Jesus himself frequently joined the great pilgrim bands that journeyed to the holy city (Jn 2:13; 5:1; 7:2-13; Mk 11:1-19 par.) (see Feasts). The pillared colonnades that surrounded the Temple were the location of Jesus' teaching (Jn 7:28-39; Mk 11:27-13:37 par.). "The portico of Solomon" (Jn 10:23) on the Temple's east side (Josephus, Ant. 20.221; J.W. 5.185) receives special mention. Some archeologists hold that it actually stands atop a wall of Solomon's Temple (GBL 2.510). Excavations conducted thus far (GBL 3.1536-41) show that there was ample reason for the excited reactions of Jesus' disciples (Mk 13:1) and Josephus (Ant. 15.411-425) over the structure's size and splendor.

The Temple was the basis for the political and economic might of the *Sadduceans. Through the Temple cleansing (see Temple Act), a symbolic action meant to send a clear message, Jesus did away with the bloody sacrifice of animals and established the Temple as the eschatological house of *prayer for all peoples (Mk 11:15-18 par.; Jn 2:13-22). The cleansing may have taken place in the royal portico on the Temple's south side (GBL 2.668-69). At the end of his ministry Jesus even foretold the destruction of the sanctuary (Mk 13:1-2). That gave ultimate impetus to the strategy of the Sadducees, who could marshal a host of Jerusalem Temple loyalists against Jesus (Mk 14:57-60 par.). At a Feast of Tabernacles Jesus had proclaimed himself as the spring welling up in the eschatological Temple (Jn 7:37-39) and described himself (Jn 2:18-22; cf. Mt 12:6) as well as the redeemed community he founded (cf. 2 Sam 7:12-16; 4Q174 1 I, 2-13) as the new, spiritual Temple.

6.2. Bethesda. John 5:2 is to be translated, "There is in Jerusalem by the Sheep [gate] a pool called in Hebrew Bethesda having five porticoes." A location north of the Temple square for this (twin) pool (cf. Sir 50:3), whose name has been passed along (Jn 5:2) in a rich variety of variant forms (Bēthesda, Bēthzatha, Bēthsaida [House of Fish—i.e., baptismal symbol?]), is consistently attested both by ancient reports from Christian pilgrims (ELS 460ff.) and by modern excavations. The five stoai (not necessarily porticoes with pillars) were probably located on the four sides and along the dividing wall of the two pools. Steps allowed to descend in the pool but how the waters came to be disturbed (Jn 5:7) is as yet uncertain. Baths on the east side point to a Jewish healing sanctuary; the Roman emperor Hadrian converted them into a pagan shrine to Serapis. The text-critically secondary verses of John 5:3b-4 also indicate a Jewish sanctuary; they may preserve a local legend current in Jerusalem. The legends about Solomon in the Jewish apocryphal Testament of Solomon may likewise have a connection with Bethesda. On the basis of a reference in the Copper Scroll (3Q15 11:11-14), a shrine with connections to the Essenes or Therapeutae is possible.

6.3. Siloam. In NT times the mouth of the Siloam channel, whose source was the spring at Gihon, was itself regarded as a spring (Josephus J.W. 5.140-145). The pool of Siloam (Gk. Silōam, Jn 9:7, 11), whose waters flowed from the same source, is identifiable based on reports from ancient Christian travelers (ELS 467ff.) and recent archeological finds which disclosed its great size and magnificent workmanship (Reich, 232-44). Like Bethesda the Siloam pool served pilgrims as ritual bath before entering the Temple. The rabbis regarded the waters of Siloam, which during the Feast of Tabernacles was poured out in the Temple to celebrate endtime expectations (Str-B II.774-780; cf. Jn 7:3-4), as ceremonially cleansing (see Clean and Unclean) and physically therapeutic. Based on references on the Copper Scroll (3Q15 10:15-16) it is possible that the Essenes also regarded Siloam as a sacred site. Hadrian made an overt attempt to supplant a Jewish sanctuary with a Nymphaeum. Although Jesus sent the blind man to wash in Siloam (Jn 9:17), he was clearly the healing agent. Tracing the name Siloam to the Hebrew šālāh, "sent" (Jn 9:7), may reflect a pre-Christian tradition (Vit. Proph. 13). In conjunction with the messianic conception of shiloh in Genesis 49:10 (cf. 4Q252 V, 4) it may refer to Jesus' own being sent as Messiah. Perhaps the "tower of Siloam" (Lk 13:4) should be identified with the circular tower somewhat northeast of the pool dating from the second century B.C. Perhaps the tower housed a columbarium where doves for the Temple offerings were hatched.

6.4. The Hall in Which the Last Supper Took Place. Jesus celebrated the last Passover meal with his disciples in an "upper room" (Gk. anagaion; Mk 14:15; Lk 22:12; see Last Supper). In Luke's presentation this room is to be identified with the first gathering place of the earliest Jerusalem believers. Luke uses the expression to hyperōon (Acts 1:13; cf. 9:37, 39; 20:8), which denotes a hall for religious worship (GBL 2.1075-77). The definite article shows that Luke was aware of a tradition about this location; the tradition was subsequently passed on without a break into Byzantine times (ELS 473ff.). Remains of a synagogue erected by Jewish Christians between A.D. 73 and 135 on the site of the upper room can still be seen today on the hill, today known as Zion, in the southwest section of Old Jerusalem at the so-called tomb of David. Josephus' allusion to the "gate of the Essenes" (J.W. 5.145) and modern excavations justify the assumption that a quarter containing members of this sect was located nearby. This strengthens the view of those scholars who maintain that Jesus celebrated the Passover in A.D. 30 according to the Essene solar calendar on Tuesday evening.

6.5. Gethsemane. The description of the evangelists alone (Mt 26:36; Mk 14:32; cf. Jn 18:1-2 [ford of the brook Kidron]) rules out any doubt regarding the general location of the Garden of Gethsemane (see Gethsemane) on the west slope of the Mount of Olives. The name (Hebrew/Aramaic gaṭ šēmānī[m]) suggests an olive garden with an oil press. Such an installation (GBL 1.460-61) is actually located in a cave (cf. Jn 18:4) in an area (ELS 533ff.) probably already known to preByzantine tradition (Origen, PG 13.740). The local circumstances would have permitted Jesus to take flight over the Mount of Olives and into the desert right up to the last minute. Luke 22:41 may indicate that memorial sites were shown in Gethsemane already in the days of the Evangelists.

6.6. The Palace of the High Priest and the Meeting Place of the Sanhedrin. The palace, in which some of the proceedings against Jesus (see Trial of Jesus) took place (Mt 26:58; Mk 14:54; cf. Lk 22:54), stood on the hill west of the city according to Josephus (J.W. 2.426). Late and secondary is the local tradition associated with the Armenian Church of the Redeemer, which lies only forty meters north of the site of the Last Supper (ELS 566ff.). Reports of early Byzantine pilgrims (ELS 566ff.), which have some archeological support, point to the area of the Church of St. Peter in Gallicantu (GBL 3.1109-10). This location on the west edge of modern Mount Zion poses no problems for the authenticity of the local tradition about the room where the Last Supper was held. The impressive tiered street passing nearby, dating to NT times and leading toward the area of Jerusalem inhabited by Essenes, was divided by separated stairs to preserve ritual purity despite use by persons of different grades of purity (cf. Ep. Arist. 106). The *Sanhedrin's official convening site was at that time probably outside the Western Temple wall (cf. Josephus, J.W. 5.144), possibly in the colonaded so-called Masonic Hall.

6.7. The Praetorium. The official residence of the Roman prefect (praitōrion), where Jesus' hearing before Pilate took place (Mt 27:27; Mk 15:16; Jn 18:28, 33; 19:9), is today identified by many researchers with the new palace constructed beginning in 20 B.C. (Josephus, J.W. 5.156-183) by Herod the Great. Its location was in west Jerusalem, south of the modern citadel (GBL 3.1221-22). Its existence is presupposed in the story of the Magi (Mt 2:1-12). There is, however, no local tradition of any kind in support that this palace served also as Pilate's. The tradition for the Fortress of Antonia on the northwest corner of the Temple square is very late and decisively contradicted by archeological investigations at the convent of the Sisters of Zion (GBL 1.68). The most ancient reports from Christian travelers (ELS 583ff.), finally made intelligible by recent excavations, refer to an area on the west slope of the Tyropoeon valley opposite the southwest corner of the Temple (GBL 3.1223-24). This is where Josephus (Ant. 20.189-192; J.W. 6.358) locates the Hasmonean royal palace. Gabbatha (Jn 19:13) could refer to the rock cliff, still visible today, opposite the Wailing Wall (GBL 1.398). The Greek name lithostrōtos that occurs in the same context (Jn 19:13) may refer to a paved square in front of the Praetorium, possibly the one still to be seen in place in the Wohl Museum. Such a location for the Praetorium would also fit well with Mark's account, according to which the crowd (presumably from the Temple) "came up" (Mk 15:8).

6.8. Hakeldama. This piece of ground received its popular Aramaic name "field of blood" (Acts 1:19; Gk. Hakeldamach) in connection with Jesus' betrayer Judas, either because of his violent death (Acts 1:18-19), or due to the innocent nature of Jesus' shed blood (Mt 27:4). The potter's field cited in Mt 27:7-10 probably lay at the end of the Hinnom valley (cf. Jer 19:1-2). Christian tradition since at least the fourth century (ELS 575ff.) is almost unanimous in placing Hakeldama here on the grounds of the Onophrius cloister (GBL 2.508-9).

6.9. The Hinnom Valley. Various Jewish groups associated this valley, which wrapped around the old city of Jerusalem on the west and south, with the expected eschatological judgment (GBL 2.578-79). In Jesus' own usage the Aramaic gêt-hennā (Gk. geenna: Mt 5:22, 29-30 and elsewhere) likewise became a designation for the place of endtime punishment.

6.10. Golgatha. The "Garden Tomb" north of the Damascus gate at the alleged hill of Golgatha is a place where one may envision the Easter events. But its origins are pious speculations of the nineteenth century, excluded by the archeological data that demonstrate a pre-exilic tomb. Recent investigations (GBL 1.480-82) show rather that the site of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre actually lay a bit outside the city wall (cf. Mt 28:11; Jn 19:17-42) in the vicinity of a gate (Heb 13:12; cf. Josephus, J.W. 5.146 [Gennath- (i.e., garden) gate]) and a busy street (Mt 27:39). Remains of the temple of Aphrodite have also been found, which Hadrian in A.D. 135 erected to displace a Jewish Christian worship site (ELS 619ff.). Golgatha was a rock formation that took shape as a result of quarrying activity. It rose as high as twelve meters and owed its Aramaic name gûlgultāā' or Hebrew name gulgôlet (Gk. Golgotha), "the skull" (Lk 23:33; cf. Mt 27:33; Mk 15:22; Jn 19:17), to its shape. All four Gospels betray unusual knowledge of local details in connection with Jesus' *burial. Mark 16:5 presupposes that the ledge on which Jesus' body was placed lay on the right side of the rock burial chamber; this detail is corroborated by the tomb under the dome of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, which is regarded as genuine for several good reasons (GBL 1.178). Matthew 27:60; Luke 23:53 and John 19:41 all seem to point also on the unfinished condition of this tomb. In addition John's Gospel is aware that Golgatha lay very near the city (Jn 19:20) and that Jesus' tomb was in the immediate vicinity (Jn 19:42) of a garden (Jn 19:41). Remains of the quarry, of garden walls from the Second Temple period and of the massive rubble fill under the Hadrianic temple can be seen in an Archeological Garden under the Protestant Church of the Redeemer. Archeology also gives us insight into the gruesome details of crucifixion, regarded in NT times as the most fearsome form of execution (GBL 2.840-42).

6.11. Emmaus. Alleged locations of Emmaus (Gk. Emmaous) near Kiriath Jearim and El-Qubeibeh are late and secondary (ELS 714ff.). Local tradition utterly fails to support the suggestion of Moza, ca. eight kilometers west of Jerusalem. In Josephus (J.W. 7.217) the original name of this place (after sifting variants through textual criticism) is not Ammaous but Amassa or Amosa. The best solution is to follow the manuscripts (like Sinaiticus) that place Emmaus 160 stadia from Jerusalem (Lk 24:13) and to identify it, as already the preByzantine tradition did (ELS 706ff.), with Emmaus Nicopolis (today the destroyed Arab village 'Amwās) twenty-three kilometers west of Jerusalem, the place of a great Maccabean victory against a Syrian army (1 Macc 3:27-4:25). There one also finds the warm springs which one would expect given the name Emmaus (Heb. hāmmat, "hot spring"). The reading "sixty stadia" in other manuscripts probably arose through a scribal omission. A journey to Emmaus and back on foot on the same day as the resurrection (Lk 24:33-34) does not appear to have been an impossible feat in that day and culture. The designation of Emmaus as "village" (Lk 24:13: kômē) is not surprising in view of its destruction in 4 B.C. (Josephus, J.W. 2.60-63) and similar references found in other contemporary sources (GBL 1.313-14). The place where Jesus held a meal with two disciples after the resurrection was commemorated by two Byzantine basilicas. Under the one from the fifth century are possibly buried the remains of a small church of the fourth century and a first century A.D. house.

6.12. The Mount of Olives. Because Zechariah 14:4-5 expected the intervention of God in the eschatological battle with the Gentile nations to take place on the Mount of Olives (Gk. ho oros tōn elaiōn), many Jewish endtime expectations were associated with it (Str-B I.840-842). Thus it was that the Egyptian false prophet (Acts 21:38) wished to launch the eschatological assault on Jerusalem from there (Josephus, J.W. 2.261-263). Jesus and his disciples often visited the Mount of Olives (Lk 21:37; cf. Jn 8:1), an area that was still within the jurisdiction of the nearby city. There is absolutely no justification for the assumption that "Galilee" in Mark 14:28; 16:7 (par.) refers to a resting place for Galilean pilgrims on the Mount of Olives (GBL 2.1088-91). Jesus' messianic *triumphal entry began there, which could have been misunderstood by the political authorities (Mk 11:1-11 par.). Luke 19:37 betrays special geographic awareness in speaking about "the descent of the Mount of Olives," down which the ancient ways steeply led. Here Jesus announced the destruction of the city (Lk 19:41-44; see Jerusalem), as he also made it a place for *apocalyptic instruction (Mt 24:3; Mk 13:3; cf. Acts 1:6-7). From no later than the second century (Acts of John 97) a cave on the heights of the Mount of Olives was venerated (ELS 384ff.). Constantine ordered a basilica to be built over it. Perhaps this preserves an authentic recollection of one of Jesus' distinctive teaching sites. Since at least the fourth century the location of Jesus' ascension has been sought immediately nearby (Eusebius, Dem. Ev. 4.18); Luke's statements such as "on the Mount of Olives" (Acts 1:12) and "out to (pros) Bethany" (Lk 24:50) comport with this. The visible return of the resurrected Christ to the Mount of Olives is announced in Acts 1:11.

7. Historical and Theological Significance.

7.1. John the Baptist. The Baptist began his ministry in the northern portion of the Holy Land, where some of the Jews expected the coming of the eschatological Elijah (Mal 3:1; cf. Mk 1:2-8) (see 2.5 above). Both of his other known baptismal sites were associated with Elijah traditions (see 2.2 and 2.4 above). His followers buried John at the traditional site of Elijah's tomb (see 2.6 above). This cannot all be happenstance. It rather shows how in Jewish thought certain areas had significance for the expectation of OT fulfillment. Put another way, John's choice of a specific place for a symbolic action could call attention to a certain claim about his mission, in this case that he was the endtime *prophet in the tradition of Elijah.

7.2. The Gospels in General. The Synoptics, probably for sheerly catechetical reasons, offer a simplified picture of the geographic framework of Jesus ministry: (1) baptism and *temptation in the lower Jordan valley (Mk 1:1-13 par.); (2) ministry in Galilee (Mk 1:14-9:50), at the end interrupted increasingly by short stays on the other side of the Galilean border (Mk 7:24-31; 8:27-30 par.); (3) journey to Jerusalem (Mk 10:1-52); (4) brief sojourn in the holy city (Mk 11-16 par.). As isolated allusions in the Synoptics also show (Mt 23:37; Lk 4:44 and elsewhere), John's presentation, which portrays about a two to three year ministry with frequent trips between Galilee and Jerusalem (Jn 2:13; 6:4; 12:1), deserves preference historically. The Fourth Gospel's description is also not exhaustive, however, for it seems intentionally (cf. Jn 21:25) to restrict itself to mentioning very little when it comes to the ministry in Galilee and surrounding areas. The geographic schema of the Synoptics has relative historical justification of its own, however: the concrete placenames that appear in the Gospel tradition point to a clear concentration of Jesus' ministry in Galilee and Jerusalem.

Three historical questions must be kept constantly in mind regarding what the geographical information says: (1) about the framework of Jesus' ministry; (2) about the local color of the preGospel traditions and (3) about the local knowledge of the Evangelists themselves. The question of the eventual theological significance of geographic factors is associated with these prior questions.

7.3. Jesus. For his family, as for Jesus himself (Jn 7:41-42), his birth in Bethlehem was an indication of his Davidic messianic ministry (see Son of David). The name of his later residence, Nazareth, kept the memory of the prophecy in Isaiah 11:1 alive (see 3.1 above). From the heights around Nazareth he viewed a panorama of OT salvation history. It may be no accident that Jesus drew parallels between his own fate and that of Jonah (Mt 12:39-41 par.; 16:4; see Sign of Jonah), whose grave was thought by early Jewish tradition to be the only grave of a prophet in Galilee (Gath-Hefer in the immediate vicinity of Nazareth; GBL 1.411). The choice of preaching sites like the springs of Tabgha (see 3.8 above) and the Jerusalem Temple also had practical reasons: here Jesus could reach great masses of persons, both from Jerusalem and from the Diaspora. The initial concentration of his own proclamation as well as that of the disciples he sent out to Galilee (Mt 10:5-6) remains, however, striking. Especially deserving of explanation is the emphasis placed by Jesus' pronouncements of judgment (Mt 11:20-24 par) on Chorazin, Bethsaida and Capernaum, all lying near each other on the northwest shore of the Sea of Galilee. It was likely not first of all the Evangelist Matthew (Mt 4:12-16), but rather Jesus himself, who saw this concentration on the southern portion of Naphthali, bordering Zebulun, as a symbolic action in fulfillment of Isaiah 9:1-2 (MT 8:23-9:1).

The phase in which Jesus resided in Capernaum (see 3.12 above) should probably be distinguished from a time during which withdrawal to areas outside Galilee became necessary (see 4 above) because of increasingly threatening circumstances. To this second phase belong logia that speak of Jesus' homelessness (Mt 8:20 par.). It is hardly accidental that it was precisely in the Mount Hermon area, to which at least a few Jewish groups attached special eschatological expectations, that Jesus, on the occasion of Peter's confession and the Transfiguration, divulged his messiahship (see 4.4, 4.5 above).

There is another reason why Jesus evaded persecution in the north: his death in Jerusalem had deep theological significance (Mk 10:33-34 par.; Lk 13:33; Lk 13:34-35 par.). Here he would identify with Israel's prophets, martyred in Jerusalem (cf. Lk 13:24); and offer his life as an atoning sacrifice, thus terminating the validity of the Temple and its cult. Jerusalem remained, however, even in Jesus' proclamation the focal point of the eschatological pilgrimage of all the nations to the one true God (Mt 8:11-12 par.). When after his resurrection Jesus expressed the desire to meet his disciples in Galilee again (Mk 14:28; 16:7 par.), he was saying that their earlier mission that started there would be renewed. In the same way the resurrected Christ revealed himself at Tabgha (see 3.11 above), which had been a center of his earthly ministry. A manifestation that was decisive for revealing his mission took place on Tabor, a place rich with endtime associations (see 3.15 above). Jesus departed from his disciples on the Mount of Olives, which in both OT and Jewish expectation is specially related to the eschaton (see 6.12 above).

7.4. Mark. Contrary to a widely held notion, the geographical knowledge of the Second Evangelist does not rule out his Palestinian origin. One can, nevertheless, detect a certain difference. While Mark does not seem to know his way around Galilee so well (see 3.8, 4.1. above), he offers a number of more specific allusions in regard to Jerusalem (see 5.5, 6.1, 6.7, 6.10 above). That agrees fully with the traditional identification of the Evangelist with John Mark of Jerusalem (Acts 12:12). Especially detailed knowledge of Galilee and the north appear in traditions which one can easily envision as Petrine in origin (see 3.4, 3.12, 3.14, 4.4 above).

Much has been made of the theological significance of geographical information in Mark's gospel. Already in pre-Markan tradition a connection was probably seen between the two miraculous feedings (both stress the isolated [erēmos topos] or desolate [erēmia] nature of the location) and the miraculous feeding of Israel in the wilderness (Mk 6:31; 8:4 par.). This connection was probably intended by Jesus himself (cf. allusions to manna and wilderness in Jn 6:26-59). Perhaps Mark wished to anchor the Gentile *mission in Jesus' ministry with his especially expansive description (Mk 5:1-20) of Jesus' first journey into *Gentile territory (see 5.1 above). The stilling of the storm (Mk 4:35-41) that precedes Mk 5:1-20 may intend to draw a parallel between Jesus ministry and the mission of the prophet Jonah (cf. Jon 1:4-17). It is likewise possible, in view of its close connection with Mark 7:1-23 (clean and unclean) and Mark 7:24-30 (healing of a Gentile woman), that the location of the second miraculous feeding (Mk 8:1-10; cf. 7:31) in the Gentile Decapolis (see 3.10, 4.3 above) looks ahead to the table fellowship between Jewish and Gentile Christians. The journey from the north to Jerusalem is a prototype for the life of the disciples as they follow Jesus. This is underscored by the repetition of the motif of the "Way" (Mk 8:27; 9:33, 34; 10:52).

7.5. Matthew. Corresponding to the scribal characteristics that the first Gospel bears, one encounters geographical information most of all in connection with the fulfillment of OT promises: the birth of Jesus (see 1.2 above) in Bethlehem (Mt 2:1-8; cf. Mic 5:1), the flight to Egypt (Mt 2:13-15; cf. Hos 11:1), Rachel's tomb (see 1.4 above) near Bethlehem (Mt 2:16-18; cf. Jer 31:15), life in Nazareth (Mt 2:22-23; cf. Is 11:1), concentration of the areas belonging to the tribes of Zebulun and Naphtali (Mt 4:12-16; cf. Is 9:1-2 [MT 8:23—9:1]), the procurement of the potter's field or field of blood (Mt 27:5-10; cf. Jer 32:9). The location of Jesus' first great (ethical) discourse on "the mountain" (Mt 5:1) awakes remembrances of the giving of the *Law through *Moses on Sinai. Gadara (see 4.1 above) forms the border of the land of Israel in the rabbinic outlook (Mt 8:28; cf. Str-B I.490). The coupling of the cities of Tyre and Sidon (Mt 15:21) is reminiscent of the OT and indicates that the Evangelist saw Jesus' stay in this Gentile region as paradigmatic. Calling the northern Transjordan "Judea on the other side of the Jordan" (Mt 19:1) is probably due to Joshua 19:34. Even if it holds true for Matthew that the area of Jesus' proper mission is restricted to the purely Jewish districts of Galilee and Jerusalem (Mt 10:5-6), he nevertheless emphasizes how many followers Jesus had from other areas (Mt 4:25) containing Jewish majorities (Judea) or minorities (Decapolis and Transjordan).

The First Gospel's geographical information comports with a Palestinian provenance of its traditions. It is most specific regarding Jerusalem and its surroundings (see 5.5, 6.8, 6.10 above), as well as the area of Capernaum (see 3.8, 3.9, 3.12, 3.15 above). The roles played in Matthew by Capernaum as the "city of Jesus" (cf. Mt 9:1) and the house in which Jesus sometimes lived (see 3.12 above) are striking (Mt 9:27-31; 13:1; cf. Mt 4:13) and may point to traditions handed down by Galilean followers of Jesus. In comparison to John, however, Matthew's geographical references are fewer and less explicit than one would expect from a Gospel that tradition attributes to an eyewitness. The unique emphasis on Jesus' preaching becoming known as far as Syria (Mt 4:24) fits with other indicators that point to the First Gospel's final redaction in this locale.

7.6. Luke. The Third Evangelist may well owe his sometimes interesting geographical information on Galilee and its environs entirely to tradition (see 3.1, 3.3, 3.9, 3.10, 4.1, 5.1 above). He hardly had any closer knowledge of Galilee, since he would otherwise not have referred to Nazareth (see 3.1 above) and Nain (see 3.3 above) as cities (poleis). Still more peculiar are a few references, more specific than one might expect, to local features of Jerusalem and its surroundings (see 1.1, 1.2, 1.3, 6.1, 6.4, 6.5, 6.10, 6.12 above). The precise knowledge of the distance between Jerusalem and Emmaus is unique in the Synoptics (see 6.11 above). An unforced explanation is possible by recognizing that the author of Luke's two-part work had visited the holy city himself according to the events related in one of Acts' "we" sections (Acts 21:15-18). The geographical references in Acts, especially concerning the area between Jerusalem and Caesarea Maritima, strengthen the view that its author was a travel companion of Paul.

Any possible deeper significance for geographical references may lie at the level of the tradition (see 1.3, 3.3, 3.10 above). The evangelist who wrote for learned Greeks could hardly assume that his readers would have knowledge of OT prophetic geography. A precise reference such as the one concerning Emmaus betrays rather a historical interest. Nevertheless, for Luke the anchoring of Christian teaching in the reliably transmitted story of Jesus was also theologically relevant (cf. Lk 1:14).

7.7. John. Compared to the other three Gospels, John offers by far the most references to places. Often the references are quite specific. His knowledge is sound in whatever areas he describes, whether Galilee (see 3.2, 3.4, 3.5, 3.14 above) and the north (see 2.4, 2.5 above), Samaria (see 5.2 above), or Jerusalem (see 6.1, 6.2, 6.3, 6.5, 6.7, 6.10 above) and its surroundings (see 5.3, 5.5 above). The only meaningful explanation for this is that the evangelist, or at the least the disciple who vouched for the tradition (Jn 21:24), was a native of Palestine, though not necessarily of Jerusalem.

Just as John gave a more comprehensive picture of the temporal duration of Jesus' appearance, he also depicts more fully its geographical scope. According to the Fourth Evangelist Jesus also ministered in areas like Batanaea (see 2.5 above) and Samaria (see 5.2 above) where Jewish fringe groups lived. Contact with them appears to have brought on him the opprobrious designation of "Samaritan" (Jn 8:48). It is striking that Jesus often ministered at sacred sites like Jacob's well (see 5.2 above), Bethesda (see 6.2 above), Siloam (see 6.3 above) and of course the Jerusalem Temple (see 6.1 above). This was to fulfill the expectations associated with them, to surpass those expectations, and thereby to render them superfluous. In the presence of Gerizim, and in view of the Jerusalem Temple, the supersession of all Jewish sanctuaries through worship of Jesus "in spirit and truth" becomes an explicit theme (Jn 4:20-24).

In John's Gospel Jesus' ministry concentrates so strongly on Jerusalem that one can raise the question whether the stereotyped talk of "the Jews" (hoi Ioudaioi) does not also strike a resounding geographical note (making "the Jews" equivalent to "Judeans"; GBL 2.736). With the name "Bethany" John linked geographically the inbreaking of salvation in the north with its fulfillment in the south (see 2.5 above). In connection with Siloam he can make christological use of Jewish interpretation of a place name's meaning (see 6.3 above). It is hardly accidental that the most secure anchoring of Jesus' ministry in time and space comes to the fore in the work of the Evangelist who places special emphasis on the incarnation (Jn 1:14).

See also GALILEE; JERUSALEM; MOUNTAIN AND WILDERNESS; TEMPLE.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. Ädna, Jerusalem Tempel und Tempelmarkt (Wiesbaden: Harrassowitz, 1999); D. Baldi, Enchiridion Locorum Sanctorum (3rd ed.; Jerusalem: Franciscan Printing Press, 1982); J. H. Charlesworth, ed., Jesus and Archaeology (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2006); G. Dalman, Sacred Sites and Ways: Studies in the Topography of the Gospels (New York: Macmillan, 1935); W. D. Davies, The Gospel and the Land (Berkeley: University of California, 1974); C. A. Evans, Jesus and His World: The Archaeological Evidence (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2012); J. Finegan, The Archaeology of the New Testament (2nd ed.; Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1992); K. H. Fleckenstein, M. Louhivuori, R. Riesner, Emmaus in Judäa (Giessen: Brunnen, 2003); H. Geva, ed., Ancient Jerusalem Revealed (Jerusalem: Israel Exploration Society, 1994); M. Hengel, "Luke the Historian and the Geography of Palestine in the Acts of the Apostles," in The Book of Acts in Its Palestinian Setting, ed. R. J. Bauckham, (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1995) 27-78; C. Kopp, The Holy Places of the Gospels (Edinburgh/London: Nelson, n.d.); J. Murphy-O'Connor, Keys to Jerusalem (Oxford: Oxford University, 2012); B. Pixner, Paths of the Messiah and Sites of the Early Church from Galilee to Jerusalem (San Francisco: Ignatius, 2010); R. Reich, Excavating the City of David (Jerusalem: Israel Exploration Society, 2011); R. Riesner, "Galiläa," GBL 1.406-7; idem, "Jerusalem," GBL 2.661-77; idem, "Judäa," GBL 2.735-36; idem, "Bethany Beyond the Jordan," TynBul 38 (1987) 29-63; idem, Bethanien jenseits des Jordan: Topographie und Theologie im Johannes-Evangelium (Giessen: Brunnen, 2002); G. Theissen, The Gospels in Context

(Minneapolis: Fortress, 1991); Y. Tsafrir, L. Di Segni, J. Green, Tabula Imperii Romani: Iudaea – Palaestina (Jerusalem: Israel Exploration Society, 1994).

R. Riesner

ASCENSION OF JESUS

Jesus' exalted status at God's right hand is a key NT theme. It expresses the Christian conviction that Jesus now reigns over the universe, and it has wide implications especially for NT *eschatology and cosmology. This theme is present across the NT documents and is closely linked to Jesus' *resurrection, although Luke alone provides a narrative of the ascension of Jesus as a space-time event after his resurrection.

1. Sources
2. Resurrection and Ascension
3. Historicity
4. Theological Significance

1. Sources.

Jesus' exalted status and position at *God's right hand is widely attested in the NT. Paul takes it for granted without argument or defense and builds other points on it, such as Jesus' expected return from heaven (e.g., Rom 8:34; Phil 2:9; 1 Thess 1:10; 4:16; cf. Eph 1:20; 4:7-13; Col 3:1; 1 Tim 3:16), as does 1 Peter 3:21-22. Hebrews bases its understanding of Christ's priestly role on his location seated "at the right hand of the Majesty on high" (Heb 1:3; cf. Heb 4:14; 7:26; 8:4; 9:24). Jesus' reign is a key element of Revelation's Christology (Rev 3:21; 5:6-14; 7:17). In the Synoptic Gospels, the "Son of Man" sayings present Jesus "coming with the clouds" (e.g., Mt 24:30; 26:64; Mk 14:62; Lk 21:27), which portray Jesus either "coming" to God (along the lines of Dan 7:13-14) or "coming" from heaven to earth; either way, his exalted status is clear. The Fourth Gospel includes teaching on Jesus' "glorification" (e.g., Jn 7:39; 8:54; 12:16; 14:13; 17:5), which fits well with the Synoptic material: John portrays Jesus journeying back to the Father in heaven, from whence he came (Jn 3:13; 13:1-3; 16:5, 28), a journey that includes his cross, resurrection and exaltation. John distinguishes Jesus' resurrection from his ascension, for Jesus says to Mary, "I have not yet ascended [anabainō] to the Father" (Jn 20:17; cf. Jn 3:13; 6:62), thus implying that his ascension is yet to come. Belief in Jesus' exaltation thus forms part of the bedrock of apostolic faith from the earliest attested times.

Luke alone tells a story of how Jesus entered his present position, in the twice-told ascension (Lk 24:44-53; Acts 1:4-11), and Luke uniquely specifies the forty-day period of Jesus' resurrection appearances before his ascension (Acts 1:3). Both accounts portray Jesus' travel into heaven as visible to his followers who were present (Lk 24:51; Acts 1:9-11). The Acts passage has four words of seeing that are not the usual "vision" or "dream" words (blepō, ophthalmos, atenizō, emblepō), and both passages use verbs of being "lifted up" or "taken up" (anapherō, epairō, analambanō). It is worth noticing that Hebrews at least hints at an ascension event in speaking of Jesus "passing through" (di-erchomai) the heavens (Heb 4:14).

2. Resurrection and Ascension.

The question that naturally follows from Luke's account is how the relationship of Jesus' resurrection, exaltation and ascension should be understood. Broadly, there have been three major scholarly views (so K. L. Anderson, who adds other, minority views): (1) Jesus rose spiritually, an event that was coincident with his exaltation, and the Lukan accounts present a later stage of storytelling to explain Jesus' exalted status (G. Lohfink calls this "concretizing" or "historicizing"); (2) Jesus rose and was exalted and ascended on Easter morning, and then he appeared from heaven for a period of forty days before a final appearance and departure (Fitzmyer; Maile; Zwiep); (3) Jesus' death, resurrection and ascension are to be seen as an integrated progress through pain to reign; we should see these events as a complex (van Stempvoort; Parsons; Anderson; Harris). Here we look briefly at each of these three views.

The first view is held quite widely and goes with a rejection of the physicality of Jesus' resurrection. G. Lohfink argues that Luke's ascension accounts are modeled on rapture accounts found elsewhere in the Jewish and Greco-Roman worlds (e.g., Elijah in 2 Kings 2:11-12). That Luke's story is presented in a similar way to other rapture stories is undeniable, but this tells us nothing about the origins of Luke's story; and in Elijah's case, the prophet does not die before his rapture, whereas Jesus dies before ascending. It seems unlikely that the earliest Christians moved from thinking of the resurrection and ascension of Jesus as invisible events to thinking of them as physical events, since their (Jewish) assumptions about resurrection were highly physical (Wright). Equally, Luke also does not conflate exaltation and ascension; rather, he links exaltation with resurrection (Lk 24:26; Acts 13:33).

The second view appears to run against the grain of Luke's storytelling, for it means that in Luke 24:26 Jesus was criticizing the two walking to Emmaus for not realizing that he was already ascended (so Fitzmyer). This does violence to Luke's story sequence of resurrection, appearances and then ascension. Further, the evangelistic speeches in Acts contain a similar story sequence of resurrection followed by appearances, without an ascension coming between them (Acts 10:34-43; 13:30-31; cf. Acts 2:32-35).

A version of the third view appears the best, for this view sees the resurrection, exaltation and ascension of Jesus as comprising a whole with distinguishable "moments" within it (Anderson). Thus, there is a fluidity about Luke's references to these moments: he can refer to Jesus' resurrection as his enthronement (Acts 2:30-31) and to his ascension as his exaltation (Acts 2:33-34). Similarly, Jesus' rejection can be followed by his resurrection as "author [archēgos] of life" (Acts 3:14-15) or by his exaltation to God's right hand as "leader" (archēgos) and "savior" (Acts 5:30-31).

3. Historicity.

Criticism of the historical value of Luke's ascension account has centered on two main areas: it assumes an outdated "three-tier" model of the universe (Lohfink; Houlden), and it is a Christianized version of Jewish and Greco-Roman stories, notably the apotheosis of emperors (Houlden; Wright, 55-60).

Although Luke probably is using a pictorial way of writing, it seems unlikely that he (or other NT writers) envisaged Jesus dwelling a few miles above earth; speaking of heaven as "above" the earth need not imply this assumption, any more than people today speaking of the sun "rising" necessarily entails the view that the earth is static and the sun moves around the earth (Moule; Wright, 653-56). More likely, Luke draws on tradition in telling this story, for the "forty days" (Acts 1:3) and the use of vocabulary of seeing (see 1 above) bespeak an event in space-time that clarifies how the apostolic band came to understand that Jesus was now exalted in heaven at the Father's right hand. The silence of Luke 24 and John 20 on this matter does not override the voice of Acts 1 (Harris).

Ancient stories of entering heaven can be categorized in two ways (Lohfink): those involving a journey of the soul to heaven (as frequently in intertestamental Jewish apocalyptic writings), and those involving a "rapture" tradition (such as the Elijah story or the departure of Romulus) (Lohfink; Zwiep). Luke's accounts include more elements of the latter but nevertheless present Jesus' ascension as unique rather than simply "modeled" on other accounts, not least because Jesus' ascension marks the end of his sequence of postresurrection appearances to his disciples. Although there is evidence of Christian tradition centuries later telling the story of Christ's exaltation in terms that echo the apotheosis of emperors, Luke's stories show little such connection, since they are not about a "soul" departing to a higher plane but rather about a physical departure of a reembodyed and transformed Jesus. Nonetheless, it is likely that to speak of Jesus entering heaven implicitly challenged imperial rule because it placed Jesus where deceased emperors were supposed to be.

4. Theological Significance.

The ascension of Jesus marks his transition from earth to heaven: "into heaven" is found three times in Acts 1:10-11 (cf. Lk 24:51) and provides the apostles with a visual demonstration of the truth of Jesus' exalted status. It has at least seven significant implications (Donne; Farrow; Harris; Walton).

(1) The ascension implies that Jesus now reigns alongside God in heaven, and thus it is appropriate to call him *"Lord" as well as "Messiah" (Acts 2:36). The (singular) cloud (Acts 1:9) echoes the one in Luke 21:27 on which the *Son of Man comes to God (cf. Dan 7:13), clearly placing Jesus alongside Israel's God. Thus Jesus, still human, is to be *worshiped (Lk 24:52) alongside Yahweh, and the portrait of Israel's God expands (Johnson). Psalm 110 (esp. Ps 110:1, 4) was a key biblical passage that was interpreted (following Jesus' own lead [Mk 12:35-37]) concerning Jesus, who is thus to be understood as having been enthroned at God's right hand as co-ruler (e.g., Rom 8:34; Heb 10:12-13).

(2) The ascension presages Jesus' return to earth from heaven (Acts 1:11; cf. Heb 9:28). That return will be the time of cosmic renewal and restoration promised in Scripture (Acts 3:20-21) and of *judgment (Acts 17:31). The cloud—a key marker of Jesus' departure (Acts 1:9)—became an emblem of Jesus' return in early Christian writing (e.g., 1 Thess 4:17; Rev 1:7; 14:14-16). Paul picks up Psalm 110:1 as testimony that the time will come when God will place Jesus' enemies under his feet (1 Cor 15:25-26). The ascension is "the advance notice of the end" (Robinson, cited in Zwiep, 196).

(3) Because of Jesus' ascended status, the *Holy Spirit is given to believers from him (Acts 2:33). The Spirit comes from heaven at Jesus' behest, for the exalted Jesus is now Lord of the Spirit (Acts 2:36). By the Spirit, Jesus exercises his rule and reign, empowering believers to call the whole of creation back to God; hence, the apostles are to go to "the end of the earth," encompassing the whole of creation (Acts 1:8).

(4) Jesus' presence in heaven means that he welcomes believers there, for he stands there to welcome Stephen (Acts 7:55-56). The naming of Jesus as "the Son of Man" in Acts 7:55-56 implies that he has fulfilled Daniel 7:13 and now has the universal jurisdiction given to the Son of Man by the Most High. Paul similarly recognizes that when Jesus returns to the renewed heaven and earth, he will bring with him believers who have died to welcome believers who are still alive (1 Thess 4:14-17).

(5) Because Jesus is now in heaven, he can appear and act from heaven. Luke does not have an "absentee Christology," for Jesus can appear to Saul on the Damascus road and strike him blind (Acts 9:8); indeed, Jesus is identified with the believers whom Saul persecutes (Acts 9:5). The Jesus who reigns is also the Jesus who suffers with his people and who thus shares God's own ability to be present in many locations at once. Further, Jesus speaks to Ananias to prepare for Saul to be welcomed by the believing community (Acts 9:10-16); Jesus is thus the stage manager of earthly events. Likewise, Jesus pours out the Spirit (Acts 2:33) and heals Aeneas (Acts 9:34), and by his name others are healed (e.g., Acts 3:6, 16; 4:7, 30). Since Jesus is engaged with events on earth from heaven, it is appropriate for believers to pray to ask him to act (Acts 9:14, 21).

(6) Jesus' ascension pierces the barrier between earth and heaven, and two-way traffic between them then flows. The flurry of angelic activity in the early chapters of Acts is striking (Acts 1:10-11; 5:19; 8:26; 10:3; 12:7-11, 23); this is even more true than in Luke's Gospel (where angels are more prominent than in the other Gospels), for there angelic appearances are a feature only of the infancy narratives and the resurrection stories (it is unlikely that Lk 22:43 is part of the original text of Luke). Similarly, the repeated coming and activity of the Spirit shows heaven invading earth (e.g., Acts 2:1-4; 4:8, 31; 6:10; 7:55; 8:17; 9:17; 10:44; 11:28; 13:2, 9, 52). The early Christians' exorcisms mark the repulsion of the occupying powers of evil and bondage (e.g., Acts 5:16; 8:7; 16:16-18; 19:12), and "signs and wonders" occur at the battle-fronts (e.g., Acts 2:22, 43; 4:30; 5:12; 6:8; 14:3; 15:12). God's word is an active agent of the mission of God (Acts 6:7; 12:24; 13:48-49; 20:32; cf. Is 55:10-11). Heaven is permanently "open for business" in a way that is unprecedented in Scripture.

(7) Jesus' present position in heaven means that believers may approach God with confidence through him: he is the sure source of *salvation (Heb 5:9-10; cf. Acts 4:12). He has the ear of the Father and intercedes for believers (Heb 7:25). As high priest, standing within heaven's courts (Heb 6:19-20), Jesus can aid believers tempted to sin or apos-tatize (Heb 4:14-16). Christian confidence and assurance stem from Jesus' exaltation, for through him believers are assured of God's welcome and encouraged to trust Christ's enabling power in transforming their lives and enabling them to live as God calls them to live.

See also CHRISTOLOGY; GLORY; HOLY SPIRIT; RESURRECTION; SON OF MAN; TRANSFIGURATION.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. K. L. Anderson, "But God Raised Him from the Dead": The Theology of Jesus' Resurrection in Luke-Acts (PBM; Milton Keynes: Paternoster, 2006); B. K. Donne, Christ Ascended: A Study in the Significance of the Ascension of Jesus Christ in the New Testament (Exeter: Paternoster, 1983); D. Farrow, Ascension and Ecclesia: On the Significance of the Doctrine of the Ascension for Ecclesiology and Christian Cosmology (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1999); J. A. Fitzmyer, "The Ascension of Christ and Pentecost," in To Advance the Gospel: New Testament Studies, ed. J. A. Fitzmyer (2nd ed.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans; Livonia, MI: Dove, 1998) 265-94; M. J. Harris, Raised Immortal: Resurrection and Immortality in the New Testament (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1983) 86-94; L. Houlden, "Beyond Belief: Preaching the Ascension," Theology 94 (1991) 173-80; A. Johnson, "Resurrection, Ascension and the Developing Portrait of the God of Israel in Acts," SJT 57 (2004) 146-62; G. Lohfink, Die Himmelfahrt Jesu: Untersuchungen zu den Himmelfahrts- und Erhöhungstexten bei Lukas (SANT 26; Munich: Kösel, 1971); J. F. Maile, "The Ascension in Luke-Acts," TynBul 37 (1986) 29-59; C. F. D. Moule, "The Ascension—Acts 1.9," ExpTim 68 (1956-1957) 205-9; M. C. Parsons, The Departure of Jesus in Luke-Acts: The Ascension Narratives in Context (JSNTSup 21; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1987); P. A. van Stempvoort, "The Interpretation of the Ascension in Luke and Acts," NTS 5 (1958-1959) 30-42; S. Walton, "'The Heavens Opened': Cosmological and Theological Transformation in Luke and Acts," in Cosmology and New Testament Theology, ed. J. T. Pennington and S. M. McDonough (LNTS 355; London: T & T Clark, 2008) 60-73; N. T. Wright, The Resurrection of the Son of God (London: SPCK; Minneapolis: Fortress, 2003); A. W. Zwiep, The Ascension of the Messiah in Lukan Christology (NovTSup 87; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1997).

S. Walton

ATONEMENT. See DEATH OF JESUS; SERVANT OF YAHWEH.

AUTHENTICITY OF SAYINGS/ACTIONS OF JESUS. See CRITERIA OF AUTHENTICITY.

AUTHORITY AND POWER

In order to grasp the portrayal of Jesus' use and understanding of authority and power in the Gospels, we must look beyond the individual. A person's charisma, influence or role may contribute to one's access to authority and power, but these are not the only contributing factors. Additionally, one must look to the context in which they have been acquired and are wielded. Most individuals, cultural systems, institutions, ethnicities and socioeconomic and political classes have rigid boundaries about who is included or excluded. In the Gospels we meet a Jesus who surprises. While he seems to be a charismatic individual (Mk 1:27-28), we find in his confrontations with leadership and power structures that excluded, marginalized and dehumanized (Mt 23) a use of power grounded in his authority and rich theological imagination, values, ethics, understanding of the *kingdom of God and relationship to the Father that offered a different way of being and behaving for the new community founded in his name. Surprisingly, then, discussion of these concepts has played a minor role in understanding the Gospels as a whole. One thing is true: religion fundamentally involves authority and power because it is a conversation about God—the ultimate authority with all power—and those who claim to speak for God.

1. Understanding Authority and Power
2. Authority and Power in the Four Gospels
3. Summary

1. Understanding Authority and Power.

The words authority and power demand careful definition, as they are often confused. Authority is a complex term that can refer to the right to do something or to act in a particular manner, like giving an order, enforcing obedience or influencing another. Authority typically is delegated in some way or comes by divine right, as many monarchs often reminded their subjects. It can also refer to expertise—that is, to one who is a source of information that is in some way authoritative. Finally, authority possesses a moral dimension. The manner by which a person, organization or government derives or exercises authority is as important as having it. Thus, an exploration of power and authority ought to include a web of values (e.g., humility, *justice, generosity, kindness, grace, *mercy) and beliefs that shape how one amasses and then uses them.

Power is fundamentally different than authority. It refers to the ability, capacity or means to do something or act in a particular way. This abstract definition obscures where and how power manifest itself. But those who are socially aware understand that power is present in most human interactions and human systems. We cannot escape it. Examples include economic and political relationships. If power is an element that is always present in human interaction, the pressing question becomes how it is employed and responded to; it is one thing to amass power and quite another to wield it once it has been accumulated.

Some have suggested that legitimacy also needs to be considered here, since not all in authority have power (e.g., a ruler living in exile), and not all power is exercised through existing structures or appointed roles. Authority and power are inextricably bound concepts that inevitably become a part of the discussion of leadership, communal life and human interaction.

The Gospels are unified in their basic presentation of Jesus as possessing a unique endowment of authority and power. He walks the earth with an authority that derives from his relationship to the Father and his role in the kingdom of God (Mk 1:9-11), and he exercises a power that also finds its source in *God. The locus of Jesus' authority and power does not reside in his unique charisma or special giftedness, though he does possess those traits. Rather, his power and authority are located in the arrival of the kingdom of God and made visible in the lives of the people whom Jesus encounters. We see in Jesus a redefinition of power and authority intrinsic to God's reign.

There have been two main approaches to understanding Jesus' power and authority within the Gospel traditions: the narrowly linguistic and the social/political. Some have focused on the words (especially exousia, usually translated as "authority"; and dynamis, usually translated as "power") and their historical uses, confining the explication to the linguistic occurrences and context. However, this generally limits the scope of study to the *miraculous (exorcisms and healings) while excluding broader social issues. More recently, sociological and political theory have been employed in studies of Jesus and the Gospels (e.g., Bryan; Carter; Horsley), and Jesus' use of authority and power in his everyday interactions becomes prominent with these models (e.g., the Canaanite woman [Mt 15:22-28]; the woman with the ointment [Mt 26:6-13 // Mk 14:3-9 // Lk 7:36-50]) (see Social-Scientific Criticisms). Understanding Jesus' life within his historical and cultural context requires the use of such methods. His many encounters with people and systemic issues become case studies in how his beliefs and values challenge existing attitudes and practices concerning socioeconomic status, gender, ethnicity and political affiliations. For example, a simple story of Jesus' pronouncement that those who enter the kingdom of God must do so like those *children who gathered around him at his invitation contains within it a profound statement about the use of power. Likewise, Jesus' conversation with a *Samaritan woman at a well (Jn 4:1-29) and the story of a Samaritan man assisting a person left for dead along the roadside (Lk 10:25-37) demonstrate unexpected uses of authority and power. To limit ourselves, then, simply to the occurrence of the terms authority and power would be to miss how Jesus embodied these in his encounters with people, culture, political and religious systems, and so forth.

The Gospels were composed after Jesus' death and resurrection, allowing many years for reflection, exegesis and theological exploration by followers who tried to account for the events that surrounded Jesus and their experience of him. With this in mind, we can turn to four narrative elements that present us with a view of power and authority and the nature and character of God: the *incarnation (Matthew, Luke, John), the cross (see Death of Jesus), the *resurrection/*ascension and the kingdom of God. The incarnation, the understanding that the Son took on human form, and the manner in which it occurred (Mt 1:18-25; Lk 1:26-38; cf. Phil 2:1-11) are a study on the use of authority, power and humility. Similarly, the crucifixion and resurrection narratives demonstrate the notion that the power of God is manifest in weakness and suffering. That Jesus brings with him the arrival of the kingdom of God, when read politically and socially, presents us with the beginnings of an alternative society populated by those dedicated to Jesus' leadership and to the values and norms of heaven and its ruler, God. Jesus' life, behaviors, teachings, attitudes and values reveal how power and authority are to be understood within the kingdom of God, demonstrating a radical departure from the social games played within human kingdoms.

2. Authority and Power in the Four Gospels.

2.1. Mark. A cosmic focus in Mark forms the basis for the Synoptic portrait of Jesus. With the arrival of Jesus and the kingdom of God, a conflict ensues between the primal forces of good and evil, the kingdom of God versus Satan. Jesus' authority is located in God and his role in salvation history. The baptism and temptation narratives play a particularly important role here. With the bestowal of the Spirit on Jesus and his successful resistance against Satan's advances, Satan and his control of the world are dealt a significant defeat, marking the beginning of the end of his power. The crowds rightly perceive a unique authority in Jesus' teachings on life and on the kingdom of God and its practices, and in his *forgiveness of sins (Mk 2:10) and casting out *demons (Mk 1:27; 11:26, 28, 33). The implications and source of this authority are spelled out more clearly in Mark 11:27-33 in the dialogue between Jesus and the chief *priests, *scribes and *elders who question the source of Jesus' authority that allows him to exorcise demons. This echoes the earlier query about whether God or Beelzebul is at work (Mk 3:22). Jesus' response compels the inquisitors to consider the origins of John's *baptismal authority: is it heavenly or human? This frames well the notion of authority for the Gospels and Jesus: legitimate authority derives from alignment with the Father and the kingdom of God. It is not so much an issue of personal charisma, as M. Weber argues; rather, Jesus views himself as aligned with God and the rule of God in heaven, now coming to earth.

Power is the means by which the inbreaking of the kingdom of God is demonstrated in the lives of the people whom Jesus encounters. It validates Jesus' message and provides a window into his identity. One may make many claims, but proof lies in results. The conflict crystallizes: how can the religious leaders disagree with Jesus' understanding of the new thing that God is doing through him and explain his deeds of power? In this way, structural, systemic, religious, economic, political and social issues are exposed. People who follow Jesus tangibly experience the powerful shift of the kingdoms moving from chaos to cosmos, a foreshadowing of the health, healing and wholeness that will accompany the denouement of the kingdom of God.

2.2. Matthew. Matthew's first explicit reference to authority does not occur until Matthew 7:28-29, at the close of the *Sermon on the Mount, the first of five major blocks of teaching material. The crowds "were amazed at his teachings, as one with authority [exousia], not like the scribes." Authority comes into play first in his teachings themselves; many find Jesus' expertise and interpretation of the *law compelling. Second, the crowds perceive the authority of Jesus' instruction vis-à-vis that of the religious establishment. This is actually Matthew's point in the narrative. Jesus' relationship to God the Father in Matthew is more developed and central to his understanding of authority (Mt 11:25-30). The uses of authority in Matthew 21:23-27 are similar in their appeal to a delegated authority; likewise, the authority in Matthew 10:1 is delegated as Jesus commissions and gives his *disciples authority over unclean spirits and to cure disease. Jesus receives his authority from the Father and in turn delegates authority to the disciples.

The passage that primarily shapes our understanding of authority in Matthew's Gospel is Matthew 28:16-20, which many consider to be the summary and thus the key to the interpretation of this Gospel as a whole. Jesus states, "All authority [exousia] in heaven and earth has been give to me" (Mt 28:18). This delegated authority culminates the story and also provides the narrative framework for a reading of the story. Jesus, the leader of their movement, emerges in the end as the sole legitimate authority in the universe. With this, Jesus' identity, so long obscured throughout the Matthean narrative, is revealed. As he does with other aspects of his identity, he shapes his use of power and authority by the values of the kingdom of God throughout the book.

In Matthew's Gospel power relates primarily to Jesus' miracles, his deeds of power (dynamis [see Mt 7:22; 11:20-21, 23; 13:54, 58; 22:29; 24:30]). Power here refers to the resources necessary to accomplish the task. In this case, it is the Spirit of God who accomplishes these deeds in alignment with the purposes of God (see Holy Spirit). As in Mark, emphasis is not on Jesus' personal charisma but rather on the effects and point of the deeds of power: the revelation of the inbreaking kingdom of God evidenced in restoration, healing and emancipation (Mt 11:4-6) on behalf of those seeking new life in the kingdom. The values that shape the use of power are humility, grace, kindness, *love and *freedom. The oppression of demonic possession or physical illness is met with Jesus' power and authority. Matthew's inclusion of conflict between Jesus and Jewish leadership, climaxing in Matthew 23, is fundamentally about power and authority. The use of power and authority is meant to bring *peace, freedom and a restoration to a quality of life that is a hallmark of the kingdom of God. This renewal reveals Jesus' role as the long-awaited Davidic king.

2.3. Luke. Luke's narrative interest in the arrival of the kingdom of God and the *salvation God made universally available to all humankind, Jew and *Gentile alike, shapes his notions of authority and power. Although we find similarities to Mark, a usage of authority unique to Luke appears in Luke 4:6, when the devil offers Jesus the authority (exousia) over the kingdoms of the world. Here authority is again tied to government and rule. It is similarly expressed in Luke 7:8 in the dialogue with the centurian, who understands he functions within a system that links his own authority to the hierarchy of the Roman army (cf. Mt 8:9). A command from above passes through the line of command (see Rome). Thus, he anticipates that Jesus has a similar authority within the kingdom of God. Proper use of that authority requires that Jesus be aligned with God's wishes. When Jesus sends his disciples out, the nuance is similar. Jesus, who has authority because of his identity and function within the kingdom of God, gives his disciples power and authority so that through them also the deeds of the kingdom—exorcisms, healings and the like—will be accomplished (Lk 9:1-2).

The role of the Holy Spirit within Jesus' life and ministry and that of the community of followers is an important motif in Luke-Acts. The Spirit provides the power to accomplish the deeds of the kingdom. Again, salvation broadly defined is available to all. One should not understate that the goal of power is a people set free, healed and restored, foreshadowing the full establishment of the kingdom of God (e.g., Lk 4:16-21). Neither power nor authority is used in political or organizational contexts with which we tend to associate them today. But the use of power in the realm of human systems is nevertheless implicitly present in the narratives. Jesus' relationship with *women (Lk 8:1-3), for example, is more explicit in Luke. Jesus is more inclusive of women within his inner circle than one might expect given the traditional culture. Similarly, his relationship to the poor, disenfranchised and outcast evinces an understanding and use of power that has as its goal inclusion, restoration and salvation. Jesus' behaviors, beliefs and values challenge the status quo and subvert the socioeconomic, gender and ethnicity barriers created by culture, human bias and institutions. His radical inclusion is a model for the new community.

2.4. John. Power and authority are more explicit in John, but not in the manner of the Synoptics. Given the prologue (Jn 1:1-18) and John's *Christology, one might expect the Jesus of John to exude authority and power. However, these terms rarely occur, and when they do, they have a different reference. There are no exorcisms and few healings, and Jesus is the one who will execute *judgment (Jn 5:27). John's references to Jesus' authority draw on his relationship to the Father and his place within the hierarchy of the rule of God. The boundaries between the world and the followers of Jesus and the Father are more delineated in John, creating the notion of a people separate from broader society and marked by a set of beliefs and values that shape their behaviors. As such, authority is tied to Jesus' identity, location and standing within his Father's realm and rule and this new community. John's message of salvation is an invitation to enter into the society of disciples. Although unseen, the authority of God trumps the human authority of governments, rulers and societal norms. To use Weber's language, Jesus' authority is legitimated by his relationship to the Father and place within the Father's kingdom.

John's understanding of power is similar. Power exists within a theological worldview. Followers are granted power to become children of God (Jn 1:12). Jesus has the power to give up his own life (Jn 10:18). Even *Pontius Pilate has no real power over Jesus (Jn 19:11), except that which the Father has given to him. Here we witness the human misunderstanding of power. Real power is elusive, and it is not always clear in whose hands the power lies.

3. Summary.

Jesus is often considered one of the great charismatic figures of world history. As such, it is assumed that his popularity and charisma afforded him social power and authority. If one limits the investigation to exploring the dynamic between Jesus and the people and his seeming innate authority and power, the Gospels reveal limited information: Jesus was a charismatic individual who was endowed by the Holy Spirit and taught powerfully; he was an exorcist and healer who ran afoul of the Jewish leaders and Romans. If we consider a broader understanding of power and authority, however, Jesus' unique relationship to the Father as Son, empowerment by the Holy Spirit and role in bringing the kingdom of God take on a profound richness. He subverts the typical human notions of authority when he states explicitly, "You know that among the Gentiles those whom they recognize as their rulers lord it over them, and their great ones are tyrants over them" (Mt 20:25 // Mk 10:42 // Lk 22:25). The values and behaviors of those within the kingdom of God are different. In Jesus' teachings, demonstrations of power and engagements with people we find one who uses power and authority to bring about wholeness, restoration and healing. In his confrontations with leadership we see his understanding of systems and the role that power plays in enforcing boundaries that exclude, marginalize and dehumanize. The converse is also true. Jesus provides a model for the positive use of authority and power grounded in his rich theological imagination, values, *ethics, understanding of the kingdom of God and relationship to the Father.

See also COMMANDMENT; DEATH OF JESUS; DEMON, DEVIL, SATAN; ETHICS OF JESUS; GOD; HOLY SPIRIT; JUDGMENT; KINGDOM OF GOD/HEAVEN; LAW; MIRACLES AND MIRACLE STORIES; RESURRECTION; WOMEN.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R. Bauckham, "Egalitarianism and Hierarchy in the Bible," in God and the Crisis of Freedom: Biblical and Contemporary Perspectives (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2002) 116-27; idem, Gospel Women: Studies of the Named Women in the Gospels. (London: T & T Clark, 2002); C. Bryan, Render to Caesar: Jesus, the Early Church, and the Roman Superpower (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2005); W. Carter, "Vulnerable Power: The Roman Empire Challenged by the Early Christians," in Handbook of Early Christianity: Social Science Approaches, ed. A. J. Blasi, J. Duhaime and P.-A. Turcotte (Walnut Creek, CA: AltaMira, 2002) 453-88; idem, The Roman Empire and the New Testament: An Essential Guide (Nashville: Abingdon, 2006); R. A. Horsley, Jesus and Empire: The Kingdom of God and the New World Disorder (Minneapolis: Augsburg Fortress, 2003); idem, Jesus and the Powers: Conflict, Covenant, and the Hope of the Poor (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2011); T. B. Liew, "Tyranny, Boundary, and Might: Colonial Mimicry in Mark's Gospel," in The Postcolonial Biblical Reader, ed. R. S. Sugirtharajah (Malden, MA: Blackwell, 2006) 206-23; B. Longenecker and K. Liebengood, eds. Engaging Economics: New Testament Scenarios and Early Christian Reception (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2009); G. R. Smillie, "Jesus' Response to the Question of His Authority in Matthew 21," BSac 162 (2005) 459-69; M. Weber, The Protestant Ethic and the "Spirit" of Capitalism and Other Writings, ed. and trans. P. Baehr and G. C. Wells (New York: Penguin, 2002).

R. Beaton

B

BANQUETING. See TABLE FELLOWSHIP.

BAPTISM

Baptism was the central rite for entrance into the church in apostolic and later times. The basis for this importance was the experience of Jesus and the texts of the Gospels. This article discusses the terminology of baptism, possible antecedents to Christian baptism, the practice of John the Baptist, the baptism of Jesus, a metaphorical use of the language of baptism, and two texts from the Gospels important for the future.

1. Terminology
2. Possible Antecedents to Christian Baptism
3. Practice of John the Baptist
4. Jesus' Baptism
5. Metaphorical Use of the Language of Baptism
6. Two Texts Important for the Future

1. Terminology.

The common Greek word used to describe dipping in water for the purpose of purification, baptismos, occurs in the Gospels only in Mark 7:4 (cf. Heb 6:2; 9:10). In distinction from these repeated washings, the baptism of John and Christian baptism are represented by baptisma (e.g., Mk 1:4; 11:30; cf. Acts 1:22; Rom 6:4; Eph 4:5). The verb baptō ("to dip") occurs in Luke 16:24; John 13:26 (cf. cognate embaptō in Mt 26:23 // Mk 14:20). Since its principal use in secular Greek was in the secondary sense "to dye" (from the practice of dipping an object in its coloring agent [cf. Rev 19:13, where Jesus' robe is "dipped" in blood]), the intensive form baptizō came into general use. Two of its common uses were to describe the drowning of a person and the sinking of a ship (e.g., Josephus, B.J. 1.437; 3.423). There is no indication that the NT departs from the meaning "to dip, plunge" (Mk 1:5, 9; Mt 3:6, 16; cf. Acts 8:38).

2. Possible Antecedents to Christian Baptism.

2.1. Pagan Washings. The use of water—immersion, pouring, sprinkling—was common in Greco-Roman paganism. These applications of water were for ceremonial cleansing before entering a sacred precinct. In the mystery religions they were preliminary purifications and noninitiatory.

2.2. Jewish Practices. The law required bathing in water to remove various impurities (Lev 11:24, 32; 14:6-16; 15:5-27; Num 19:17-20). By the time of Jesus, the Pharisees understood many of the purifications to require an immersion (Lk 11:38), and the Mishnah (ca. A.D. 200), in its tractate Miqwa'ot, codified the regulations, including the size of immersion pools to permit submerging the whole body. The discovery of scores of miqwa'ot in Israel of pre-A.D. 70 date, including many adjoining the Temple Mount, confirm that these later regulations were observed in Jesus' time.

The Qumran community observed a daily bath for purification. The DSS stressed a righteous life to accompany the physical cleansing by water. It may be that the first bath of a new member had a special meaning, but it cannot be proved that this had an initiatory significance. The Damascus Document, similar to the Mishnah later, requires that "No person shall bathe in dirty water or in an amount too shallow to cover a person" (CD-A X, 10-14). The stepped pools at Qumran likely served for ritual bathing, and the stepless cisterns stored water and had other uses (see Dead Sea Scrolls; Essenes).

Later sources speak of several baptizing groups among the Jews, but all appear to have originated post-A.D. 70.

Nor can proselyte baptism be confirmed before A.D. 70. Sources that speak of conversion to Judaism prior to this date make no mention of it. The later rabbinic formulation of the conversion ceremony required circumcision, immersion and sacrifice at the temple. The central rite was circumcision of males; this circumstance meant that the subsequent immersion acquired a special significance for female converts. This immersion probably was rooted in the earlier ceremonial cleansings, but when it became an initiatory act, it was given a moral meaning as a symbol of new life.

3. Practice of John the Baptist.

Early Christians saw the immediate antecedent to their practice of baptism in the activity of *John the Baptist. He is identified in the Gospels as John “the baptizer” (ho baptizōn, “the one who immerses” [Mk 6:14, 24]) or more commonly John “the baptist” (ho baptistēs [Mt 3:1; Mk 6:25; Lk 7:20]). This was a distinguishing title because unlike the Jewish washings, which were self-immersions, John administered baptism to others.

Mark’s account of John the Baptist is the briefest in the Gospels, but he gives the important information that John preached a “repentance baptism for the forgiveness of sins” (Mk 1:4), the people “were baptized by him in the river Jordan, confessing their sins” (Mk 1:5), and he declared, “I baptized you in water,” but that the one who coming after him “will baptize you in the Holy Spirit” (Mk 1:8).

Matthew adds to these points the necessity of repentance in view of the near approach of the *kingdom of heaven (Mt 3:2) and the coming wrath (Mt 3:7), and that the stronger one coming after John would baptize “in the Holy Spirit and fire” (Mt 3:11). This last phrase has been subject to a variety of interpretations. The context (Mt 3:10, 12 // Lk 3:9, 17) suggests that the fire refers to *judgment and punishment. Luke identifies the baptism in the Holy Spirit with the overwhelming power of the Holy Spirit resulting from his coming at Pentecost (Acts 1:5; 2:1-4) and to the household of Cornelius (Acts 10:44-48; 11:15-17). Since grammatically the two elements are linked, perhaps we can think of a baptism inaugurated in the Spirit and consummated in fire.

Luke’s account of John’s preaching is the fullest of the Synoptic Gospels, but he does not add to the description of his baptism (Lk 3:1-20). He does later add a strong endorsement of the divine authority behind John’s baptism: “And all the people and the tax collectors who heard this acknowledged the righteousness of God by being baptized with John’s baptism; but the Pharisees and the lawyers rejected God’s will for them by not being baptized by him” (Lk 7:29-30; cf. Lk 20:4).

The Fourth Gospel elaborates on John’s testimony to Jesus (Jn 1:19-37; cf. Jn 1:6-8; 3:27-30). Although it locates John’s baptizing on the east bank of the Jordan (Jn 1:28; 3:26; 10:40), it identifies another place: “John was also baptizing at Aenon near Salim because there were abundant waters there” (Jn 3:23). The Fourth Gospel alone informs us that Jesus and his disciples also engaged in a baptizing ministry alongside John’s (Jn 3:22, 26; 4:1-2). The discussion between the disciples of John and a Jew (or Jews) concerning purification (Jn 3:25) suggests that the purpose of John’s baptism was a different kind of purification from that practiced by Jews.

Josephus’s account of John the Baptist complements the NT texts in most respects, but on one point he contradicts them: “[John, called the Baptist] was a good man and exhorted the Jews to lead righteous lives, practice righteousness toward one another and piety toward God, and so to come together for baptism [baptismos]. In his view this was a necessary preliminary if baptism [baptis, ‘dipping’] was to be acceptable to God. They must not use it to gain pardon for whatever sins they committed, but for the purity of the body, since the soul was already thoroughly cleansed by right behavior” (Josephus, Ant. 18.116-17).

Josephus’s words imply that he knew the explanation given in the Gospels of the purpose of John’s baptism. He rather interprets John’s practice by what he knew of Jewish, and especially Essene, views of purity. The accounts in the Synoptic Gospels are to be preferred as earlier sources and as derived from those with firsthand contact with John’s ministry. Against the argument that their wording was conformed to Christian teaching, it may be replied that since there was competition between the disciples of John and the disciples of Jesus, the latter would more likely have exaggerated the differences than made them agree.

John’s baptism had in common with Jewish washings the practice of immersion, the motif of cleansing, and the application to Jews. It differed in being an administered immersion, a one-time act (like proselyte baptism except not for non-Jews), requiring repentance and offering forgiveness of sins, and providing eschatological rather than ceremonial cleansing. John’s baptism was like Christian baptism in these points, but it differed in being accompanied by a confession of sins rather than a confession of faith (he taught believing in one to come rather than in one who has come), not being done in the name of Jesus, and not offering the Holy Spirit (Acts 19:2-5).

4. Jesus’ Baptism.

The historicity of Jesus’ baptism by John is undeniable. The identification of the one proclaimed *Son of God with the movement led by a lesser figure would not have been invented, and the submission by one claimed to be sinless to a rite associated with *forgiveness of sins could only be an embarrassment.

Mark's account is brief, conveying only the essential facts: "Jesus came from Nazareth of Galilee and was baptized into the Jordan by John. And immediately as he was coming up out of the water he saw the heavens split open and the Spirit descending as a dove into him. And a voice came out of heaven, 'You are my beloved son, in you I am well pleased'" (Mk 1:9-11). The descent of the Spirit may recall creation (Gen 1:2) or the return of the dove to Noah's ark (Gen 8:8-11). The words from heaven echo Genesis 22:2; Psalm 2:7; Isaiah 42:1.

Luke is even briefer on Jesus' baptism (Lk 3:21-22), but he adds three details: Jesus praying at his baptism, the addition of "Holy" to "Spirit," and the Spirit's coming "in bodily form." For Luke, the coming of the Holy Spirit was Jesus' anointing as the Messiah (Lk 4:16-21; Acts 10:38) (see Christ).

Matthew has the fullest account of the baptism of Jesus (Mt 3:13-17). His distinctive concern is the problem posed by Jesus coming for baptism by John, who protests that he needs to be baptized by Jesus, to which Jesus replies, "It is fitting for us to fulfill all righteousness." With these words, Jesus accepted his mission to bring the *righteousness of God by submitting in obedience to the divine will. Hence, later patristic interpreters saw the baptism as Jesus' identification with sinful humanity (also reflected in early Christian art by showing Jesus as a smaller figure than John, in reverse of their respective importance) and his offering himself as an example of obedience.

The Gospel of John only alludes to the baptism of Jesus and indicates that the baptism was to reveal Jesus to *Israel (Jn 1:29-34). The declaration that Jesus "takes away the sin of the world" and will baptize "in the Holy Spirit" brings together two basic characteristics of the Christian age.

The indications are that the baptism of Jesus was by immersion. This accords with the meaning of the words, the contemporary Jewish practice, and the circumstantial details in the narratives. The Synoptic accounts bring together the voice of God, the descent of the Spirit, and the sonship of Jesus (a trinitarian dimension represented in early Christian art by the hand of God in the sky, the dove of the Holy Spirit, and Jesus in the water). That Jesus himself was baptized and that he and his disciples practiced baptism readily accounts for the disciples in the post-resurrection period administering baptism to converts to Jesus.

5. Metaphorical Use of the Language of Baptism.

Words from the bapt- root had several metaphorical uses in reference to being overwhelmed by something. Jesus makes an important metaphorical use of baptism in reference to his death: "Jesus said to them [James and John], . . . 'Are you able to drink the cup which I drink or to be baptized with the baptism with which I am baptized?'" They said to him, 'We are able.' And Jesus said to them, "The cup which I drink you will drink, and the baptism with which I am baptized you will be baptized'" (Mk 10:38-39 [cf. Lk 12:50]). He was referring to being overwhelmed, submerged in suffering. This saying was the basis for later Christian writers referring to martyrdom as a baptism.

6. Two Texts Important for the Future.

Jesus, in explaining the begetting "from above" (or "anew") to Nicodemus (Jn 3:3), a ruler of the Jews, said, "Unless begotten of water and Spirit, a person is unable to enter the kingdom of God" (Jn 3:5). Many evangelical scholars deny that water here refers to water baptism, but the early church thought otherwise. Indeed, John 3:5 was the most frequently quoted baptismal text in the second century A.D., not to minimize the place of the Spirit, but rather understanding the Spirit to work in connection with the water of baptism.

The Great Commission, in Matthew 28:18-20, was the foundation text for early Christian baptismal practice: "All authority was given me in heaven and upon the earth. Go, therefore, and instruct all the nations, baptizing them into the name of the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit, teaching them to observe everything I commanded you" (cf. Mk 16:15-16, in the longer ending of that Gospel). Since the trinitarian words are absent from most (but not all) of the quotations of the passage in Eusebius of Caesarea, some have argued that it was a later addition to the Gospel. Its presence in all other witnesses to the text of Matthew make it likely that Eusebius abbreviated his quotation when his concern was with the universality of the gospel or the necessity of obedience to Jesus' teaching but included the words when explicitly concerned with the Trinity. "Into the name of" in Greek usage carried the idea of "into the ownership or possession" of someone, but the equivalent Hebrew phrase meant "with reference to," defining the purpose of the act. The phrase may have been descriptive of the nature of Christian baptism, but it soon became the framework of the candidate's baptismal confession of faith and/or a formula pronounced by the administrator of baptism.

See also JOHN THE BAPTIST.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. G. R. Beasley-Murray, Baptism in the New Testament (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1962); G. Dellings, “Βάπτισμα βαπτισθῆναι,” NovT 2 (1958) 92-115; idem, Die Taufe im Neuen Testament (Berlin: Evangelische Verlagsanstalt, 1963); E. Ferguson, Baptism in the Early Church: History, Theology, and Liturgy in the First Five Centuries (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2009); L. Hartman, “Into the Name of the Lord Jesus”: Baptism in the New Testament (SNTW; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1997); D. Hellholm, et al., eds., Ablution, Initiation, and Baptism: Late Antiquity, Early Judaism, and Early Christianity, 3 vols. (Beihefte ZNTW 176; Berlin: Walter de Gruyter, 2011); R. Jensen, Baptismal Imagery in Early Christianity: Ritual, Visual, and Theological Dimensions (Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2012); J. D. Lawrence, Washing in Water: Trajectories of Ritual Bathing in the Hebrew Bible and Second Temple Literature (SBLAB 23; Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature, 2006); S. Légasse, Naissance du baptême (LD 153; Paris: Cerf, 1993); K. McDonnell, The Baptism of Jesus in the Jordan: The Trinitarian and Cosmic Order of Salvation (Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1996); A. Oepke, “βάπτω, βαπτίζω, κτλ.,” TDNT 1:529-46; R. L. Webb, John the Baptizer and Prophet: A Socio-Historical Study (JSNTSup 62; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1991). E. Ferguson

BAPTIST, JOHN THE. See JOHN THE BAPTIST.

BEATITUDES. See BLESSING AND WOE; SERMON ON THE MOUNT/PLAIN.

BELIEF. See FAITH.

BELOVED DISCIPLE

“Beloved Disciple” is the commonly used title for the *disciple referred to by the Johannine narrator as “the disciple [mathētēs] whom Jesus loved [agapāō/phileō]” (Jn 13:23; 19:26; 20:2; 21:7, 20).

1. The Appropriateness of the Title
2. The “Other Disciple”
3. The Johannine Contexts of Use
4. The Significance of the Apparent Ending at John 20:30-31
5. The Role of the Beloved Disciple in the Epilogue
6. Identifying the Beloved Disciple

1. The Appropriateness of the Title.

Although convenient, the title obscures the connection to people described as loved by Jesus: “him [Lazarus] whom you [Jesus] love [phileis]” (Jn 11:3);

“see how he [Jesus] loved [ephilei] him [Lazarus]” (Jn 11:36); “Jesus loved [ēgapa] Martha, her sister, and Lazarus” (Jn 11:5). The overlap in these references suggests that phileō and agapāō are used without distinction. This is important for the assessment of the reference to “the disciple whom Jesus loved” in John 20:2, where phileō is used. As in other contexts in John, these two verbs are used interchangeably of the Beloved Disciple. What distinguishes the Beloved Disciple from others said to be loved by Jesus is that this disciple is not named, while those said to be loved by Jesus are named but not called disciples. The narrator’s reference to Jesus “having loved [agapēsas] his own who were in the world, he loved [ēgapēsen] them to the end” (Jn 13:2) further complicates the issue. The use of mathētēs in John includes, but probably is not restricted to, the Twelve (see Jn 4:1; 6:60-61, 66). In John 13:2 Jesus’ love for “his own” appears to be a reference to the wider group of disciples. One specific disciple is identified as “the disciple whom Jesus loved.” Does this disciple belong to the narrow group or to the wider group? Is “disciple” a reference to those who leave all to follow Jesus, like the Twelve, but a slightly broader group? Are the “two other disciples,” not identified in John 21:2, numbered with the Twelve? Probably not, since otherwise they would have been identified. If the observation concerning disciples as “followers” is valid, it excludes those named, and said to be loved by Jesus, because they are not described as disciples but rather are portrayed as supporters whom Jesus visits. Because the Beloved Disciple cannot be Peter, he must be one of the other six disciples mentioned in John 21:2.

2. The “Other Disciple.”

In John 20:2 Mary Magdalene, finding the empty tomb, “runs and comes to Simon Peter and to the other disciple whom Jesus loved [pros tonallon mathētēn hon ephilei ho Iēsous].” The interchangeability of hon ephilei in John 20:2 and hon ēgapa in John 13:23 is confirmed by a broader study of John’s Gospel (cf., e.g., Jn 3:35 [agapā] with Jn 5:20 [philei]). With this variation, John 20:2 also introduces tonallon mathētēn, “the other disciple.” The definite article is made necessary because he is not just “another” disciple, but rather “the other disciple whom Jesus loved.” The reference marks a pairing of Peter and this other disciple.

Already in John 13:23 the Beloved Disciple is portrayed in dialogue with Peter. John 20:2 portrays a second appearance with Peter. The connection between the two is found also in John 21:7, 20. Peter is absent only from John 19:26, where the Beloved Disciple is paired with the mother of Jesus beside the cross. From the cross Jesus says to his mother, "Woman, behold your son," and to the Beloved Disciple, "Behold your mother." One might have supposed that in this reference the oldest son handed responsibility of care for his mother to Jacob (James), probably the oldest of his siblings (see Tabor), and there is some support for identifying Judah, another sibling. In each incident the Beloved Disciple appears as a foil for another character in the narrative.

Because the Beloved Disciple is called "the other disciple" in relation to Peter in John 20:2, it has been suggested that he is the unnamed disciple alongside Andrew (Jn 1:35-42). Although there he is not called "the other disciple," John 1:41 indicates that Andrew "first" (prōton) found his brother (Simon Peter), which might imply that the unnamed disciple then found his brother, making a comparable scene to the call of the two sets of brothers in the Synoptics (Mk 1:16-20 par.). While possible, the case is weak because the Beloved Disciple makes his first explicit appearance only in John 13:23.

Similarly, in John 18:15-16 Peter and "another disciple" (allon mathētēn) follow Jesus to the house of the high priest, and because "the other disciple" (ho mathētēs ho allos) was known to the high priest, they gain access. Two aspects of the narrative favor identification with the Beloved Disciple. First, there is the appearance alongside Peter. Second, there is an explicit reference to "the other disciple." Against the identification is the absence of reference to the Beloved Disciple and the initial reference to "another disciple" who is subsequently called "the other disciple" to distinguish him from Peter, not to identify the Beloved Disciple. In John 18:15 the reader has not been alerted to the relationship of this language to the reference to the Beloved Disciple in John 20:2. But at least here the reference occurs after the appearance of the Beloved Disciple and in a contexts where his continuing presence would not be surprising.

3. The Johannine Contexts of Use.

The Beloved Disciple first appears in John 13:23. Consequently, the role of the Beloved Disciple during the ministry of Jesus is restricted to *Jerusalem and the last week. This observation fits within the Judean/Jerusalem orientation of this Gospel in contrast to the Synoptics. The perspective is strengthened if the Beloved Disciple is identified with the other disciple with Peter in John 18:15-16.

This disciple seems to have been favorably known to the high priest, implying a Jerusalem base.

The Beloved Disciple is present in a privileged position at the meal (Jn 13:23), reclining in the same relation to Jesus as monogenēs theos to the Father (in Jn 1:18). In the next Beloved Disciple episode he is present with the mother of Jesus (not named in John) and, with her, is addressed by Jesus from the cross (Jn 19:26-27). Although not made explicit, it can only be the Beloved Disciple in John 19:35 who sees the spear thrust into the side of the already dead Jesus and the effusion of water and blood. This he has seen and borne witness to, "and his witness is true, and he knows that he speaks truth, that you [pl.] also may believe" (see the authorial conclusion at Jn 20:31, which shares the final words, hina hymeis pisteu[s]ēte, including the same textual variant on the tense of the verb). This might imply already that the Beloved Disciple has an authorial role in this Gospel.

The final reference to the Beloved Disciple before the epilogue (Jn 21) is in John 20:2-10. It is to Peter and the other disciple whom Jesus loved that Mary Magdalene runs upon finding the stone rolled away and the body of Jesus gone from the tomb (see Resurrection). Although the Beloved Disciple outruns Peter, he does not enter until Peter first goes in. Only then does "the other disciple" go in. He apparently sees what Peter saw, but it is said only of him that "he saw and believed." It is not said what he believed. It might be implied that he believed what Mary told them, "They have taken the body." But this meaning fits neither the singling out of the Beloved Disciple as one who believed nor the Johannine use of "believed" in this context. But the next verse notes that "they did not yet know the scripture that he must rise from the dead," which seems to rule out belief that Jesus was risen. However, it might mean that the event created belief that led to the finding of the scriptural foreshadowing/prediction. Some such meaning seems to be demanded by the contrast of the Beloved Disciple with Peter.

4. The Significance of the Apparent Ending at John 20:30-31.

If John's Gospel ended with John 20, readers probably would consider John 20:30-31 to be an appropriate conclusion. It expresses the message and purpose of John's Gospel in a memorable and compelling way. Nevertheless, there is no textual evidence that the book ever circulated without John 21. It is possible that John's Gospel was published/circulated only after the death of the Beloved Disciple. This may be implied by John 21:23 in conjunction with John 21:24–25. First, the death of the Beloved Disciple made it necessary to clarify that Jesus had not said that the Beloved Disciple would survive until he returned. Then, the concluding words of those who eventually published John's Gospel attest the faithful witness of the Beloved Disciple embodied in it. It seems clear that these words are meant to identify the Beloved Disciple as the substantive author. If this is true, it may be that these "editors" added the reference to the Beloved Disciple to the body of this Gospel because, although not impossible, it seems unlikely an author would refer to himself in these terms. The overlap of John 19:35 with the wording of John 20:31 may imply that the Beloved Disciple is the author, and this becomes more or less explicit in John 21.

5. The Role of the Beloved Disciple in the Epilogue.

Inexplicably, after the two overwhelming appearances of the risen Jesus to the gathered disciples, John 21 returns to *Galilee and a fishing expedition with seven of the disciples on the Sea of Galilee. Three are named (Simon Peter, Thomas, Nathanael), two are identified as the sons of Zebedee, and another two are not identified. One of these, who cannot be Peter, is identified as the Beloved Disciple, who is the first to recognize Jesus on the seashore and announce it to the others in the boat (John 21:7). Later, the Beloved Disciple becomes the subject of discussion between Jesus and Peter (Jn 21:20–23) in a way that clarifies a misunderstanding. If the Beloved Disciple was the author of John 1–20, that would account for the attestation of the reliability of his witness in John 21:23–24. But this is paradoxical in that anonymous witnesses attest the reliability of the Beloved Disciple, who is implicitly an authoritative witness, and may suggest that this authoritative figure within the Johannine narrative was as anonymous to its first readers as it is to readers today.

6. Identifying the Beloved Disciple.

John 21 implies that the Beloved Disciple is one of seven disciples. Peter is excluded, and of the other four who are known, only James the brother of John has not been proposed as Beloved Disciple. Because there were also two unidentified disciples, the list has been expanded to include other members of the Twelve and beyond. Among the Twelve are John, Philip, Nathanael, Andrew, Thomas and Matthias, who replaced Judas. Beyond the Twelve are, for example, Lazarus, Paul, John Mark, and John the Elder. H. Waetjen thinks that the Beloved Disciple was *Lazarus in John 1–20, but John in John 21. The case for none of these can be considered strong, and it is made more complex by the uncertain status of John 21. Is it an integral part of John's Gospel, or is it an epilogue added by other hands to send it on its way after the death of the author? The latter seems probable because it is unlikely that the author would refer to himself as the "Beloved Disciple." That designation may have been added to the body of this Gospel at the same time as the epilogue, which explicitly identifies him as the author, though this may be implied by John 19:35; 20:31. Even this leaves the Beloved Disciple and the authorship of this Gospel anonymous.

This Gospel was published under the name of John (kata Iōannēn), though the date of the titles of the Gospels is uncertain. It is unclear whether the identification of the Beloved Disciple as John was influenced by the title, or whether the title is a consequence of the identification. John the son of Zebedee was one of the seven disciples of John 21. There might have been another John, one of the two unnamed disciples. Irenaeus was of the view that John the son of Zebedee was the Beloved Disciple and author of this Gospel (Haer. 3.1.1). This part of Irenaeus's view was not questioned, by Eusebius, but he used his reading of Papias (Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 3.39) to argue that a second John, John the Elder, wrote the book of Revelation. Some recent scholars reverse that judgment to argue that John the Elder wrote this Gospel, a view that has no ancient support. The anonymity of the Beloved Disciple has led to the treatment of this figure as an ideal or symbol (Bauckham, 73–92), but this case is weakened by the way the Beloved Disciple is a foil for Peter and the mother of Jesus. It is difficult to know what to make of this intentional anonymity.

See also APOSTLE; DISCIPLES AND DISCIPLESHP; JOHN, GOSPEL OF.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. C. K. Barrett, The Gospel According to St. John: An Introduction with Commentary and Notes on the Greek Text (2nd ed.; Philadelphia: Westminster, 1978); R. Bauckham, The Testimony of the Beloved Disciple: Narrative, History, and Theology in the Gospel of John (Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2007); J. H. Charlesworth, The Beloved Disciple: Whose Witness Validates the Gospel of John? (Valley Forge, PA: Trinity Press International, 1995); R. A. Culpepper, John the Son of Zebedee: The Life of a Legend (Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1994) 56–88; V. Eller, The Beloved Disciple: His Name, His Story, His Thought (Grand Rapids:

Eerdmans, 1987); P. S. Minear, “The Beloved Disciple in the Gospel of John: Some Clues and Conjectures,” NovT 19 (1977) 105-23; idem, “The Original Function of John 21,” JBL 102 (1983) 85-98; idem, John: The Martyr’s Gospel (New York: Pilgrim Press, 1984); J. D. Tabor, The Jesus Dynasty: The Hidden History of Jesus, His Royal Family, and the Birth of Christianity (New York: Simon & Schuster); H. C. Waetjen, The Gospel of the Beloved Disciple: A Work in Two Editions (New York: T & T Clark International, 2005). J. Painter

BENEDICTUS. See SONGS AND HYMNS.

BENEFACTION, BENEFACITOR. See ECONOMICS.

BETHANY. See ARCHEOLOGY AND GEOGRAPHY.

BETHANY BEYOND THE JORDAN. See ARCHEOLOGY AND GEOGRAPHY.

BETHESDA. See ARCHEOLOGY AND GEOGRAPHY.

BETHLEHEM. See ARCHEOLOGY AND GEOGRAPHY.

BETHPHAGE. See ARCHEOLOGY AND GEOGRAPHY.

BETHSAIDA. See ARCHEOLOGY AND GEOGRAPHY.

BIOGRAPHY, ANCIENT. See GOSPEL: GENRE.

BIRTH AND INFANCY GOSPELS. See GOSPELS: APOCRYPHAL.

BIRTH OF JESUS

The NT contains two narratives of the birth and early childhood of Jesus, in Matthew 1:18–2:23 and Luke 1:5–2:40. Beginning in the late second century, writers sought to supplement the limited information in Matthew and Luke by composing “infancy gospels” such as the Protevangelium of James, the Infancy Story of Thomas, and, derived largely from the latter, the Arabic Infancy Gospel (Clivaz et al., 418-587; Cullmann; Elliott 1993, 46-122) (see Gospels: Apocryphal). These writings present Jesus the infant prodigy and (often vindictive) miracle worker, Mary the perpetual virgin and Joseph the widower who was father to other sons, among other things. As for their historical value, O. Cullmann writes, “The further away we move in time from the beginnings, the more unrestrained becomes the application to Jesus of what is recounted about the birth and infancy of sons of gods and children of supernatural origin” (Cullmann, 416-17).

The retelling of the canonical birth stories in celebration of Christmas has tended to obscure the uniqueness of the story as presented in each Gospel, resulting in the loss of some of the richness of their contribution to each Gospel’s overall message. The differences between the two birth narratives should not be overemphasized, as they essentially tell the same story; P. MacDonald has compiled a list of twenty-three features common to both stories (MacDonald; see also Brown 1993, 34-35; Fitzmyer 1989, 35-36). Yet each birth story also contains many unique elements, which serve to communicate a distinct message. Matthew’s account focuses on Joseph, while Luke’s focuses on Mary. Matthew alone mentions the star, the magi, Herod plotting against Jesus, the slaughter of the children in Bethlehem and the family’s flight to Egypt; Luke alone reports the stories of Elizabeth and Zechariah, *John the Baptist’s birth, the census that brings Joseph and Mary to Bethlehem, the visit of the shepherds, Jesus’ presentation in the temple and the hymns: the Benedictus, the Magnificat and the Nunc Dimittis.

These differences suggest that Luke and Matthew are based on different sources, and more importantly they highlight that each evangelist chose what material to include in his narrative, and how to edit and arrange it, in keeping with his own unique purposes. As the introductions to their respective Gospels, the birth stories provide the reader with privileged information for understanding the purpose of each narrative, including the seeds of the most important themes that they will develop and the key to understanding these themes (Hooker; Fitzmyer 1989, 29-30; Kahl, 88).

1. Matthew’s Birth Narrative
2. Luke’s Birth Narrative
3. The Date of Jesus’ Birth: Reconciling Luke 1 and Luke 2
4. The Virginal Conception

1. Matthew’s Birth Narrative.

1.1. Matthew and the Scriptures of Israel.

1.1.1. Formula Quotations. Matthew’s birth narrative seeks to tie Jesus’ story to the story of the OT, and a distinctive way that it does so is through the use of five formula quotations. Each quotation draws attention to the OT connection by a phrase such as “all this took place in order to fulfill.” The location of these quotations in Matthew, and the OT text to which they refer, are set out in Table 1.

Table 1. Old Testament Quotations in Matthew 1–2

Event	Matthew	OT Scripture
Jesus' conception and naming	1:22–23	Isaiah 7:14
Jesus' birth in Bethlehem	2:5b–6	Micah 5:2; 2 Samuel 5:2
Flight to Egypt	2:15	Hosea 11:1
Slaughter of the innocents	2:17–18	Jeremiah 31:15
Return to Nazareth	2:23	Isaiah 11:1 (?)

By tying details of Jesus' birth and early childhood to the OT in this way, Matthew shows the unity of God's plan (Mayordomo, 279). Although the formula quotations may have also served a polemical function (i.e., to aid Jesus followers of Jewish descent to defend their faith before those who had remained in the synagogue), their primary function was didactic. Each communicates a distinct aspect of Jesus' identity in relation to God's promises found in the OT.

1.1.1.1. Jesus' Conception and Naming (Mt 1:22–23) and Isaiah 7:14. The MT of Isaiah 7:14 promises that a "young woman" (Heb. almâ) will conceive and bear a child named "Emmanuel," as a sign to King Ahaz of Judah that God would deliver him from his enemies. Reading the LXX translation of this text typologically, Matthew shows that Jesus' conception and birth follow the pattern of the events in Isaiah but give them a fuller expression (Hamilton, 241): (1) the Greek parthenos cited from the LXX points to Mary's being not just a young woman but a virgin, so that Jesus' conception implies God's miraculous intervention; (2) the child's name, "Jesus," means "savior," who will save his people not from a military threat but "from their sins" (Mt 1:21); (3) although his name is not "Emmanuel," meaning "God with us," Jesus is indeed God with us, so that what in Isaiah functioned as a sign in Matthew becomes reality. "God with us" is a central theme of Matthew's narrative (Viviano 2011a, 393), and its use here invites the reader to become a part of those who "call" Jesus "Emmanuel" (Mayordomo, 273).

1.1.1.2. Jesus' Birth in Bethlehem (Mt 2:5b–6) and Micah 5:2. Matthew has made some changes in citing his OT source. Bethlehem is no longer "of Ephratha" but "in the land of Judah," and it is no longer "one of the little clans" but the opposite: "by no means least among the rulers." Rather than simply

"ruling" in Israel, the citation in Matthew speaks of the coming ruler "shepherding" Israel. This may allude to other texts in which God speaks of David as the shepherd of his people (2 Sam 5:2; 1 Chron 11:3) in order to reinforce Matthew's presentation of Jesus as Davidic king (Muñoz Iglesias 1990b, 255–58).

1.1.1.3. Flight to Egypt (Mt 2:15) and Hosea 11:1. Matthew takes advantage of an opportunity to make a christological statement. His narrative has just placed Jesus in Egypt (Mt 2:13–15a) so that God could call him from there (Mt 2:19–21), and he is God's *Son in a more unique way than were the people of Israel in Hosea 11:1 (Muñoz Iglesias 1990b, 31–32, 282–87). This comparison between Jesus and *Israel begins a theme that will continue in Matthew's Gospel (e.g., Mt 4:1–11) (Mayordomo, 276). The quotation from Hosea also serves Matthew's aim of presenting Jesus as the new *Moses; the author expects the reader to set the story of Moses and the exodus next to the story of Jesus that he is narrating and work to find in what ways they are similar (Allison 1993, 140–41) (see further under 1.1.2 below).

1.1.1.4. Slaughter of the Innocents (Mt 2:17–18) and Jeremiah 31:15. The quotation in Matthew is related to Herod's having the male infants in and around Bethlehem put to death. The text in Jeremiah has to do with the absence of the exiles from Israel, who have marched off to Babylon (France, 245). Matthew's reader is probably meant to consider the wider context of Jeremiah 31:15, which has to do with hope and joy, promises of restoration from *exile and new covenant (Jer 31:1–40). Jeremiah 31:15 functions within Jeremiah 31 primarily as a contrasting prelude to the next lines: "Thus says the LORD: Keep your voice from weeping, and your eyes from tears; for there is a reward for your work, says the LORD: they shall come back from the land of the enemy; there is hope for your future, says the LORD: your children shall come back to their own country" (Jer 31:16–17 NRSV). In reading Matthew 2:18, perhaps one is meant to recognize the emphasis on comfort and joy, restoration and new covenant in the wider context of Jeremiah 31:15, and apply this to the story of the arrival of Jesus (France, 246). If so, this fulfillment quotation would serve a christological function: Jesus is the one through whom God is bringing about the fulfillment of his promises of comfort and joy, restoration and new covenant (Erickson).

1.1.1.5. Return to Nazareth (Mt 2:23) and Isaiah 11:1. The citation formula speaks of "prophets," in the plural rather than singular, and this may indicate that Matthew does not cite any specific prophet, or that he refers to the general witness of more than one (Brown 1993, 208). Which OT text is alluded to here is much debated, as is the meaning of “Nazorean” applied to Jesus (see Nazarene). The most likely options are that “Nazorean” (1) is derived from the name “Nazareth”; (2) refers to one consecrated as a Nazirite; (3) signifies the promised messianic nēšer (“branch”) from Isaiah 11:1 (Brown 1993, 209–13). Possibly all of these meanings are to be combined in one’s reading of Matthew 2:23: Jesus dwelt in Nazareth prior to beginning his public ministry (Mt 4:15), he was consecrated to God from the womb (Mt 1:21; cf. Judg 13:3b, 5b), and he is “Emmanuel” (Mt 1:23), the very branch (nēšer) that, according to Isaiah 7:14, was to bloom from the root of Jesse in Isaiah 11:1 (Brown 1993, 212, 223–25). Matthew 2:23 is not just about the provenance of the Messiah (Stendahl), but about who the Messiah is (see Christ): Matthew appears to be playing on words to underline the central christological point that Jesus, as the rightful heir of David (the main point of Mt 1:1–17), is “God with us” (“Emmanuel”) (see Son of David).

1.1.2. Moses Typology. Matthew’s interest in tying his narrative to Israel’s Scriptures is also clear from its extensive use of Moses *typology (Allison 1993). For Matthew, God guides history for his redemptive ends, as evidenced in a pattern of type (Moses) followed by antitype (Jesus). This pattern comes to the fore in the birth story, which is “permeated by Mosaic motifs” (Allison 1993, 140): (1) The explicit citation in Matthew 2:15, “Out of Egypt have I called my son,” prepares the reader to interpret Matthew 1–2 in light of the story of Moses and Israel’s exodus from Egypt. (2) The circumstances surrounding the birth story of Jesus in Matthew 2 are strikingly similar to those of Moses’ birth story in Exodus 1; 4 and its interpretations in Jewish tradition (Josephus, Philo, and rabbinic literature), are strikingly similar: a king gives the order to kill all male children in the area where the child is born because he has learned of the birth of Israel’s liberator from chief priests, scribes and magi/scribes or chief magicians, as foretold by magi. Both kings are troubled at the announcement of the birth of a savior; both infants are providentially delivered from the rulers who seek to kill them; both are forced to leave their homeland. After the death of the rulers the Lord commands Moses and Joseph to return to their homeland, given that those seeking the death of Moses/Jesus have died, after which they return with their families. (3) Other considerations add to the pattern of type and antitype in the stories of Moses and Jesus: Matthew 1–2 and Exodus 2; 4 share several key words and phrases; Matthew follows the basic narrative pattern of the Moses story common in Jewish sources such as Josephus and later rabbinic literature; the history of interpretation of Matthew 1–2 has used the parallelism between Jesus’ story and that of Moses and the exodus; and Matthew has arranged and edited the tradition behind Matthew 1–2 so as to enhance the parallel features (Allison 1993, 140–65).

By this use of Moses typology, Matthew provides his community with an identity rooted in the history of Israel and in the consistency of God’s work. By presenting Jesus as the new Moses, he shows that Jesus is in fundamental continuity with the Jewish tradition, so that “the new” found in Jesus is guided by “the old” found in Moses; “the old vindicates the new,” even while the new represents the completion of the old (Allison 1993, 272–74).

1.2. Anticipating Themes in the Remainder of the Gospel.

1.2.1. Jesus as Davidic King. Matthew’s birth narrative not only looks back to the OT to root the Gospel in God’s past work, but also introduces themes that will be important in the remainder of the Gospel. For example, a major theme in Matthew 2 that carries over into the remainder of the Gospel is Jesus as Davidic King (Mt 2:2, 6; also Mt 2:11 in light of Ps 45:7–9; 71:15) (see Chae). This theme is informed by two contrasts: between King *Herod and Jesus the king, and between Herod and the magi in their response to Jesus the king (Bauer; Chae, 187–88). Herod is portrayed as deceitful (Mt 2:8) and horribly violent (Mt 2:16) in asserting his power and yet powerless to thwart God’s purposes. In contrast, Jesus is both the legitimate heir to David’s throne, born to be king (Mt 2:2), and Son of God conceived by the Holy Spirit (Mt 1:18–25; 2:15). He is thus able to save his people not just from national enemies but from their sins, so that God establishes his kingship through Jesus. Unlike the violent Herod, Jesus will “shepherd [God’s] people Israel” (Mt 2:6), and unlike the arrogant Herod, Jesus is a humble king, referred to exclusively as “the child” (Mt 2:8, 9, 11, 13 [2x], 14, 20 [2x], 21) (Bauer, 309–11; Chae, 179, 244). The contrast between King Herod and the child Jesus serves to redefine the very nature of kingship: “Apparent weakness is demonstrated to be real power and demonstrable power demoted to real weakness” (Weaver, 381). The second contrast is set up between the Gentile magi, who know that one has been born “king of the Jews” (Mt 2:2), and a series of other characters: Herod and “all Jerusalem with him,” who are initially ignorant of the Messiah’s birth, and “terrified” when they hear of it, and the “chief priests and scribes of the people,” who become complicit in Herod’s violent plans by informing him of where the Messiah was to be born (Mt 2:3-6) (Bauer, 319; Weaver, 381-82). In seeking to destroy Jesus, Herod ultimately sets himself against God’s kingship, thus becoming a representative of the Jewish religious leadership that will oppose Jesus in the remainder of the Gospel, climaxing with the crucifixion (Bauer, 314-18). In seeking to *worship Jesus (Mt 2:2, 8), the magi point to the inclusion of the *Gentiles in God’s people and become paradigmatic for how Matthew’s readers are to respond to his message (Bauer, 323).

1.2.2. The Magi. The history of popular interpretation on the identity of the magi in Matthew 2:1-12 could be described as a history of imagination: they have been given names and portrayed as wise kings, their number specified as three, their races as diverse and their origin as the three continents of Asia, Africa and Europe. In reality, however, Matthew’s text provides none of this information (Fuller, 132). Against the idea of the magi as wise kings, M. Powell has argued that the Gospel’s implied readers would be expected to view the magi as lacking both royalty and wisdom, given Matthew’s implicit hostility toward both of these forms of power. What is more, reading these forms of power into the story amounts to making the magi worthy of God’s favor, which goes against the nature of the gospel itself (Powell, 136-56, 175). To this should be added that the star followed by the magi likely was neither a natural phenomenon such as a comet or a meteor (which could not “stop” over the house where Jesus was [Mt 2:9-10]) nor a celestial sign accessible to them because of their knowledge of astrology. Given that stars in antiquity were viewed as living beings, and associated closely with angels in many Jewish writings, it may be best to view the star in Matthew 2:9-10 as an angel (Allison 2005). The magi in Matthew thus represent the Gentiles with no knowledge of the Messiah who yet are drawn to him by a divine messenger, foreshadowing the important Matthean theme of the Gentile inclusion in the people of God. That they worship Jesus is also important, given the centrality of this theme to Matthew’s narrative. Found for the first time here (Mt 2:11; see also Mt 2:2, 8), worship of Jesus is also found at the conclusion of the Gospel (Mt 28:17; see also Mt 14:33; 28:9), forming an inclusio together with the identification of Jesus as “Emmanuel”/“God with us” (Mt 1:23; 28:20) that sets an example for the reader of the appropriate response to Jesus (Kim, 229-30).

2. Luke’s Birth Narrative.

2.1. Continuity with God’s Plan. Luke’s technique for bringing the OT to bear on his narrative is quite different from Matthew’s, in that it includes few explicit quotations. Instead, Luke uses an array of OT type stories, implicit allusions, echoes and motifs; even the very language of Luke 1:5—2:40 is reminiscent of Septuagintal Greek (on this last point, see Fitzmyer 1981, 114-16; Jung 2004). The three hymns—the Magnificat, the Benedictus and the Nunc Dimittis—are replete with OT allusions (Brown 1993, 358-60, 386-89, 458) (see Songs and Hymns). By these means Luke presents God personally orchestrating events to continue the one story that God has been writing, with a plot that leads through covenant promises and acts on behalf of Israel as narrated in the OT, to their culmination in the achievement of God’s purpose in the coming of the Savior Jesus (Luke) and the formation of a universal Christian movement (Acts) (Green 1994, 62-67, 82-83; Hays, 116).

2.1.1. Abraham in Luke. Luke shows great interest in how the story of Abraham sheds light on the events in his Gospel. Luke mentions *Abraham explicitly only in Mary’s Magnificat (Lk 1:55) and Zechariah’s Benedictus (Lk 1:79). As J. Green has shown, however, these two explicit mentions of the patriarch barely tap into the wealth of the use of Abraham’s story in Luke 1:5—2:52, which shows up implicitly in references to things such as Elizabeth’s barrenness (Lk 1:7 // Gen 11:30); the great age of the parents-to-be when receiving angelic visitation (Lk 1:7, 11 // Gen 17:1); the promise of a son, to be given a certain name and assigned a future role (Lk 1:13, 31 // Gen 17:16, 19); Mary’s presentation of herself as a “servant” (Lk 1:38, 48 // Gen 18:3-5); Zechariah’s questioning of the possibility of the angel’s message (Lk 1:18 // Gen 17:17; 18:11-12); the mention that nothing is impossible for God (Lk 1:37 // Gen 18:14); and the removal of Elizabeth’s disgrace together with the expression of the joy of her neighbors (Lk 1:25, 58 // Gen 21:6). In light of this multifaceted correspondence (given only partially here), and a series of linguistic overlaps between the Greek of Luke and the LXX of Genesis, one may detect an even wider series of correspondences between Luke 1—2 and Genesis 11—21 that reflects Luke’s interest in Abraham’s story (Green 1994, 67-76). “Luke has thus inscribed himself in a tradition, showing his debt to this previous story and inviting his auditors to hear in this story the reverberations and continuation of that story as he attempts to give significance to the present one. . . . As with Abraham, so now, God is working graciously and mightily to bring his purpose to fruition” (Green 1994, 77, 85).

2.1.2. Isaiah in Luke. As with Abraham, so also with Isaiah; while explicit quotations from Isaiah in Luke-Acts are few, they are placed at key moments in the narrative: at the appearances of John the Baptist, Jesus, and Stephen, and in the final scene in Acts, in which Paul quotes from Isaiah (Koet, 80). More important than the explicit quotations, however, is the way Luke interweaves Isaianic motifs throughout his two-part work (Mallen; Mittmann-Richert). This shows up in the birth story in relation to the dominating literary feature of Luke 1:5–2:52, which is the multipointed parallelism between John and Jesus (Green 1995, 51–55) (see Table 2).

Table 2. Multipointed Parallelism Between John and Jesus

John		Jesus
1:5-7	Introduction of parents	1:26-27
1:8-23	Annunciation	1:28-38
1:24-25	Mother's response	1:39-56
1:57-58	Birth	2:1-20
1:59-66	Circumcision and naming	2:21-24
1:67-79	Prophetic response	2:25-39
1:80	Child's growth	2:40-52

This parallelism could be broken down further, as exemplified by the common literary structure of the annunciations to Zechariah and to Mary (Muñoz Iglesias 1986, 6-7) (see Table 3).

Table 3. Parallel Literary Structure Between Annunciations

John		Jesus
1:5-7	Presentation of characters	1:26-27
1:8-12	Appearance of archangel Gabriel	1:28
1:13	Character's emotional response	1:29
1:13	Angel's reassuring words	1:30
1:13	Angel announces conception and name of child	1:31
1:14-17	Description of child's future role	1:32-33
1:18	Objections by character	1:34
1:19	Angel's confirming response	1:35
1:20	Angel offers miraculous proof	1:36-37

These points of parallelism invite the reader to consider how closely the stories of these two children and their parents are intertwined, guided by the principle “The greater the first [John], the greater still the second [Jesus]” (Verheyden, 160). The narrative makes clear that Jesus is primary by such devices as devoting twice as much space to Jesus as to John, the two prophetic responses to Jesus versus one to John, and the focus of attention on Mary when the two stories converge in Luke 1:39–56 (Green 1997, 51). The purpose of the parallelism, however, is not primarily to highlight Jesus’ superiority over John, but rather to show how the two figures together serve to fulfill the divine plan. The interweaving of their stories specifically serves to highlight John as Isaiah’s promised messenger who prepares the way, and Jesus as the one through whom God’s promise of *salvation is actualized, as shown later by the explicit quotations from Isaiah 40:3–5 in Luke 3:4–6 regarding John, and from Isaiah 61:1–2; 58:6 in Luke 4:18–19 regarding Jesus (Mallen, 69–78; cf. Kuhn). The Isaianic language of Simeon’s description of Jesus (Lk 2:32; see Is 42:6; 49:6) further underscores that Jesus is the one who fulfills God’s promises through Isaiah (Koet, 81–86). In this way, Luke shows that the missions of both John and Jesus are to be understood against the backdrop of salvation history found in the Scriptures and derive their significance from the ongoing story of God’s work of redemption (Green 1995, 25).

2.2. Anticipating Themes in the Remainder of the Gospel. Luke’s birth story contains most of the theological themes that will be important in the remainder of the Gospel, as well as some themes that anticipate aspects of the narrative that the reader will not encounter fully until Acts (Devillers; Turner, 140; Tyson, 109–16). For example, in Luke 2:25–35 Simeon declares that the salvation Jesus brings will be “a light of revelation for the Gentiles” (Lk 2:32), a theme fully actualized in the narrative only with the mission to the Gentiles in Acts. The birth story is no mere afterthought, however, added on in form of introduction (contra Conzelmann); rather, it is “full gospel,” showing that God’s story of salvation is taking concrete form in the here and now (Janssen and Lamb, 650; Richter Reimer, 33).

2.2.1. God’s Aim as Criterion for Division. God’s aim, and how it becomes actualized in history through the birth and ministry of Jesus, is one of the key themes that drives Luke’s narrative (Green 1995, 22–49). Given that God’s aim is accomplished through Jesus as his supreme agent, those who ally themselves with Jesus are on God’s side, while any who oppose him are against God. Seen in this light, the mention of representatives of Roman imperial power in Luke 1:5; 2:1 is not an innocuous chronological device, but rather introduces them implicitly as Jesus' opponents. That the Lord will give Jesus "the throne of his ancestor David" to "reign over the house of Jacob forever" (Lk 1:32-33) places Jesus in opposition to "Herod king of Judea" (Lk 1:5), a client-king of *Rome hated by the Jewish population for his arrogance, brutality and heavy taxation policies (see Herodian Dynasty). Likewise, that the birth of Jesus the "savior" will bring *peace (Lk 2:11-14) puts Jesus in opposition to Caesar Augustus (Lk 2:1), hailed as "savior" by his subjects due to his institution of the Pax Romana. Caesar achieved the Pax Romana, however, though conquest, terror and subjection, and he maintained it on the basis of systemic subordination and taxation; peace and war were two sides of the same coin (Horsley, 25-33, 40-49). Luke's critique of the Roman Empire, implicit already in contrasting Jesus with these figures, is aimed not at the empire's pretensions to power over the land of Israel, but rather at its "oppressive politics, its arbitrary wielding of power, its ignorance of justice for the poor, for women, for the marginalized" (Míguez, 51).

2.2.2. Salvation. As presented paradigmatically in Luke 4:14-30 and worked out in the remainder of the Gospel, God's aim through Jesus is to bring about full salvation, especially for the "poor" (see Rich and Poor). The poor in Luke are a distinct category of people characterized by their dishonorable status, their position outside circles of power and prestige, those whom the social system has turned into outsiders (Green 1995, 79-84). The theme of *justice for the poor and freedom from oppression runs through the three hymns incorporated into Luke's birth account. For example, in the Magnificat *Mary proclaims that God "has scattered the arrogant" (Lk 1:51), "he has pulled down the powerful from their thrones and lifted up the lowly" (Lk 1:52), "those who hunger he has filled with good things, and those who prosper he has sent away empty" (Lk 1:53).

Luke is not, however, concerned with salvation only for the poor. A unifying theme of the entire narrative of Luke-Acts is "God's purpose to bring salvation in all of its fullness to all people" (Green 1997, 9). Luke's birth story looks forward to the fulfillment of this purpose, as when Simeon speaks of the meaning that Jesus will have for both Jews and Gentiles (Lk 2:29-32) (Tannehill, 108). This purpose is not fully realized until Acts, however, where God leads the early Christian movement to form "an egalitarian community composed of Jews, Samaritans, and Gentiles" (Green 1997, 9). Luke's narrative as a whole, with this theme of salvation at its center, extends an invitation to the reader to embrace an alternative worldview in which this age has already been revolutionized by God's reign. Salvation for Luke "is neither ethereal nor merely future, but embraces life in the present, restoring the integrity of human life, revitalizing human communities, setting the cosmos in order, and commissioning the community of God's people to put God's grace into practice among themselves and toward ever-widening circles of others. . . . Salvation embraces the totality of embodied life, including its social, economic, and political concerns" (Green 1997, 24-25).

2.2.3. Joy. Closely related to the theme of salvation in Luke is that of *joy in response to God's salvation. The idea of joy appears numerous times in Luke 1—2: John's birth is to bring joy (Lk 1:14); the child John leaps for joy in his mother's womb in response to Mary's voice (Lk 1:44); Mary is filled with joy/rejoices in God her Savior (Lk 1:47); Elizabeth's neighbors and relatives rejoice with her (Lk 1:58); and the angel announces news of great joy to the *shepherds (Lk 2:1-11) (Muñoz Iglesias 1990a, 123; 1987, 125). This theme of joy and rejoicing in God's salvation continues on in the remainder of the Gospel and into the book of Acts (Cullen).

2.2.4. Women. Luke's interest in "the poor," understood as those outside circles of power and prestige, extends to his treatment of *women. The traditional view of Luke as a champion of women and their causes has been called into question in studies that focus on how he remains bound by certain patriarchal and androcentric biases of his culture (e.g., Schaberg and Ringe). However, although Luke does remain bound in certain respects to his culture, the extent to which he presents women in ways that positively redefine and reverse their status by subverting cultural norms is remarkable (Seim 1994; 2001).

Elizabeth appears initially as a passive character, while the action focuses on her husband Zechariah (Lk 1:8-23), but Zechariah soon becomes mute, after which Elizabeth gains her voice (Lk 1:21-25). Indeed, filled with the Spirit, Elizabeth speaks with a "loud voice" (Lk 1:41-45), and becomes the spokesperson, against cultural expectations, of what the angel Gabriel had told her husband (Lk 1:13, 59-64). During the nine months of Elizabeth's pregnancy, Luke's narrative subverts the patriarchal status quo of her household by silencing the man and giving initiative to speak and act exclusively to the two women, Elizabeth and Mary, and the unborn John (Lk 1:39-56) (Kahl, 79-80). Luke also subverts the cultural understanding that Elizabeth's sterility was due to God's curse on her blameworthy life, as she is portrayed (with Zechariah) as "righteous in God's sight, observing all the commandments and regulations of the Lord blamelessly” (Lk 1:6) (Green 1995, 3-4; Janssen and Lamb, 650-51; Richter Reimer, 36-43). While Zechariah’s unbelief renders him mute (Lk 1:20), Elizabeth’s faith is indicated by her recognition that her pregnancy is a sign of the Lord’s favor, to remove her disgrace (Lk 1:25). Her stature rises further in the narrative when, inspired by the *Holy Spirit, she recognizes without a word from Mary that she too had conceived, that Mary’s child was her Lord, and that Mary had responded in faith to God (Lk 1:41-45). Finally, the important Lukan emphasis on the social aspects of salvation begins already with Elizabeth, when following John’s birth “her neighbors and relatives heard that the Lord had shown her great mercy, and they rejoiced with her” (Lk 1:58). Elizabeth’s story communicates a recurring Lukan theme: “God stands with women and will liberate the people from oppression and humiliation” (Janssen and Lamb, 650).

Mary in Luke 1—2 is portrayed not as God’s passive instrument, but rather as one who in saying yes to God becomes an active agent in God’s incarnation. As the central figure in Luke’s birth narrative, she is portrayed as meditating on the significance not only of the *mission of her son (Lk 2:19), but also of her own key role in the history of God’s work: “From now on all generations will consider me blessed, because the Mighty One has done great things for me” (Lk 1:48-49). By combining personal, active agency in cooperating with God’s work and by meditating upon the significance of God’s revolutionary actions, Mary “begins to become a theological agent in her own right” (Ruether, 32-34). While Jesus’ reading from and interpretation of Isaiah in Luke 4:16-30 is commonly recognized as programmatic for the whole Gospel, Mary’s Magnificat anticipates its themes of good news to the poor and social justice (Lk 1:51b-53). The placement of the Magnificat and its wider cotext of Luke 1:24-58 at the head of Luke’s two-part work makes it a “key” for reading the whole work in a manner that does justice to women and the poor (Kahl, 87-88).

What Luke says about Anna is brief but significant (Lk 2:36-38). Her old age implies matriarchal authority, her marriage of seven years may portray her as the ideal wife (seven viewed as the number of perfection), and she is a model of prophetic persistence, given that for many decades she “never left the temple, where she worshiped with fasting and prayer night and day” (Lk 2:37). Anna’s role as a prophet implies religious and political activity, and it is significant that she carries out this role in the *temple, the Jewish center not only of social, political and religious life, but also of eschatological expectations. It is in this light that one is to read that she “began to praise God and to speak about the child to all who were expecting the redemption of Jerusalem” (Lk 2:38). As the only person explicitly identified as a prophet in the birth story (Lk 2:36), Anna represents a model for prophetic activity in the remainder of Luke’s two-part narrative (Reid, 43-44; Janssen and Lamb, 653-54).

2.2.5. God’s Faithfulness. That God fulfills his promises is an important theme within Luke 1—2, discernible in the manner in which Luke has built hymns of praise into his narrative. Although certain influential studies have posited that the hymns fit awkwardly into their cotext (e.g., Brown 1993, 347), S. Farris has shown that they fit smoothly into the narrative as three interrelated stories that move from promise, to evidence of fulfillment, to praise response (Farris 1985, 101; cf. Dillon) (see table 4).

Table 4. Hymns as Praise Responses in Luke 1—2

	Promise	Evidence of Fulfillment	Praise Response
Zechariah	His wife will bear a son	John’s birth	Benedictus
Mary	She will conceive a special son	The unborn John bears witness to Jesus, and Elizabeth blesses Mary	Magnificat
Simeon	He will see the Messiah	He sees Jesus	Nunc Dimittis

Taken together, these hymns praise God for the evidence of his decisive intervention on behalf of his people in fulfillment of his promises. What is more, the hymns as expressions of “eschatological praise” are themselves part of the fulfillment of God’s promises (De Long, 152-78).

The Magnificat (Lk 1:46-55) speaks of the actions of God using a series of ten aorist verbs: “he has looked with favor” (Lk 1:48); “the Mighty One has done great things for me” (Lk 1:49); “he has shown might with his arm” (Lk 1:51); “he has scattered the arrogant” (Lk 1:51); “he has pulled down the powerful from their thrones and lifted up the lowly” (Lk 1:52); “those who hunger he has filled with good things, and those who prosper he has sent away empty” (Lk 1:53); and “he has helped Israel his child, remembering mercy” (Lk 1:54). It is possible to interpret these statements as reflecting prophetic confidence regarding what God will do in the eschatological future (Talbert, 27-28), but it is better to view Mary as praising God for things that have already become a reality, given that they have begun to take place with the presence of the Messiah in her womb (Farris 2001, 102; Muñoz Iglesias 1990a, 161-62). The Magnificat's first-person address to God invites the reader who also recognizes the greatness of what God has done to join with Mary in her words of thanksgiving and praise (Becker, 70-73).

That God fulfills his promises is also woven into Luke's birth narrative in other ways. For example, the details of John's birth and infancy in Luke 1:57-80 fulfill the promises contained in the annunciation by Gabriel (Lk 1:5-25) (Muñoz Iglesias 1987, 9). As promised, Elizabeth bears Zechariah a son (Lk 1:13, 57); that many would rejoice at his birth is fulfilled when Elizabeth's neighbors and relatives rejoice with her (Lk 1:14, 58); the fulfillment of the announcement that the name of the boy would be "John" is described in detail (Lk 1:13, 59-63); that Zechariah would be mute until the things that he foretold took place is fulfilled, and he is then able to speak (Lk 1:20, 64); even the promise that these things would be "fulfilled in their time" finds echo in the statement "the time came for Elizabeth to give birth" (Lk 1:20, 57); John's predicted role as precursor is taken up in Zechariah's song about the newborn's future (Lk 1:17, 76-77), the narrative having already witnessed to the fulfillment of the promise that John would be full of the Spirit even before his birth via John's reaction to Mary's voice while still within Elizabeth's womb (Lk 1:15, 41).

2.2.6. The Holy Spirit. It would be difficult to overestimate the importance of the *Holy Spirit as the driving force behind the events of Luke's birth narrative. Many reliable spokespersons speak on God's behalf under the power of the Spirit of prophecy (Lk 1:41, 67; 2:25-27; implied also in Lk 2:36-38 ["a prophet"] and in Lk 1:46-55 in light of Lk 1:35) (Turner, 143-44; Menzies, 44). The Spirit empowers *John the Baptist for his prophetic role even from before birth (Lk 1:15, 17, 80; cf. Lk 1:44). The virginal conception of Jesus results from the Spirit's coming upon Mary, so that Jesus would be called "holy" and "Son of God" (Lk 1:35). The Spirit, then, is involved at many levels within Luke's birth narrative, empowering prophetic speech about what God is doing through his Messiah, preparing the Messiah's forerunner in a unique way from before his birth, and enabling the very conception of the Messiah in a virgin so that he is uniquely God's Son (and in the texts that follow, filling him to empower him for his unique mission [Lk 3:21-22; 4:1, 14, 16-21; see also Lk

3:16]). This is not only the Spirit of prophecy, but also the Spirit of mighty works of deliverance for the redemption of Israel (Turner, 147-65, 188-266).

3. The Date of Jesus' Birth:

Reconciling Luke 1 and Luke 2.

Both Matthew and Luke contain chronological markers for the year of Jesus' birth (see Chronology): Luke 1 dates the annunciation of John the Baptist's birth during "the days of Herod King of Judea" (Lk 1:5). Jesus would have been born fifteen to sixteen months after this, since Mary's pregnancy began about six months after Elizabeth's (Lk 1:36). Given that Herod died in March or April of 4 B.C., the date of Jesus' birth, according to Luke 1, would have been no later than 3 B.C. This date matches the information in Matthew 2:1, 15-16, where Jesus' birth is also dated during Herod's reign, and in Luke 3:1, 23, according to which Jesus was about thirty in the fifteenth year of Tiberius, A.D. 27-28. These time markers are not problematic on their own, but problems do arise when one takes into account Luke 2:1-7, which ties Jesus' birth to the time of Caesar Augustus's decree that the whole world should be registered and "the first census under Quirinius as governor of Syria" (Lk 2:2). Quirinius became governor of Syria in A.D. 6 and conducted a census of Judea in A.D. 6-7, so Luke 2:1-7 would date Jesus' birth to A.D. 6-7 (Brown 1993, 547-48). There is a discrepancy of about ten years, then, between the information in Luke 2 and that in Luke 1; 3 and Matthew 2. Solutions to this problem have followed three basic approaches.

3.1. Reinterpretations of Luke 1. Some seek to reinterpret the information in Luke 1 to match that in Luke 2 (A.D. 6-7). The end of Herod the Great's reign is too securely set in history at 4 B.C. to shift it to A.D. 6-7. One theory, however, is that the Herod of Luke 1 is not Herod the Great but rather Archelaus, sometimes referred to as "Herod" ("Herod the Ethnarch" was inscribed on his coins), who reigned until A.D. 5-6 (see Herodian Dynasty). This would date Jesus' birth to A.D. 6 or later (Derrett 1975, 82-85). Archelaus is never called "Herod" either by *Josephus or in the NT, however, and there are other difficulties involved in Luke's description of the census (Brown 1993, 548-54). Another theory is that Luke united the births of John and Jesus in Luke 1-2 for theological purposes, while in reality John was born in 4-3 B.C. during the time of Herod the Great (Lk 1:5), and Jesus in A.D. 6 during the time of Quirinius's census (Lk 2:2) (Sherwin-White, 167). Both of these attempted solutions solve one problem to raise another: positing that Luke 1 supports A.D. 6 as the year of Jesus' birth brings Luke 1 into conflict with Luke 3 and Matthew 2. Given that Matthew and Luke derived their birth narratives from separate sources, one should value the independent witness of Luke 1 and Matthew 2 to Jesus' birth during the time of Herod the Great (Brown 1993, 548n3).

3.2. Reinterpretations of Luke 2. Another solution to the problem is to reinterpret the evidence of Luke 2 to match the information in Luke 1; 3 (and Mt 2:1). Quirinius's legateship in Syria in A.D. 6–7 is well enough attested to withstand any effort to move it to 3–4 B.C. (Fitzmyer 1981, 402–3). Some hold, however, that the word prōtē in Luke 2:2 should be read not in the sense of “first” but rather in the sense of “before.” Luke 2, then, would refer to a census that took place before Quirinius was governor of Syria—for example, perhaps under Herod in 7 B.C. as part of his vow of fealty to Augustus (Muñoz Iglesias 1987, 46–62). Although this meaning of the word prōtē is attested elsewhere, the grammar of the Greek of Luke 2:2 does not allow for this interpretation, and it also causes one to wonder why Luke would even mention Quirinius (Fitzmyer 1981, 401; Brown 1993, 552).

3.3. Appeals to Ancient Standards of Historiography. A third solution, and to be preferred, allows for the vagueness with which two important events in the history of Palestinian Jews would have been remembered: Herod's death in 4 B.C. and Rome's annexation of Judea in A.D. 6. This annexation followed the deposition of Archelaus and brought Quirinius to Judea “in order to make an assessment of the property of the Jews and to liquidate the estate of Archelaus” (Josephus, Ant. 18.1.2). In a time not as accustomed to exact documentation as our own, both events would serve as approximate dating for the events described in Luke. Another example of this is found in Acts 5:37, where Gamaliel speaks of “the days of the census,” referring to the well-known census under Quirinius (Syme, 600). This solution is to be preferred over the first two above because it does not impose today's standards of historiography on a first-century A.D. writer, and it avoids a forced harmonization of Luke's chronology (Syme is followed on this by Fitzmyer 1981, 404–5; Brown 1993, 554–55).

4. The Virginal Conception.

The expression “virginal conception” more accurately represents our subject matter in relation to the canonical Gospels than does “virgin birth.” Later veneration of Mary led to the idea of her perpetual virginity, as reflected in documents such as the Protevangelium of James (after A.D. 150), in which Mary remained a virgin through the birth process (i.e., Jesus' birth did not rupture the hymen) (Cullmann, 423–25, 433–34). The fourth-century triad virginitas ante partum, in partu, et post partum (“virginity before, in, and after birth”) in reference to Mary's virginity also reflects this shift in focus from *Christology to Mariology (Brown 1993, 518). This idea of “virgin birth” has no scriptural basis, but one does find in the canonical Gospels the idea of Jesus' “virginal conception” (Fitzmyer 1998, 41–42). Matthew and Luke's birth stories communicate that Jesus was conceived not via sexual union between a man and Mary, but rather by the power of the Holy Spirit.

4.1. The Gospel of Matthew. Matthew prepares the reader by means of Jesus' *genealogy (Mt 1:2–16) for what his birth narrative will say regarding Jesus' virginal conception (Mt 1:18–2:23). He does so by breaking up the pattern of the genealogy in two ways at Matthew 1:16: (1) following the overarching pattern, one would expect to read, “and Jacob the father of Joseph, and Joseph the father of Jesus”; (2) following the pattern of other women's inclusion in the genealogy (Tamar, Rahab, Ruth and the wife of Uriah [Mt 1:3, 5–6]), at Mary's inclusion one would expect to read, “Joseph the father of Jesus by Mary.” One finds neither of these readings, however, but instead, “Joseph the husband of Mary, of whom Jesus was born” (Mt 1:16). That is, Matthew does not present Joseph as Jesus' biological parent, but Mary as such, and Joseph as her husband. The genealogy in Matthew 1:2–16 seeks to establish that Jesus is the legitimate heir of David by tracing his line through the Davidic Joseph, and what follows in Matthew 1:18–25 seeks to explain how this is so even though Jesus is not biologically descended from Joseph (Kingsbury, 163–64).

The explanation Matthew offers is this: “When his [Jesus'] mother Mary had been engaged [mnēs-teuomai] to Joseph, but before they lived together, she was found to be pregnant from the Holy Spirit” (Mt 1:18). Engagement in the Palestine of Matthew's day entailed a period of time in which the woman was legally bound to the man (a bill of divorce was required to dissolve the relationship) and yet continued to live in her father's home, not engaging in sexual relations with her future husband (Luz, 93). Although “before they lived together” is a legitimate translation of the Greek prin ē synelthein autous, given the context, the equally legitimate “before they had sexual relations” is also implied. What the reader is told already in Matthew 1:18, Joseph will learn from an angel only in Matthew 1:20: the child conceived in Mary is “from the Holy Spirit.” Matthew then adds a citation from Isaiah 7:14: "All this happened in order to fulfill what had been spoken by the Lord through the prophet: 'Look! The virgin will become pregnant and give birth to a son, and they will name him Emmanuel,' which translated means, 'God is with us'" (Mt 1:22-23). As noted above, while the MT's ʾalmâ is best understood as referring to a "young woman," the LXX's parthenos, cited by Matthew, is most commonly used in the sense of "virgin," one who has never had sexual intercourse. Matthew has read the LXX of this verse typologically and found its fuller expression in God's miraculous intervention to bring about the conception of Jesus in a virgin—that is, without the participation of a male. Joseph's nonparticipation in Jesus' miraculous conception is further underscored in Matthew's conclusion to this section: Joseph, in obedience to the angel, "took [Mary] as his wife, but had no sexual relations with her until she had given birth to a son; and he named him Jesus" (Mt 1:24-25). This serves to answer the question left open by the genealogy in Matthew 1:2-16: how is Jesus the legitimate heir of David if he is not his biological descendant? The answer is that Jesus, though conceived by the power of the Spirit in a virgin not descended from David, is Son of David by adoption, given that the Davidic Joseph fulfilled what the law required for this by taking Jesus' mother as his wife and by naming her child (Brown 1993, 138-39).

4.2. The Gospel of Luke. Luke's birth narrative emphasizes the virginal conception even more than Matthew's, as can be seen already when it twice mentions that Mary is a virgin (parthenos) before giving her name (Lk 1:27). Like Matthew, Luke notes that Mary was engaged (mnēsteuomai) to Joseph (Lk 1:27), implying that they are legally bound to one another, but not yet living together or having sexual relations. Unlike Matthew (Mt 1:18), Luke does not begin with Jesus' conception as a past event, but instead has the angel Gabriel announce it to Mary as coming in the near future, "Look! You will conceive [syllēmpsē] in your womb and bear a son" (Lk 1:31). There is no place in Luke, then, for Joseph's initial uncertainty over Mary's pregnancy (Mt 1:18-20, which seems to imply that he suspected her of adultery). Mary's response to the angel again stresses her virginity: "How will this be possible, since I do not have sexual relations with a man [epei andra ou ginōskō]?" (Lk 1:34). The angel's explanation is that God will bring it about: "The Holy Spirit will come upon you, and the power of the Most High will overshadow you. Therefore the one to be born will be called holy, God's Son" (Lk 1:35). Jesus will be conceived within Mary without the normal participation of a male (Turner, 153-62).

Luke's birth narrative and its following cotext contain three other probable allusions to the virginal conception: (1) Luke 2:7 refers to Mary giving birth to "her firstborn son" (ton huion autēs ton prōtotokon) rather than "their" or "his" firstborn son, which points to Joseph's nonparticipation in Jesus' conception. (That Luke makes no reference here to Jesus' miraculous conception is not strange [pace Freed, 63], given that the reader has just read about it in the previous chapter and would be expected to remember it.) (2) Upon finding the boy Jesus in the temple, Mary speaks of how she and his father have been searching for him, to which Jesus replies in part, "Did you not know that I must be in my Father's house?" (Lk 2:48-49). This emphasizes that God is Jesus' father, to whom he owes his primary allegiance (Green 1997, 156), while highlighting that he has no human, biological father. (3) Following the birth narrative, the genealogy of Jesus in Luke 3:23-38 begins, "Jesus . . . was the son (as was thought) of Joseph," and ends, "son of Adam, son of God" (Lk 3: 23b, 38b). The "as was thought" indicates that while the characters in the story might think that Jesus' relationship to God is one of ordinary human descent from Adam through Joseph, in reality it is a direct relationship by miraculous conception (Green 1997, 189-90). Finally, in view of the bigger picture of Luke's narrative, "the totality of the emphasis on Mary in ch. 1 of Luke is curious if Joseph was equally the parent of Jesus" (Brown 1993, 301).

4.3. Issues of History and Faith. Both Gospels that contain a birth narrative present Jesus as having been conceived by the power of the Holy Spirit in a virgin. Neither narrative is dependent on the other, so that apparently a Christology of divine sonship tied to a virginal conception by means of the Holy Spirit was essential to the birth story as transmitted in the early pre-Gospel period (Brown 1993, 308). The historicity of the Matthean account is bolstered by the oblique nature of its witness to the virginal conception: Matthew is not taking up the polemic of the virginal conception (pace Freed, 36), but rather simply presupposes it; his argument has to do rather with showing how Jesus is the legitimate heir of David despite the virginal conception (Daniélou, 41). In Luke 1:35 neither verb in Gabriel's announcement to Mary, "the Holy Spirit will come upon [eperchomai] you, and the power of the Most High will overshadow [episkiazō] you," connotes sexual intercourse, as if this were a story parallel to the myths of sexual encounters between humans and the gods that led to the birth of ancient heroes (a perception already combated by, e.g., Justin Martyr, 1 Apol. 33.3-4). Nor (pace Freed, 65) can one dispense with the virginal conception in Luke and hold that “the Holy Spirit’s action could have taken place through the normal sexual relations between Joseph and Mary.” This would make nonsense of Mary’s question “How will this be possible, since I do not have sexual relations with a man?” (Lk 1:34). That Mary’s question is found in the center of the annunciation portion of the narrative implies that the theme of absence of sexual intercourse must be taken into account in any explanation of the annunciation’s meaning.

In the final analysis, one’s decision on the historical reliability of the virginal conception as portrayed in Matthew and Luke will depend in large part on one’s starting point. If one holds that belief in Jesus’ virginal conception is harmful because it denies women their right to sexual and cultural self-determination, then one may seek a different road (e.g., Lüdemann); or if one approaches the Gospels with a historical explanation in hand that sidesteps the miraculous, then one will likely find support for that explanation (e.g., Schaberg). For the person, however, who approaches the Gospels with faith in a God who can and will work miraculously to bring about his saving purposes for all of humanity (including women!), the Gospels provide ample support for the confession that Jesus was conceived by the operation of the Holy Spirit on a virgin (who in accepting her role exercised her self-determination) (see Miracles and Miracle Stories). The person of faith can confidently appeal to the witness of the Gospels in affirming the statement of the Apostles’ Creed that Jesus “was conceived by the Holy Spirit, born of the Virgin Mary.”

See also CHRISTOLOGY; CHRONOLOGY; GENEALOGY; HERODIAN DYNASTY; INCARNATION; JOHN THE BAPTIST; MARY, MOTHER OF JESUS; MIRACLES AND MIRACLE STORIES; SON OF DAVID.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. S. Agourides, “The Birth of Jesus and the Herodian Dynasty: An Understanding of Matthew, Chapter 2,” GOTR 37 (1992) 135-46; D. C. Allison Jr., The New Moses: A Matthean Typology (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1993); idem, “The Magi’s Angel (Matt. 2:2, 9-10),” in Studies in Matthew: Interpretation Past and Present (Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2005) 17-41; E. Autero, “Social Status in Luke’s Infancy Narrative: Zechariah the Priest,” BTB 41 (2011) 36-45; D. R. Bauer, “The Kingship of Jesus in the Matthean Infancy Narrative: A Literary Analysis,” CBQ 57 (1995) 306-23; S. Becker, “The Magnificat Among the Biblical Narrative-Set Psalms,” in

Early Christian Literature and Intertextuality, 2: Exegetical Studies, ed. C. A. Evans and H. D. Zacharias (LNTS 392; London: T & T Clark, 2009) 60-73; G. J. Brooke, ed., The Birth of Jesus: Biblical and Theological Reflections (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 2000); R. E. Brown, The Virginal Conception and Bodily Resurrection of Jesus (New York: Paulist, 1973); idem, The Birth of the Messiah: A Commentary on the Infancy Narratives in the Gospels of Matthew and Luke (2nd ed.; ABRL; New York: Doubleday, 1993); Y. S. Chae, Jesus as the Eschatological Davidic Shepherd: Studies in the Old Testament, Second Temple Judaism, and in the Gospel of Matthew (WUNT 2/216; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2006); C. Clivaz et al., eds. Infancy Gospels: Stories and Identities (WUNT 281; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2011); M. Coleridge, The Birth of the Lukan Narrative: Narrative as Christology in Luke 1-2 (JSNTSup 88; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1993); H. Conzelmann, The Theology of St. Luke, trans. G. Buswell (New York: Harper & Row, 1960); J. Corley, ed., New Perspectives on the Nativity (London: T & T Clark, 2009); C. E. B. Cranfield, “Some Reflections on the Subject of the Virgin Birth,” in On Romans and Other New Testament Essays (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1998) 151-65; P. J. Cullen, “Euphoria, Praise and Thanksgiving: Rejoicing in the Spirit in Luke-Acts,” JPT 6 (1995) 13-24; O. Cullmann, “Infancy Gospels,” in New Testament Apocrypha, 1: Gospels and Related Writings, ed. W. Schneemelcher and R. McL. Wilson (rev. ed; Cambridge: James Clarke; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1991) 414-69; J. Daniélou, The Infancy Narratives, trans. R. Sheed (New York: Herder & Herder, 1968); K. P. De Long, Surprised by God: Praise Responses in the Narrative of Luke-Acts (BZNW 166; Berlin: de Gruyter, 2009); J. D. M. Derrett, “Further Light on the Narratives of the Nativity,” NovT 17 (1975) 81-108; idem, “Shared Themes: The Virgin Birth (Matthew 1:18-2:12),” JHC 4.2 (1997) 57-67; A. Destro and M. Pesce, “The Cultural Structure of the Infancy Narrative in the Gospel of Matthew,” in Infancy Gospels: Stories and Identities, ed. C. Clivaz et al. (WUNT 281; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2011) 94-115; L. Devillers, “The Infancy of Jesus and the Infancy of the Church: From the Canticles (Luke 1-2) to the Summaries (Acts 1-7),” in Infancy Gospels: Stories and Identities, ed. C. Clivaz et al. (WUNT 281; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2011) 351-73; R. J. Dillon, “The Benedictus in Micro- and Macrocontext,” CBQ 68 (2006) 457-80; J. K. Elliott, ed., The Apocryphal New Testament: A Collection of Apocryphal Christian Literature in an English Translation (Oxford: Clarendon, 1993); idem, A Synopsis

- of the Apocryphal Nativity and Infancy Narratives (NTTS 34; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2006); R. J. Erickson, "Divine Injustice? Matthew's Narrative Strategy and the Slaughter of the Innocents (Matthew 2:13-23)," JSNT 64 (1996) 5-27; C. Escudero Freire, Devolver el evangelio a los pobres: A propósito de Lc 1-2 (BEB 19; Salamanca: Sígueme, 1977); S. Farris, The Hymns of Luke's Infancy Narratives: Their Origin, Meaning and Significance (JSNTSup 9; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1985); idem, "The Canticles of Luke's Infancy Narrative: The Appropriation of a Biblical Tradition," in Into God's Presence: Prayer in the New Testament, ed. R. N. Longenecker (MNTS; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2001) 91-112; J. A. Fitzmyer, The Gospel According to Luke I-IX: A New Translation with Introduction and Commentary (AB 28; New York: Doubleday, 1981); idem, "Problems in the Lukan Infancy Narrative," in Luke the Theologian: Aspects of His Teaching (New York: Paulist, 1989) 27-56; idem, "The Virginal Conception of Jesus in the New Testament," in To Advance the Gospel: New Testament Studies (2nd ed.; BRS; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans; Livonia, MI: Dove, 1998) 41-78; R. T. France, "The Formula-Quotations of Matthew 2 and the Problem of Communication," NTS 27 (1981) 233-51; E. D. Freed, The Stories of Jesus' Birth: A Critical Introduction (BibSem 72; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2001); C. Fuller, "The Magi Story Through the Eyes of Pasolini: A Bakhtian Reading," in New Perspectives on the Nativity, ed. J. Corley (London: T & T Clark, 2009) 132-47; S. J. Gathercole, "The Heavenly ἀνατολή (Luke 1:78-9)," JTS 56 (2005) 471-88; J. B. Green, "The Social Status of Mary in Luke 1,5-2,52: A Plea for Methodological Integration," Bib 73 (1992) 457-72; idem, "The Problem of a Beginning: Israel's Scriptures in Luke 1-2," BBR 4 (1994) 61-86; idem, The Theology of the Gospel of Luke (NTT; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1995); idem, The Gospel of Luke (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1997); J. M. Hamilton Jr., "'The Virgin Will Conceive': Typological Fulfillment in Matthew 1:18-23," in Built upon the Rock: Studies in the Gospel of Matthew, ed. D. M. Gurtner and J. Nolland (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2008) 228-47; R. B. Hays, "The Liberation of Israel in Luke-Acts: Intertextual Narration as Countercultural Practice," in Reading the Bible Intertextually, ed. R. B. Hays, S. Alkier and L. A. Huizenga (Waco, TX: Baylor University Press, 2009) 101-17; H. Hendrickx, The Infancy Narratives (rev. ed.; SSG; London: Geoffrey Chapman, 1984); M. D. Hooker, Beginnings: Keys that Open the Gospels (London: SCM, 1997); R. A. Horsley, The Liberation of Christmas: The Infancy Narratives in Social Context (New York: Crossroad, 1989); C. Janssen and R. Lamb, "Gospel of Luke: The Humbled Will Be Lifted Up," in Feminist Biblical Interpretation: A Compendium of Critical Commentary on the Books of the Bible and Related Literature, ed. L. Schottroff and M.-T. Wacker (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2012) 644-61; R. H. Jarrell, "The Birth Narrative as Female Counterpoint to Covenant," JSOT 97 (2002) 3-18; C.-W. Jung, The Original Language of the Lukan Infancy Narrative (JSNTSup 267; London: T & T Clark International, 2004); B. Kahl, "Reading Luke Against Luke: Non-Uniformity of Text, Hermeneutics of Conspiracy and the 'Scriptural Principle' in Luke 1," in A Feminist Companion to Luke, ed. A.-J. Levine and M. Blickenstaff (FCNTECW 3; London: Sheffield Academic Press, 2002) 70-88; H. C. Kim, "The Worship of Jesus in the Gospel of Matthew," Bib 93 (2012) 227-41; J. D. Kingsbury, "The Birth Narrative of Matthew," in The Gospel of Matthew in Current Study: Studies in Memory of William G. Thompson, S.J., ed. D. E. Aune (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2001) 154-65; B. J. Koet, "Isaiah in Luke-Acts," in Isaiah in the New Testament, ed. S. Moyise and M. J. J. Menken (NTSI; London: T & T Clark International, 2005) 79-100; K. A. Kuhn, "The Point of the Step-Parallelism in Luke 1-2," NTS 47 (2001) 38-49; J. R. Levison, "The Spirit, Simeon, and the Songs of the Servant," in The Spirit and Christ in the New Testament and Christian Theology: Essays in Honor of Max Turner, ed. I. H. Marshall, V. Rabens and C. Bennema (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2012) 18-34; A. T. Lincoln, "Contested Paternity and Contested Readings: Jesus' Conception in Matthew 1.18-25," JSNT 34 (2012) 211-31; G. Lüdemann, Virgin Birth? The Real Story of Mary and Her Son Jesus (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 1998); U. Luz, Matthew 1-7: A Commentary, trans. J. E. Crouch, ed. H. Koester (Hermeneia; Minneapolis: Fortress, 2007); P. Mallen, The Reading and Transformation of Isaiah in Luke-Acts (LNTS 367; London: T & T Clark, 2008); I. H. Marshall, "The Interpretation of the Magnificat: Luke 1:46-55," in Der Treue Gottes trauen: Beiträge zum Werk des Lukas; Für Gerhard Schneider, ed. C. Bussmann and W. Radl (Freiburg: Herder, 1991) 181-96; M. Mayor-domo, "Matthew 1-2 and the Problem of Intertextuality," in Infancy Gospels: Stories and Identities, ed. C. Clivaz et al. (WUNT 281; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2011) 257-79; P. M. McDonald, "Resemblances between Matthew 1-2 and Luke 1-2," in New Perspectives on the Nativity, ed. J. Corley (London: T & T Clark, 2009) 200-201; R. P. Menzies, Empowered for Witness: The Spirit in Luke-Acts (JPTSUP 6; Sheffield:

Sheffield Academic Press, 1994); N. Míguez, “Lucas 1-2: Una mirada económica, política y social,” RIBLA 53 (2006) 44-51; U. Mittmann-Richert, Der Sühnetod des Gottesknechts: Jesaja 53 im Lukasevangelium (WUNT 2/220; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2008); S. Muñoz Iglesias, Los Evangelios de la Infancia, 2: Los anuncios angélicos previos en el Evangelio lucano de la Infancia (BAC 488; Madrid: Biblioteca de Autores Cristianos, 1986); idem, Los Evangelios de la Infancia, 3: Nacimiento e Infancia de Juan y de Jesús en Lucas 1-2 (BAC 508; Madrid: Biblioteca de Autores Cristianos, 1987); Los Evangelios de la Infancia, 1: Los cánticos del Evangelio de la Infancia según San Lucas (2nd ed.; BAC 479; Madrid: Biblioteca de Autores Cristianos, 1990a); idem, Los Evangelios de la Infancia, 4: Nacimiento e Infancia de Jesús en San Mateo (BAC 509; Madrid: Biblioteca de Autores Cristianos, 1990b); G. Mussies, “The Date of Jesus’ Birth in Jewish and Samaritan Sources,” JSJ 29 (1998) 416-37; F. Ó Fearghail, The Introduction to Luke-Acts: A Study of the Role of Lk 1,1-4,44 in the Composition of Luke’s Two-Volume Work (AnBib 126; Rome: Editrice Pontificio Istituto Biblico, 1991); M. A. Powell, Chasing the Eastern Star: Adventures in Biblical Reader-Response Criticism (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2001); B. E. Reid, “Prophetic Voices of Elizabeth, Mary, and Anna in Luke 1-2,” in New Perspectives on the Nativity, ed. J. Corley (London: T & T Clark, 2009) 37-46; I. Richter Reimer, “Lucas 1-2 bajo una perspectiva feminista: . . . y la salvación se hace cuerpo,” RIBLA 44 (2003) 32-52; J. M. Rist, “Luke 2:2: Making Sense of the Date of Jesus’ Birth,” JTS 56 (2005) 489-91; R. R. Ruether, Mary, the Feminine Face of the Church (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1977); J. Schaberg, The Illegitimacy of Jesus: A Feminist Theological Interpretation of the Infancy Narratives (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1987); J. D. Schaberg and S. H. Ringe, “Gospel of Luke,” in Women’s Bible Commentary, ed. C. A. Newsom, S. H. Ringe and J. E. Lapsley (3rd ed.; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2012) 493-511; T. K. Seim, The Double Message: Patterns of Gender in Luke-Acts (Nashville: Abingdon, 1994); idem, “Feminist Criticism,” in Methods for Luke, ed. J. B. Green (MBI; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2010) 42-73; A. N. Sherwin-White, Roman Society and Roman Law in the New Testament (Oxford: Clarendon, 1963); G. M. Soares Prabhu, The Formula Quotations in the Infancy Narrative of Matthew: An Enquiry into the Tradition History of Mt 1-2 (AnBib 63; Rome: Biblical Institute Press, 1976); K. Stendahl, “Quis Et Unde? An Analysis of Mt 1-2,” in Judentum, Urchristentum, Kirche: Festschrift für Joachim Jere- mias, ed. W. Eltester (BZNW 26; Berlin: Töpelmann, 1964) 94-105; R. Syme, “The Titulus Tiberinus,” in Akten des VI. Internationalen Kongresses für griechische und lateinische Epigraphik, München 1972 (Vestigia 17; Munich: Beck, 1973) 585-601; C. H. Talbert, Reading Luke: A Literary and Theological Commentary on the Third Gospel (rev. ed.; RNT; Macon, GA: Smyth & Helwys, 2002); R. C. Tannehill, The Shape of Luke’s Story: Essays on Luke-Acts (Eugene, OR: Cascade, 2005); M. Turner, Power from on High: The Spirit in Israel’s Restoration and Witness in Luke-Acts (JPTSUP 9; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2000); J. B. Tyson, “The Birth Narratives and the Beginning of Luke’s Gospel,” Semeia 52 (1990) 103-20; J. Verheyden, “Creating Difference through Parallelism: Luke’s Handling of the Traditions on John the Baptist and Jesus in the Infancy Narrative,” in Infancy Gospels: Stories and Identities, ed. C. Clivaz et al. (WUNT 281; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2011) 137-60; B. T. Viviano, “God as Father in the Infancy Gospels (Matt 1 and 2, Luke 1 and 2),” in Infancy Gospels: Stories and Identities, ed. C. Clivaz et al. (WUNT 281; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2011a) 390-98; idem, “A Woman’s Quest for Wisdom and the Adoration of the Magi as Part of Matthew’s Program of Solomonic Sapiential Messianism,” in The Gospel of Matthew at the Crossroads of Early Christianity, ed. D. Senior (BETL 243; Leuven: Peeters, 2011b) 683-700; D. J. Weaver, “Rewriting the Messianic Script: Matthew’s Account of the Birth of Jesus,” Int 54 (2000) 376-85; C. H. Zorrilla, “The Magnificat: Song of Justice,” in Conflict and Context: Hermeneutics in the Americas, ed. M. L. Branson and C. R. Padilla (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1986) 220-37.

S. Young

BLASPHEMY

The term blasphemy normally refers to verbal slander against God. However, acts of slander can also count as blasphemy.

1. Blasphemy in the Old Testament, Second Temple Judaism, and Among the Rabbis
2. Jesus and Blasphemy

1. Blasphemy in the Old Testament, Second Temple Judaism, and Among the Rabbis.

1.1. Terms. Those who claim that the concept of blasphemy appears in the OT connect it with the following terms: hrp (“to reproach, taunt, despise, scorn”), n’s (“to spurn, scorn, despise”), gdp (“to revile, affront”) and the Piel of qll (“to curse”). All of these words are used in the OT with both human and divine objects, just as blasphēmō (“to commit blasphemy”) is used in Greek. LXX usage parallels the OT and is similar to that of ordinary Greek, where, for example, blasphēmō is used, but not as a technical term. This verb is used in the LXX to translate both gdp and n’s.

1.2. Words of Blasphemy. In Second Temple Judaism, blasphemy covered a wide range of activity. There is little discussion of trials of blasphemy, though m. Sanhedrin 7:5 does define a procedure for examining a charge. This passage limits the offense to speaking the very name of God. These ideas are rooted in the Torah. Leviticus 24:10-16 is discussed where blasphemy is presented (cf. Josephus, Ant. 4.202). Its ambiguities made defining blasphemy, especially where euphemisms were used, a subject for rabbinic debate. Numbers 15:30-31 is often cited as an analogous situation to blasphemy with its Sabbath violation followed by a death penalty. To use the divine name in an inappropriate way is certainly blasphemy and is punishable by death (Lev 24:10-16; m. Sanh. 6.4; 7.5; Philo, Mos. 2.203-206). Behind these ideas about blasphemy lies the command in Exodus 22:27 to revile neither God nor the leaders whom he appointed for the nation.

Later rabbis debated whether the use of an alternative name qualifies as blasphemy, though some sentiment existed for including it (m. Šebu. 4:13; b. Šebu. 35a; b. Sanh. 55b-57a; 60a). Warnings were issued in such cases, but it does not appear, at least in the rabbinic period, to have carried an automatic death sentence. The case of the incorrigible son in m. Sanhedrin 8:4 gives us some indication of the results of an ignored warning. Apparently, second offenses carried especially severe consequences. The official rabbinic position was that the use of the divine name constituted the only clear case of capital blasphemy (m. Sanh. 7:5). One is even to avoid blaspheming foreign deities as a sign of respect for the name of God (Josephus, Ant. 4.207; Philo, Mos. 2.205; Spec. 1.53).

1.3. Acts of Blasphemy. Acts of blasphemy involve the use of substitute titles and a whole range of actions offensive to God. Their existence suggests a category of cultural blasphemy (as opposed to legal blasphemy) as an offense against God.

Acts of blasphemy concentrate on idolatry, a show of arrogant disrespect toward God, or the insulting of his chosen leaders. Often those who blasphemed verbally also acted on these dispositions. God judges such offenses. Examples in Jewish exposition are Sisera (Judg 4:3; Num. Rab. 10:2 [disrespect toward God’s people]), Goliath (1 Sam 17; Josephus, Ant. 6.183 [disrespect toward God’s people and worship of Dagon]), Sennacherib (2 Kings 18-19; cf. Is 37:6, 23 [disrespect for God’s power]), Belshazzar (Dan 3:29 Theod. [3:96]; Josephus, Ant. 10.233, 242 [disrespect for God’s presence in the use of temple utensils at a party]), Manasseh (Sipre 112 [acting against the Torah]) and the Roman general Titus (b. Giṭ. 56b; Abot R. Nat. B 7 [entering, defaming the temple, slicing open the curtain, and taking the utensils away]). Acting against the *temple is also blasphemy (1 Macc 2:6; Josephus, Ant. 12.406). Significantly, comparing oneself to God constitutes blasphemy because it reflects arrogance, according to Philo (Philo, Somn. 2.130-31; Decal. 61-64). At Qumran, immoral action by those who pretend to lead the people (CD-A V, 12) or the act of speaking against God’s people (1QpHab X, 13) is blasphemous. Within Israel, the outstanding example of an act of blasphemy is the incident of the golden calf (Philo, Mos. 2.159-66).

1.4. Summary. When applied to God as object, blasphemy represents an offense against God and a violation of a fundamental principle of the faith that gives glory to him. Sometimes God alone punishes the blasphemer (e.g., Pharaoh, Korah, Titus), while at other times the community executes judgment (the Israelite woman’s son). Attacking God’s people verbally is a second class of blasphemy (Goliath, Sennacherib). Those who challenge the leadership that God has put in place for his people are seen as attacking God himself. So blasphemy refers to a wide range of insulting speech or activity. All of this serves as crucial background to how blasphemy relates to Jesus.

2. Jesus and Blasphemy.

2.1. Blasphemy and Forgiveness of Sins. The first major controversy surrounding Jesus appears in Mark 2:7, where he is charged with blasphemy for *forgiving *sin (// Mt 9:3; Lk 5:21). All three Synoptics use the passage the same way. The charge seems to revolve around Jesus’ directly exercising an exclusively divine prerogative that his accusers argue is not in his authority to execute (cf. Ex 34:7). Here Jesus gives forgiveness without any cultic requirements, an approach that points to Jesus’ own *authority. So forgiveness on his authority did not require priests, sacrifices or rabbis (Ellis). The implications for religious authority structures are significant, since these authorities would believe that they bestowed forgiveness in line with divine instruction. A similar remark appears in Luke 7:49, but here we read of shock at forgiving sin rather than blasphemy.

2.2. Blasphemy of the Spirit. Two other relevant texts appear in Mark. In both cases it is others who blaspheme or risk blaspheming. In Mark 3:28-29 Jesus warns about blaspheming the Spirit (see Holy Spirit), as opposed to the other sins and blasphemies that people might perform (// Mt 12:31-32). Those who blaspheme the Spirit are guilty of a sin that cannot be forgiven, an “eternal sin.” Matthew speaks of no forgiveness in this age or in the age to come. The remark in both Mark and Matthew comes in response to the claim that Jesus casts out “demons by Beelzebul (Mk 3:22 // Mt 12:24) or by an unclean spirit (Mk 3:30), texts that form an inclusio for Mark around the remark. The combination of Mark 2:7 with Mark 3:29 sets up a “battle of the blasphemies” in Mark, with each side accusing the other of offending *God by their claims. Jesus meets the blasphemy accusation of the Jewish leadership in Mark 2:7 and Mark 3:22 with his warning about blaspheming the Spirit. The fact that Jewish materials accuse Jesus of being a deceiver or sorcerer means that this “dispute” has a credible claim to be authentic (Justin, 1 Apol. 30; 108; Dial. 69.7; Origen, Cels. 1:28, 71; b. Sanh. 43a; 107b) (Stanton). This “blasphemy of the Spirit” passage refers to making a settled judgment against Jesus despite the testimony and activity of the Spirit on Jesus’ behalf. Blaspheming the *Son of Man, in contrast, refers to a single act of rejection versus a permanent decision against Jesus.

2.3. Jesus Charged with Blasphemy at His Trial.

A final crucial passage involves Jesus’ examination before the Jewish leadership and his reply, which appeals to a combination of Psalm 110:1 and Daniel 7:13-14 (Mk 14:53-65) (see Trial of Jesus). The charge of blasphemy also shows up explicitly in Matthew 26:65; Luke 22:66-71 reports a similar exchange but lacks a direct reference to blasphemy. It sometimes is argued that this scene is too christological to go back to Jesus, or that the scene would lack witnesses to report on it (e.g., Marcus). However, many witnesses could exist, including a sympathizer like Joseph of Arimathea, someone like Paul who would have known the Jewish position on Jesus, or even assorted bystanders who were familiar with the public debate about Jesus and the circumstances surrounding his death. The scene as a summary of trial events has a strong claim to authenticity and is unlikely to have been created by Mark or by the early church. Its authenticity follows on (1) the use of indirect references to God in line with Jewish expression by referring to God as “the Blessed One and the Power,” (2) the likelihood that the Jewish position about Jesus would have widely circulated in Jerusalem after his death, and (3) the way in which Jesus’ response fits the background for what constitutes blasphemy.

The charge of blasphemy as outlined by Mark also provides historical explanation for the Jewish leadership taking Jesus to *Pilate (on the debate concerning the authenticity of the passage, see Bock).

Jesus’ perceived blasphemy likely operated at two levels. First, Jesus claimed that he would exercise comprehensive authority from God’s side. Although some in Judaism might contemplate such a position for a few (1 En. 62; Ezek. Trag. 69-82), the leaders did not think that this teacher from Galilee could be such a candidate. As a result, his remark would have been seen by the leadership as an arrogant self-claim that was an affront to God’s presence. For Jesus, the claim to sit at God’s right hand was also a prediction of God’s coming vindication of him regardless of what the Jewish leadership did to him. Second, Jesus also attacked the leadership by implicitly claiming to be their future judge (or by claiming a vindication by God of him). They held him in violation of Exodus 22:28, which states that God’s leaders are not to be cursed. Jesus’ claim that their authority was nonexistent and that they would be accounted among the wicked is a total rejection of their authority. To the leadership, this primarily was an affront to God, since they were, in their own view, God’s chosen leaders who had a responsibility to defend their monotheistic faith, a position seemingly compromised if Jesus’ claim is accepted. So Jesus’ twofold claim constituted a religious offense worthy of death; it led to his being taken before *Rome on a sociopolitical charge. In the leadership’s view, there was also a sociopolitical threat to the Jewish people’s stability if an independent figure could emerge whom Rome did not appoint. This political factor was a second reason why this claim had to be handled (R. H. Gundry argues that Jesus did pronounce the divine name, violating m. Sanh. 7:5, a view that is less likely).

2.4. Jesus Charged with Blasphemy at the Temple. In John 10:33 Jesus is confronted at the temple and charged with blasphemy because he equates God and his own activity. Jesus’ reply is that the judges call humans “gods,” so why complain if he makes such a claim and has the support of divine activity to sustain the claim in his miraculous activity. This helps explain why John’s Gospel calls the “miracles” “signs.” In a strange way, these blasphemy texts point to what was at stake around Jesus: a claim to possess divine connections and authority that derived from and made him equal to God.

2.5 Summary. The only blasphemy that Jesus discussed involved an individual speaking or acting against the testimony of God’s Spirit to Jesus. However, the Jewish leadership charged Jesus with blasphemy for his declaration to forgive sin, his claim to sit directly in God's presence, and his assertion that he worked in equal conjunction with God. Jesus' counterclaim was that God's vindication of him in receiving him at the divine right hand showed what God thought of the charge—and of Jesus.

See also HOLY SPIRIT; TRIAL OF JESUS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. D. L. Bock, Blasphemy and Exaltation in Judaism and the Final Examination of Jesus: A Philological-Historical Study of the Key Jewish Themes Impacting Mark 14:61-64 (WUNT 2/106; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1998); A. Y. Collins, "The Charge of Blasphemy in Mark 14.64," JSNT 26 (2004) 379-401; J. D. G. Dunn, Jesus Remembered (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2003); E. E. Ellis, "Deity Christology in Mark 14:58," in Jesus of Nazareth: Lord and Christ; Essays on the Historical Jesus and New Testament Christology, ed. J. B. Green and M. Turner (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1994) 192-203; R. H. Gundry, "Jesus' Blasphemy According to Mark 14:61b-64 and Mishnah Sanhedrin 7:5," in The Old Is Better: New Testament Essays in Support of Traditional Interpretations (WUNT 178; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2005) 98-110; M. Hengel, Studies in Early Christology (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1995); J. Marcus, Mark 8-16: A New Translation with Introduction and Commentary (AYB 27A; New Haven: Yale University Press, 2009), 1016-18, 1126-30; A. Schwemer, "Die Passion des Messias nach Markus und der Vorwurf des Antijudaismus," in Der messianische Anspruch Jesu und die Anfänge der Christologie, by M. Hengel and A. Schwemer (WUNT 2/138; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2001) 133-63; G. N. Stanton, "Jesus of Nazareth: A Magician and a False Prophet," in Jesus of Nazareth: Lord and Christ; Essays on the Historical Jesus and New Testament Christology, ed. J. B. Green and M. Turner (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1994) 164-80.

D. L. Bock

BLESSING AND WOE

Blessing and woe are paired here because, to some degree, they are natural opposites, but also and especially because in Luke 6:20-26 Jesus declares blessing upon four categories of people and woes upon four matched but contrasting categories of people. The language of blessing and woe, however, when not linked as opposites, has a much wider currency, even within the Gospels.

1. Terminology
2. Blessing
3. Woe
4. Conclusion

1. Terminology.

There are two word groups relevant to this discussion of blessing in the Gospels. One involves the Greek root makar-, a term of happiness; the other involves the root eulog-, a positive speech term. In the wider Greek world that sets the background for biblical use makar- was used of the gods, who were above all the vicissitudes of life, of the dead, who had left it all behind, and of people who were thought to be in a good situation and were deemed to have reason for being happy: wealthy, having family, being wise or famous or an honored citizen, and so on. In this wider frame eulog- is used in language of praise but also of the good reputation that might arise from or lead to such praise—praiseworthiness.

For woe, there is only one Greek term used in the Gospels, ouai. The word is rare in wider Greek (some suggestion that it may be a Latinism) but common in the LXX. It is an imprecise interjection, marking how bad in some respect something is (as in English "Oh, dear!" "Bad!" "How awful!" etc.).

2. Blessing.

2.1. In the Old Testament.

2.1.1. Using makar-. In the LXX the makar-root consistently renders the Hebrew root šr, a term of happiness and good fortune. Closest to the Gospel use and represented more than forty times is a use in the OT of the plural construct, literally "good fortunes of . . ." The LXX does not take us significantly away from the Greek of the wider framing world, except insofar as happiness in connection with trust in God frequently has an anticipatory dimension to it and was consistent with needing to cope with difficulty in the present (e.g., Is 30:8).

The beatitude form ("blessed is/are . . . [or] the one(s) who . . .") is prominent in OT use of makar-. In wisdom texts they commend a proposed path of goodness; in prophetic and eschatological texts they express confidence in God's intervention to put right the problems of the present situation; in historical texts they mark God's blessing of the king or the people. Beatitudes verge on the congratulatory: a category of persons is singled out, and their good fortune is proclaimed.

2.1.2. Using eulog-. The use of the eulog- root in the LXX is rather different from its use in the wider framing world. In the LXX it regularly represents the Hebrew root brk, which is essentially a religious word concerned with blessing. It is against this OT background that the Gospel uses of eulog- are to be set.

A blessing is a word believed to have power to define a situation and make things happen (e.g., Gen

1:21); it imparts a blessing. God is mainly one who blesses, but others do so who could act for God, such as the temple priests (e.g., Num 6:23-24). But blessings were also given by people of seniority and importance (e.g., Gen 47:7); their blessing was weighty because of their personal significance. Even ordinary people pronounced blessings on special occasions, such as important leave-taking moments (e.g., Gen 24:60). Characteristically, the act of blessing would be understood as invoking God's blessing upon the one blessed (e.g., Gen 48:20). At a lower level, blessing could also be quite a casual matter, nothing more than a positive word of greeting (e.g., 1 Sam 25:14).

To bless somebody is at times more about expressing gratitude than invoking a blessing on them (e.g., 2 Sam 14:22), but clearly it could be both at the same time. But when the language is used of blessing God, invoking a blessing has quite disappeared from sight, and what remains is the expression of gratitude and appreciation (e.g., Deut 8:10).

Blessing is not just the word of blessing but also, derivatively but very commonly, the good that has been received from the hands of God (e.g., Deut 15:14); the good that God makes happen is his blessing. To be blessed is, therefore, to be in a privileged, perhaps even an elevated situation. Sometimes, saying to God "You are blessed" seems not to be about expressing gratitude (as above) but rather about recognizing the greatness of God (e.g., 1 Chron 29:10); no doubt the two merge.

Finally, there is an occasional use of "bless" to mean something like "consecrate." God blesses the seventh day in Exodus 20:11, and Samuel blesses the sacrifice in 1 Samuel 9:13. Here the blessing received would seem to be capacity to fulfill a distinctive role.

2.2. In the Gospels.

2.2.1. Using makar-. The majority of the Gospel uses of makar- are in the beatitudes found in Matthew 5 and Luke 6. Nearly all of the other uses have a more or less beatitude form; furthest from the form is Luke 1:48, where Mary anticipates a future beatitude. Our interest must be in what identifies one as having the happy prospects celebrated by beatitudes.

The beatitudes in Matthew 5:3-10 can be seen as an expanded restatement of Matthew 4:17. This is what it means for the *kingdom of God to have drawn near. There is good news now for those who find themselves in these identified situations. The list seems to have been designed to echo key elements of the historical experience of God's people: chastened by the humiliation of *exile and beyond; longing for *God to finally put things to rights; *peacemakers, not after vengeance because they have recognized their own need for *mercy; well conscious of past failure, now seeking to be pure in heart; and ready to suffer, as needs be, out of their freshly affirmed loyalty to God. Such people will recognize God's purposes as moving forward in connection with Jesus and will find blessing as they pay the cost of loyalty to him (Mt 5:11-12).

For his equivalent, Luke has only four beatitudes (Lk 6:20-23), but they are matched by four woes (Lk 6:24-26 [see 3.2. below]). There are important differences, but the overall thrust is quite similar to that in Matthew. Some scholarly attention has focused on the fact that Luke has "the poor" where Matthew has "the poor in spirit." An interest in material poverty in Luke is guaranteed by the balancing woe being in relation to the rich (see Rich and Poor). Because, however, Luke includes quite a bit of material on wealth, it is easy to discern that it is not wealth as such that attracts the woe but rather the warped attitude that it has created toward God and one's fellows. Similarly, it will not be the poverty as such that commends. In the kingdom *justice will come for the poor, but in relation to the kingdom their poverty benefits them inasmuch as it has nurtured within them qualities of the opposite kind to the self-sufficiency of the rich over against God and one's fellow.

Elsewhere good fortune is declared for those who take no offense at Jesus (Mt 11:6; Lk 7:23), those who see with insight what Jesus is doing in his ministry (Mt 13:16; Lk 10:23), those ready for the return of the master (Mt 24:46; Lk 12:37-38, 43), those who hear the word of God and obey it (Lk 11:28), those who act on what they have learned from Jesus (Jn 13:17), future believers who believe without seeing the resurrected Jesus (20:29), and those who invite to their celebratory meals the needy and disabled (Lk 14:13-14) (see Table Fellowship). Jesus marks the good fortune of Peter as the one whom God granted to perceive Jesus' true identity (Mt 16:17), and Elizabeth marks the good fortune of Mary for her expectant faith in relation to the word spoken to her (Lk 1:45). Mary in turn recognizes that future generations will consider her to have been specially favored (Lk 1:48). The only other beatitude on the lips of Jesus is an ironic one: in the final crisis period childlessness is a blessing because one is spared the responsibility of taking *children into a terrible situation (Lk 23:29). Finally, conventional but not well connected up piety is expressed on two occasions and made a foil for Jesus: the privilege of Jesus' birth mother (Lk 1:27) and of dining in the kingdom of God (Lk 14:15).

2.2.2. Using eulog-. All the uses of eulog- in connection with an act of blessing come in Luke's Gospel. Simeon, the godly senior, blesses the infant Jesus' parents (Lk 2:34); Jesus blesses his disciples in a farewell gesture as he ascends from them (Lk 24:50-51); Jesus calls for the blessing of enemies (Lk 6:28). Also distinctive to Luke is the blessing of God. In Luke 1:68 Zechariah expresses his gratitude to God for what is coming in connection with his own newborn son and the yet-to-be-born Jesus; in Luke 24:53 it is the disciples, freshly commissioned by the risen Lord, who in great joy acknowledge what God has done in Jesus.

In the so-called *triumphal entry of Jesus into Jerusalem blessing is used positively in relation to Jesus being appreciated and welcomed (Mt 21:9; Mk 11:9-10; Lk 19:38; Jn 12:13), perhaps being recognized as blessed by God, and again negatively in Matthew 23:39; Luke 13:35 in relation to Jerusalem's need to make good on its failure to offer a welcoming greeting to Jesus.

"Blessed" stands as a designation for God in Mark 14:61. Whether this is a proper Jewish usage has been debated, but it would be a natural development out of the frequent OT use of "blessed be the LORD": he is "the Blessed" as the one supremely worthy of receiving our blessing. Job 1:21, "blessed be the name of the LORD," is suggestive.

In Matthew 25:34 those who have come to the aid of the needy are termed by Jesus as "blessed by my Father," indicating God's committed intention to provide well for them; they are marked out for blessing.

The final set of uses of eulog- in the Gospels is in connection with the saying of grace over meals (Mt 14:19; 26:26; Mk 6:41; 8:7; 14:22; Lk 9:16; 24:30). As such, this use is not found in the OT, but it is built upon the OT blessing of God as expressing gratitude and appreciation and marking his greatness. Jesus adopted the regular Jewish habit of recognizing in a blessing the goodness of God in the provision of the food needed for our lives. In some of these texts, however, there may be a different usage. God is normally the one blessed, but in Mark 8:7; Luke 9:16 a pronoun referring to the food follows "blessed." Here it is the food that seems to be being blessed. In relation to Sabbath and sacrifice, a comparable use in the OT has been noted above. Since the Gospel feeding account involves a deliberate anticipation of the *Last Supper and therefore the Lord's Supper, language of consecration might seem particularly appropriate. However, it is also possible that the sense is "say a blessing with respect to the food."

3. Woe.

3.1. In the Old Testament. In the LXX ouai translates the Hebrew interjections of woe, hōy and 'ōy. These are used to announce the prospect of evil or to express the direness of an existing awful situation, and they can be used to indicate powerful feelings of distress about something. They are found predominantly in prophetic contexts and call to mind the judgment of God (e.g., Is 5:8; Jer 48:1; Zech 11:17).

3.2. In the Gospels. Gospel woes are designed to make a powerful but imprecise statement about the (unrecognized) unhappy situation of the target of the woe. The woe form almost always identifies the reason for the negative attitude involved, but unlike the beatitude, it does not identify what the unhappiness in prospect is. The larger context must be left to supply this lack.

A large proportion of the uses of woe language in the Gospels is found in a series of seven woes against the *scribes and *Pharisees in Matthew 23:13-23, which is partially paralleled in Luke 11:42-52. These people are being castigated for being bad leaders and models for the people, blocking the way to the kingdom rather than illuminating it. The vague but threatening tone of the woe language gives way in Matthew 23:33-36 (cf. Lk 11:50-51) to language of coming *judgment.

Luke also has a series of four woes in Luke 6:24-26, corresponding to his four beatitudes. To be rich, full, laughing and popular now is quite a problem, for it almost certainly means that one is compromised with the world and out of touch with the values of the kingdom of God. Matching the corresponding beatitudes, these woes do specify what there is to be unhappy about: it is a future stripped of what one has at present, and then to experience quite the opposite.

The failure of Chorazin and Bethsaida to respond to Jesus' ministry is marked with a woe in Matthew 11:21; a woe upon Jesus' betrayer is found in Matthew 26:24; Mark 14:21; Luke 22:22; a sympathetic woe in relation to those who are pregnant or breast feeding in the coming time of crisis comes in Matthew 24:19; Mark 13:17; Luke 21:23. Finally, a woe is declared in Matthew 18:7 // Luke 17:1 upon those who cause others to stumble.

4. Conclusion.

Blessing characterizes Jesus' good news of the kingdom, but for those who will not align themselves with the new move of God that is underway, the good news becomes bad news.

See also JUDGMENT; KINGDOM OF GOD/HEAVEN;

RICH AND POOR; SERMON ON THE MOUNT/PLAIN.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. H. Charlesworth, "The Qumran Beatitudes (4Q525) and the New Testament (Mt 5:3-11, Lk 6:20-26)," RHPR 80 (2000) 13-35; H. B. Green, Matthew, Poet of the Beatitudes (JSNTSup 203; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2001); T. Hieke, ed., Q 6:20-21: The Beatitudes for the Poor, Hungry, and Mourning (Documenta Q; Leuven: Peeters, 2001); S. McKnight, "A Loyal Critic: Matthew's Polemic with Judaism in 'Theological Perspective,'" in Anti-Semitism and Early Christianity: Issues of Polemic and Faith, ed. C. A. Evans and D. A. Hagner (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1993) 55-79; J. Nolland, The Gospel of Matthew (NIGTC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2005); A. R. Simmonds, "Woe to You . . . Hypocrites!" Re-reading Matthew 23:13-36," BSac 166 (2009) 336-49; J. W. Thomson, "The Background and Function of the Beatitudes in Matthew and Luke," ResQ 41 (1999) 109-16.

J. Nolland

BLINDNESS AND DEAFNESS

Blindness and deafness appear frequently in the Gospels in both literal and metaphorical senses. Readers encounter persons who lack the ability to see or hear, and who typically are healed by Jesus. On a figurative level, however, seeing and hearing are used as metaphors for spiritual acuity or lack thereof (see, e.g., Mt 23, where Jesus five times labels the Pharisees "blind"; or note Jesus' frequent plea "Let the one with ears to hear, hear," wherein hearing implies proper understanding). It is also the case that the literal and the figurative can be used together, such that someone who is physically blind or deaf is also presumed to be blind or deaf in a spiritual sense.

Physiognomy, the idea that a person's moral character can be known from his or her outward physical appearance, was common in the larger cultural world in which the Gospels were written. Few modern scholars have read the Gospels using physiognomics, but recently some have called attention to it (e.g., Parsons; Hartsock). While some debate exists as to whether or not the gospel writers are aware of physiognomy (Luke and John seem more aware than Mark and Matthew), and while there is some debate about whether a particular gospel writer undermines or deconstructs the assumptions of physiognomy or simply reflects what is in the larger culture, what seems clear is that physical features such as blindness and deafness do mean more than simply the disability itself. Read in this way, many of the *healing stories of the Gospels not only would tell of Jesus healing a physical ailment but also would speak to him healing a spiritual defect; that is, Jesus brings understanding to those who previously lacked it.

1. Blindness
2. Deafness

1. Blindness.

The ancient world had multiple theories of how vision worked (see Betz). One view, called "intramission," assumes that light comes into the eye from outside, and the eye is the first step in processing that light. This is more or less our modern understanding. More common in the ancient world, however, was the view called "extramission." In this view, the eye is the source of light, or at least channels that light as it originates from within the body. In this way, the eye functions more like a flashlight, emitting light rather than receiving it. When Jesus claims, "The eye is the lamp of the body. If your eyes are good, your whole body will be full of light. But if your eyes are bad, your whole body will be full of darkness" (Mt 6:22-23; Lk 11:33-34), extramission is assumed. The eye emits light, and a good eye emits good light, whereas a dark eye emits bad light or no light at all. In this worldview, one who is blind has no inner light to emit; the inner light has gone out, as reflected by the lack of eyesight.

Multiple significant examples of blindness can be noted in the Gospels. Mark makes use of blindness in a way that implies that the disciples are the ones who lack understanding. Two notable blind healings occur in Mark (Mk 8:22-26; 10:46-52). In the first scene, which is unique to Mark, an unnamed blind man is brought to Jesus, and it takes Jesus two attempts to fully heal his sight. The second story involves Bartimaeus crying out to Jesus from the side of the road. These stories form an inclusio around the trip to *Jerusalem in which the primary focus is on the *disciples and discipleship, and in which Jesus three times predicts his death, predictions that the disciples fail to comprehend. In this way, the stories of the two blind men can be read not only as healing stories, but also as metaphors for the disciples, whose spiritual blindness still awaits a cure. In their case, they will need a second touch, as it were, for Jesus to open their eyes fully to his identity and mission.

Matthew does not include the story found in Mark 8, but he does include the healing of Bartimaeus. In addition, Matthew frequently uses blindness in a purely metaphorical sense, referring to "blind guides" (Mt 15:14) and using "blind" five times in the woes to the Pharisees (Mt 23). Matthew, like Mark and Luke, appears to be heavily influenced by the use of blindness in the writings of the prophets as well, Isaiah in particular. The Synoptics will, for example, invoke Isaiah 6:9-10 to make sense of the *parables (Mt 13:14-15; Mk 4:12; Lk 8:10). Isaiah, of course, links blindness and deafness to the *hardening of the heart, the idolatry of the people of *Israel, and the refusal to follow the covenant, and Isaiah's use of blindness as a metaphor for these things has clearly made its way into the narratives of the Gospel writers.

Luke uses blindness and its healing as a kind of interpretive key to the Gospel. In Jesus' self-introduction in Luke 4:17-21 he reads from the scroll of Isaiah and announces the coming of the *gospel to the poor, the prisoner, the blind and the oppressed. Jesus will heal the physically blind, but certainly he has in mind spiritual blindness as well. Acts continues this trajectory, especially in Paul's encounter on the road to Damascus (Acts 9:1-22).

John uses seeing and believing together frequently, often interchangeably. Here the signature example is John 9, where Jesus encounters a man born blind. The man is healed, both in a physical and spiritual sense. This is evident in his interview by the religious leaders as he mocks and evades, ultimately claiming, "One thing I know: I once was blind but now I see" (Jn 9:25). Numerous commentators have noted that this story can be read on both a literal level as a healing miracle and on a figurative level as a story of spiritual enlightenment and *salvation. Such two-level reading is indeed possible, perhaps even preferable, throughout the Gospels.

2. Deafness.

Deafness is used less frequently in healing stories in the Gospels, but it communicates much the same thing as blindness. The most frequent use of deafness in the Gospels is in conjunction with the parable of the sower (Mk 4:1-20; Mt 13:1-17; Lk 8:4-15). In the explanation for this parable Jesus invokes Isaiah 6:9-10 to explain why so many fail to understand the gospel. Hearing and deafness clearly speak of one's inner spiritual state. Hearing is used to speak of obedience (cf. Jas 1:22-25), and deafness is used to imply spiritual dullness or hardness of heart. One might also compare Mark 8:17, in which Jesus asks his disciples, following the multiplication of the loaves, "Do you still not see or understand? Are your hearts hardened? Do you have eyes but fail to see, and ears but fail to hear?"

A key question with respect to these texts has to do with causation. Is God causing the hearts of some to be hardened, such that God is making people deaf? Or are people deaf on their own account, failing to properly understand the gospel when confronted with it? On this issue no clear consensus has yet emerged in biblical scholarship.

See also HARDNESS OF HEART; HEALING.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. D. C. Allison, "The Eye Is the Lamp of the Body (Matthew 6:22-23 = Luke 11:34-36)," NTS 33 (1987) 62-66; H. D. Betz, "Matthew 6:22f and Ancient Greek Theories of Vision," in Text and Interpretation: Studies in the New Testament Presented to Matthew Black, ed. E. Best and R. McL. Wilson (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1979) 46-64; J. H. Elliott, "The Evil Eye and the Sermon on the Mount: Contours of a Pervasive Belief in Social Scientific Perspective," BibInt 2 (1994) 51-84; E. Haenchen, "Sight to the Blind: Vision as Metaphor in Luke," Bib 67 (1986) 457-77; C. Hartsock, Sight and Blindness in Luke-Acts: The Use of Physical Features in Characterization (BIS 94; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2008); S. Horne, "'Those Who Are Blind See': Some New Testament Uses of Impairment, Inability, and Paradox," in Human Disability and the Service of God: Reassessing Religious Practice, ed. N. L. Esland and D. E. Saliers (Nashville: Abingdon, 1998) 88-101; D. Lee, "The Gospel of John and the Five Senses," JBL 129 (2010) 115-27; M. C. Parsons, Body and Character in Luke and Acts: The Subversion of Physiognomy in Early Christianity (Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2006); G. D. Robinson, "The Motif of Deafness and Blindness in Isaiah 6:9-10: A Contextual, Literary, and Theological Analysis," BBR 8 (1998) 167-86. C. Hartsock

BORN AGAIN/FROM ABOVE. See NEW BIRTH.

BREAD

"Bread" (artos) was a foodstuff baked from barley or wheat flour, usually with the addition of yeast. It was the staple food of the ancient Mediterranean diet, and thus its production, preparation and consumption were important aspects of everyday life. In the Gospels artos generally refers to this staple (Mt 7:9; 14:17; Mk 6:37-38; 6:38; Lk 9:13; Jn 21:9, 13). "Bread" is also used in the Gospels to refer to food in general. This idiom is particularly evident in the phrase "to eat bread" (esthiō artōn), meaning simply "to eat a meal" (Mt 15:26; Mk 3:20; 7:2; 7:27; Lk 14:1; 15:17). In these instances artos is synonymous with brōsis and trophē ("nourishment" or "food"). This makes "bread" (artos) a ready-made term for extended metaphorical, symbolic and theological uses.

“Bread” (artos) is used fifty-seven times in the Synoptic Gospels and twenty-four times in the Fourth Gospel. The term “leaven” or “yeast” (zymē), used in the preparation of bread, features in Jesus’ warning against the “leaven [zymē] of the Pharisees/Sadducees/Herod” (Mt 16:6, 11; Mk 8:15; Lk 12:1). In its negated form, this term is used as an adjective to refer to bread that is free from yeast, “unleavened bread” (azyma), and almost always refers to the “feast of unleavened bread” (Mt 26:17; Mk 14:1, 12; Lk 22:1, 7).

1. Mark
2. Matthew
3. Luke
4. John
5. Conclusion

1. Mark.

The first occurrence of bread in Mark is in the Sabbath controversy (Mk 2:23–28). The Pharisees object to Jesus and his disciples eating heads of grain and interpret this as a transgression of the Sabbath. Jesus defends himself by drawing an analogy with David and his companions’ action of eating “the bread of presence” (ho artoi tēs prothēsēs) when in need of food (cf. 1 Sam 21:1–6). But this bread was reserved for priests (Mk 2:26; cf. Lev 24:5–9), since it was uniquely “set before” (prothesis) the Lord (LXX Ex 40:23). Mark 2:28 makes the point that Jesus has authority to meet needs on the Sabbath because he is “Lord of the Sabbath.”

In the feedings of the five thousand (Mk 6:32–44) and of the four thousand (Mk 8:1–10) Jesus miraculously provides bread for the crowds. The first feeding story clearly draws upon exodus imagery. First, the setting is a “desolate” place (Mk 6:32), evoking the exodus-wilderness wanderings (cf. Ex 3:1, 18; 4:27; 5:3; 8:27). Second, Mark notes that the crowd “sat down in groups by hundreds and fifties” (Mk 6:40), recalling the ordering of Israel in Exodus 18:21. Third, Mark describes the crowd as “sheep without a shepherd” (Mk 6:34), perhaps echoing Numbers 27:17; Ezekiel 34:5. Jesus, as Israel’s Messiah, meets the need of the crowd by miraculously multiplying the available food so that it was able to “satisfy” all who were present (Mk 6:42). Mark’s account of the feeding of the four thousand (Mk 8:1–10) seems to make the same basic point: Jesus’ followers can trust him to “satisfy” human need (Mk 6:42; 8:8). The literary setting of the four thousand suggests a Gentile context (Mk 7:26, 31) as opposed to the feeding of five thousand, and this may mean that the feeding of the five thousand represents salvific provision for Israel, and the feeding of the four thousand provision for the nations (Guelich, 403; Witherington, 235; Hagner, 450; contra Keener, 418–19). The two feeding stories are mentioned again at Mark 8:14–21. Jesus’ phrase “beware of the leaven of the Pharisees and the leaven of Herod” (Mk 8:15) suggests that leaven refers to the general opposition against him and his ministry (cf. Mk 3:6). The disciples’ response to Jesus’ warning, “we have no bread” (Mk 8:16), reveals that they are still not exemplifying faith in Jesus’ power to provide for the people’s needs, and thus they have not learned from the previous feeding stories (Mk 8:17; cf. Mk 6:32–44; 8:1–10).

In Mark 7:27 Jesus responds to a Syrophoenician woman’s request as follows: “Let the children be satisfied first, for it is not good to take the children’s bread and throw it to the dogs.” This encounter is couched between the two feeding stories (Mk 6:32–44; 8:1–10) and occurs in a Gentile territory (Tyre) and with a Gentile woman. Jesus’ response indicates a salvation-historical priority for Israel (the “children”) in that Israel is first to receive bread, or spiritual sustenance, from Jesus the Messiah. In light of the context, in which Jesus himself offers deliverance and sustenance (“bread” [Mk 7:4]) in a *Gentile region (Mk 7:31–37; 8:1–10), Jesus’ saying in Mark 7:27 seems to be aimed at provoking a response from the woman. She passes the test in Mark 7:28, and Jesus rewards her by providing deliverance for her Gentile daughter (Mark 7:29). Thus, Jesus’ freeing the girl from *demonic bondage is comparable to his provision of spiritual sustenance (“bread”); both flow out of Jesus’ ministry of extending the blessings of God’s kingdom to Jew and Gentile.

The Passover meal shared by Jesus and his disciples happened “on the day of unleavened bread,” and Mark makes it clear that this was the day when the Passover lamb was sacrificed (Mk 14:12). The link between the Feast of Unleavened Bread and the Feast of Passover (see Feasts) is based on Exodus 12. The Passover celebration recalls God’s deliverance of his people from the bondage of Egypt (Ex 12:17), and the eating of bread without yeast recalls the hurried nature of Israel’s departure from Egypt (Deut 16:3). In Jesus’ eucharistic words (Mk 14:22–25) bread represents his body given in death, and the cup (of wine) represents his blood, which recalls the blood of the Passover lamb (Ex 12:13, 22–27).

2. Matthew.

Matthew shares the following references to “bread” with Mark: the Sabbath controversy (Mt 12:1–8; Mk

2:23-28), the feeding of the five thousand (Mt 14:13-21; Mk 6:32-44), the feeding of the four thousand (Mt 15:32-39; Mk 8:1-10), the “leaven of the Pharisees” (Mt 16:5-12; Mk 8:14-21), the preparation for the Passover “on the day of unleavened bread” (Mt 26:17; Mk 14:1, 12) and the “bread” saying at the Last Supper (Mt 26:26; Mk 14:22). But there are some important differences in these shared passages. In Matthew’s feeding stories and Last Supper he maintains the strong exodus overtones observed in Mark. However, the Gentile setting evident in Mark’s feeding of the four thousand (“the region of the Decapolis” [Mk 7:31]) is less clear for Matthew’s story, since Matthew does not carry over the reference to the Decapolis (Mt 15:29). In Matthew 16:6 Jesus says, “Beware of the leaven of the Pharisees and Sadducees.” “Leaven” here is not the “leaven of bread” (zymē tōn artōn), but rather a metaphor for the corrupting “teaching of the Pharisees and Sadducees” (Mt 16:12) as well as their unified opposition against Jesus (Mt 16:1).

After Jesus had fasted for forty days and nights, Satan takes advantage of Jesus’ weakened condition by attempting to “tempt” or “test” (peirazō) him (Mt 4:1). The first *temptation (Mt 4:1-11) appeals to Jesus as God’s Son: if Jesus is God’s Son, surely he can miraculously provide bread (i.e., food) for himself in his hour of need (Mt 4:3). Jesus responds by quoting Deuteronomy 8:3: “One does live by bread alone, but by every word that proceeds from the mouth of God” (Mt 4:4). The exodus allusions suggest that Jesus, as God’s true Son, trusts God for his needs as opposed to the Israelites in the Sinai wilderness, who failed their time of “testing” (Deut 8:2, 16).

An important occurrence of “bread” in Matthew comes in the context of the Lord’s Prayer (Mt 6:7-15): “give us this day our daily bread” (Mt 6:11). The sense of the adjective epiousion (“daily”) is debated. There are at least three interpretive options: (1) bread necessary for today’s existence; (2) bread for the current day; (3) bread for the coming or following day. The third option often leads to an eschatological reading: “bread for the age to come” (Jeremias; Brown; Davies and Allison). However, J. Nolland (2005; 1993) argues against an eschatological interpretation of bread in Matthew 6:11, since “daily bread” connotes bread for day-to-day sustenance. But a prayer for daily food need not be at odds with an eschatological interpretation of the phrase (Marshall; Davies and Allison), especially given the immediate eschatological context of the prayer (“your kingdom come” [Mt 6:10]) and Jesus’ promise of an eschatological meal “in the kingdom of heaven” (Mt 8:11).

Last, Matthew has a unique reference to bread in Matthew 7:9: “Is there anyone among you who, if your child asks for bread, will give a stone?” By a series of comparisons, Matthew 7:8-11 provides assurance to disciples who pray to the Father in the overlapping of the ages that God will hear and answer their prayers (Mt 7:7-8).

3. Luke.

Luke shares the following references to bread with Matthew and Mark: the Sabbath controversy (Lk 8:4-5; Mt 12:1-8; Mk 2:23-28), the feeding of the five thousand (Lk 9:10-17; Mt 14:13-21; Mk 6:32-44), the “leaven of the Pharisees” (Lk 12:1; Mt 16:5-12; Mk 8:14-21), the Feast of Unleavened Bread (Lk 22:1; Mt 26:17; Mk 14:1, 12), and the “bread” saying at the *Last Supper (Lk 22:19; Mt 26:26; Mk 14:22); and with Matthew Luke shares the temptation narrative (Lk 4:1-13; Mt 4:1-11) and the Lord’s *Prayer (Lk 11:1-4; Mt 6:7-15), both of which refer to bread.

A few differences in Luke’s Gospel regarding two of these passages should be mentioned. (1) In Luke’s phrase “leaven of the Pharisees” (Lk 12:1) he further defines the Pharisees’ “leaven” as “hypocrisy” (hypokrisis), which sums up the description of the Pharisees in the preceding section (Lk 11:37-54). (2) In Luke’s Lord’s Prayer we read, “Give us each day our daily bread” (Lk 11:3), instead of Matthew’s “Give us this day our daily bread” (Mt 6:11). Luke’s “each day” (to kath’ hēmeran) may demand a less eschatological interpretation of the verse than Matthew 6:11. But, as in Matthew, the line in the previous verse, “your kingdom come” (Lk 11:2), and Luke’s eschatological use of “bread” later (Lk 14:15; 22:19) in the context of the “eating and drinking at my table in the kingdom” (Lk 22:29-30) seem to point us in the direction of an eschatological orientation of the prayer in Luke 11:3.

Immediately after the Lord’s Prayer is Luke’s parable of the friend at midnight (Lk 11:5-8). In this parable a friend comes to a householder at midnight asking for three loaves of bread (Lk 11:5). The true friend, despite the inconvenience, will rise and meet the needs of the other (Lk 11:8). How much more, then, will the Father give the spirit to those who ask him (Lk 11:13)? In Luke 14:1-24 food (“bread”) and meals are dominant. The section begins with Jesus sharing a meal (lit., “to eat bread,” esthiō artōn) with a ruler of the *Pharisees on the *Sabbath (Lk 14:1). The parable of the marriage feast follows (Lk 14:7-14) and deals with the issue of to whom should be given places of honor “at the table” (Lk 14:10). In Luke 14:15 Jesus pronounces a *blessing on those who seek the honor of others, thereby revealing that they are living under God's righteous reign (see Kingdom of God/Heaven). These are the ones who will "eat bread in the kingdom of God" (Lk 14:15)—that is, have a place at the eschatological messianic banquet.

Luke uniquely narrates Jesus' postresurrection encounter with the two disciples on the road to Emmaus. The disciples "recognized" Jesus only when he "took the bread, blessed and broke it, and gave it to them" (Lk 24:30-31 [reiterated in Lk 24:35]), an action that recalls the feeding of the five thousand (Lk 9:16) and the Last Supper (Lk 22:19).

4. John.

References to bread are clustered in John 6. John's version of the feeding of the five thousand (Jn 6:10-13) is followed by the bread of *life discourse (Jn 6:25-50), in which John draws out the christological and soteriological significance of the feeding account. This christological significance is couched in exodus symbolism, which emphasizes the analogy between God's final saving action in Jesus and God's saving action of Israel in the exodus. A "great crowd" follows Jesus as the Passover draws near (Jn 6:3-4). After Jesus distributes the bread and fish to the crowd, he commands his disciples to "gather the leftover pieces so that nothing is lost" (Jn 6:12). Then they "gathered" the fragments of barley loaves (artōn tōn krithinōn) into "twelve" baskets (Lk 6:13), which may symbolize the restoration of the twelve tribes of Israel (Dennis; Brunson) (see Restoration of Israel). The people rightly connect the sign of the feeding *miracle with the eschatological "prophet like Moses" (Jn 6:14; cf. Deut 18:18). Jesus rejects the crowd's desire to make him a king (Jn 6:15) or political deliverer, for Jesus' kingship is not "of this world" (Jn 18:36).

Jesus and the disciples cross the sea (Jn 6:16-21), an act that may suggest Moses/exodus imagery (Dennis). Jesus now presses the true significance of the feeding miracle: the crowd should seek not merely for "food" (brōsis) that perishes, but rather for the "food" (brōsis) that lasts unto eternal life (Jn 6:27), which only Jesus can provide. The rest of the narrative spells out this central truth by identifying Jesus as God's ultimate provision for his people. God had promised Israel that he would "rain bread down from heaven for you" (Ex 16:4). Now, Jesus is, metaphorically, the "true bread [artos] from heaven" that the Father has given (Jn 6:32). The metaphorical use of bread now reaches its apex in Jesus' statements "I am the bread of life" (Jn 6:35) and "I am the living bread" (Jn 6:51). The metaphor is stretched even further when Jesus speaks of his "flesh" (sarx) given in death as "bread" that brings life (Jn 6:51). Thus, it is not Moses or the Torah that provides true life, but Jesus; he is the eschatological "food" (brōsis) or "bread" (artos) / "manna" (manna) that creates and sustains true salvific life.

After John's very short account of the Last Supper (Jn 13:1-3) Jesus predicts Judas's betrayal by citing Psalm 41:9: "He who eats my bread has lifted up his heel against me" (Jn 13:18). Thus, the one who has shared an intimate meal with Jesus will be the one who betrays him. Later, after Jesus' resurrection, when the disciples arrive on the shore, Jesus had already prepared breakfast, complete with fish and bread (Jn 21:9). Jesus' actions of taking and giving bread and fish (Jn 21:13) may echo his actions with the bread and fish in the feeding of the five thousand (Jn 6:11) and again emphasizes Jesus as the one who provides sustenance for his people (Jn 21:3-6; cf. Jn 6:7-8).

5. Conclusion.

As the staple of Mediterranean life, bread was an obvious substance that could be used to communicate spiritual realities and life. In the Gospels Jesus miraculously provides physical sustenance ("bread") for his people that foreshadows the "bread" that he will share with his people at the end of the age. Jesus' giving of his body in death is identified as the bread given for the spiritual sustenance of believers. It is then left to John's Gospel to make explicit what the Synoptics imply: Jesus does not only provide bread for his people; he himself is the bread that creates and sustains the life of the age to come.

See also FASTING; LAST SUPPER; LIFE, ETERNAL; LIFE; TABLE FELLOWSHIP; WATER; WINE.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. H. Balz, "ἄρτος," EDNT 1:159-60; R. E. Brown, New Testament Essays (New York: Doubleday, 1965); A. C. Brunson, Psalm 118 in the Gospel of John: An Intertextual Study on the New Exodus Pattern in the Theology of John (WUNT 2/158; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2003); W. D. Davies and D. C. Allison, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Gospel According to Saint Matthew, 3: Commentary on Matthew XIX-XXVIII (ICC; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1997); J. Dennis, Jesus' Death and the Gathering of True Israel: The Johannine Appropriation of Restoration Theology in the Light of John 11.47-52 (WUNT 2/257; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2006); C. A. Evans, Mark 8:27-16:20 (WBC 34B; Nashville: Thomas Nelson, 2001); R. A. Guelich, Mark 1-8:26 (WBC 34A; Waco, TX: Word, 1989); D. A. Hagner, Matthew 14-28 (WBC 33B; Dallas:

Word, 1995); J. Jeremias, Abba: Studien zur neutestamentlichen Theologie und Zeitgeschichte (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1966); C. S. Keener, A Commentary on the Gospel of Matthew (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1999); I. H. Marshall, The Gospel of Luke (NIGTC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1978); J. Nolland, Luke 9:21-18:34 (WBC 35B; Dallas: Word, 1993); idem, The Gospel of Matthew: A Commentary on the Greek Text (NIGTC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2005); R. Pesch, Das Markusevangelium (2 vols.; HTKNT 2; Freiberg: Herder, 1977); B. Witherington III, The Gospel of Mark: A Socio-Rhetorical Commentary (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2001).

J. Dennis

BRIDE, BRIDEGROOM

Eight Gospel passages use the terms nymphē or nymphios. In six of these passages the semantic range of the terms is clearly limited to “bride” or “bridegroom.” These six passages derive from four independent traditions: Jesus’ saying about the wedding guests (Mk 2:18-20), his *parable about the ten bridesmaids (Mt 25:1-10), the Cana wedding story (Jn 2:1-11) and *John the Baptist’s pronouncement about the bridegroom’s voice (Jn 3:25-30). The terms serve two main purposes. In the Cana wedding story the “bridegroom” (Jn 2:9) is one of the characters. In the other three instances the terms function metaphorically, illustrating some aspect of Jesus’ ministry. Significantly, Jesus himself is identified with a bridegroom in Mark 2:18-20 and parallels as well as in Matthew 25:1-10; John 3:28-30, and perhaps implicitly in Matthew 22:1-14; John 2:9; 4:1-42; 12:1-3; 20:1-18. In John’s Gospel Jesus’ followers assume the role of the bride.

1. The Bridegroom in Mark
2. The Bridegroom in Matthew
3. Bride and Bridegroom in John
4. Conclusion

1. The Bridegroom in Mark.

If the two-source theory is correct (see Synoptic Problem), Mark 2:18-20 contains the earliest Gospel bridegroom metaphor. It constitutes part of the central episode of a series of five confrontations that pit the halakah of Jesus against that of the religious authorities (Mk 2:1—3:6). Mark 2:18-20 concerns *fasting. Other pious Jews fast, perhaps as often as twice a week. Jesus’ disciples, however, do not fast. Jesus explains, “The wedding guests cannot fast while the bridegroom is with them, can they? As long as they have the bridegroom with them, they cannot fast” (Mk 2:19 NRSV).

The saying evokes the atmosphere of a Jewish wedding in Jesus’ time. The bridegroom’s family prepared a feast, gathering their relatives and other guests to greet the betrothed couple. The bride arrived first, decked in finery and accompanied by her friends and relations. Then, upon the subsequent arrival of the bridegroom, the celebration began (Malina and Rohrbaugh, 70). Mark 2:19 compares Jesus to the bridegroom and his *disciples to the wedding guests. Just as the wedding guests feast when the bridegroom arrives, so the disciples eat and drink in Jesus’ presence. They simply cannot fast while God’s Son (Mk 1:11) is with them (see Table Fellowship).

There is no way for a historian to be sure that any of the Synoptic Gospels bridegroom sayings originated with Jesus. In the case of Mark 2:19, however, attribution to Jesus is the easiest way to explain the use of this simple but elegant metaphor to illustrate the disciples’ halakah. The case with Mark 2:20 is more complex. Certainly Jesus could have anticipated a time when his followers would have to carry on without him. He might therefore have spoken of such a time when they would find it appropriate to fast. Since Mark 2:20 is more relevant for Mark’s audience than for Jesus’, however, it makes more sense to suppose that Mark added the sentence as a logical corollary of Jesus’ original pronouncement, as, apparently, in the divorce prohibition of Mark 10:11-12 (Hultgren, 81).

It is more difficult to determine whether “bridegroom” is more than just a handy metaphor—that is, whether it bears christological significance. Mark never indicates that it does. He does not elaborate on the bridegroom metaphor, nor does he link it to messianic expectations of any kind. He gives it no more significance than the physician metaphor in the previous episode (Mk 2:17). The comparison of Jesus to a physician illustrates how he can mend human weakness. In the same way, the comparison of Jesus to a bridegroom simply designates him as an honored figure whose presence is celebrated and whose absence is mourned.

On the other hand, a christological interpretation enriches the metaphor, and it could easily have done so for Mark as well as for Jesus. Although there is no precedent in extant early Jewish literature for portraying the Messiah, God’s anointed one, as a bridegroom (see, however, the later rabbinic saying in Pesiq. Rab. 149a), many OT passages place God in the role of a husband (e.g., Is 54:4-8; Jer 31:32; Ezek 16:8-14; Hos 2:1-23). Perhaps more pertinent is Psalm 45, which celebrates the wedding of a king whom God “has anointed” (Ps 45:7) (O’Neill, 485). If Jesus believed that he was the Messiah (see Christ), he might well have identified himself with the royal bridegroom of Psalm 45. Paul, writing about twenty-five years after Jesus' death and as many as fifteen years before Mark, adopts the metaphor easily enough (2 Cor 11:2). Mark too might have made this connection, either independently or in light of previous tradition (Hultgren, 79). This may be reflected in his designation of Jesus as "the Beloved" (Mk 1:11; 9:7), the subject of Psalm 45 according to its Greek inscription (LXX Ps 44:1). In any case, the metaphor in Mark 2:19 could offer more than a general excuse for the disciples' lack of fasting. It could imply, for Mark and perhaps also for Jesus, that the honored individual whose presence they celebrate is none other than the Messiah.

2. The Bridegroom in Matthew.

Both Matthew (Mt 9:14-15) and Luke (Lk 5:33-35) include the saying from Mark 2:18-20. Nowhere else does Luke compare Jesus to a bridegroom. The situation is different for Matthew, however. Two parables near the end of Matthew's Gospel cast Jesus in the bridegroom role: the parable of the wedding banquet (Mt 22:1-14) and the parable of the ten bridesmaids (Mt 25:1-13). Like Mark, Matthew portrays Jesus' followers as wedding guests. Unlike Mark, Matthew shifts from describing their behavior (Mt 9:14-15) to prescribing it (Mt 22:1-14; 25:1-13).

The parable of the wedding banquet is the last in a series of three parables concerning the Jewish authorities' rejection of Jesus (Mt 21:28—22:13). It does not include the terms "bride" or "bridegroom." The first sentence, however, indicates that a king has prepared the wedding banquet for his son (Mt 22:2). If the king represents God, then the son represents Jesus. Matthew thus portrays God's Son, the Messiah (Mt 16:16), as a bridegroom.

Although Matthew continues to identify the feast as a wedding banquet (Mt 22:4, 8-10) and uses the wedding as a premise for the sequel concerning an improperly clothed guest (Mt 22:11-14), the king's son is never mentioned again. The parable itself does not emphasize the bridegroom so much as the outrageous behavior of the invitees. Matthew's emphasis on the royal bridegroom lies more in the fact that he includes the metaphor in the first place, since it is absent from the parallel account in Luke 14:16-24. If Matthew and Luke drew from the same tradition, then Matthew intentionally describes the dinner as a wedding banquet for a king's son. This detail, whether preserved from or added to the original, allows the dinner to represent more than just inclusion among God's people: it is an eschatological event, the consummation of the messianic age.

In the parable of the ten bridesmaids (Mt 25:1-13) Matthew casts Jesus in the role of the bridegroom for a third time. Once more, Jesus' followers are portrayed as wedding guests, this time as friends of the bride. Here, however, there is no Markan or Lukan parallel. This parable appears only in Matthew. Some scholars think that Matthew draws it from tradition, others from his imagination. Either way, his inclusion of this third wedding illustration indicates his affinity for the metaphor of bridegroom and wedding guests.

Matthew places the parable toward the end of Jesus' final discourse (Mt 24:3—25:46). This eschatological discourse ends with a series of warnings for Jesus' followers to prepare for his imminent, unexpected return (Mt 24:32—25:46). Matthew again reaches for the wedding banquet illustration. As usual, he equates Jesus with the honored bridegroom and implicitly compares the feast to the rejoicing inspired by Jesus' presence. In this instance, however, the bridegroom arrives late—a detail that clearly evokes Jesus' delayed parousia. Matthew also portrays ten bridesmaids, whose wise or foolish behavior sets an example for Jesus' followers. Those who are prepared will enter God's kingdom, but those who are unprepared will be shut out.

3. Bride and Bridegroom in John.

The Fourth Gospel handles the metaphor somewhat differently. John 3:28-30 contains the most straightforward example. This bridegroom saying is attributed not to Jesus but rather to John the Baptist. It clearly delineates the roles of the Messiah and the Messiah's forerunner by comparing them to a bridegroom and his friend. In addition, it implies that Jesus' popularity with the people is like a bridegroom's relationship with his bride. It also implies that just as a bridegroom stands to increase his family, so Jesus will keep gaining followers. This causes John the Baptist to rejoice. As the bridegroom's friend, he is pleased about the prospects for the newly married couple.

This saying is unique among the Gospels in that it explicitly likens "the Messiah" (Jn 3:28) to a bridegroom. In addition, it portrays Jesus' current followers not as wedding guests but rather as the bride, with his future followers as the anticipated children. Having made such a strong statement on this theme, however, John seems to let it die out. His only other use of the noun "bridegroom" is found at John 2:9 in the Cana wedding story.

Although this bridegroom is an independent character, several scholars have argued that the remark in John 2:9 hints that Jesus is also a bridegroom. After all, Jesus has just performed the bridegroom's duty of supplying wine (Jn 2:10). And this is not the only story in John where the bridegroom metaphor seems to lurk. Soon after John the Baptist says, "He must increase" (Jn 3:30), Jesus meets a Samaritan woman at a well (Jn 4:1-42). In a scene reminiscent of the betrothal scenes in Genesis 24:1-67; 29:1-20; Exodus 2:15-22, the woman runs off and tells the citizens of Sychar. They come to the well and become Jesus' followers. Jesus and the woman have started a family of sorts. Then, toward the end of John's story, two scenes seem to evoke passages from Song of Songs. In John 12:1-3 Jesus plays the part of the reclining, perfumed king of Song of Songs 1:12. In John 20:1-18 he is like the missing beloved of Song of Songs 3:1-4; 5:6. In each case, one of Jesus' female followers assumes the role of the bride in Song of Songs.

It is possible, then, that the bridegroom metaphor in John accomplishes more than just contrasting the relationship between Jesus and John the Baptist, setting a joyful tone and establishing that Jesus will continue to gain followers. It is possible that, having likened the Messiah to a bridegroom, John then shows that he is *anointed for *burial and raised from death in a manner reminiscent of Song of Songs, the Scripture's tribute to a royal bride and bridegroom.

4. Conclusion.

Although it appears infrequently, the bridegroom metaphor significantly enriches the Gospels' portrayal of Jesus. As Mark, Matthew, John and perhaps even Jesus himself realized, the utility of the bridegroom metaphor for describing Jesus lies in its ability to exploit multiple parallels. A bridegroom is ending a period of betrothal. Bridegroom and bride enter into a new relationship that usually leads to the birth of children. Friends and family celebrate this joyful occasion with feasting, especially when the newly married couple is present. Wedding guests are expected to behave appropriately. It seems natural to apply this metaphor to Jesus, the Messiah, whose advent inaugurates God's joyfully anticipated reign.

See also ESCHATOLOGY; PARABLES.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R. Batey, New Testament Nuptial Imagery (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1971); M. Blickenstaff, "While the Bridegroom Is with Them": Marriage, Family, Gender, and Violence in the Gospel of Matthew (JSNT-Sup 292; London: T & T Clark, 2005); A. Fehribach, The Women in the Life of the Bridegroom: A Feminist Historical-Literary Analysis of the Female Characters in the Fourth Gospel (Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1998); A. J. Hultgren, Jesus and His Adversaries: The Form and Function of the Conflict Stories in the Synoptic Tradition (Minneapolis: Augsburg, 1979); J. Jeremias, "νύμφη, νυμφίος," TDNT 4:1099-1106; B. J. Malina and R. C. Rohrbaugh, Social Science Commentary on the Gospel of John (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1998); J. McWhirter, The Bridegroom Messiah and the People of God: Marriage in the Fourth Gospel (SNTSMS 138; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2006); J. C. O'Neill, "The Source of the Parables of the Bridegroom and the Wicked Husbandmen," JTS 39 (1988) 485-89. J. McWhirter

BRIDEGROOM. See BRIDE, BRIDEGROOM.

BURIAL OF JESUS

The Gospels and early church tradition affirm that Jesus, subsequent to his crucifixion and prior to his *resurrection, was buried in a rock-cut tomb just outside *Jerusalem. Such an interment conforms to common first-century A.D. Jewish burial procedure.

1. Burial in the Greco-Roman World
2. Burial in Palestine
3. Burial and the Jesus of History
4. Burial in the Gospels
5. Location of Jesus' Burial

1. Burial in the Greco-Roman World.

Both Greek and Roman funerary practices varied over the centuries, vacillating between inhumation (burial of complete bodies) and cremation (incineration of bodies to ashes), with both procedures at times in vogue simultaneously. However, in the first century A.D., generally cremation was performed in the Latin West and inhumation in the Greek East (Hope, 80-85). Burials in the East were commonly entombments outside town or city and could involve a variety of forms, such as individual trench graves, tile graves, chamber tombs and rock-cut cave tombs. Preferences for the kind of interment varied regionally, but there exists substantive first-century A.D. archeological evidence for rock-cut tombs in Egypt and in the Levant (including Palestine and the Transjordan). In all forms of Roman burial the bodies normally were washed, anointed with perfume, and wrapped in cloth. Eulogies were delivered. Corpses frequently were interred with burial goods (especially jewelry, glass vessels and pottery). Afterward, mourners often celebrated feasts in honor of the dead.

2. Burial in Palestine.

In first-century A.D. Judea burial also followed various types. Shallow trench graves (or shaft graves), dug in the soil for one person, are found outside Jerusalem (especially at Beit Zafafa) and at Qumran and Wadi Ghweir. Some consider trench graves to reflect a sectarian practice (plausibly *Essene in light of Qumran examples [see Hachlili, 475-79]), though it is likely that it was also a common method of burial among the poorer members of society (Kloner and Zissu, 95-99). In addition, many examples of rock-cut tombs (hewn as caves into slopes) have been discovered near Jerusalem, as well as at Jericho and Ein-Gedi. Wooden coffins might be employed in both trench graves and rock-cut tombs, as witnessed in Ein-Gedi, Jericho and Qumran (Hachlili, 75-94). Although some stone sarcophagi have been recovered, very little archaeological evidence exists for coffins being used in Jerusalem (Kloner and Zissu, 104).

Rock-cut tombs in Jerusalem typically functioned as family tombs, holding multiple bodies. These were closed with heavy stone slabs, which very occasionally were round but more often were rectangular. A. Kloner suggests Jesus' tomb would have been closed with a rectangular stone that was "dislodged" or "moved" rather than "rolled" like a wheel (Kloner and Zissu, 53-56). In such tombs mourners generally laid the bodies either on loculi (also called kokhim), which were horizontal surfaces hewn into the cave that allowed bodies to be inserted, or on arcosolia, which were bench shelves cut sideways along a wall underneath an arch. In order to make space for further burials, families could engage in secondary burial, in which decomposed skeletons were removed from the loculus or arcosolium and were either piled together or placed in ossuaries (cf. m. Sanh. 6:6; Sem. 12:6-9).

Ossuaries are lidded boxes, most often carved from chalk or limestone. Archeological evidence suggests that these were employed in the Jerusalem area from the late first century B.C. to around A.D. 70 (with some scattered use into the second or third century A.D.). Ossuaries for individual adults usually measure around 42-65 cm long, 23-28 cm wide, and 30-39 cm high, although ossuaries could be constructed smaller for children or larger to hold multiple skeletons (Rahmani, 6). Decoration of these boxes could range from plain surfaces to elaborately detailed geometric patterns. Into ossuaries families placed the decomposed bones of one, two or three bodies (occasionally bones from various bodies seem to have been confused). Sometimes inscriptions on ossuary exteriors identified the deceased. Given Christian tradition and the frequency of the names Jesus and Joseph in antiquity (regularly found inscribed on ossuaries), it is highly improbable that any of the currently known "Jesus son of Joseph" ossuaries ever contained the remains of Jesus of Nazareth (see further Meyers et al., and Quarles). Scholars debate the origins of ossuary reburial, with some arguing that such a careful collecting of the deceased implies a hope in resurrection, though it is then difficult to understand why multiple bodies could be found in a single ossuary and why *Sadducees (who did not believe in a bodily resurrection) practiced such procedures. Other possibilities for the origins of ossuaries include the availability of skilled workers and supplies in the Herodian period (Evans, 26-30) or an attempt to emulate Roman cinerary urns (Magness, 129-40).

Prior to burial in a rock-cut tomb, the body was washed and then wrapped in a cloth shroud (e.g., In 11:44; m. Kil. 9:4; Sem. 12:10), though the decay of such cloth makes it a rare archeological discovery (Kloner and Zissu, 103). Mourners applied ointments and aromatic spices to the corpse, not as a preservative (the body was expected to decay within a year for possible reburial), but in order to reduce the unpleasant smell in the tomb (e.g., Josephus, J.W. 1.673; m. Ber. 8:6). In rabbinic tradition, movement of corpses and some other burial procedures are forbidden on the Sabbath (m. Šabb. 23:4-5). Purity laws labeled the corpse and the items that it touched unclean (e.g., Num 19:11-19; Josephus, Ant. 4.81; m. 'Ohal. 1:1-2:7, 3:1-6; m. Kel. 23:4), though such uncleanness did not prevent one from celebrating Passover (Num 9:10) (see Clean and Unclean).

Reports of burial, and the need to bury the dead, are often emphasized in the OT (e.g., Gen 23:1-20; 25:9-10; 47:30; 49:29-32; Josh 24:32; 2 Sam 2:4-5). The importance of burial continued into Second Temple Judaism (e.g., Tob 1:17-18; 2:7; 6:14; 14:10; Josephus, Ag. Ap. 2.205, 211), even concerning those judicially condemned to death (Josephus, Ant. 4.265). The disciples of *John the Baptist, possibly with some risk, carefully buried the corpse of their leader (Mt 14:12), as did the church in the Lukan account of Stephen's stoning (Acts 8:2). In contrast, Jesus' declaration "Let the dead bury the dead" (Lk 9:60) must have sounded quite shocking in its time.

3. Burial and the Jesus of History.

Early Christian traditions widely testify to Jesus' burial, including some very early creedal formulations (e.g., 1 Cor 15:4, with pre-Pauline implications). Paul, among others, discusses the theological import of Jesus' burial (Rom 6:4; Col 2:12). Passing mention of Jesus' entombment appears in Acts 13:29 (with an ambiguous reference to "they laid him in the tomb"). The Gospels anticipate Jesus' interment when a woman *anoints him with costly perfume (Mt 26:12; Mk 14:8; Jn 12:7; cf. Lk 7:36-50). Moreover, the canonical Gospels provide fairly detailed reports about Jesus' burial by Joseph of Arimathea in a rock-cut tomb (Mt 27:57-61; Mk 15:42-47; Lk 23:50-56; Jn 19:38-42), and later traditions concur (e.g., Gos. Pet. 6:23-24). The burial of Jesus is thus firmly entrenched in our earliest witnesses.

Although Roman crucifixion typically involved prolonged suspension of the body (e.g., Petronius, Sat. 112), at the decision of the local Roman legate victims of Roman crucifixion could indeed be buried before significant religious/cultural festivals (such as Caesar's birthday [see Philo, Flacc. 83])(see further Cook, 193-213). Pilate likely was aware that such an exception to Roman practice would be especially important in light of the religious sensibilities in Judea during Passover. As previously noted, burial was viewed as a religious mandate in Judaism. Furthermore, some Jewish texts specifically require the burial of the crucified in compliance with Deuteronomy 21:22-23 (Philo, Spec. 3.151-152; Josephus, J.W. 4.317) (see Chapman, 117-49). The religious desire of a family to bury a crucified person was so ingrained in Jewish consciousness that later rabbinic texts were obliged to state that such burial should not be obligatory when the Roman government outlaws it (Sem. 2:9, 11) (see Chapman, 199-202). At least one crucified body has been found reburied in an inscribed ossuary in the vicinity of Jerusalem (at Givat ha-Mivtar); such an ossuary likely implies family involvement in the funeral rituals.

Some have pointed to rabbinic texts that signal a separate burial place for criminals condemned by the *Sanhedrin (m. Sanh. 6:5; t. Sanh. 9:8; cf. Josephus, Ant. 4.202) in order to insist that Jesus could not have been buried in a rock-cut family tomb. Others, in defense of Jesus' burial, have suggested that the figure of Joseph of Arimathea must actually have represented the Sanhedrin's desire to produce a shameful criminal interment (Brown, 2:1213-19; McCane, 89-108) rather than having acted as a disciple of Jesus (despite Mt 27:57; Jn 19:38). However, it makes sense that a man of Joseph's Sanhedrin rank could request Jesus' body from Pilate—doing so as a "secret disciple" (Jn 19:38) who had not concurred with the Sanhedrin's decision (Lk 23:51)—with the intent of burying Jesus honorably in his own new and unused family tomb. By doing this Joseph also interred Jesus apart from other corpses, thus partly complying with rabbinic law to bury condemned criminals separately. Other details in the Gospel texts fit their Jewish context well (such as the concern not to bury on the Sabbath, the use of spices and the sealing stone). All of this supports the general contention that Jesus was buried as the Gospels report (Keener, 2:1157-66; Magness, 140-49).

4. Burial in the Gospels.

The four canonical Gospels broadly agree concerning most central matters. Joseph, from the town of Arimathea, employed a rock-cut tomb to bury Jesus. Joseph is called a "disciple of Jesus" in Matthew and John, while Mark and Luke describe him as a man "waiting for the kingdom of God." Joseph receives permission from Pilate to bury Jesus that day, noting that it was the day of preparation for the Sabbath, and that no burial could occur on the Sabbath. Joseph takes Jesus' body, wraps it in linen, places it in the grave, and seals the tomb with a stone.

Some specific details should be noted. Three Gospel accounts remark that Joseph's tomb was previously unused (Mt 27:60; Lk 23:53; Jn 19:41). According to the Synoptic Gospels, at least two women (Mary Magdalene and Mary the mother of Joses) were there to witness the burial, and their names are explicitly mentioned in Matthew and Mark. In all four Gospels the women later returned to an empty tomb (in Mark and Luke this was in order to bring spices for continued burial rituals). The Synoptic Gospels also record that the tomb was "hewn in the rock."

Only Matthew explicitly states that the tomb itself actually belonged to Joseph of Arimathea (Mt 27:60; cf. Gos. Pet. 6:24). This appears reasonable, since otherwise it is unlikely that he would have quick access to a rock-cut family tomb (Magness, 145-49). John adds the detail that the tomb was in a garden near the place of Jesus' crucifixion (Jn 19:41). Joseph is variously described among the Gospels as "rich" (Matthew), "a prominent member of the council" (Mark and Luke), a "good and righteous man" who had not consented to Jesus' execution (Luke), and a "secret" disciple "for fear of the Jews" (John). Mark carefully testifies that prior to permitting the burial, Pilate inquired of the centurion to verify that Jesus had died (Mk 15:44-45).

Matthew emphasizes that Pilate, at the behest of the chief priests and Pharisees, permitted a guard and a seal to be placed on the tomb (Mt 27:62-66; cf. Gos. Pet. 8:28-33; 11:43-49). In Matthew's Gospel this ultimately serves as apologetic evidence for the resurrection as well as providing further narrative of the continued opposition of Jewish leaders to Jesus and to the church.

Joseph of Arimathea would certainly have required assistance in transporting Jesus' body; yet, only John records that Joseph was accompanied by the same Nicodemus encountered earlier in his Gospel (Jn 19:39; cf. Jn 3:1ff.; 7:50). Joseph and Nicodemus brought spices (a mixture of myrrh and aloes) weighing a hundred Roman pounds (approximately 75 lbs. = 34 kg). They included these spices in the linen wrappings. This excessively large quantity (and its immense cost) has been variously interpreted either as a faithless procedure by people who did not anticipate Jesus' resurrection or, as seems more likely, as a faithful act of secret disciples who were now willing to take a public stand while the apostles themselves cowered in hiding (Keener, 2:1157-62). Immense quantities of spices are known from a few famous funerals (such as Herod [Josephus, Ant. 17.199]); John thus implies a regal burial by true disciples.

Clearly, the most important dimension of Jesus' burial in all four Gospels concerns their insistence that his tomb was empty when the women and others came to visit. Thus the tomb of Jesus in the Gospels principally serves as testimony to Jesus' resurrection.

5. Location of Jesus' Burial.

Currently, two different locales in Jerusalem compete for visitors seeking Jesus' empty tomb. However, the Garden Tomb (Gordon's Calvary), chosen in the nineteenth century by Charles George Gordon because it was outside the medieval walls of Jerusalem and near a cranial-shaped outcropping, is most credibly identified as an Iron Age tomb (i.e., OT era) reused in the Byzantine period (Barkay).

Although we cannot be certain, a more plausible location is found in the rotunda of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre. The strength of early Byzantine Christian tradition, manifest in Constantine building a basilica church at the behest of his mother, Helena, supports this. In the early first century A.D. this area, though later incorporated into the city, was located outside the walls of Jerusalem and was used for tombs. The rotunda (or Anastasis) surrounds a former hill that had been leveled, except for the cave that contained a single burial niche in antiquity (Bahat).

See also DEATH OF JESUS; RESURRECTION.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. D. Bahat, "Does the Holy Sepulchre Church Mark the Burial of Jesus?" BAR 12.3 (1986) 26-45; G. Barkay, "The Garden Tomb: Was Jesus Buried Here?" BAR 12.2 (1986) 40-53, 56-57; R. E. Brown, The Death of the Messiah: From Gethsemane to the Grave; A Commentary on the Passion Narratives in the Four Gospels (2 vols.; New York: Doubleday, 1994) 2:1199-1313; D. W. Chapman, Ancient Jewish and Christian Perceptions of Crucifixion (WUNT 2/244; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2008); J. G. Cook, "Crucifixion and Burial," NTS 57 (2011) 193-213; C. A. Evans, Jesus and the Ossuaries (Waco, TX: Baylor University Press, 2003); R. Hachlili, Jewish Funerary Customs, Practices and Rites in the Second Temple Period (JSJSup 94; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2005); V. M. Hope, Roman Death: The Dying and the Dead in Ancient Rome (New York: Continuum, 2009); C. S. Keener, The Gospel of John: A Commentary (2 vols.; Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 2003); A. Kloner and B. Zissu, The Necropolis of Jerusalem in the Second Temple Period (ISACR 8; Leuven: Peeters, 2007); J. Magness, "Ossuaries and the Burials of Jesus and James," JBL 124 (2005) 121-54; B. R. McCane, Roll Back the Stone: Death and Burial in the World of Jesus (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 2003); E. Meyers et al., "Forum: The Talpiot 'Jesus' Family Tomb," NEA 69 (2006) 116-37; C. L. Quarles, ed., Buried Hope or Risen Savior? The Search for the Jesus Tomb (Nashville: B & H Academic, 2008); L. Y. Rahmani, A Catalogue of Jewish Ossuaries in the Collections of the State of Israel (Jerusalem: Israel Antiquities Authority, 1994).

D. W. Chapman

C

CAESAREA PHILIPPI. See ARCHEOLOGY AND GEOGRAPHY.

CALL OF DISCIPLES. See APOSTLE.

CANA. See ARCHEOLOGY AND GEOGRAPHY.

CANON

The word canon, in Christian thought, pertains first of all to the list of writings deemed by the church to belong to the divinely given, Holy Scriptures. More precise definitions of the term vary somewhat within different Christian traditions, and considerably so among present-day scholars. When, beginning in the middle of the fourth century, the term is first used for Christian writings, no explicit definition is given. One may deduce that words such as canon, canonical and canonize denoted the normativity of certain books that were received by the church as being of divine origin, and as belonging to an exclusive set of Scriptures permanently given for the life of the church. Some today insist that the notion of exclusivity must be present for any legitimate application of the word canon, while others maintain that the word is justifiably used when normativity is in view. Despite a diversity of opinion today on this and other matters related to the rise of the NT canon, there is widespread agreement on two fronts: (1) some books of the NT were recognized as Scripture very early (even by the end of the first century), at least by some churches, but (2) the expressed agreement of the majority of churches on the scriptural (i.e., canonical) status of all twenty-seven books of the NT was not achieved until late in the fourth century. When it comes to the *Gospels specifically, however, we have the benefit of clearer and more abundant attestation even in the early period. A robust confession of a canon of four Gospels is indisputably present in the 180s in Irenaeus of Lyons, who spoke of the four Gospels—Matthew, Mark, Luke, John—as “handed down to us from the apostles,” as alone “true and reliable,” and as admitting of “neither an increase nor diminution” of their number (Haer. 3.11.9; cf. 3.1.1; 3.11.8). Opinions are polarized, however, over the question of how representative Irenaeus’s views were at the time. Some believe that Irenaeus’s view of the exclusivity of the four Gospels was his own innovation and was out of step with his contemporaries even in the “Great Church.” A number of roughly contemporary sources, however, evince virtually the same view as that held by Irenaeus, and by his time there had been a long history of the use of these four Gospels, some sources even disclosing a perception of a limited “canon” of four.

1. Foundations
2. The Fourfold Gospel: Literary Attestation
3. The Fourfold Gospel: Artifactual Attestation
4. Conclusion

1. Foundations.

By the early first century A.D. many Jews found in the converging strands of epic narrative, poetry, wisdom and prophecy in their Scriptures the promise of a final prophet/deliverer, a messiah, who would save them from God’s enemies and establish righteousness on earth (Lk 2:25, 38; Acts 5:36–37; Josephus, Ant. 18.4–9, 23). Some of these same passages also predicted a message of good news to accompany this final deliverance—a new “law” and “word of the Lord” to go forth from Jerusalem to the ends of the earth (e.g., Deut 18:15–19; Ps 2:8; Is 2:2–3; 49:6; 52:7), to make both Israel and the nations glad. When Jesus of Nazareth was manifested to Israel as the Messiah (Jn 1:31), he brought the promised “good news” of the nearness of the *kingdom of God in his own person. As integral to his mission, he authorized a chosen group of disciples to carry his *gospel message—the new law and word of the Lord—further to the lost sheep of the house of *Israel and to the nations (Mt 28:16-20; Lk 24:44-49; Jn 20:21-23; Gal 2:7-9).

In the course of the early mission of Jesus' apostles and their associates, while their *oral proclamation was still being heard and remembered, written accounts of Jesus' words and works began to be drawn up for the benefit of the communities of Christians that had formed. We do not know how many such attempts were made (cf. Lk 1:1), but four books in particular survived the first century through relatively wide distribution and use by Christians around the empire.

2. The Fourfold Gospel: Literary Attestation.

2.1. Witnesses to the Four. Each of the four Gospels individually can boast of some form of early attestation, even from our quite limited literary sources. It appears that Luke's Gospel is known as Scripture already by the time it is cited in 1 Timothy 5:18 (cf. Luke 10:7). The author of the Didache, perhaps before the end of the first century, seems to know at least Matthew as a "Gospel" (e.g., Did. 8:2; 9:5; 11:2-4) and possibly Luke (e.g., Did. 1:3). By the early years of the second century Papias of Hierapolis was learning traditions, probably passed along by John the presbyter, about the origins of Gospels used in Asia Minor. From quotations preserved by Eusebius (Hist. eccl. 3.39.15-16), we know these included Gospels attributed to Mark (as based on Peter's teaching) and Matthew. From references to Papias's work in other writers, it is apparent that he also knew Luke and John. If (as has been argued) Eusebius's anonymous source in Historia ecclesiastica 3.24.6-13 is also Papias, then Papias knew these four Gospels as an exclusive group. The letters of Ignatius, written probably before 110, almost certainly reveal his knowledge of at least Matthew (Ign. Smyrn. 1:1) and John (e.g., Ign. Rom. 7:2-3; Ign. Phld. 7:1), and perhaps Luke as well (Ign. Smyrn. 1:1, 3). The apologist Aristides, in the 120s or 130s, mentions a written Gospel, and he seems to reflect knowledge of at least Luke and John, and perhaps Matthew and Mark as well. It appears that the Epistula Apostolorum (ca. 140s) knows all four Gospels and may presume the existence of the four-Gospel canon.

Writing just after the midpoint of the second century, Justin in Rome uses all four Gospels in his extant writings, and apparently only these four. In them Justin found the words of Jesus, "filled with the Spirit of God, and big with power, and flourishing with grace" (Dial. 9). This must have mirrored the experience of the churches as well, for Justin reports that Gospels, which he also calls "Memoirs of the Apostles," were being read and expounded as Scripture in Sunday services, alongside the Prophets (1 Apol. 67). Probably in the 160s or 170s Celsus, a critic of Christianity, used all four Gospels in his broadside against the Christian church (Origen, Cels. 2.16, 34; 5.59, cf. 5.61).

Despite recent efforts to redate it to the late fourth century, the Muratorian Fragment's several strong links to the late second or early third century justify its traditional position there. This document, probably originating from somewhere in Italy, gives a discursive list of the books that "the catholic church" receives. Although its first lines are missing, the surviving text names Luke as the third of the Gospels and John as the fourth. It is clear that in the view of this author the church catholic receives four, and only four, Gospels.

Clement of Alexandria wrote only slightly later than Irenaeus and in a place far removed from the frontier city of Lyons. Despite the fact that Clement knows other Gospels, occasionally cites them, and at times even seems to accept something in them at face value, he displays a clear notion of a canon of only four. Clement not only uses each of the four as Scripture, he also specifically refers to them as "the four Gospels that have been handed down to us," contrasting them in this regard to the Gospel of the Egyptians (Strom. 3.13.93). He casually mentions that Mark and other Gospels were homologomenoi—that is, "confessed" or "acknowledged" in the church (Quis div. 1.5). This terminology would also be used by Origen and Eusebius in their catalogues of scriptural books. In his Hypotyposes Clement preserves a tradition about the origins of the Gospels, probably from his mentor Pantaenus, purporting to come from a much earlier time. This tradition refers to John as the "last of all," denoting another early perception that there were four and only four authentic Gospels (Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 6.14.5-7).

In the 190s Serapion of Antioch too had a body of Christian books received by tradition. Serapion is of particular interest because he once approved the reading of the Gospel of Peter before later retracting that permission after learning that the book had heretical tendencies. This is often claimed as disproving the existence of a four-Gospel canon at the end of the second century. It is most likely, however, that Serapion at first regarded the book as a harmless, popular digest of the stories of Jesus recorded in the church's Gospels; his initial approval evidently was for supplementary reading in nonliturgical contexts. For Serapion had this to say about the church's reception of authoritative writings: "For we ourselves, brothers, receive both Peter and the other apostles as Christ, but, as having experience in such matters, we reject the pseudepigrapha written in their name, knowing that we did not receive such writings by tradition [ou parelabomen]" (Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 6.12.3-6). Almost certainly, these received writings included the four Gospels (Matthew, Mark, Luke, John), which his episcopal predecessor Theophilus had incorporated into a Gospel harmony (see 3.3. below) and had used as Scripture in his Ad Autolyicum.

Matthew and John are most frequently cited, but each of the canonical Gospels is used or named in ecclesiastical authors from a very early time, and the attestation for each far outstrips that of any other Gospel. Moreover, by the last two decades of the second century, testimonies to a fourfold Gospel converge from widely divergent geographical areas: Alexandria, Antioch, Italy and Gaul. From this time on, the fourfold Gospel seems to be standard among Greek and Latin churches (though Syriac-speaking churches primarily knew them only in the form of the Gospel harmony known as the Diatessaron), so that by the 240s Origen could say that these Gospels were "the only indisputable ones in the Church of God under heaven" (Commentary on Matthew in Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 6.25.4).

2.2. Four Gospels or Many? Christians in the second and third centuries, of course, were well aware that other Gospels were circulating, each of which must have had at least some readers (see Gospels: Apocryphal). Attitudes toward these books varied to some extent among leaders of the apostolic churches. Irenaeus seems to have known only heretical alternatives (such as the Valentinian Gospel of Truth), which he regarded as worthless fabrications. Others, such as the Alexandrians Clement and Origen, Serapion of Antioch, and perhaps the anonymous author of 2 Clement, while they might condemn some Gospels out of hand, also believed that they could critically discern what was genuine or valuable in certain "unacknowledged" books and used them accordingly. Origen viewed such books as "mixed," containing both truth and falsehood. Such discriminative and selective procedures, however, these authors did not employ with the four Gospels, which the church regarded as given by God in their fullness and entirety.

Nearly all, if not all, of the other Gospels that we now know to have been in circulation in the second century were reliant to one degree or another on one or more of the four. The Gospel of Peter, the Gospel of the Ebionites and the Egerton Gospel (possibly the so-called Fayum Gospel as well) have even been called "harmonizing Gospels," telling the story of Jesus in part by combining the accounts in one or more of the four Gospels with the addition of materials of various kinds. Even those Gospels that diverge most radically from the four, such as the Gospel of Judas and the Gospel of Mary, knew them as sources. To be sure, some scholars have argued that certain noncanonical Gospels (e.g., Gospel of Thomas, Gospel of Peter, Egerton Gospel) once existed in a (now lost) version more primitive than any of the four. Yet none of these arguments has won the assent of the majority of scholars, and it remains the case that the earliest known forms of these Gospels appear to be dependent on one or more of the canonical Gospels.

Some Gospel-like books, promoted today as real rivals of the four, apparently were never intended to compete with other books that functioned as Scripture. For instance, the Infancy Gospel of Thomas and the Protevangelium of James, two works from the middle or late second century, neither of which was known as a "Gospel" in antiquity, dealt with time frames essentially outside the main chronologies of the four. Church leaders may not have liked them, but presumably they could be read without prejudice to a Gospel such as Matthew or John. The Protevangelium of James, in fact, eventually became quite popular precisely among Christians who held only the four Gospels to be canonical. The Epistula Apostolorum borrowed the fictional construct of the postresurrection dialogue between Jesus and his disciples in order to advance an orthodox agenda and witness indirectly to the church's Gospels. It is probably also the case that some "Gospel literature," such as Marcion's Gospel (a "corrected" version of Luke [ca. 150]) and the Valentinian Gospel of Truth (ca. 150), were not viewed, even by the groups who used them, as "sacred Scripture" in the same way as other Christians considered their books to be.

All of this is a reminder that Gospels and other like materials were written for a variety of purposes and were put to a variety of uses. The mere existence of more than four Gospels, even their occasional use by church writers, is not necessarily disruptive to the notion of a four-Gospel canon.

3. The Fourfold Gospel:

Artifactual Attestation.

Some scholars would mitigate the importance of the literary sources of the first three centuries because most of these sources are biased on the orthodox and elite side. Thus, they are not believed to represent the breadth and diversity of opinion among early Christians. The survival of relatively fewer “nonorthodox” and “nonelite” sources of the period is attributed to the successful suppression of these writings on the part of the victorious orthodox, after the Christianization of the empire under Constantine. In the meantime, exciting archeological discoveries of early Christian papyri in Egypt purportedly offer a more impartial fund of evidence. This evidence, some claim, puts the lie to the declarations of bishops such as Irenaeus, showing that in the early period several noncanonical Gospels were at least as popular as the four. There are, for example, currently more early manuscripts of the Gospel of Thomas (three) than of the Gospel of Mark (one). But as we will see in the next section, when all the data are assessed, it appears that the manuscript evidence as it presently exists complements the literary sources very nicely and exhibits their common witness in tangible form.

3.1. Physical Format: Codex Versus Roll. First, there is the elementary matter of the book form. In the time of Jesus the customary form of a book, whether secular or sacred, was the roll. But our earliest discoveries of Christian manuscripts reveal that Christians from a very early time and in virtually every known example adopted the more novel, but also more labor-intensive, format of the codex (like the modern book) for their copies of scriptural books. This was the case for both OT and NT books, including the Gospels. At the present time, the four Gospels—Matthew, Mark, Luke or John—are represented forty times in thirty-five second- or third-century manuscripts retrieved from the Egyptian sands. Not a single one of these is an unused roll, and only one is an opisthograph (a text written on the outside of a used roll, presumably when no other materials were available). The remaining thirty-nine instances are in codex form.

By contrast, there are now ten pre-fourth-century papyrus fragments containing Gospel texts other than Matthew, Mark, Luke or John. This numerical disparity (thirty-nine versus ten) hardly shows an equivalence of popularity, despite Mark’s current underrepresentation. But more importantly, of these ten only five are codices (including just one copy of the Gospel of Thomas), four are copied onto unused rolls, and one is an opisthograph. This means that just five of the ten earliest fragments of noncanonical Gospels have even the basic physical form that would have made them appear analogous to the thirty-nine contemporary copies of one of the canonical Gospels. And even these five fragments show certain irregularities (in codex size, formality of the scribal hand, use of nomina sacra abbreviations, etc.) when compared to contemporary manuscripts containing Matthew, Mark, Luke or John.

Our earliest evidence, as it now stands, thus indicates that distinctions between the Gospels were often being made even at the production stage, as they were being prepared and copied as physical objects. These distinctions should not be interpreted to mean that no one ever considered Gospels other than the four to be authoritative, inspired or scriptural; however, they do suggest that any who might have regarded them in these ways probably stood apart from what appears to be the Christian mainstream, if judged by the scribal tradition. Our manuscript evidence suggests that works such as the Gospel of Thomas, the Gospel of Mary and the Gospel of Peter either tended to be regarded differently from the four canonical Gospels, even by those who copied them, or else those who copied them tended to belong to different scribal networks from those who copied the canonical Gospels.

3.2. Multiple-Gospel Codices. The fourfold Gospel was not a mere idea; it was taking material shape in various ways. Probably the most consequential of these was the attempt to bind two or more of these Gospels together into one physical format in the codices produced by Christian scribes. Binding originally distinct books together in this way only increased the impression that such books, in some sense, belonged together. Our first surviving codex containing all four Gospels is the third-century P⁴⁵, which holds all four Gospels and Acts. From somewhat earlier is P⁷⁵, a codex that contains Luke and John together, which some speculate may have had a companion volume containing Matthew and Mark. The fragments known as P⁴⁺⁶⁴⁺⁶⁷ date to the late second or early third century and contain parts of Matthew and Luke from the same codex, a codex that probably contained more Gospels. Our evidence of Gospel codices from the first three centuries shows so far only combinations of the four—that is, no combinations of, say, Matthew, Mark and Thomas, or John, Peter and Mary.

3.3. Gospel Synopses and Harmonies. Codices made to contain two or all four of the church’s Gospels were not the only physical expression of the four-Gospel canon. Some time in the third century Ammonius of Alexandria constructed the first known Gospel synopsis, which laid out in one book the three parallel accounts alongside Matthew’s as the base text. An even earlier effect of a perceived fourfold Gospel has already been mentioned. The Gospel harmony composed by Theophilus of Antioch, and the better-known Diatessaron made by Tatian the Syrian, a former student of Justin, were harmonies of the same four Gospels, the ones that Irenaeus and Clement said were already traditional in their day. It has been confidently claimed that Tatian used other Gospels, but the evidence for this is tenuous. If any other written sources were used, they were not used programmatically like the four. That at least two Gospel harmonies combining the accounts of the same four Gospels should appear by the 170s seems to attest a previous recognition of these four as set apart, in at least some Christian circles in Rome and Antioch. One Greek parchment fragment (P. Dura 10 [on a roll, not a codex]) of the Diatessaron, dating to the mid-third century or before, was discovered at Dura-Europos in Syria in 1933.

A significant point about this artifactual evidence is that all of it comes from the time before Constantine and cannot be explained away as the result of an alleged orthodox suppression. The statistics, of course, will change as new discoveries are made. But unless they change quite dramatically from the way they are trending, they will continue to support and fill out the picture of the early reception of Gospels and other Christian writings gained from literary sources.

4. Conclusion.

Our present data do not permit a clear conclusion as to when the perception of a four-Gospel canon first arose or took hold of the mind of the church. From the last half of the second century, however, descend lines of evidence pointing to an earlier recognition in the first half: (1) the widespread use of each of these Gospels as Scripture and the common appeal by late-second-century authors to a more ancient tradition of the grouping of the four; (2) the appearance of at least two four-Gospel harmonies; (3) the tendency to bind two or all four of these Gospels together into codices. If one were to conjecture that the perception of a four-Gospel canon arose not many years after the last of the four Gospels was distributed to a number of churches, this would at least account for a great deal of what was to come. In any case, it was not long before the church's adherence to its fourfold witness to Jesus seemed so natural and so vital that it inspired comparisons between the Gospels and the four winds (Irenaeus), the four elements of creation (Origen), the four living creatures beneath the throne of God (Irenaeus), and the four rivers that water the church, the paradise of God (Hippolytus).

See also CANONICAL CRITICISM; GOSPEL: GENRE; GOSPELS: APOCRYPHAL; TEXTUAL CRITICISM.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J.-M. Auwers and H. J. de Jonge, eds., The Biblical Canons (BETL 163; Leuven: Leuven University Press, 2003); J. Barton, Holy Writings, Sacred Text: The Canon in Early Christianity (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1997); R. Bauckham, Jesus and the Eyewitnesses: The Gospels as Eyewitness Testimony (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2006); S. D. Charlesworth, "Indicators of Catholicity in Early Gospel Manuscripts," in The Early Text of the New Testament, ed. C. E. Hill and M. J. Kruger (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2012) 37-48; D. L. Dungan, Constantine's Bible: Politics and the Making of the New Testament (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2007); J. K. Elliott, "Manuscripts, the Codex and the Canon," JSNT 63 (1996) 105-23; P. Foster, ed., The Non-Canonical Gospels (London: T & T Clark, 2008); H. Y. Gamble, Books and Readers in the Early Church: A History of Early Christian Texts (New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1995); A. F. Gregory and C. M. Tuckett, eds., The Reception of the New Testament in the Apostolic Fathers (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2005); D. D. Hannah, "The Four-Gospel 'Canon' in the Epistula Apostolorum," JTS 59 (2008) 598-633; M. Hengel, The Four Gospels and the One Gospel of Jesus Christ (London: SCM Press, 2009); C. E. Hill, "Ignatius, 'the Gospel' and the Gospels," in Trajectories Through the New Testament and the Apostolic Fathers, ed. A. Gregory and C. Tuckett (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2005) 267-85; idem, "'The Orthodox Gospel': The Reception of John in the Great Church Prior to Irenaeus," in The Legacy of John: Second-Century Reception of the Fourth Gospel, ed. T. Rasmussen (NovTSup 132; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2009) 233-300; idem, "Serapion of Antioch, the Gospel of Peter, and a Four Gospel Canon," in Ascetica, Liturgica, Orientalia, Critica et Philologica, the First Two Centuries: Papers Presented at the 15th International Conference on Patristic Studies Held in Oxford 2007, ed. J. Baun et al. (StPatr 45; Leuven: Peeters, 2010) 337-42; idem, Who Chose the Gospels? Probing the Great "Gospel Conspiracy" (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2010); L. Hurtado, The Earliest Christian Artifacts: Manuscripts and Christian Origins (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2006); H.-J. Klauck, Apocryphal Gospels: An Introduction, trans. B. McNeil (London: T & T Clark, 2003); M. Kruger, Canon Revisited: Establishing the Origins and Authority of the New Testament Books (Wheaton, IL: Crossway, 2012); L. M. McDonald and J. A. Sanders, eds., The Canon Debate (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 2002);

B. M. Metzger, The Canon of the New Testament (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1987); O. Skar-saune, “Justin and His Bible,” in Justin Martyr and His Worlds, ed. S. Parvis and P. Foster (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2007) 53-76; G. N. Stanton, “The Fourfold Gospel,” NTS 43 (1997) 317-46. C. E. Hill

CANONICAL CRITICISM

Unlike other interpretive models, which often are defined by a distinctive set of methodological interests, the canonical approach is cued by the theological commitments of the canonical process and the aesthetic excellence of its final literary product, the biblical canon. In particular, the canonical approach to the Gospels is oriented by a study of the church's reception of four different narratives of Jesus' life and by the subsequent shaping of these four into a single canonical collection, the fourfold Gospel (see Canon). Both process and product are mined for their exegetical and theological deposits that guide the contemporary performances of the Gospel as sacred Scripture within its ecclesial setting. This article addresses four orienting concerns and related interpretive practices of canonical criticism.

1. The Four Gospels Within Their Canonical Context
2. The Four Gospels as a Canonical Collection
3. The Four Gospels a Fourfold Whole
4. The Four Gospels Within an Ecclesial Setting as Their Principal Address

1. The Four Gospels Within Their Canonical Context.

A persistent objection to the canonical approach is that it refuses to read biblical texts as historically conditioned. But the consideration of the church's reception, formation and ongoing practices of its biblical canon shares all aspects in the study of any cultural phenomenon; in the same way that Paul portrayed the apostolicity of his gospel and mission, Scripture too may be regarded as “treasure in earthen vessels” (2 Cor 4:7). All those complexities that shaped the writing and editing of individual biblical compositions at their diverse points of their origins—language, date and location, religious experience, spiritual or social struggle—also inform the exegete's understanding of the intentions of a text's canonical editing/shaping and its postbiblical reception as Scripture, even if for different reasons than they were written.

Consider, for example, the standard chronology of critical orthodoxy, which rearranges the sequence of the fourfold Gospel according to date of composition rather than canonization. Accordingly, Mark is typically granted priority and studied first because most historians judge it to be the first Gospel written and so used as a source by the other Synoptic evangelists (see Synoptic Problem). Virtually every modern introduction to the Gospels avers from their canonical order to begin with a study of Mark as the critical norm, not only in the quest of the historical *Jesus but also for reading the narrative of the canonical Christ. The effect of Mark's chronological priority is to narrow the reading of Matthew or Luke's redactions as add-ons to Mark's normative Gospel, and to marginalize John's Gospel because of its dissimilarity when compared to Mark's narrative of Jesus.

Little is known, however, about the compositional history of the Gospels; they are anonymous narratives composed without an address or clear statement of purpose. What does seem sufficiently clear from the available evidence is that the church had come to recognize four discrete yet integral “gospels of the apostles” by the time Irenaeus wrote Against Heresies (ca. A.D. 180). Before then, the manuscript evidence already suggests that the four Gospels were copied on single codices for wide use (Stanton); and every extant canon list thereafter includes this same fourfold Gospel, even if in different sequences. In any case, the church's final redaction and reception of this fourfold Gospel canon occurred sometime during the second century A.D., the end result of an extended organic process based upon its variegated and effective use in worship and mission. The assumption that each Gospel was composed for a particular community and circulated independently prior to the production and canonization of a fourfold Gospel is based upon little hard evidence. As B. S. Childs puts it, “The major formal sign of canonical shaping of the collection is the juxtaposition of the four books with titles which introduce the books as witnesses to the one gospel” (Childs, 155).

Significantly, the history of the Gospel's canonization prioritizes Matthew, not Mark (even if written before Matthew). Manuscript and citational materials from the second century A.D. (Massaux) used to reconstruct the Gospel's earliest postbiblical reception evince that Matthew was by far the most popular Gospel in the second century, having more parallels in second-century writings than do Mark, Luke or John (McDonald, 255). This evidence commends its priority for Christian worship and instruction at the very moment the oral traditions about the church's Jesus were being written down and fixed into a fourfold Gospel canon. In fact, in sharp contrast to modern criticism, Augustine referred to Mark as Matthew's "epitomizer"—a kind of "Reader's Digest" version of Matthew's normative rendering of Jesus. Without developing the implications of this move, the canonical hermeneutics of Matthew's priority suggests a different sequence for studying the four Gospels than is proposed by criticism's presumptive solution of the so-called Synoptic Problem.

2. The Four Gospels as a Canonical Collection.

The canonical approach is a species of theological interpretation that recognizes the simultaneity of Scripture. This unity should not be misunderstood as the protest against modern biblical criticism, which explains the theological and literary diversity of the Gospels by the historical and linguistic particularity of each. Rather, the formation of the fourfold Gospel, if under the direction of one Spirit for one church catholic, forges the critical recognition that the formation of a canonical collection of Gospels delineates a new textual setting in which a range of diverse apostolic witnesses to Jesus sing with each other in lyrical refrain. That is, the formation of a single Gospel sung in four parts creates a chorus that makes this music possible.

Much has been made in recent years of Scripture's intertextuality, which clearly means different things to different scholars. Literary studies of intertextuality argue that the very polyvalence of texts opens their interpretation to an ever-unfolding meaning. That is, a Gospel narrative is not fixed by its individual literary or theological shape, by its evangelist's intentions, or by the cultural context of its first auditors/readers; rather, the canonization of that Gospel within a fourfold collection and its subsequent placement within the church's biblical canon occasion a new context for reading and appropriating it. No one redaction of a Gospel pericope can be read in isolation of other recensions of the same episode in any of the other three; neither can that same Gospel text be read in isolation of other canonical texts that are cued by similar linguistic or thematic elements. The shift from authorial to canonical context alters the nature of a text's intentionality. The reader assumes not only that canonical intertexts bring different texts together that both relativize and thicken the meaning of any single text, but also that this thickened meaning, when aimed at new questions and concerns raised by a faithful reader, will more adequately disclose God's word for a new day "according to the Scripture."

For example, the declaration of Luke's centurion that the crucified Jesus was dikaïos ("innocent" [Lk 23:47]), when heard afresh within its canonical setting, reverberates with a loud echo from Isaiah's prophecy that envisages a "servant" who is dikaïos, "a righteous one," and who will thereby "acquit" (dikaioō) the sins of many (LXX Is 53:11). What might be initially understood as Rome's verdict of Jesus' criminal guilt—not guilty—the church understands also to offer a theological judgment that this faithful messianic servant of God, Jesus, is crucified to acquit the sins of those who believe in him (cf. Rom 3:21-31).

3. The Four Gospels a Fourfold Whole.

An exegetical interest in the final literary form of the fourfold Gospel assumes that it is complete and provides the church with the fullest witness to Jesus, in whom the apostles observed the truth about God. Understood theologically, the church, led by the Spirit, recognized when the process of collection building had ended. To explain this phenomenon is more difficult. N. Wolterstorff advances a philosophical conception of "aesthetic excellence" that posits ultimate importance on the salutary effects of a work of art that enriches the public good. If the purpose of an art form is self-interested or trivial rather than to inspire its audiences to do good or to live more virtuously, then the aesthetic of its form is of lesser quality.

This conception of aesthetic excellence provides a useful typology for explaining why the church came to valorize a particular shape and size of the canonical Gospel over other possible forms. Those inherent properties of shape, size, texture and color that naturally draw readers to an artistic work of higher quality also draw people to Scripture. As a literary achievement, the biblical canon is a genre of collections made up of artfully told stories, memorable lyrics, vivid poetry, exacting law codes, practical letters and even apocalypses, all of which aim readers at ultimate meaning. And these well-told parts are nicely fitted together into a complete and sufficient whole in order to perform its authorized roles effectively in the formation of Christian disciples.

The canonical approach assumes, for instance, a kind of canon logic: what is placed first should be read first as the most effective articulation of Scripture's textual word. Thus, the OT is necessary reading before one turns to the NT; the fourfold Gospel stages a reading of Acts, and Acts is read before the Epistles to introduce them, and Revelation is read last to sound Scripture's concluding note.

This observation may also suggest the importance of the textual seams that are created as a result of canonization. The placement of Matthew as the first narration of the fourfold Gospel, for example, may be viewed as strategic because its opening comments introduce Jesus in a way that links his story with the biblical promises that God makes to Israel according to the OT. Likewise, the placement of John as the final narration of the fourfold Gospel may also be viewed as strategic because it frames the previous, more “human” telling of the so-called Synoptic Gospels in incarnational terms (Calvin). Furthermore, the Fourth Gospel’s concluding episodes introduce the risen Lord’s apostles and God’s Spirit in a way that links the fourfold Gospel with Acts as the continuation of its plotline.

4. The Four Gospels Within an Ecclesial Setting as Their Principal Address.

It should come as no surprise that the canonical approach recognizes the importance of congregational worship in forming the believer’s capacity for faithful interpretation. The liturgical practice of concluding the public reading of Scripture with the Gospel lection envisages an interpretive strategy for worship that prioritizes the canonical narrative of Jesus. Not only is Scripture read by the Gospel, but also the virtues necessary to read sacred texts after the mind of Christ are formed in imitation of his canonical portrait drawn by the fourfold Gospel.

Moreover, biblical interpretation that forms Christian disciples is decided not by its coherence to the conclusions of critical orthodoxy but rather by its agreement in content and effect with the church’s apostolic rule of faith. Insofar as the core beliefs and theological grammar of this rule have been disclosed in the life of Jesus as remembered and rendered by his apostles, the canonical deposit of their witness in the fourfold Gospel carries with it decisive hermeneutical and practical importance within the biblical canon for its faithful readers. Simply put, the content and effect of every faithful interpretation of Scripture will cohere with the Gospel’s portrait of Jesus precisely because it is the gravitas of the apostolic rule of faith that orders the church’s reading of its canonical heritage for holy ends (Wall).

Matthew 2:1-12 is the church’s Gospel reading for Epiphany, when Christians celebrate the “appearance” of the Messiah with God’s *salvation for the nations. The story tells of the magis’ visitation of Jesus, and it forms a jarring juxtaposition with the NT’s opening chapter, which introduces Jesus as Israel’s Messiah according to the Scripture (see Mt 1:21) (see Birth of Jesus). Perhaps the strangest element of this arresting story is the star that guides those guileless Gentiles to the savior not only of Israel but also of the nations. There is no indication in the text that God sent the star to guide the magi; the star simply “appeared” (phainō [Mt 2:7]) and was observed by the magi (Mt 2:10). In fact, the narrative is severely gapped and provides no details about the manner by which the magi observed the star’s location or why they responded in joy and in worship of Jesus upon seeing it. What is the reader to make of this textual element?

The theocentric grammar of the apostolic rule of faith is concentrated by what the church confesses first of all: there is “one God, the Father Almighty, maker of heaven, and earth, and the sea, and all things that are in them” (Irenaeus, Haer. 3.4.1-2). In a church whose faith and life are ordered by its core beliefs about God’s salvation, it is God’s work in and with creation that tracks and interprets God’s redemptive action in the world. If the meaning of the star in Matthew’s telling of salvation’s epiphany is rendered by the church’s confession that God is the almighty “maker of heaven . . . and all that is in it,” then we should assume that it is the Creator’s (rather than an astrologist’s) star that is providentially guiding Gentiles to the place of their Lord. While criticism’s concern is to reconstruct the background of the magi’s interest in the star or even to test its historicity, whether it is real or a redactor’s trope, such concerns are misplaced if motivated by apologetics rather than by theological illumination. The plain sense of the text is that the star is a celestial compass that serves as a heavenly agent of natural revelation for those who do not have Scripture. What the text suggests, of course, is that the triune Maker of heavenly creatures, such as stars, can use them all to achieve God’s redemptive purpose for all things made.

See also CANON; GOSPELS: HISTORY OF INTERPRETATION; NARRATIVE INTERPRETATION; THEOLOGICAL INTERPRETATION OF THE GOSPELS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. Calvin, “The Argument of the Gospel of St. John,” in The Gospel of St. John (Calvin’s New Testament Commentaries, Eerdmans, 1995), 4:10-11; B. S. Childs, The New Testament as Canon: An Introduction (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1984); M. Hengel, The Four Gospels and the One Gospel of Jesus Christ: An Investigation of the Collection and Origin of the Canonical Gospels (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 2000) 34-115; E. Massaux, The Influence of the Gospel Saint Matthew on Christian Literature Before Saint Irenaeus, trans. N. J. Belval and S. Hecht, ed. A. J. Bellinzoni (5 vols.; NGS 5; Leuven: Peeters; Macon, GA: Mercer University Press, 1990-); L. McDonald, The Biblical Canon: Its Origin, Transmission, and Authority (3rd ed.; Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 2007); G. N. Stanton, “The Early Reception of Matthew’s Gospel: New Evidence from Papyri?” in The Gospel of Matthew in Current Study: Studies in Memory of William G. Thompson, S.J., ed. D. E. Aune (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2001) 42-61; R. W. Wall, “Canonical Approach,” in Biblical Hermeneutics: Five Views (B. Stovell and S. Porter, eds., IVP Academic, 2012); idem, “The Rule of Faith in Theological Hermeneutics,” in Between Two Horizons: Spanning New Testament Studies and Systematic Theology, ed. J. B. Green and M. Turner (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1999) 88-107; N. Wolterstorff, Art in Action: Toward a Christian Aesthetic (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1980). R. W. Wall

CAPERNAUM. See ARCHEOLOGY AND GEOGRAPHY.

CHILD, CHILDREN

In the Gospels children are healed by Jesus, they are left behind by disciples, and Jesus predicts that they will turn against the disciples. Children are used as examples in Jesus’ teachings, and the followers of Jesus are also consistently called “children.” When one approaches these texts, it is misguided to have a sentimental, romanticized understanding of childhood. Childhood in antiquity was difficult and dangerous. It is estimated that only fifty percent of children lived past age ten (Bakke 2005, 23), a fact of life represented in the stories of sick and dying children in the Gospels. Common childhood experiences included hard work and abuse along with play and education. Although children could be valued and loved by their parents, in general they were seen as unfinished adults, prey to vices that they could not control and subject to strict discipline. The understanding of childhood and the expectations of children in Greco-Roman and Jewish antiquity are key to the interpretation of texts concerning children in the Gospels.

1. A Child’s Life
2. Exploitation of Children
3. The Value of a Child
4. Jesus and the Children in the Gospels

1. A Child’s Life.

Across the ancient world, parents were expected to care for, provide for, and raise their (freeborn) children to be contributing members of society (an expectation disrupted by the call to discipleship [Mk 10:28-30]). In turn, children were expected to respect, obey and honor their parents (e.g., Seneca, Ben. 3.11; 4.27; Josephus, Ag. Ap. 2.204; Philo, Spec. 2.224-231; cf. Mt 7:9-11; Mk 7:10; Lk 2:51). A child was considered the spitting image of the parent, reflecting the parent’s (more precisely, the father’s) character (cf. Sir 30:4-6; Jn 8:39-47), and thus a child’s behavior could positively or negatively influence the parent’s social standing. Beyond these basic expectations, children’s daily experience in antiquity was determined to a great extent by gender, wealth, social status (freeborn or slave) and stage of life, and its corresponding abilities.

Disparity based on wealth and social status was present for children even in infancy. Babies born to *slave parents were, of course, slaves, and parental rights over them were thus nonexistent; the owners could dispose of the infant as they saw fit. Slave mothers continued to work despite the needs of the infant, as did mothers in poor households. Because of their responsibilities to the household and society, wealthy mothers had little to do with their infants, who were cared for and nursed by slaves or professional wet nurses (interestingly, slave babies could also be raised by nurses, allowing their mothers to work without distraction). Freeborn Roman babies who survived to eight to nine days of life were given a celebration that included sacrifices and naming the baby. For Jewish boys, the comparable ceremony centered on circumcision (cf. Lk 2:21; Phil 3:5).

The first stage of childhood (Lat. infans [“one who does not speak”], Gk. paidion [“little child”]) lasted from birth to age seven. For freeborn children, this stage of life was associated with physical development, learning social traditions, and play; the only children pictured at play in the canonical Gospels are little children (Mt 11:16-17; Lk 7:32). Wealthy children’s toys included rattles, dolls, balls and even miniature chariots. All children played dice games, board games and physical games such as hide-and-seek and ball. They also played at being adults, pretending to be judges, priests, soldiers, orators and other professionals.

Wealthy freeborn children were able to enjoy their privilege. Their slaves fed, bathed, entertained and played with them. Poor freeborn and slave children did not have these luxuries. Most slave children began working in the household or in agriculture and training for their future responsibilities at a very young age. Young children in poor families likewise began helping to support the family economically as soon as they were able.

The second stage of childhood (Lat. impuberes, Gk. pais [“child”]) lasted from age seven to puberty. Wealthy Roman girls and boys began schooling with parents or private tutors at home or in a school run by a professional teacher. They had a paedagogus, usually a slave, to accompany them, carry their school supplies, and ensure their attentiveness to their studies. Education in the Roman world, largely a matter of rote memorization, was primarily concerned with literacy and arithmetic and, nearing the end of education, with grammar and rhetoric. Education was accompanied by discipline; learning was beaten into Roman schoolchildren (see Plutarch, Cat. Maj. 20.4; Martial, Epig. 9.68; Suetonius, Gramm. 9). Jewish children's education began at home with the law and the stories of Israel (Josephus, Ag. Ap. 2.204). There may have been schools outside the home, possibly in synagogues, in Roman Palestine, though the question is debated. In any case, only boys could have attended these schools, which would have provided more formal education in the Torah, the prophets, and their interpretation (cf. Lk 2:46-47).

In poorer families across the Roman world school might still be an option, but children also worked in the household or family business. Slave children would begin to work longer periods at more advanced tasks, and both slave and freeborn children might be apprenticed to learn a trade such as weaving (see P.Oxy. 1647). Like their Roman counterparts, Jewish children worked with the family to support the household (as reflected in Mt 21:28-31; Mk 1:19-20; Lk 15:25-29).

Childhood ended at puberty. Roman and Jewish daughters were married off by their parents, usually at age twelve to fourteen. Young Roman men went through a ceremony in which they assumed the toga, and thus adult stature, when they were fifteen to seventeen years old. Young Jewish men and women became independently responsible for keeping the Torah (e.g., m. Nid. 5:6; m. 'Abot 5:21).

2. Exploitation of Children.

Children in Greco-Roman antiquity faced the likelihood of violence and sexual abuse. Infancy was a particularly dangerous period of life due to the threat of exposure in the Roman Empire (though not, according to numerous sources, for Jewish children [see, e.g., Josephus, Ag. Ap. 2.202]). The child's father or, if unmarried, the mother had the legal right to choose to raise a child or abandon it in a public space (a temple, garbage dump, doorway, etc. [cf. P.Oxy. 744]). The possibility of exposure increased if the infant was female or malformed or if the parents were poor. An exposed child would die or potentially be raised as a slave in another household (the status of exposed infants who survived to adulthood was of frequent legal concern).

Slave children, like slave adults, could expect indiscriminate physical abuse. Reports of freeborn children's education also include frequent mention of being beaten by teachers. The potential for physical discipline in the home is less certain (though see Seneca, Const. sap. 12.2; Philo, Spec. 2.232). The traditional patria potestas, the power of the male head of the family over the household, gave fathers the right to kill their children with cause, although the stories in which this power is enacted relate to young women caught in sexual immorality or young men in political rebellion (e.g., Livy, Hist. 3.48.5-8; Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Ant. rom. 2.26-27; Valerius Maximus, Fact. dict. 5.8.1). There are no stories in which fathers severely abuse or kill younger children.

Children in Greco-Roman societies were also subject to sexual abuse. Wealthy freeborn girls were protected to some extent because they were expected to be virgins at marriage, but boys faced the potential of sexual abuse from older men in the household and out (Martial, Epig. 3.73; Catullus, Carm. 15; Suetonius, Gramm. 23). Sexual abuse was practically a certainty for male and female slave children, who, like slave adults, were sexually available to any male in the household (Martial, Epig. 1.58; Petronius, Sat. 24-25; 75). Delicia ("pets") were young slave or (rarely) freeborn children who held a special, often affectionate relationship with the owner. In addition to entertaining the adults and providing companionship for the freeborn children of the household, the delicia could also be subject to sexual abuse. Slave children sometimes were put into prostitution, and there are reports of a sex trade involving very young freeborn and slave children in the Roman world (Suetonius, Cal. 41; also Justinian, Nov. 14 [fifth century A.D.]).

The extent to which this sexual abuse was present in Jewish society is debatable. One example of the potential for the sexual abuse of children in the Gospels is the story of Herod's birthday party in Mark 6:21-22 (// Mt 14:6), in which a young girl (Gk. kora-sion) dances for the king and his male guests. Such entertainment traditionally was eroticized. A less certain example may be found in Mark 9:42-48 (// Mt 18:6-9). The hands, feet and eyes in this text can be sexually charged euphemisms (cf. Mt 5:27-30), and a later rabbinic text (b. Nid. 13b) with strong resemblance to Mark 9:42-48 directly addresses the sexual abuse of children. W. Deming suggests that the same is true in Mark 9:42-48: if the "little ones who believe" are children, the text speaks against the sexual abuse of children. However, the little ones may be disciples, which makes this interpretation less certain.

3. The Value of a Child.

For Philo, young children are innocent (cf. Deut 1:39; Is 7:15-16; 1 Cor 14:20), but after the age of seven children learn evil and are overcome by passions (Philo, Her. 294). Likewise in Greco-Roman thought, a child was seen as an unfinished or imperfect adult, lacking self-control and reason (e.g., Seneca, Const. sap. 12.2; cf. 1 Cor 13:11; Heb 5:11-14). The value of a child thus lay not in being a child but rather in practical contributions to the household. Poor children and slaves were valuable for their work and, in the case of free-born children, for their potential to care for elderly parents; wealthy children had value in terms of the political connections of a daughter's marriage or a son's position as heir and future head of household. This valuation of children is apparent even in Judaism (see, e.g., Sir 30:4-6; Philo, Spec. 2.129).

A strictly utilitarian view of children is not the end of the story, however. Second Temple Judaism inherited the idea of children as a gift of God from texts such as Deuteronomy 28:4; Psalm 127:3-5; 128:3-4. Language used of children in Greco-Roman texts and funerary inscriptions is also indicative of parental affection (e.g., ILS 8473; CIL 6.22972; Pliny the Younger, Ep. 5.16). This affection is represented in the Gospels in the lamentation for the babies of Bethlehem (Mt 2:16-18) and in stories of parents begging for *healing for their children (Mk 5:22-23; 7:25-26; 9:17-18; Jn 4:47).

4. Jesus and the Children in the Gospels.

Children's lives and the understanding of childhood in Greco-Roman antiquity form an important background for interpreting the texts concerning children in the canonical Gospels. Several issues require further consideration: (1) the recognition of Jesus by children; (2) Jesus' use of little children as an object lesson in discipleship; (3) the metaphor of the followers of Jesus as children of God.

4.1. Recognizing Jesus in Matthew. In Matthew 11:16-17 Jesus compares "this generation" to little children (paidion) in a marketplace, calling to each other because no one will play with them. The children here can be identified as Jesus and *John the Baptist, receiving no response to their messages from the other children (their audiences). Alternatively, Jesus' audience may be the "little children," rejecting both Jesus and John the Baptist for refusing to do and say what the audience wants (see Davies and Allison, 261-62). Read in the context of ancient expectations and understandings of children, the unflattering analogy in Matthew 11:16-17 condemns the adults for their lack of response to Jesus and John (cf. Lk 7:31-32).

"This generation" in Matthew 11:16-17 contrasts with the little children who accept Jesus in Matthew 11:25-27; 21:15-16. In Matthew 11:25-27 Jesus' audiences, the wise and intelligent from whom Jesus and his message are hidden, are unfavorably compared with infants to whom the Father reveals the Son. The infants make a second appearance in Matthew 21:15-16. When children (pais) in the *temple acclaim Jesus as the *Son of David, they are critiqued by the chief *priests and *scribes. Jesus defends these children as the infants and nursing babies from whom God prepares praise (cf. LXX Ps 8:3). Infants and babies in these texts act as literary foils. Although they are, in cultural context, the ignorant and uneducated (cf. 1 Cor 3:1-2), it is these infants who recognize and accept Jesus, not the educated, wise adults. As in the case of the tax collectors and prostitutes who enter the *kingdom before the chief priests and *elders (Mt 21:31-32), social expectations are disrupted by these precocious children. This message is furthered by Jesus' use of little children as models for *discipleship.

4.2. Children and the Kingdom of God. In Mark 9:33-37 Jesus teaches his disciples that to be first, they must be last and the servant of all (see Slave, Servant). As they are together in a house, Jesus places a young child (paidion) in the midst of the disciples, hugs the child, and tells his disciples that whoever receives a child like this in his name receives Jesus and thus the one who sent Jesus (cf. receiving the disciples in Mt 10:14; Mk 6:11; Lk 10:8-11). Young children are here likened to slaves and thus to Jesus himself (Mk 10:45; Lk 22:24-27). These children serve as a model for discipleship in terms of their helplessness and their low status in society (cf. Lk 9:47-48). The parallel story in Matthew 18:1-4 clarifies the message: to enter the kingdom, the disciples must become like a little child, and to be greatest in the kingdom, one must be humble like a little child.

In Mark, this scene is quickly followed by a second appearance of "little children." People, presumably parents, are bringing little children to Jesus to be blessed, a scene that reflects a concern with the neediness of children due to their physical and social vulnerability (cf. Lk 2:28). When the disciples stop them, possibly because of the social marginality of children, Jesus is angry. He tells the disciples to let the little children come because the kingdom of God belongs to children like these (Mk 10:14). Moreover, it is impossible to enter the kingdom unless it is received "as a little child" would receive it (Mk 10:15; cf. b. Sanh. 110b); this claim reflects the neediness of young children, those who must be cared for but can contribute little to family or society. Luke 18:15 emphasizes this helplessness by identifying the children as infants. In Mark 10:16 Jesus again hugs the little children, and he also lays hands on them and blesses them (abbreviated in Mt 19:15, omitted in Lk 18:15-17).

These two stories have been used to portray Jesus as loving and accepting children, potentially even adopting children into his family (so Gundry, 154-58). But although these stories may be used to encourage adults to love and accept children, this message is not their primary aim. The elevation of the young child in these traditions is, rather, part of the Gospels' reversal of traditional social hierarchies. Like the poor, tax collectors or other marginalized groups, children are unexpectedly given precedence over their social superiors. In addition, the identification of children as models for the disciples supports the Gospels' overarching themes of servanthood and humility as the way of discipleship. In fact, there is great elision between actual children and the disciples as "little ones" and children of God (see Mt 18:10-14; Mk 9:42).

4.2. The Children of God. In Mark, immediately after blessing the little children, Jesus addresses the disciples as children (tekna [Mk 10:24]). This metaphor, drawn from the OT identification of *Israel as God's child, appears more frequently in Matthew and John. "Children" as a metaphor for Jesus' followers in these Gospels is a sign of identity and relationship.

4.2.1. Matthew. In Matthew, God is consistently identified as the Father in heaven (e.g., Mt 23:9), and thus the followers of Jesus are God's children. The metaphor brings ancient expectations for parents and children into the relationship of God with Jesus' followers. Parents should care and provide for children, and so God provides food, clothing and protection for God's children; the children can trust in this expectation (Mt 6:25-32; 7:9-11; 10:28-31). Children should obey their parents, and as children of God, the disciples are to obey God (Mt 6:10; 12:50; 21:31). Furthermore, as good children, they should imitate their heavenly Father in *love, *forgiveness and perfection (e.g., Mt 5:44-45, 48; 6:14-15). The metaphorical identification of the followers of Jesus as God's children in Matthew is thus formative for their character as disciples: they are to be the spitting image of their Father.

4.2.2. John. In John, the metaphor of being the children of God is focused on identity, as the extended analogy in John 8:39-47 makes clear. Jesus provides the ultimate model of the good child. As the Son, Jesus is unified with his Father (Jn 10:30; 17:21) (see Son of God). In accordance with ancient expectations for a father's relationship with his son, Jesus is loved by God, sent by God, empowered by God and obedient to God (Jn 3:34-35; 5:19-23; 10:36-38): the Son is the Father's image and representative (cf. Jn 1:18; 14:7-11). Reflecting John's primary focus on Jesus himself, the disciples are "children" (tekna) rather than sons, and their relationship with the Father is contingent upon the Son (cf. Jn 1:12-13; 14:18-21). Through their relationship with the Son, the followers as children will also do God's work (Jn 13:33-35; 14:10-14; 20:21-23).

Jesus is not wholly revolutionary in his engagement with children, which happens, after all, rarely in the Gospels. However, the healing of children, the use of children as models of discipleship, and the identification of the followers of Jesus as "children" firmly place children within the ministry of Jesus and provide them with a place in the kingdom that Jesus brings.

See also DISCIPLES AND DISCIPLESHIP; FAMILY; SLAVE, SERVANT.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. O. M. Bakke, When Children Became People: The Birth of Childhood in Early Christianity, trans. B. McNeil (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2005); D. L. Balch and C. Osiek, eds., Early Christian Families in Context: An Interdisciplinary Dialogue (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2003); P. Balla, The Child-Parent Relationship in the New Testament and Its Environment (WUNT 2/155; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2003); M. J. Bunge, ed., The Child in the Bible (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2008); W. B. Davies and D. C. Allison, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Gospel According to Saint Matthew, 2: Commentary on Matthew VIII-XVIII (ICC; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1991); W. Deming, "Mark 9:42-10:12, Matthew 5:27-32, and B. Nid. 13b: A First-Century Discussion of Male Sexuality," NTS 36 (1990) 130-41; S. Dixon, The Roman Family (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1992); J. K. Evans, War, Women and Children in Ancient Rome (New York: Routledge, 1991); J. Francis, "Child and Childhood in the New Testament," in The Family in Theological Perspective, ed. S. C. Barton (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1996) 65-85; J. M. Gundry, "Children in the Gospel of Mark, with Special Attention to Jesus' Blessing of the Children (Mark 10:13-16) and the Purpose of Mark," in The Child in the Bible, ed. M. J. Bunge (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2008) 143-76; C. B. Horn and J. W. Martens, "Let the Little Children Come to Me": Childhood and Children in Early Christianity (Washington, DC: Catholic University of America Press, 2009); B. Rawson, Child and

Childhood in Roman Italy (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2003); T. Wiedemann, Adults and Children in the Roman Empire (New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1989). C. Reeder

CHORAZIN. See ARCHEOLOGY AND GEOGRAPHY.

CHREIA/APHORISM

Scholars have long recognized the presence of aphorisms, or short, pithy sayings of Jesus, in the Gospels. However, the Hellenistic chreia, or brief anecdote conveying an action or saying, has more recently been employed as a means for analyzing the Jesus tradition.

1. Greco-Roman Background
2. Gospels Usage

1. Greco-Roman Background.

The peoples of the ancient Mediterranean world used several different Greek and Latin words to designate various memorable sayings, especially those of a short, pithy nature. One was aphorismos, from which the English word aphorism is derived. The Greek term was a cognate of the verb aphorizō, which has the basic sense of “to mark off.” Etymologically, therefore, it designated sayings that were “marked off” or “set apart” in at least two senses. First, an aphorism was a saying that was or could be set off from the social context in which it was first uttered as well as from any literary context in which it later appeared. It was detachable from these contexts because it expressed an independent idea or fundamental thought that existed in its own right, so that its veracity and relevance were not dependent on these contexts for meaning or persuasive power. Consequently, it could easily be quoted by others and applied to new situations. Second, an aphorism was also typically distinguished from normal, ordinary discourse by its concise, pointed wording. The speaker’s astute and sometimes provocative insights often were enhanced in aphorisms by rhetorical features such as antithesis, which made them even more striking. According to the physician-philosopher Galen, an aphorism was a form of teaching that was succinct yet comprehensive, briefly stating all of the specific distinguishing aspects of the topic under discussion (Hipp. aph. 17b, 351-52).

Two other terms commonly used in antiquity for memorable sayings of a short pithy nature were gnōmē, transliterated into English as “gnome” (see Aristotle, Rhet. 2.20-21), and sententia, commonly translated as “sentence” (see Rhetorica ad Herrenium 4.24.5; Quintilian, Inst. 8.5). Although “aphorism,” “gnome” and “sentence” had various meanings, all three terms were different ancient words for the later term maxim (derived from the postclassical Latin term maxima) and played an important role in moral formation and exhortation. A related ancient term was apophthegma (pl. apophthegmata), which was used of a terse, pointed saying that was sometimes but not always sententious. Whereas aphorisms, gnomes and sentences circulated both anonymously and with names attached, most apophthegms, by contrast, retained their connection with the people who first uttered them. Some famous sayings, however, were attributed to several different individuals, with the name of the true author unknown or forgotten.

In addition to circulating independently and in clusters, memorable sayings also appear in brief narratives or anecdotes, which provide a setting for an action or saying that usually constitutes the culmination of the anecdote. The ancient term for “anecdote” was chreia (pl. chreiai), which received this name in view of its “usefulness” in addressing many situations in life. Aelius Theon, usually dated to the first century A.D., defined a chreia as “a concise saying or action, aptly attributed to some specified person or to something analogous to a person” (Kennedy, 15), and he distinguished it from both the gnome and the reminiscence (apomnēmoneuma), noting that when gnomes are attributed to a particular person, a chreia is produced. In addition, Theon proposed a basic threefold classification for chreiai: (1) sayings-chreia, where speakers make their point verbally, either by a statement or in response to a query; (2) action-chreia, where the individual’s point is made by some act rather than verbally; (3) mixed chreia, where there is both speech and action.

The chreia’s popularity as a literary form increased immensely in the Hellenistic period, when it became a standard part of the curriculum at all three educational levels. It was introduced at the primary level, where pupils used chreai in learning how to read and write. At the secondary level teachers used it to instruct pupils in how to decline nouns and conjugate verbs. It received extensive attention at the tertiary level, where students learned how to elaborate a chreia as one of the preliminary exercises (progymnasmata) in rhetoric. Training in how to use the chreia in argumentation and analysis was believed to create not only skill in speaking but also good character because the moral sayings of the wise comprised the content of most chreiai (Kennedy, 4). In the late Roman Republic and the early Roman Empire the progymnasmata were increasingly introduced at the secondary level, and inasmuch as the chreia was usually the third of fourteen preliminary exercises to be taught, many students who never formally studied rhetoric at the tertiary level were given basic instructions in how to compose and elaborate a chreia. Later teachers of rhetoric continued to give great attention to the exercise in chreia and the other progymnasmata, with those of Aphthonius (late fourth century) being the most important.

2. Gospels Usage.

Biblical scholars' interest in the chreia began with the rise of *form criticism, which focused on the transmission of the Jesus tradition prior to the composition of the canonical Gospels. Form critics focused on the individual units of the tradition, not on the Gospels as a whole, with a distinction often made between the sayings of Jesus and narratives about him (such as the infancy and the *passion narratives). Although it was recognized that Jesus' words, many of them aphorisms (Crossan), sometimes were transmitted as independent logia devoid of any setting for the saying (e.g., Acts 20:35) and as collections of sayings with no narrative context (e.g., 1 Clem. 13:2), form critics were particularly interested in sayings contained in brief narratives, which were deemed to have circulated primarily as single units of tradition, and sometimes also as small collections of material that shared the same theme or topic. When attached to a brief narrative, the saying tended to provide the culminating point or climax of the narrative as a whole. Because of that feature, such stories often were deemed closer to the sayings tradition than to the more extended narrative tradition proper. Consequently, R. Bultmann used "apophthegm" to describe "sayings set in a brief context" (Bultmann, 11), and he distinguished three types of settings: those that were hostile ("controversy dialogues"), those that were friendly ("scholastic dialogues") and those occasioned by some incident in Jesus' life ("biographical sayings"). M. Dibelius, on the other hand, thought that such narratives typically were used in sermons to provide examples, and thus he called them "paradigms" (Dibelius, 37-69). V. Taylor used the term "pronouncement story" (Taylor, 63-87) because such stories "quickly reach their climax in a saying of Jesus which was of interest to the first Christians because it bore directly upon questions of faith and practice" (Taylor, 23).

Although these early form critics were well aware of the Hellenistic chreia, they either made scant use of it when analyzing the Jesus tradition (Bultmann, 25) or deemed it largely irrelevant (Dibelius, 152-64). One consequence of this neglect of the chreia's use in the Greco-Roman world was that only a limited number of stories in the Synoptic Gospels were identified as chreiai. Although the precise number varied among these critics, only eleven NT narratives were commonly viewed as chreiai. Ten of these are found in Mark: eating with tax collectors and sinners (Mk 2:15-17), the question about *fasting (Mk 2:18-22), plucking grain on the *Sabbath (Mk 2:23-28), the true kindred of Jesus (Mk 3:31-34), the blessing of the little children (Mk 10:13-16), the rich man and wealth (Mk 10:17-22), the request of James and John (Mk 10:35-40), the question about paying taxes to Caesar (Mk 12:13-17), the question about the resurrection (Mk 12:18-27) and the anointing at Bethany (Mk 14:3-9). The eleventh chreia is the healing of the man with dropsy (Lk 14:1-6) (Robbins, ABD 1:308).

The situation has changed dramatically in the last fifty years and is one of the results of the renewed interest in Greek and Roman rhetoric and in the rhetorical features of the NT. As ancient rhetoric began to be used extensively in analyzing early Christian texts, the chreia was thoroughly examined in its own right, with many of the key texts translated into English (Hock and O'Neil 1986; 2002; Hock). This has resulted in a better understanding of the chreia, which in turn has cast a new light on its use in the NT (Robbins 1993; Mack and Robbins). Among the more important implications for the study of the NT are the following: (1) The chreia was an *oral and literary compositional device that speakers and writers could manipulate in various ways. Depending on the situation, details of the story could be added or omitted, which meant that the chreia had an accordion-like quality. The presence or absence of certain details in a given chreia is thus not proof of its primary or secondary status. (2) At the core of a chreia was either a memorable saying or action, or both, which contained the point of the story and thus was never omitted. (3) Chreiai were not simply vehicles for the transmission of sayings. The existence of action-chreiai proves that form criticism's typical restriction of the chreia to the sayings tradition was unfounded. (4) The use of the chreia throughout the educational curriculum meant that anyone who had attended school, even for a short time at the primary level, was aware of the form. (5) The introduction of preliminary exercises at the secondary level of education meant that many literate individuals, including the authors of the canonical Gospels, would have received basic training in how to use the chreia.

(6) It therefore is not surprising that many of the shorter Synoptic chreiai have the same or similar form as many pagan chreiai (Butts). (7) Given the versatility of the chreia as a form, it could be elaborated in various ways and even serve as a thesis to be argued. The recognition of the enormous rhetorical potential of the chreia has led to the view that many more NT materials belong to the chreia tradition (Tannehill 1981a; 1981b). Instead of only eleven chreiai, now approximately one hundred units in the Gospels and Acts have been claimed as chreiai in certain circles of NT scholarship (Robbins, ABD 1:308). Not all of these claims are convincing, but it is sufficiently clear that the chreia was one of the chief compositional devices of the Greco-Roman world, and that it was used more extensively in the composition of the canonical Gospels and Acts than was previously thought.

See also FORM CRITICISM; ORALITY, ORAL TRADITION.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R. Bultmann, The History of the Synoptic Tradition (2nd ed.; New York: Harper & Row, 1968); J. R. Butts, "The Chreia in the Synoptic Gospels," BTB 16 (1986) 132-38; J. D. Crossan, In Fragments: The Aphorisms of Jesus (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1983); M. Dibelius, From Tradition to Gospel, trans. B. L. Woolf (London: Ivor Nicholson & Watson, 1934); R. F. Hock, ed. and trans., The Chreia and Ancient Rhetoric: Commentaries on Aphthonius's Progymnasmata (SBLWGRW 31; Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature, 2012); R. F. Hock and E. N. O'Neil, ed. and trans., The Chreia in Ancient Rhetoric: The Progymnastica (SBLTT 27; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1986); idem, eds. and trans., The Chreia and Ancient Rhetoric: Classroom Exercises (SBLWGRW 2; Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature, 2002); G. A. Kennedy, trans., Progymnasmata: Greek Textbooks of Prose Composition and Rhetoric (SBLWGRW 10; Atlanta, Society of Biblical Literature, 2003); B. L. Mack and V. K. Robbins, Patterns of Persuasion in the Gospels (FF; Sonoma, CA: Polebridge, 1989); V. K. Robbins, "Apophthegm," ABD 1:307-9; idem, "Progymnastic Rhetorical Composition and Pre-Gospel Traditions: A New Approach," in Synoptic Gospels: Source Criticism and the New Literary Criticism, ed. C. Focant (BETL 110; Leuven: Leuven University Press, 1993) 111-47; R. C. Tannehill, "Introduction: The Pronouncement Story and Its Types," Semeia 21 (1981a) 1-13; idem, "Varieties of Synoptic Pronouncement Stories," Semeia 21 (1981b) 101-19; V. Taylor, The Formation of the Gospel Tradition (2nd ed.; London: Macmillan, 1949).

J. T. Fitzgerald

CHRIST

The Greek word christos usually is translated as "Christ" in most English versions (though occasionally as "Messiah" [see, e.g., Mk 1:1 TNIV]), and it occurs over five hundred times in the Greek NT. It is a designation used of Jesus to indicate his status as the Messiah, and it is used frequently in relation to the name "Jesus" with "Jesus Christ," "Christ Jesus" or "Lord Jesus Christ" especially in Paul's letters. In some cases, it is possible that "Christ" has become a proper name rather than merely a title; however, a titular use of christos certainly is retained in the NT (e.g., Mt 1:1; Jn 20:31; Acts 18:5; Rom 9:5; Rev 11:15; 12:10). The designation "Jesus Christ" is really a shorthand way of saying "Jesus is the Christ" or "Jesus is the Messiah." The word christos and its cognate verb chriō are associated with anointing or smearing with oil or ointment. Thus, the designation "Jesus Christ" would sound peculiar to speakers of Greek as something like "Jesus the Smeared-One." The description is accordingly unpacked in the narrative of the Gospels whereby they explain exactly who Jesus is, what the appellation christos means, and why it is appropriately applied to Jesus.

Proclamation of Jesus as the Messiah was an important feature of early Christian preaching and teaching (e.g., Acts 2:36; 5:42; 8:5; 9:22; 18:28; Rom 1:3-4; 2 Tim 2:8). The NT accordingly presents Jesus as the Messiah of *Israel, who fulfills the Jewish Scriptures through his life, *death, *resurrection and exaltation. An important function of the canonical Gospels in this regard is to demonstrate the legitimacy, characteristics and impact of Jesus' messianic career.

In order to show the significance of "Christ/Messiah" in the Gospels, this article addresses the context and background of the term, discusses whether Jesus was a messianic claimant, and examines how Jesus' identity as the Messiah is variously portrayed by the evangelists.

1. Meaning and Background
2. Jesus as Messianic Claimant
3. Portrayal of Jesus as "Messiah" in the Four Gospels
4. Conclusion

1. Meaning and Background.

Christos is an adjective signifying "anointed [with oil]"; it is used in the LXX to translate the Hebrew word māšīaḥ, designating a person appointed by God for a specific role. The Israelite practice of *anointing a person with oil indicated installation in a special office such as that of king (2 Sam 23:1; Ps 2:2) or priest (Lev 6:15; 21:10, 12). A particular term used in the OT is “the LORD’s anointed” (1 Sam 16:6; 24:7, 11; 26:9, 11, 16, 23), which carries specific religious connotations as it signifies the particular set-apartness of Israel’s king as consecrated to God and his commission to rule over God’s people. The verb chriō is also used in the LXX to designate the specific act of anointing someone for sacred offices. Examples include King Saul (1 Sam 9:16; 10:1), King David (1 Sam 16:3, 12–13), Aaron and his sons (Ex 28:41; 29:7), and in one case the prophet Elisha (1 Kings 19:16).

Although the fortunes of the Israelite monarchies changed during the united and divided kingdoms, hope remained that a Davidic descendant would take the throne as set out in the promises in 2 Samuel 7:12–16. Reflection on this promise is found in Psalms 72; 89; 132, which appeal to the inviolability and security of God’s covenant promises to the house of David to establish an everlasting Davidic kingdom. In the prophetic literature one observes that hopes for a renewed Davidic dynasty began to be infused into eschatological expectations about an Israelite ruler with grandiose qualities and superlative strengths. Hosea expected the exiled northern tribes to seek out “David their king” (Hos 3:5), Amos looked ahead to God raising up a “booth of David that is fallen,” Isaiah 9; 11 display an interest in a future Davidic king uniquely endowed with the Spirit of the Lord. Similar Davidic traditions are reinterpreted, expanded and intensified in the exilic prophets Jeremiah and Ezekiel. The Lord intends to raise up a “righteous scion” to usher in the salvation of Judah and Israel (Jer 23:5–6) with a reinstitution of the Davidic throne and a rebuilt temple (Jer 33:17–22). The new Davidide will be a shepherd to the house of Israel (Ezek 34:22–24). In the Persian period, the return of the Davidic king is a sign that Israel’s day of liberation and cleansing has dawned (Zech 9:9–10; 12:7–13:1). Also in Zechariah we observe a focus on the dual figures of the anointed priest and the anointed king who are the “sons of oil,” and they act to hasten the process of national restoration (Zech 4:12–14; 6:11–12). Finally, in Daniel there is a vision for God’s kingdom to crush all human kingdoms (Dan 2:44–45). The “one like a son of man” in Daniel 7 had a formative effect upon the developing messianism of the Second Temple period with the vindication of the saints of the Most High over the pagan empires of the ancient Near East. Daniel 9:24–27 refers to the coming of an anointed leader and the advent of a wicked prince who is to desecrate the holy place. In sum, there is an incipient messianism in the OT through the idealization of Davidic kingship configured in light of eschatological hopes for the restoration of Israel (see Exile and Restoration).

In the Second Temple period, belief in a coming messiah was not held by all Jews, and those Jews who did look for a messiah had diverse views on what kind of messiah would appear. For instance, in the Qumran scrolls (150 B.C.–A.D. 70) there appears to be an anticipation of two anointed figures: a “messiah of Israel” and a “messiah of Aaron” (e.g., CD-A XII, 23–XII, 1; 1QS IX, 10–11). These royal messiah and priestly messiahs are to reign over the congregation of Israel. Two particular documents from Qumran, the “Messianic Apocalypse” (4Q521) and the “Son of God” text (4Q246) show clear signs of influence from Isaiah and Daniel on the formation of a messianic narrative (see Dead Sea Scrolls). Psalms of Solomon looks ahead to a messiah who establishes the throne of David, destroys sinners, purges Jerusalem of Gentiles, regathers the twelve tribes of Israel, and inaugurates a period of holiness and covenant righteousness (Pss. Sol. 17–18). Even the Jewish Alexandrian philosopher Philo, who interpreted Israel’s Scriptures through a Platonic lens, remained committed to an eschatological story whereby Israel’s royal deliverer rescued the nation from its various travails. For Philo, the kingship of God is to be expressed through its messianic leader who will rule over the nations and extend the kingdom of Israel (e.g., Philo, Mos. 1.290–91). The Similitudes of Enoch (1 En. 37–71), though dated by some to after A.D. 70, designate an eschatological deliverer with several titles, including “Righteous One,” “Messiah,” “Elect One” and “Son of Man.” The document envisages a messiah built on a synthesis of royal images in Psalms, Isaiah and Daniel, where the Messiah is a superhuman and transcendent being.

The OT represented a wealth of images portraying a coming deliverer, and varied messianic exegesis of these texts led to a plethora of messianic images for a coming deliverer. Thus, the type of messiah depicted in this literature is richly varied. The Davidic messiah could be viewed as essentially a human figure in a royal office who has superlative qualities of leadership and military prowess, and whom God uses to liberate the nation. On other occasions, this messiah is a superhuman and transcendent figure sent from heaven to defeat God’s enemies on earth and to bring the nation of Israel to a utopian paradise. Furthermore, the messianic hopes found in these texts were also influenced by the cultural contexts of the authors. The sociopolitical context of Palestine in the first century A.D.—domination by the Roman Empire, threat of invasion from the Parthian Empire in the east, several sporadic and unsuccessful revolts against Rome, turmoil within the Judean ruling class, sectarian rivalries over the proper way to observe the law of Moses, and speculation on prophetic oracles about Israel's deliverance in the Hebrew Scriptures—created a fertile context in which messianic hopes could flourish. This is the context in which Jesus began his ministry and is the setting that shaped the traditions contained in the canonical Gospels about a “messiah.”

2. Jesus as Messianic Claimant.

The notion that Jesus believed himself to be the Christ—that is, the Messiah of Israel—could be derived from a fairly straightforward reading of the canonical Gospels. However, historical authenticity of that the claim is disputed in scholarship. It is often believed that the early church regarded Jesus as the Messiah because of his *resurrection and then projected that belief into his pre-Easter ministry (e.g., W. Wrede, R. Bultmann, J. D. Crossan). Others suggest that Jesus was regarded as the Messiah during his lifetime, but Jesus himself either rejected the role or was at least ambivalent toward the title “Messiah” (e.g., N. A. Dahl, J. D. G. Dunn, P. Fredriksen). Still others have argued that Jesus did indeed see himself in messianic categories, and his career was designed to evoke royal hopes from Israel's Scriptures that the day of God's kingdom with its king had finally come to Israel (e.g., B. Meyer, M. Hengel, N. T. Wright, C. A. Evans, M. F. Bird). There is no denying the ambiguity of the evidence, as seen, for example, in the royal riddle of Mark 12:35-37, where it is unclear if Jesus is denying the Davidic lineage of the Messiah or claiming that he himself, though not a Davidide, can still be the Messiah—or perhaps something else entirely. In my judgment, postulating Jesus as a messianic claimant remains historically probable from a close historical reading of the Gospels, even if the evidence is more implicit than explicit. In any case, the evidence that needs consideration is discussed below.

(1) Jesus' characteristic designation of himself as the “Son of Man”* was pregnant with messianic significance. If Jesus spoke Aramaic, then he probably used the expression bar(e)nasha for this designation (see Languages of Palestine). The Aramaic phrase was idiomatic for a generic description of “humanity” or “someone” (and this fits neatly with several of Jesus' sayings—e.g., Mt 8:20 // Lk 9:58, where “son of man” means “I” or “people like me,” and Mt 9:6-8, where the authority given to the Son of Man parallels the authority given to human beings concerning the Sabbath). Yet “son of man” as self-designation, in Aramaic or Hebrew, could still take on an absolute or titular meaning. The self-reference as “son of man” obviously echoes the mysterious figure described in Daniel 7, the “one like a son of man,” who is given dominion over an everlasting kingdom. The precise identity of the “son of man” figure is disputed because the imagery is full of cryptic symbolism. Yet it remains highly plausible that the imagery is multi-layered, and the mysterious “son of man” is a multi-valent symbol for God's people, kingdom and appointed king. We know from Qumran, 1 Enoch and the book of Revelation that Daniel 7 was read messianically, and it is likely that Jesus also understood Daniel 7 in a messianic sense, and this arguably informed his usage of the phrase. Indeed, when asked at his trial by the high priest if he was the Messiah (Mk 14:61-62 par.), Jesus seems to be providing an oblique affirmation by way of reference to the Son of Man being enthroned beside God.

(2) Many of the teachings and deeds of Jesus were straight out of Isaiah, and the “anointed one” of Isaiah 61 appears to have provided something of a script for much of Jesus' work. According to Luke 4:16-21, Jesus seems to have taken Isaiah 61:1-2 as programmatic for his ministry. This suggests that Jesus saw himself in a *prophetic role, but not necessarily a messianic one. However, in the accounts that narrate Jesus' answer to the question from *John the Baptist via his disciples as to whether or not Jesus is the “one to come” (Lk 7:18-23 // Mt 11:2-6), Jesus replies with a catena of texts drawn from Isaiah about the blind receiving sight, the lame walking, lepers being cleansed, the deaf hearing, the dead being raised, and good news being preached to the poor. Jesus' reply is, in effect, that the results speak for themselves. When Jesus is asked by followers of John the Baptist if he is the deliverer that everyone has been waiting for, his reply is an indirect affirmation that he is indeed fulfilling the role of a messianic deliverer. Moreover, it is interesting that the same range of activities is explicitly predicated of the Messiah in the Qumran text 4Q521 2 II, 1-14. Although many of Jesus' activities and sayings could be ascribed simply to a sense of prophetic calling, we see elsewhere that these deeds and sayings edge into royal messianic categories of a Davidic deliverer when compared to Jewish writings from the same period.

(3) If Jesus proclaimed the *kingdom of God, then the obvious question is this: what role did Jesus see himself having in the inauguration and consummation of that kingdom? Two passages in particular indicate that Jesus had a royal role in the coming kingdom. Mark 10:35-45 depicts the two sons of Zebedee trying to secure for themselves choice places in the forthcoming reordering of power that they were expecting Jesus to establish in this new kingdom. The two brothers accordingly ask Jesus if they can sit at his left and at his right. Similarly, Jesus tells the disciples in Matthew 19:28-29 // Luke 22:28-30 that in the future kingdom they will sit on thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel, and Jesus' position appears to be in turn over them in the kingdom. To this we can add the observation that Jesus periodically compared himself to royal figures of Israel's ancient history, such as David and Solomon. Indeed, Jesus' roles as exorcist, prophet and sage can be connected to royal traditions in Israel's sacred writings and are perhaps allusive to his royal aspirations.

(4) Several of Jesus' "I have come" (Gk. ēlthon) sayings, distinguished by the formula "I have come [+ purpose]," can be coordinated with messianic aims. The sayings are ambiguous, and proposed referents include Jesus' preexistence, prophetic work or messianic task. In support of the messianic connotation are three particular sayings. The content of Mark 2:17, concerning Jesus coming to call not the righteous but sinners, corresponds to 1 Enoch 48, where the Messiah is the one in whom sinners find hope. The material in Matthew 10:34; Luke 12:49-51; Gospel of Thomas 10, 82 about Jesus coming to kindle a fire or bring a sword indicates that Jesus saw his role as inaugurating the final judgment through fire, a role sometimes attributed to Israel's messiah (e.g., Dan 7:10; 4 Ezra 13:10; 1 En. 63:11). In continuity with John the Baptist, Jesus seems to have believed that it was his role as the "coming one" to initiate the eschatological judgment. Lastly, Luke 19:10 depicts Jesus as coming to seek out and to save the lost, which coheres with other sayings about Jesus coming to restore Israel (e.g., Mt 10:5-6; 15:24; 25:31-34; Mk 6:34; Jn 10:14-16). The image of a Davidic king or the Messiah coming to regather Israel like they were lost sheep (e.g., Pss. Sol. 17:26; Ezek 34:11-14; Shemoneh Esreh 10, 15) is a motif that Jesus appears to have applied to his own ministry.

(5) It is reported that at Caesarea Philippi Peter confessed Jesus as the Messiah (Mt 16:13-20 // Mk 8:27-30). Theologically loaded as the account is by Mark and Matthew, in all probability it contains a genuine historical tradition, since Jesus' severe rebuke of Peter is unlikely to have been retained if fictitious. The confession by Peter that Jesus is the Messiah is not rejected by Jesus; it is met with an unexpected response as Jesus seeks to redefine the meaning of "Messiah" in line with a different string of values and along the thread of a different messianic story related to the suffering of the "Son of Man."

Further evidence for Jesus as a messianic claimant can be seen in the unfolding events of his final week in Jerusalem with his arrest, trial and crucifixion.

(1) The story of the anonymous woman who anoints Jesus at a meal occurs in all four Gospels (Mt 26:6-13; Mk 14:3-9; Lk 7:36-50; Jn 12:1-8), and it likely makes a furtive connection between Jesus' death and his identity as the "anointed one." Although the *anointing was a preparation of Jesus' body for burial (Mt 26:12 // Mk 14:8), it may well have signified the messianic significance of his death, given earlier discussions of his messianic identity among his followers and the messianic themes embedded in his forthcoming activities in Jerusalem (see Evans 2001, 360; Bauckham 2006a, 191-92).

(2) Jesus' *triumphal entry into Jerusalem suggests a deliberate and provocative attempt to fulfill the words of Zechariah 9:9 about Israel's king returning to Zion on a donkey. The reference to Psalm 118 is neither secondary nor incidental to the messianic nature of the event. In fact, the targumic version of that psalm historicizes the thanksgiving liturgy into an acclamation of God's choice of David as king (Evans 2004, 84). The pilgrims celebrate Jesus' entrance into Jerusalem as the arrival of the Davidic deliverer, and Jesus makes no effort to censure them.

(3) Jesus' action in the temple was a demonstration of his messianic prerogatives (see Temple Act). There was an intimate link between Israel's king and Israel's temple since the time of David (2 Sam 7:12-16), and an association between a new king and a new temple continued in the Persian and Second Temple periods (Zech 6:12-13; 4Q174 1 I, 3:3-10). The Messiah was supposed to rebuild and/or cleanse the temple. Jesus' demonstration against the corruption of the temple and its role in fostering nationalistic sentiments must be seen as a critique by one who claims authority to determine its function and to condemn its operation. "The entry into Jerusalem and the cleansing of the temple constituted a messianic demonstration, a messianic critique, a messianic fulfillment event, and a sign of the messianic restoration of Israel" (Meyer, 199).

(4) Jesus appears to have deliberately inflamed messianic hopes through his engagement with Judean religious leaders. In one encounter (Mk 12:35-37 par.), Jesus asked the scribes how can the Messiah can be a son of David, since in Psalm 110 David calls the Messiah his "Lord"? The saying is genuinely enigmatic and has prompted a number of interpretations. Is this an example of later Christian christological exegesis of the OT read into Jesus' life? Is Mark's Jesus teaching that the Messiah is not from David's line, or that Jesus himself, though in fact the Messiah, is not a Davidide? Most likely what Jesus is doing here is redefining the meaning of messiahship. The citation of Psalm 110 specifies both the priestly function of the Messiah (given the reference to Melchizedek in Ps 110:4) and intimates the exaltation of the Messiah to sharing in God's own throne (given the reference to the title "Lord" in Ps 110:1); both themes, priestly Messiah and exalted Messiah, were current in Second Temple Judaism.

(5) Messianic themes emerge most clearly in the accounts of Jesus' death to the extent that "we cannot ignore that the Messiah questions runs through the Passion story of all the gospels like a red thread" (Hengel, 45). The passion prediction in Mark 14:27-28 about the shepherd being struck down and the sheep being scattered reflects Jesus' own unique interpretation of Zechariah 13:7 as designating his suffering and subsequent vindication in terms of judgment and restoration or in terms of the scattering and regathering of Israel. In other words, what is going to happen to Jesus is a microcosm of what has happened or will happen to Jesus' disciples and to Israel. The time before the end was called the "messianic woes" or the "birth pangs of the Messiah." These woes included a dark period of trial and tribulation that was to fall upon God's people as a precursor to the final manifestation of God's kingdom. Jesus probably was thinking that such woes were destined to fall upon him, and that he, by his vicarious death, would shield his people from their punitive effect. As the messianic shepherd-king, Jesus is smitten with this divine judgment in order to preserve a remnant of the faithful from the full fury of the messianic woes. So when the messianic woes come and judgment is poured out, God's people emerge purified rather than destroyed by the eschatological ordeal. It seems to have been Jesus' intent that by his death and vindication as the messianic shepherd, he would effect the eschatological regathering of Israel in the aftermath. The judgment, issued in the striking of the shepherd, results in the reconstitution of a remnant of Israel. Importantly, this mix of midrash, messianism, *apocalypticism and atonement theology is truly unique in the NT and thus is all the more likely to be authentic.

What is more, the *trial of Jesus (Mt 26:57-68; Mk 14:53-64; Lk: 22.63-71) includes accusations about threats to destroy the temple and an explicit question as to whether or not Jesus is the Messiah.

Clearly, the priestly aristocracy understood Jesus' intentions as messianic and therefore as politically inflammatory. Jesus' reply to the high priest was brief, opaque and unanticipated. Jesus appears to have tacitly acknowledged his messianic status and then announced that he would be coenthroned with God like the "Son of Man" in Daniel 7:9, 13-14. An indubitable event of Jesus' life was that he was crucified by the Romans on the charge of being a messianic pretender and mocked with the titulus "King of the Jews" on the cross. The titulus was the final verdict of what his ministry meant to the Jerusalemites—a ministry that led to the charge of being a messianic pretender in his final week—and was elicited by the various themes of his teachings and activities.

Moving into the post-Easter period, we should take note of what impact or effect Jesus had on the early church as evidence of his messianic identity. The recurrent messianic motifs in early Christian sources such as Mark, the shared tradition of Luke and Matthew, Paul's letters, and primitive confessions such as Romans 1:3-4 seem to be derived from a belief that Jesus' career was performatively messianic. The resurrection faith did not create Messiah faith, but rather it took what should have been the debris of a messianic failure and turned it into a messianic movement based on the notion that God's Messiah, though rejected by the Judean populace, had come and done what was asked of him and then was vindicated by God. The deeper we dig into the historical tradition in the Gospels, the more concrete the evidence becomes that Jesus deliberately imparted messianic hopes to those that followed him because, and only because, he was convinced that he was the anointed one pointed to by Israel's Scriptures.

3. Portrayal of Jesus as "Messiah" in the Four Gospels.

3.1. Mark. The Gospel of Mark is the earliest Gospel, and it combines the centrality of the cross from Paul's preaching with the Jesus tradition according to Peter's testimony. Mark's incipit, "The beginning of the gospel of Jesus the Messiah," includes the good news about Jesus and the good news announced by Jesus (Mk 1:1, 15).

The word christos is used several times in Mark. Peter confesses Jesus as "the Messiah" at Caesarea Philippi, and this marks a major turning point in the narrative as attention now turns more fully to the imminent events of Jesus' confrontation with the Judean leadership and his looming crucifixion (Mk

8:29). Later, christos is clearly used as a referent to Jesus when it is said that there will be a reward for anyone who gives the disciples a cup of water because “you belong to the Messiah” (Mk 9:41). The word appears again in the royal riddle in Mark 12:35–37, where Jesus is tantalizingly opaque on the question of the identity of the Messiah as a son of David. His answer is, in effect, that while the Messiah is a son of David, he is more than a son of David and has a preexistent quality and carries a priestly authority as well. The word christos can also be used of other aspiring messianic figures as in the Olivet discourse in Mark 13. There it is said that people will be directing the crowds to other messianic claimants by announcing, “Look, here is the Messiah” or “Look, there he is,” and Jesus urges his disciples to ignore such claims. That is because such persons are “false Messiahs” (pseudochristoi) who perform signs and even try to deceive the elect (Mk 13:21–22).

At Jesus’ trial, after several witnesses have testified against him for his announcement of the temple’s impending destruction, the high priest asks Jesus, “Are you the Messiah, the Son of the Blessed One?” (Mk 14:61). In many ways, the high priest aptly summarizes the christological focus of Mark’s Gospel: Jesus is the Messiah. Notably, “Blessed One” is a circumlocution for “God” that avoids pronouncing the divine name, and the high priest asks Jesus if he claims to be the “Son of God.” Hence the titles “Messiah” and “Son of God” are roughly equivalent. However, “Son of God” probably carries connotations of Jesus’ unique filial relationship to God and his heavenly commission that is revealed at key points of the narrative, including his *baptism (Mk 1:11) and *transfiguration (Mk 9:7). Interesting also is that Jesus responds to the high priest affirmatively by saying, “I am,” and retorts to the high priest, “You will see the Son of Man sitting at the right hand of the Mighty One and coming on the clouds of heaven” (Mk 14:62). It is quite possible that Jesus’ response “I am” is a deliberate allusion to the Tetragrammaton, YHWH (“Yahweh”), the name of God (cf. Ex 3:14; Is 43:10, 13; Jn 8:58).

The mention of the Son of Man coming on the clouds of heaven is probably not a reference to Jesus’ second coming but rather denotes his enthronement beside God as the Almighty’s vice-regent. This is plausible on two fronts. First, the parallel versions in Matthew and Luke include the qualifying phrase “from now on” (ap arti [Mt 26:64]; apo tou nyn [Lk 22:69]) they will see the Son of Man sitting at the right hand of the Mighty One. How can it be “from now”? Most likely, Jesus’ execution is the very means of his enthronement beside God and achieves his elevation to royal status in the very efforts of Caiaphas and his cohorts to dispose of him. Second, the picture Jesus presents coheres with the rabbinic tradition, allegedly affirmed by Rabbi Akiba and denounced by Rabbi Yose, that the multiple thrones referred to in Daniel 7:9 included one for God and one for the Son of David (b. Hag. 14a; b. Sanh. 38b). Jesus’ audacity in making such a claim is no greater than the claim made in the Qumran text 11Q13 concerning a heavenly enthronement and deification of Melchizedek. In which case, the titles “Messiah,” “Son of the Blessed One” and “Son of Man” (Mk 14:61–62) are not synonymous, but mutually interpretive. Jesus’ identity as the messianic deliverer is defined with reference to his role as one appointed by God and invested with heavenly authority, and also with respect to the suffering and vindication pattern that he enters into as the Son of Man, who is to be gloriously enthroned beside God.

The final appearance of the word christos in Mark is in the crucifixion scene when Jesus is mocked on the cross by the chief priests and teachers of the law. They decry Jesus with the words “Let this Messiah, this king of Israel, come down now from the cross, that we may see and believe” (Mk 15:32). Together with the titulus (Mk 15:26), the titles “King of Israel” and “King of the Jews” are typical examples of Mark’s dramatic irony. Throughout the passion narrative Jesus is viciously mocked as a royal pretender, and yet the reality that Mark points his audience to is that the mockery is actually true. Jesus is the rightful king rejected by the Judean leadership and brutally murdered by the Romans even though his final vindication is soon to be manifested. Indeed, the imagery in the passion sequence—salutation by the praetorian guard, bestowal of a purple robe, coronation (with thorns), procession up the Via Dolorosa, climactic acclamation of the Son of God—parallels the events that took place in the triumphal procession of Roman generals and emperors on their return to Rome after securing a great victory (Schmidt). Here we begin to capture part of Mark’s rhetorical purpose. He is trying to persuade or affirm to readers that Jesus is the Messiah, not despite the cross but precisely because of it (see Bird 2005).

Mention should also be made of the so-called messianic secret in Mark’s Gospel. W. Wrede maintained that the injunctions to silence among supplicants of healings and exorcisms were not historically authentic events from Jesus’ ministry but rather were theological additions utilized by Mark. Wrede’s theory, still influential in some circles, is that Mark and his tradition had to devise a convincing explanation as to why no one remembered Jesus claiming to be the Messiah during his lifetime, while the church celebrated him as the Messiah after his resurrection. By employing the secrecy motif in his Gospel, Mark could simultaneously depict Jesus as the Messiah and account for the fact that it was not widely known, because Jesus deliberately kept his messianic identity a secret among his followers until after he had been raised from the dead.

There are several major problems with Wrede's thesis. First, it is unlikely that the church acclaimed Jesus as the Messiah purely on the basis of belief in his resurrection. There is nothing about a resurrection that itself would necessitate the messianic identity of Jesus in the absence of prior messianic claims by Jesus. We have no analogy for the suffering righteous one who is killed, revived, exalted and then called "the Messiah." As M. Hengel says, "The mere revivification of a person or, as the case may be, his translation into the heavenly realm, establishes neither messianic majesty nor eschatological mission, nor could it, of itself, supply the content of a message of salvation" (Hengel, 10). Second, what is silenced in Mark's Gospel is not always messianic, and what is messianic is not effectively silenced. The silences relate to more than a messianic status and include Jesus' sonship (Mk 3:11-12), miracles (Mk 5:43) and the kingdom (Mk 4:10-12). Mark has just as much of a kingdom secret and a miracle secret as he has a messianic secret (Mk 8:27-30). On top of that, the only supplicant of healing who hails Jesus in explicitly messianic terms (i.e., "Son of David") is not silenced at all (Mk 10:46-52). Thus, Jesus' injunction to the disciples not to tell anyone about his identity as the Messiah (Mk 8:30) is hardly programmatic for the book and is part of a larger secrecy motif in the Gospel as a whole whereby the mysterious identity of Jesus is only gradually revealed. F. J. Matera aptly summarizes what Mark meant by applying the title "Christ" to Jesus: "The Messiah is the Spirit-anointed Son of God who proclaims the arrival of God's kingdom in word and deed. He heals the sick, expels demons, and even extends his ministry to Gentiles. Most important, he gives his life as a ransom for the many. Having suffered, died, and risen from the dead, he will return as the glorious Son of Man" (Matera, 24).

The most distinguishing feature of Mark's messianism is his focus on the passion as the means whereby Jesus' identity as the Messiah is revealed. In the Gospel of Mark, Jesus is the Messiah who proclaims the kingdom of God, and yet we are confronted at the end of the narrative with the kingship of the crucified Messiah. Mark wants to define messiahship in light of Jesus' ministry, death and resurrection. Mark's theological purpose is to lead his audience to see the cross as the place where the saving power of the kingdom is unleashed, where Jesus' identity as Messiah is manifested, and where the true pattern of *discipleship is set forth.

3.2. Matthew. Matthew replicates much of Mark's usage of christos, but he also projects his own perspective into the tradition in his effort to show that Christians follow an authentically Jewish Messiah. The opening words of Matthew's Gospel, "Jesus Christ, the Son of David, the Son of Abraham," cement the Jewish credentials of Jesus (Mt 1:1). The subsequent *genealogy shows that Jesus' familial origins are rooted in Israel's sacred history, and that he belongs within the house of David. Joseph is the husband of *Mary, and since Joseph stands in the dynastic line of David, Jesus is qualified to be the Messiah (Mt 1:16). From Abraham to David were fourteen generations, and from the Babylonian exile to the Messiah were also fourteen generations (Mt 1:17). After the genealogy (Mt 1:1-17) Matthew proceeds to detail the "birth of the Messiah" (Mt 1:18), where Jesus is portrayed as the fulfillment and climax of Israel's postexilic history. Overall, Matthew emphasizes the picture of Jesus as the royal Son of David and Israel's shepherd-king in order to show, in dialogue with the OT, that Jesus is the awaited deliverer of Israel (Willitts). Another unique element of the Matthean Jesus is that his messianic role also includes his role as teacher and eschatological judge of the nations.

Matthew accents the royal status of Jesus in several places, beginning with usage of the title christos when the magi ask about the birth of the "king of the Jews" and Herod responds by inquiring with the scribes about OT prophecies concerning the birthplace of the Messiah (Mt 2:1-4). When the Matthean Jesus enters Jerusalem, he is hailed as the "Son of David" to the consternation of the chief priests and teachers of the *law (Mt 21:9, 15). Matthew also includes the unit about the royal riddle as to how the Messiah can also be a *son of David when David calls him "Lord." Matthew's introduction to the unit is prefaced with the provocative question "What do you think of the Messiah?" (Mt 22:42).

John the Baptist sends a delegation to Jesus to inquire if he really is the Messiah (apparently, time in prison caused the Baptist to have some doubts), John's question having been prompted by his hearing about the "deeds of the Messiah" (Mt 11:2). The question is whether or not Jesus is actually performing the messianic signs of liberation, as John could do with some rescuing himself. Matthew believes that Jesus passes muster as a messianic deliverer, and John should not confuse the presence of the kingdom with its reception.

Matthew gives his own stamp to the confession of Peter at Caesarea Philippi, and the Matthean Jesus calls Jesus "the Messiah, the Son of the living God" (Mt 16:16). The emphasis falls upon Jesus as the Son with an exalted status who fulfills all the messianic hopes of Judaism. Matthew is also more explicit than Mark in the injunction to secrecy concerning Jesus' messianic identity (Mt 16:20).

Probably the characteristic element of Matthew, at least in relation to Mark, is that the Matthean Jesus is a teaching Messiah, not only a suffering and vindicated Messiah. As such, his messianism also presents Jesus as a new Moses, in addition to being the Son of David par excellence. Disciples of Jesus have one *teacher, who is the Messiah (Mt 23:10), which indicates the exclusive authority that Jesus' teaching possesses for his followers. That is why the commands of the risen Jesus need to be taught to all nations (Mt 28:19-20). Matthew also makes Jesus' messiahship slightly more explicit in the trial scene as the soldiers torment Jesus with the words "Prophecy to us, Messiah! Who is it that hit you?" (Mt 26:68). Twice Pilate refers to Jesus "who is called Messiah" (Mt 27:17, 22), making the messianic question a more divisive issue at Jesus' trial.

Jesus' messiahship is significant for Matthew because it provides the primary connection between the Christians of Matthew's day and Israel's sacred history. Jesus preserves together both the old and the new (Mt 9:17), and he affirms the validity of Israel's law and the prophetic promises, but he also draws in the Gentile Christians into the family of Abraham. Because the Messiah is a son of David as well as a son of Abraham, Matthew can envisage Gentiles entering into communion with Israel's God by following the teachings of Israel's Messiah (e.g., Mt 4:15-16; 8:5-13; 10:18; 12:18-21; 24:14; 25:32; 28:19-20).

3.3. Luke. The Gospel of Luke has its own distinctive Christology within the wider discourse of Luke-Acts as a whole. Luke inherits several uses of christos from Mark but still employs them within his own unique matrix of Jesus as the Spirit-anointed prophet and messiah who brings the forgiveness of sins to his people (see Bird 2007). It is unclear whether it is the royal or prophetic nature of Jesus' anointed identity that is uppermost (see Porter, 145), but the two anointed roles are hardly mutually exclusive, and they coalesce as part of Luke's effort to depict Jesus as God's appointed agent for the deliverance of Jews and Gentiles.

In the birth narratives, an angel of the Lord announces to the shepherds that a savior has been born who is "the Messiah the Lord" (christos kyrios) (Lk 2:11; cf. the very similar expressions in Lam 4:20; Pss. Sol. 17:32), which is arguably a proper title. A bit further on in the same narrative sequence Simeon waits for the "consolation of Israel" (Lk 2:25), and he is promised that he will not die before he sees "the Lord's Messiah" (christos kyriou [Lk 2:26]), which is equivalent to "the Lord's Anointed." Later, John the Baptist is asked if he is the "Messiah," and he responds by contrasting his own ministry of preparation with the "stronger one" who will baptize with the *Holy Spirit and with fire (Lk 3:16), which intimates the role of the Messiah to bring cleansing or judgment upon the earth. At one point Luke reports that in Jesus' exorcisms the *demons kept shouting, "You are the Son of God!" but Jesus would not let them speak because "they knew he was the Messiah" (Lk 4:41). This acutely amplifies the secrecy motif found in Mark and places it more lucidly in relation to Jesus' messianic identity, and it also reflects a tradition about royal figures, such as David and Solomon, who were regarded as exorcists. Luke also accentuates Peter's confession of Jesus as the Messiah by using the more Semitic expression "the Messiah of God" (Lk 9:20). In the passion story Luke essentially follows Mark's usage of christos with a few minor changes. For instance, Luke's Jesus makes no mention of false messiahs (Lk 17:23-24; cf. Mt 24:23-24 // Mk 13:21-22), and at the trial the high priest asks Jesus if he is "the Messiah" (Lk 22:67) but follows that with another question, "Are you the Son of God?" to which Jesus answers affirmatively but somewhat indirectly with "You say that I am" (Lk 22:70). The priests also accuse Jesus before Pilate with political charges of perverting the nation, preventing tribute being paid to Caesar, and calling himself "Messiah a king" (Lk 23:2). Pilate himself questions Jesus if he is indeed "the King of the Jews," and Jesus replies with yet another indirect response, "You say so" (Lk 23:3). Luke thus enlists Jewish and Roman officials into discussions of Jesus' messianic identity; they participate in executing Jesus despite the fact that he is innocent (Lk 23:4, 13-16, 22).

Material unique to Luke about Jesus as the Messiah occurs in the resurrection narrative. When the risen Jesus appears to the two travelers on the way to Emmaus, Luke has Jesus rhetorically asking them, "Was it not necessary for the Messiah to suffer these things and then to enter his glory?" (Lk 24:26). This is the clearest indication we have that the Scriptures were regarded as teaching that the Messiah had to suffer as part of his divinely foreordained role. Luke arguably reads Jewish messianic hopes in light of the psalms about the suffering righteous one, and that is how he is able to bring the two themes together. The same point is reiterated again in a fuller form in Luke 24:44-47, where it is declared by the risen Jesus that everything must be fulfilled about him in the "law of Moses, the prophets, and the psalms" that the "Messiah will suffer and rise from the dead on the third day," leading to *repentance and the *forgiveness of sins being preached in his name. Importantly, this interpretive maneuver could be ascertained only when Jesus "opened their minds so that they could understand the Scriptures" (Lk 24:45). Hence, being able to read the Scriptures messianically (as pointing to the passion and exaltation of the Messiah) is more a matter of divine illumination than simply good biblical interpretation.

It is impossible to discuss the Christology of Luke without also having a glance at the book of Acts. The vast majority of the references to christos in Acts involve a designation for Jesus as "Jesus Christ" (Acts 2:36; 3:6; 4:10; 8:12; 9:34; 10:36, 48; 16:18), "Christ Jesus" (Acts 18:5; 24:24) and "the Lord Jesus Christ" (Acts 11:17; 15:26; 28:31). This is evidence that christos has certainly become a namelike designation for Jesus even if all titular significance has not yet dissipated. Elsewhere in Acts, christos is used to present Jesus as the fulfillment of messianic hopes in apostolic preaching before Jewish audiences. Peter's Pentecost sermon reaches its summit with the announcement that Jesus is both "Lord and Messiah" (Acts 2:36). The notion of the ordained suffering of the Messiah is also accented at several points (Acts 2:31; 3:18; 17:3; 26:23) and is concurrent with the affirmation that Jesus is "the Messiah appointed for you [Israel]" who will bring "times of refreshing for the nation" and "restore everything as he [God] promised long ago through the prophets" (Acts 3:18-21). Again and again many of the apostles preach to their audiences that "Jesus is the Messiah" (Acts 5:42; 8:5; 9:22; 17:3; 18:28) in the context of the fulfillment of the scriptural promises about God's coming deliverance.

The most christologically significant aspect of Acts is that, in contrast to the largely narrative Christology of the Gospel of Luke, the Christology of Acts is derived mainly from the titles. Of the two primary titles for Jesus in Acts, "Lord" and "Messiah," the latter is the more dominating description.

As Matera observes, "Of the many terms that Luke employs to identify Jesus, then, 'Messiah' is among the most important. Indeed, one could argue that it is the title in reference to which all others are to be understood" (Matera, 89).

3.4. John. The Gospel of John was composed probably at a time when confession of Jesus as the Messiah was a lasting point of division between Jews who believed in Jesus and Jews who did not. Consequently, the stated purpose of the Fourth Gospel is its attempt to persuade its audience that "Jesus is the Messiah" (Jn 20:31). To that end, the Fourth Gospel parades an ensemble of witnesses to prove the case that Jesus is the Messiah sent by God and has a unique relationship to the Father (see Bauckham 2006b).

In two places christos is used in the formulaic designation "Jesus Christ" (Jn 1:17; 17:3). The Aramaic word for "messiah" is transliterated into the Greek messias and translated as christos for the benefit of the reader at two points (Jn 1:41; 4:25). Following the prologue, John the Baptist explicitly denies that he is the Messiah (Jn 1:20, 25; cf. Jn 3:28), and later the Baptist testifies that Jesus is the Son of God (Jn 1:34). After meeting Jesus, Andrew seeks out his brother Peter with the news that "We have found the Messiah" (Jn 1:41), which probably is the profession of faith of the Johannine network responsible for transmitting the traditions behind the Fourth Gospel. Philip goes on to describe Jesus as the one foretold by "the law and prophets" (Jn 1:45). Nathaniel's encounter with Jesus results in his guileless affirmation of Jesus as rabbi, the "Son of God" and the "King of Israel" (Jn 1:49). Although the disciples do not yet fully grasp the true meaning of Jesus' identity, they are witnesses to Jesus' divine sonship and messianic mission.

The expectation of a messianic deliverer is attested by the Samaritan woman, who says that the Messiah is thought to "make known all things" (Jn 4:25). She is persuaded by Jesus' mysterious knowledge of her life that he is the Messiah (Jn 4:29). In a moment of narrative irony, the Samaritans embrace the salvation that is from the Jews with the advent of the Jewish Messiah (Jn 4:22), while the Judean leaders threaten to expel anyone from the synagogue who confessed Jesus to be the Messiah (Jn 9:22). This evidently reflects some kind of internecine conflict between Jews and Jesus-believing Jews about the validity of faith in Jesus as Messiah within Jewish communities of the post-A.D. 70 period. Martha is another woman enlisted as a witness to Jesus' messianic identity when she exclaims, "I believe that you are the Messiah, the Son of God, the one coming into the world" (Jn 11:27).

We find in John 7:25-44 that Jewish messianic speculations are set in juxtaposition to the messianic identity of Jesus. The crowd wonders if the Judean authorities privately believe that Jesus is the Messiah, since they refuse to move against him, and yet there is some doubt among the crowd about Jesus because no one is supposed to know where the Messiah is from (Jn 7:26-27). Then again, the signs that Jesus does are regarded by the crowd as clear evidence of his messianic credentials (Jn 7:31), yet some are still hesitant because the Messiah comes not from Galilee but rather from Bethlehem (Jn 7:41-43). A similar juxtaposition recurs in John 12:34, where the crowd has an expectation according to the law that the "Messiah remains forever," and they are accordingly perplexed as to why the Son of Man is lifted up (i.e., dies). This leads to their question "Who is the Son of Man?" This unit witnesses to both the equation of the Messiah with the Son in Jewish tradition and confusion about what Christians meant by calling Jesus "the Son of Man."

The works that Jesus performs showcase the fact that he was sent by the Father, but they also disclose his messianic mission. A group of Jews gathers around Jesus in the temple and demands that he end the suspense and tell them plainly if he is the Messiah. Jesus responds that he has told them, but they do not believe even though the works that he does in his Father's name testify to him (Jn 10:22-25). The primary problem in this episode is not simply the Jews' difficulty to fit Jesus into their preformed messianic ideas, but their inability to accept Jesus' claim that he is the Messiah and the Son of God, who shares in the divine life of the Father (Jn 10:37-38). For John, belief in Jesus as the Messiah cannot simply be read off the surface of his words and deeds; messianic faith is not arrived by human deduction, but comes only by revelation (Jn 6:44-45).

The Fourth Gospel attests the diversity among Jewish groups about messianic figures and polemics against Christians for believing in Jesus as Messiah. What is more, the profession of Jesus as the Messiah is clearly important to the evangelist yet subordinate to the claim that Jesus is the transcendent Son of God, who participates in the divine identity of the Father. Viewed this way, the Johannine Jesus exemplifies a redefinition of messiahship to account for Jewish disbelief in Jesus' messianic status and his unique position in relation to Israel's God. Proclaiming Jesus as Messiah is also imperative for the author as an evangelist of his own covenant people (Pryor).

More importantly, in the Fourth Gospel the Messiah undertakes the role as God's word to Israel and also God's savior for the whole world. Indeed, "As Messiah of Israel, the Word incarnate accomplishes deliverance not only for his own but for the world. . . . The Mission of the Word in the world includes the people of Israel and intends their deliverance, but it also extends to the whole world, because the God of Israel is the Lord of the universe, and the incarnate Word the agent of its creation" (Thompson, 172).

4. Conclusion.

Ultimately, the name "Jesus Christ" is embedded with the story and status of Jesus of Nazareth as the anointed deliverer appointed for Israel and for the nations too. The theological texture and the rhetorical movement of the evangelists are largely focused upon the identity of Jesus as the messianic savior of Israel. In sum, the messianic identity of Jesus is of paramount importance for the *Christology of the evangelists. The evangelists are unanimous that Jesus is the Messiah, who fulfills the scriptural promises of a coming deliverer to redeem Israel from their plight. In his exalted state he also is the leader of the renewed people of God comprised of both Jews and Gentiles.

See also CHRISTOLOGY; EXILE AND RESTORATION; "I AM" SAYINGS; KINGDOM OF GOD/HEAVEN; LORD; REVOLUTIONARY MOVEMENTS; SON OF DAVID; SON OF GOD; SON OF MAN.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. H. W. Bateman, "Defining the Titles 'Christ' and 'Son of God' in Mark's Narrative Presentation of Jesus," JETS 50 (2007) 537-59; R. Bauckham, Jesus and the Eyewitnesses: The Gospels as Eyewitness Testimony (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2006a); idem, "Messianism According to the Gospel of John," in Challenging Perspectives on the Gospel of John, ed. J. Lierman (WUNT 2/219; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2006b) 34-68; K. Berger, "Zum Problem der Messianität Jesu," ZTK 71 (1974) 1-30; M. F. Bird, "Jesus Is the Christ: Messianic Apologetics in the Gospel of Mark," RTR 64 (2005) 1-14; idem, Jesus Is the Christ: The Messianic Testimony of the Gospels (Carlisle, UK: Paternoster, 2012); idem, "Jesus Is the Messiah of God: Messianic Proclamation in Luke-Acts," RTR 66 (2007) 69-82; idem, Are You the One Who Is to Come? The Historical Jesus and the Messianic Question (Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2009); C. L. Blomberg, "Messiah in the New Testament," In Israel's Messiah in the Bible and the Dead Sea Scrolls, ed. R. Hess and M. D. Carroll R. (Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2003) 111-41; M. Bockmuehl, "Resistance and Redemption in the Jesus Tradition," in Redemption and Resistance: The Messianic Hopes of Jews and Christians in Antiquity, ed. M. Bockmuehl and J. C. Paget (London: T & T Clark, 2007) 65-77; A. Y. Collins and J. J. Collins, King and Messiah as Son of God: Divine, Human, and Angelic Messianic Figures in Biblical and Related Literature (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2008); N. A. Dahl, The Crucified Messiah and Other Essays (Minneapolis: Augsburg, 1974) 37-47; M. de Jonge, Christology in Context (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1988); C. A. Evans, Mark 8:27-16:20 (WBC 34B; Nashville: Thomas Nelson, 2001); idem, "The Aramaic Psalter and the New Testament: Praising the Lord in History and Prophecy," in From Prophecy to Testament: The Function of the Old Testament in the New, ed. C. A. Evans (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 2004) 44-91; J. A. Fitzmyer, The One Who Is To Come (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2007); M. Hengel, Studies in Early Christology (London: SCM, 1995); O. Hofius, "Ist Jesus der Messias?" JBT 8 (1993) 103-29; W. Horbury, Messianism Among Jews and Christians: Twelve Biblical and Historical Studies (London: T & T Clark, 2003); L. Hurtado, Lord Jesus Christ: Devotion to Jesus in Earliest Christianity (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2003); A. Laato, A Star Is Rising: The Historical Development of the Old Testament Royal Ideology and the Rise of the Jewish Messianic Expectations (SFCJ 5; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1997); A. H. I. Lee, From Messiah to Preexistent Son: Jesus' Self-Consciousness and Early Christian Exegesis of the Messianic Psalms (WUNT 2/192; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2005); F. J. Matera, New Testament Christology (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1999); E. P. Meadors, Jesus, the Messianic Herald of Salvation (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1997); B. F. Meyer, The Aims of Jesus (London: SCM, 1979); K. Pomykala, The Davidic Dynasty Tradition in Early Judaism: Its History and Significance for Messianism (SBLEJL 7; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1995); S. E. Porter, "The Messiah in Luke and Acts: Forgiveness for the Captives," in The Messiah in the Old and New Testaments, ed. S. E. Porter (MNTS; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2007) 144-64; J. W. Pryor, John: Evangelist of the Covenant People (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1992); T. E. Schmidt, "Mark 15.16-32: The Crucifixion Narrative and the Roman Triumphal Procession," NTS 41 (1995) 1-18; M. L. Strauss, The Davidic Messiah in Luke-Acts: The Promise and Fulfilment in Luke's Christology (JSNTSup 110; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1995); M. M. Thompson, "Word of God, Messiah of Israel, Savior of the World: Learning the Identity of Jesus from the Gospel of John," in Seeking the Identity of Jesus: A Pilgrimage, ed. B. R. Gaventa and R. B. Hays (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2008) 166-79;

J. Willitts, Matthew's Messianic Shepherd-King: In Search of "The Lost Sheep of the House of Israel" (BZNW 147; Berlin: de Gruyter, 2007); W. Wrede, The Messianic Secret, trans. J. C. G. Greig (Cambridge: James Clark, 1971); M. Zetterholm, ed., The Messiah: In Early Judaism and Christianity (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2007). M. F. Bird

CHRISTOLOGY

The Gospels are "lives" of Jesus (in the sense of the ancient literary genre of biography) (see Gospel: Genre). As such, they are strongly focused on the identity and career of their subject, Jesus of Nazareth, and contain a wealth of "christological" material that is not easily summarized in a brief space. Additionally, they were written to relate closely to the Hebrew Scriptures, recording a new and climactic chapter in the story of God, his world and his people that those Scriptures tell. The Gospels share major common characteristics, while each also has its distinctive contribution to make.

1. The Christology of the Gospels: Common Characteristics
2. Gospel of Mark
3. Gospel of Matthew
4. Gospel of Luke
5. Gospel of John

1. The Christology of the Gospels: Common Characteristics.

We can summarize the common characteristics of their Christology as follows.

1.1. Narrative Christology. The Gospels tell the story of Jesus. They frame their accounts of who Jesus is around and within the story that they tell about him. The question of Jesus' identity is raised by what he does and says and suffers. It is discussed among the characters in the story: Jesus himself, his disciples, the people, his enemies. There are moments of disclosure when God declares who Jesus is. What he does and suffers reveals who he is. But more than that, it is actually through the story that Jesus becomes who he now is: the crucified, risen and exalted Lord. The Gospels tell a story that maintains the identity of the earthly Jesus, in the life he once lived, with the living and exalted Jesus, who reigns with God and is known to his followers now. The story of his human life and death tells us not only what he has done for us, but also who he now is: still the man Jesus of Nazareth, still the one who was crucified, still the one who shares the identity of the one God. Recognizing the narrative Christology of the Gospels should warn us against taking the christological titles in the Gospels (such as “Messiah” and “Son of God”) as autonomous units of meaning. Although the scriptural background of these titles is important for understanding them (see below), the Gospel narratives serve to give them their full and precise meaning within the Gospels. They may sum up the narratives, but they also need the narratives to explain them.

1.2. Metanarrational Christology. Not only do the Gospels tell the story of Jesus; they also connect that story with the biblical metanarrative, the grand story of God, his people and his world, which began with creation and will conclude in the eschatological future with the new creation of all things. The full significance of Jesus can be seen only in that universal context. Each of the Gospels begins by linking its story back into the OT’s story, each in a different and distinctive way. One way in which all of them connect Jesus’ story with Israel’s hopes of salvation is by prefacing their account of Jesus’ ministry with an account of the preaching of *John the Baptist, greatest of Israel’s prophets. Moreover, the Gospels not only connect their story backwards to the OT’s “story so far”; they also point ahead, each in different ways, to the future “coming soon”: the mission of the new, messianic people of God to the world and the completion of God’s purposes through Jesus at his future coming. The Jesus of the Gospels is a unique figure in that he is both the one for whom the whole story told in the OT prepares and the one who holds the destiny of the whole world in his hands.

1.3. Scriptural Christology. That Jesus and the events of his life, ministry, suffering, *death, *resurrection and exaltation fulfilled the promises of God in the OT is a theme that is prominent in all the Gospels. It appears not only in the many explicit quotations from the Scriptures, but also in many allusions, such as those to the Psalms, that are a major feature of the passion narratives in all the Gospels (see Old Testament in the Gospels). Some of these quotations and allusions refer to messianic prophecies that were well recognized at the time. Others refer to passages that were not commonly read as messianic (such as Is 52–53). Still others refer to prophecies of coming *salvation that are not explicitly messianic in the OT. A messiah or messiahs were not always prominent in Jewish expectations of future salvation, but the Gospels focus all of these on Jesus. Furthermore, the Scriptures that are “fulfilled” by Jesus are not all explicitly prophetic. The Gospels identify in the OT many prefigurings, patterns and trends that point to or culminate in Jesus (see Typology). Finally, the titles that the Gospels use to sum up Jesus’ identity are mostly derived from the Hebrew Scriptures: “Messiah” (anointed one) (see Christ), “king,” *Son of David,” *Son of God,” *Lord” and the enigmatic *Son of Man.” Some of these were in use as messianic titles among Jews at the time, others were not. It is important to recognize that the Gospels do not just take up a ready-made messianic expectation and apply it to Jesus. The fabric of reference to Scripture is very distinctive, featuring themes (such as the suffering and death of the Messiah or his exaltation to God’s heavenly throne) that were not commonly discerned in the OT by other Jews, while some messianic themes (such as the military defeat of Israel’s enemies) are ignored by the Gospels. The scriptural Christology of the Gospels has its roots in the distinctive ways in which Jesus himself discerned his identity and mission in the Scriptures and in the creative exegesis of Scripture in which early Christians engaged as a means of interpreting Jesus and his story. It entails a two-way interpretative process: understanding Jesus in the light of the Scriptures and understanding the Scriptures in the light of Jesus.

1.4. Salvation-Historical Christology. Christology in the Gospels (as in the rest of the NT) is intimately connected with soteriology. The story of Jesus is told as the decisive stage of the story of how God has acted for the salvation and renewal both of his people Israel and of the whole creation. So Jesus appears as the one who has a unique mission from God to be the Savior of the world. In the terminology of the Synoptic Gospels, this can be summed up by saying that he came to proclaim and to inaugurate the *kingdom of God; in the terminology of the Gospel of John, that he came to bring eternal *life. We may add that in the biblical expectation God was expected to come not only to redeem his people and the nations, but also to be present with them. In a variety of ways the Gospels portray Jesus as the presence of *God with his people (e.g., Mt 1:23; Jn 1:14–18).

1.5. Relational Christology. The Gospel narratives are not about Jesus in isolation from others; rather, they are very much about Jesus in relationship and interaction with many other characters in the stories: *God his Father, the *Holy Spirit, *angels, Satan and the *demons, and a wide variety of human characters. The identity of Jesus is constituted and clarified as his relationship to these other characters is established. For example, in all the Gospels he is portrayed as “the Son” in relation to “the Father,” as sent by the Father and doing the Father’s will, as receiving and bestowing the Spirit, as a teacher of *disciples, as brother to those whom he calls brothers and sisters, as overcoming Satan, as restoring health and life and relationship with God to people in a variety of situations of need, as sacrificing his life for others, as the son of *Mary, as a Jew in relation to other Jews and to *Samaritans and to *Gentiles. His character, to which there is rarely explicit reference in the Gospels, emerges in these relationships, as was common in ancient biographical narrative. The identity of Jesus in the Gospels would be meaningless without this complex of concrete relationships with other persons. We should note also that his uniquely universal identity emerges when he is said to be related to all *Israel (e.g., Lk 1:33), to all people (e.g., Jn 12:32) and even to the whole creation (e.g., Mt 28:18).

1.6. Divine Identity Christology. I have proposed this term to describe the way in which all the NT documents relate Jesus to God by including him in the unique identity of the one God, the God of Israel (see Bauckham). This God was unique because he was the only Creator of all things and the only sovereign Lord over all things. Everything else was created by him and is subject to his rule. Consequently, in the Jewish tradition, only this unique God was to be worshiped. Being the unique Creator and the only Sovereign are not roles that God could delegate to a created being, such as an angel. They are integral to who God is—his unique divine identity. What early Christians did was include Jesus in this unique divine identity by speaking of him sharing in the inalienable prerogatives of the one God. They believed that he had been exalted to sit at the right hand of God on the throne from which he governed the universe—the symbol of God’s unique lordship. They included the *worship of Jesus in their worship of the one God. They even claimed that Jesus, as the preexistent divine Son, participated with God the Father in creating all things. These facets of divine identity Christology will prove relevant to the Gospels, all of which maintain such a Christology, though in varying ways.

2. Gospel of Mark.

It makes sense to begin with Mark’s Gospel. Not only is it very probably the earliest of the Gospels, but also most of Mark’s material was taken over by Matthew and Luke into their own compositions. In doing so, they took over most of the major features of Mark’s Christology. John’s Gospel (whether or not John knew Mark’s Gospel itself) also takes up major features of Mark’s Christology and develops them further.

Mark’s Gospel is strongly focused on answering the question “Who is Jesus?” which is explicitly asked by characters in the Gospel (Mk 4:41), including Jesus himself (Mk 8:27, 29). Readers know from the outset that Jesus is the Messiah (Mk 1:1, where “Son of God” is probably not part of the original text), but the characters in the story have to discover this, while both readers and characters must learn in what way Jesus is the Messiah, what his messianic mission entails. In order to expound this, Mark constructs the narrative in a way that is as much pedagogic as it is chronological. Almost all of Jesus’ miracles occur in the first part of the book, the part that culminates in Peter’s confession, “You are the Messiah” (Mk 8:30). In this first half of the narrative Jesus proclaims the coming of God’s kingdom and, by his miracles, evidently claims an instrumental role in the coming of the kingdom, though he says nothing explicitly about who he is. In the *miracles—exorcisms, healings, nature miracles—Jesus acts with the power and authority of God. This is the evidence on the basis of which Peter is able to recognize him as the Messiah. But no sooner has Peter made this confession than Jesus begins to teach his disciples that he will be rejected, suffer, be put to death and rise again (Mk 8:31) (see Predictions of Jesus’ Passion and Resurrection). This becomes the theme of the second half of the narrative. As Jesus continues to teach his disciples this, it is clear that they cannot reconcile it with their own expectation of a Messiah who will take power and reign in *Jerusalem (cf. Mk 10:35-40).

As in all the Gospels, Jesus is reticent about revealing his own identity, indicating it in indirect ways (e.g., Mk 2:19-20; 3:27) and leaving people to draw their own conclusions from his miracles. Often he talks about his mission and destiny in sayings that refer to “the Son of Man” (Mk 2:10, 28; 8:31, 38; 9:9, 12, 31; 10:33, 45; 14:21, 41), a term that in Mark’s Gospel remains an enigmatic, indirect form of self-reference until it acquires the overtone of allusion to the “one like a human being [son of man]” in Daniel 7:13 (Mk 13:26; 14:62). As well as Jesus’ apparent reluctance to speak directly of his own identity, Mark emphasizes his commands to those who recognize something of this to keep quiet about it (demons [Mk 1:34; 3:12]; recipients of miracles [Mk 1:44; 5:43; 7:36; 8:26]; disciples [Mk 8:30; 9:9]). The motive for this so-called messianic secret is debated. The fact that Jesus’ command to the demoniac from the Decapolis, a Gentile, is quite the opposite—to spread the news of his deliverance—suggests that the secret relates to Jesus’ Jewish context. It may be due to his desire to define his role for himself rather than having some ready-made notion of the Messiah imposed on him. It may also be that Jesus knows his exercise of divine *authority is going to arouse opposition that will threaten his life (so already in Mk 3:8) and wishes to avoid this until the right moment comes.

In any case, the time to avoid publicity ends with Jesus' arrival in Jerusalem. His entry into Jerusalem on a donkey (Mk 11:1-10) is a claim to be the messianic king, though made not in words but rather in a symbolic enactment of messianic prophecy (see Zech 9:9-10) (see Triumphal Entry). The prophecy is a carefully selected reference to the king who comes in peace*, not on a horse for war. Messianic kingship is a major theme of this last section of Mark's Gospel, beginning with Bartimaeus's use of the royal title "Son of David" (Mk 10:47, the first occurrence in the narrative [cf. Mk 12:35-37]). The title "king of the Jews," a version of "messiah" that Gentiles could understand, dominates the Roman part of the passion narrative (Mk 15:2, 9, 12, 18, 26, 32). But at the same time as Mark highlights Jesus' identity as the Davidic Messiah, he also narrates the fulfillment of Jesus' predictions of his sufferings and death. This is a paradoxical kind of kingship in humiliation, the way of the king who "came not to be served but to serve, and to give his life a ransom for many" (Mk 10:45).

The royal Messiah of scriptural and Jewish expectation could be called "son of God" (2 Sam 7:14; Pss 2:7; 89:26; Mk 14:61), though this title was not used often. Mark, however, gives it special prominence by making it the content of two divine disclosures: one at the very beginning of Jesus' ministry (Mk 1:13), when the words are addressed to Jesus ("You are my Son"), and another at the central point in the whole story (Mk 9:7), when the words are addressed to the disciples ("This is my Son"). These two disclosures are complemented by a third, at the point of Jesus' death (Mk 15:39), when the words are those not of God but rather of the Roman centurion ("This man was the Son of God"). This time the disclosure is to the world. Thus, Jesus' sonship entails a mission grounded in God the Father's love for him (Mk 1:13; cf. Mk 12:6) and will be fulfilled in the glory* for which he is destined in the coming kingdom (Mk 9:2-3; cf. Mk 8:38; 13:26), but its true character is most adequately enacted in the obedient love that took him to his God-forsaken death (cf. Mk 14:35-41).

Much of Mark's Christology can thus be described in terms of messianic identity, defined by means of a narrative that leads to the cross and by appropriate scriptural allusions that were not part of the common Jewish repertoire of messianic prophecies (Pss 22:1-18; 118:22-23; Is 42:1; 52:13-53:12; Zech 9:9-10; 13:7). However, there is a further dimension of Mark's Christology, a secret deeper than the messianic secret. The latter is never a secret for readers of Mark's Gospel, though the narrative certainly serves to unfold it more fully for them, but the secret of Jesus' divine identity is kept from readers in the sense that Mark only points indirectly to it and raises questions that suggest an answer not given until Jesus finally makes his only explicit self-identification (Mk 14:62).

There are seven main passages in which Jesus exercises or claims uniquely divine authority (five contain unanswered questions about Jesus' identity; the last contains a question that Jesus answers). (1) In Mark 1:21-27 Jesus exorcises the demon not by special techniques or by praying to God or invoking God's name, as other exorcists did, but instead by exercising directly the authority of God to command the powers of evil. (2) In Mark 2:1-12 Jesus does what, as the scribes* correctly observe, only God can do (Mk 2:7): he forgives* sins (cf. Is 43:25; Mic 7:18-19). (3) In Mark 4:35-41 Jesus, just as he had rebuked and silenced the demon (Mk 1:25), rebukes and silences the sea (Mk 4:39; cf. Pss 74:13-14; 89:8-9; 107:25-30), leaving disciples and readers with the question "Who is this?" (Mk 4:41). (4) In Mark 6:47-52 Jesus tramples the waves like God (cf. Job 9:8-11; Is 43:16) and declares "I am he," which, in this epiphanic context, echoes the uniquely divine self-declaration found in Isaiah (e.g., Is 41:4). (5) When Jesus asks, "Why do you call me good? No one is good but God alone" (Mk 10:18), he does not, as many exegetes think, disclaim divinity, but rather suggests, cryptically, his participation in God's unique identity as the sole source of all good (cf. 2 Macc 1:24-25). (6) In Mark 12:35-37 it is Jesus himself who asks the unanswered question, implying that although the Messiah is, of course, David's son, he is also much more than David's son, since Psalm 110:1 indicates that he reigns not from David's throne, but rather from God's, and so David calls him his "Lord." This would be as explicit as Mark 14:64 about Jesus' divine identity (see below), were it not that Jesus, as usual, refrains from identifying himself as the Messiah.

Finally, (7) in answer to the high priest (Mk 14:61-64), Jesus for the first and only time in Mark's Gospel explicitly accepts the title "Messiah," but, much more than that, he goes on to declare his own identity in the terms that he chooses, which are considerably more exalted and provoke the verdict of blasphemy. He quotes Psalm 110:1 and Daniel 7:13, key texts for the divine identity Christology of the early Christians. He is to sit at God's right hand, sharing with God the throne of the cosmos, participating in the unique divine sovereignty over all things. Within the framework of early Jewish theology this was one of the clearest ways in which Jesus could be included in the identity of the one God. So at Mark 14:62 the secret of Jesus' divine identity is divulged.

Mark establishes Jesus' divine identity within a very clearly monotheistic context (cf. the Shema, quoted in Mk 12:29-30, with key allusions to it in Mk 2:27; 10:18). It is not enough to say, with some scholars, that Jesus exercises God's authority as his human agent, for as the passages in the OT cited above show, the prerogatives that Jesus claims are intrinsic to God's identity, inalienable aspects of what distinguishes God from all his creatures. In the light of Jesus' divine identity we can also revisit the topic of Jesus' sonship to God and see in it something more than a messianic status. Just as Jesus' messianic authority turns out to be more than that of the human messiah of Jewish expectation, so his sonship to God can be seen as the unique intimacy of relationship to his Father that Jesus enjoys within the divine identity.

Finally, we should notice that Mark, already in his prologue, where he roots the narrative in the Hebrew Scriptures by quoting Isaiah (Is 40:3, conflated with Mal 3:1), follows the widespread early Christian practice of applying to Jesus biblical texts in which "the Lord" (Gk. ho kyrios) refers to Yahweh (Is 40:3 = Mk 1:3). For scripturally alert readers, Jesus' divine identity can thus be discerned from the outset.

3. Gospel of Matthew.

Matthew takes over Mark's narrative even more comprehensively than Luke does. With it comes much of Mark's Christology, although Matthew fails to appreciate several of Mark's pointers to Jesus' unique divine identity (see Mt 8:27; 9:8; 19:17). On the other hand, as we will see, Matthew has a variety of ways of portraying and expounding Jesus' divine identity that were not to be found in Mark.

We should begin, however, with the care that Matthew takes to present his narrative as the climax of the biblical metanarrative, which the *genealogy (Mt 1:1-17) serves to resume. The story from *Abraham to the Messiah divides into three phases, after which the Messiah's role must clearly be to redeem his people from the condition into which they have fallen under David's successors. But the genealogy presents Jesus not only as the Son of David, but also as the Son of Abraham, recalling the promise that through Abraham's offspring all the nations would be blessed (Gen 12:3; 22:18). Jesus is thus heralded as the Jewish Messiah for Gentiles as well as for Jews, a theme continued in the infancy narrative, as representative Gentiles come to pay homage to the newly born king of the Jews (Mt 2:1-12). Matthew later follows Mark in highlighting Jesus' status as king of the Jews in the Roman section of the passion narrative (Mt 27:11, 29, 37, 42; cf. also Mt 21:3), but the title "Son of David" is much more prominent in Matthew than in Mark (see Mt 1:20; 9:27; 12:23; 15:22; 20:30-31; 21:9, 15; 22:41-45). Many of these references associate the title with Jesus' healings and exorcisms, and it has been suggested that here Jesus is modeled on King Solomon, the son of David, famous as an exorcist. It is more likely that for Matthew the title simply designates the royal Messiah of Israel, to whom he can attribute healings because he identifies him with the Servant of the Lord in Isaiah (Mt 8:17; 12:18-21). The fact that the Canaanite woman appeals to Jesus as "Son of David" (Mt 15:22) conforms to Matthew's portrayal of Jesus as the Jewish Messiah for Gentiles and recalls the Canaanite women in the Davidic genealogy (Mt 1:3, 5). She is one of the special exceptions to the rule that Jesus' mission is to "the lost sheep of the house of Israel" (Mt 15:24; cf. Mt 10:5-6), extended to the Gentiles only in the final commission to the disciples (Mt 28:19), which at the end of the Gospel forms an inclusio with "son of Abraham" at the beginning (Mt 1:1).

Matthew, with his special interest in the fulfillment of prophecy, draws on a much wider range of biblical sources than Mark, especially but not only in his fourteen formally quoted prophecies (Mt 1:22-23; 2:5-6, 15, 17-18, 23; 3:3; 4:14-16; 8:17; 12:17-21; 13:14-15, 35; 21:4-5; 26:56; 27:9-10). Moreover, Matthew's ways of relating Jesus to the biblical history of Israel are not confined to prophecies in the narrow sense. He also suggests a kind of identification of Jesus with God's people that involves a recapitulation of Israel's early history in the story of Jesus. Like Israel, Jesus in his infancy goes to Egypt and returns, which leads Matthew to cite the words of the prophet Hosea, "Out of Egypt I have called my son" (Mt 2:15 = Hos 11:1). In Hosea the reference is to the exodus. The forty days in which Jesus is tested in the wilderness echo Israel's forty years in the wilderness, and all of the scriptural texts that Jesus quotes against the devil in this context are from Deuteronomy (Mt 4:1-11).

In Matthew Jesus is, much more prominently than in Mark, a *teacher. Indeed, he is the one and only teacher of his disciples, who can never duplicate his unique role (Mt 23:8-11). The disciples' own mission is to "make disciples . . . teaching them to obey everything that [Jesus] has commanded" the original disciples (Mt 28:19-20). It has sometimes been argued that Matthew presents Jesus as a new *Moses, teaching the people and his disciples in five major discourses (Mt 5:1–7:27; 10:5–42; 13:1–52; 18:1–35; 24:3–25:46), echoing the five books of the law of Moses. The first of these discourses is given on a *mountain (Mt 5:1), recalling the giving of the law on Mount Sinai. However, while these resemblances may be intentional, especially in the case of the *Sermon on the Mount, where Jesus interprets the *law of Moses, there is probably too little to constitute a “new Moses” Christology. When Jesus interprets the law in Matthew 5:17–48 (see also Mt 19:3–9), he does so with a sovereign authority (“I say to you”) that puts him in a position more like that of God, who gave the law, than of Moses, who mediated it. This certainly would cohere with other indications of Jesus’ divine identity in Matthew. It is also notable that when Jesus commends his teaching, he does so in words based on those of God’s *Wisdom personified (Mt 11:28–30; cf. Sir 24:9; 51:23–26). This is the clearest indication of a Wisdom Christology in Matthew, which some scholars consider a broader characteristic of this Gospel.

Matthew’s distinctive take on the divine identity of Jesus is his interest in Jesus as the presence of God with his people. In his account of the birth of Jesus Matthew uniquely speaks of two names given to the child. For the first, “Jesus,” he gives the explanation “for he will save his people from their sins” (Mt 1:21). This depends on the meaning of the Hebrew name: “Yahweh saves.” It seems that Matthew takes the Yahweh to whom the name refers to be Jesus (“he [Jesus] will save his people”), in line with the early Christian practice of applying to Jesus biblical texts that speak of Yahweh. The second name, taken from Isaiah 7:14, is “Emmanuel,” which Matthew interprets correctly as meaning “God with us” (Mt 1:23 [this, rather than “God is with us,” is the literal translation]). Jesus is thus more than the Lord who saves his people; he saves them by being the divine presence with his people, as Yahweh is with his people in the biblical history of Israel. This name of Jesus given early in Matthew’s Gospel forms an inclusio with Jesus’ promise to the disciples in the closing words of the Gospel: “I am with you always, to the end of the age” (Mt 28:20). The formula “I am with you” occurs on the lips of Yahweh in the Hebrew Bible/LXX 114 times. Jesus thus speaks of his presence as God’s presence, and this verse makes clear that when Matthew refers to the name “Emmanuel,” he means to speak not merely of divine presence in Jesus, but of Jesus himself as the presence of God. The theme occurs also in Matthew 18:20.

With this theme of divine presence in view, it makes sense that Matthew portrays worship of Jesus. The gesture of bowing down or prostration (proskyneō, often translated as “to worship”) need not indicate divine worship; it could be given to a human superior, even in a Jewish context, though in strongly monotheistic contexts (such as Jewish objection to treating a king as divine) it might be confined to the worship of God (cf. Mt 4:10). Matthew uses the verb proskyneō with Jesus as the object on ten occasions, whereas Mark uses it in this way only twice. On five of these ten occasions there is no parallel in Mark (Mt 2:2, 8, 11; 28:9, 17). On three of them Matthew supplies the word proskyneō where Mark has the gesture but not this word (Mt 8:2; 9:18; 15:25). On the remaining two occasions Matthew supplies the word where Mark does not even have the gesture (Mt 14:33; 20:20). There are also two occasions where Mark has the word proskyneō but Matthew omits even the gesture, and one where Mark has the gesture but Matthew omits it (Mk 5:6 // Mt 8:29; Mk 15:19 // Mt 27:30; Mk 10:17 // Mt 19:16). But in these three cases the worship (by demons, the mocking soldiers, the rich young man) Matthew doubtless considered inadequate. It seems therefore that Matthew used the word proskyneō in a technical way for the obeisance that is due to Jesus alone among humans and emphasizes that it expresses the proper response to Jesus. According to Matthew 4:10, it is what is due only to God.

Matthew develops, more than does Mark, the theme, crucial to the divine identity Christology of the early church, of Jesus’ exaltation to the throne of God. The phrase “all things” was often used to define the total sovereignty over the cosmos that only God has. As well as using this phrase in Matthew 11:27, Jesus begins his final speech in Matthew’s Gospel thus: “All authority in heaven and on earth has been given to me” (Mt 28:18 [cf. Mt 11:25]), and he makes this basis for sending the disciples to “all nations” (Mt 28:19). Jesus is no mere servant of God implementing God’s commands (as were, for instance, the most exalted angels) or even a Messiah who deputizes for God on earth; rather, he has “all authority in heaven and earth.”

Finally, Jesus’ sonship to God, while it is not, as has been claimed, the single central focus of Matthew’s Christology, is undoubtedly important to Matthew (cf. Mt 3:17; 4:3, 6; 8:29; 11:27; 16:16; 17:5; 26:63; 27:40), introduced in the infancy narrative with a quotation from Scripture (Mt 2:15) and appearing in Jesus’ closing words in the form of the trinitarian baptismal formula: “in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit” (Mt 28:19). Since this almost certainly refers to a single name (“YHWH”) shared by Father, Son and Holy Spirit, we have here both a notable instance of the inclusion of Jesus in the unique divine identity and a recognition that the relationship of Jesus as Son to God as Father is a relationship within their common identity as God.

4. Gospel of Luke.

Most discussions of Luke's Christology discuss his two-volume work, Luke-Acts, as a whole, but the present context requires confining the discussion to Luke's Gospel. Like Matthew, Luke takes over most of Mark's narrative and with it Mark's Christology. But whereas Matthew weakens Mark's indications of Jesus' divine identity (while developing his own, different ways of presenting this), Luke is very faithful to Mark in this respect. Of the seven key passages listed in the discussion of Mark (see 2 above), Luke retains six (omitting only Mk 6:47-52). Moreover, Luke adds the story of the sinful woman (Lk 7:36-50), highlighting Jesus' evident authority to forgive sins, as in the story of the paralytic (Lk 5:17-26; cf. Mk 2:1-12), and provides another unanswered question about Jesus' identity, additional to Mark's: "Who is this who even forgives sins?" (Lk 7:49).

In this light, a common scholarly view of Luke's Christology, that it is a "low" Christology, emphasizing Jesus' subordination to God as God's human agent, already seems unconvincing. But we must take seriously the alleged indications of a "low" Christology. In the first place, alone among the evangelists, Luke has a sustained presentation of Jesus as a *prophet. The other Synoptic Gospels do report that people identified Jesus as one of the prophets (Mt 16:14; Mk 6:14-16; 8:28; cf. Lk 9:7-8, 18-19), while in John people think that he must be the prophet, the expected prophet like Moses (Jn 6:14; 7:40). Luke makes rather more of this popular view of Jesus (Lk 7:16, cf. Lk 7:39). He also ascribes it to the two disciples on the road to Emmaus, who considered Jesus to be "a prophet mighty in deed and word" (Lk 24:19), though they had also "hoped he was the one to redeem Israel" (Lk 24:21). Jesus appeared to them to be a prophet but had not yet actually proved to be the sort of Messiah they were expecting, though they hoped he would.

The voice at the *transfiguration probably alludes to the prophet like Moses in all three Synoptics (Mt 17:5; Mk 9:7; Lk 9:35), and all four Gospels have minor indications that Jesus saw himself in the role of a prophet (Mt 13:57; 23:37-39; Mk 6:4; Lk 4:24; Jn 4:44), but in Luke this is more significant (Lk 13:31-35). But most important in Luke's presentation of Jesus as a prophet is Luke 4:16-30, which is clearly placed as programmatic for Jesus' mission. Jesus here evidently understands the role of the figure in Isaiah 61:1-2 as that of a prophet, especially a prophet like *Elijah and Elisha, who performed miracles to aid people in need (cf. Lk 4:23-27). However, we need not suppose that Jesus is here presented as prophet rather than Davidic Messiah. Jewish readers could easily identify the anointing with the Spirit in Isaiah 61:1 with the similar anointing of the Davidic Messiah in Isaiah 11:2. The prophetic mission is thus an aspect of the messianic mission of the Son of David, and so the fulfillment of this mission to which Jesus directs John the Baptist in Luke 7:18-23 is meant to reassure John that Jesus is indeed, as he thought, "the one who is to come" (Lk 7:19)—that is, the Messiah. Thus, in the end, Luke's portrayal of Jesus as a prophet is part of his portrayal of Jesus as the Messiah Son of David. This latter category, which dominates Luke's infancy narrative (Lk 1:27, 32; 2:4, 11, 26), is as important to Luke as to any of the evangelists, but by means of Isaiah 61:1-2 he is able to integrate the well-known features of Jesus' ministry of preaching and miracles into a messianic profile that could be found in Scripture.

Also a dimension of the Davidic Messiah, for early Christian interpreters who read Isaiah holistically, was the figure of the Servant of the Lord, especially the Suffering Servant of Isaiah 52:13—53:12 (see Servant of Yahweh). Luke weaves a number of allusions to this passage into his *passion narrative (Lk 22:37; 23:4, 9, 14-15, 22, 32-33, 34; also cf. Lk 23:35 with Is 42:1; and Lk 18:32-33 with Is 50:6). This explains why he changes the centurion's statement in Mark, "Truly this man was the Son of God" (Mk 15:39), to "Truly this was a righteous man" (Lk 23:47), echoing Isaiah 53:11. While some of these features have been understood to show that Luke portrays Jesus' death as that of a righteous person who dies a martyr, in reality Luke is portraying Jesus as this particular righteous man of whom Isaiah prophesied, the Servant of the Lord, the Messiah. The redemptive meaning of his death, so often thought to be absent from Luke, is therefore implicit (Is 53:10-11), though it may be that Luke does not make it explicit because he does want to present Jesus' death as an example to his followers (cf. Acts 7:54-60).

Luke's treatment of Jesus' sonship to God his Father has much in common with Matthew and Mark (see Lk 2:49; 3:22; 4:3, 9, 41; 8:28; 9:35; 10:22; 22:42, 70; 23:34, 46; 24:49), suggesting a unique intimacy of relationship. But, distinctively, he links it with the virginal conception of Jesus (Lk 1:32, 35). Also distinctive is the title "Savior" (Lk 2:11), a title that, among the evangelists, only Luke and John (Jn

4:42) give to Jesus (for Luke's use of this title, see also Acts 5:31; 13:23).

While Jesus in Luke is the Servant, he is no less the *Lord. This is one of the three christological titles in the angel's announcement of his birth: "a Savior, who is the Messiah, the Lord" (Lk 2:11), but even when still in the womb Elizabeth had called him "my Lord" (Lk 1:43). In addition to frequent occasions on which characters in the story call Jesus "Lord" (in the vocative 27x), Luke differs from the other evangelists in that he frequently, as narrator, refers to Jesus as "the Lord" (15x). While, addressed to Jesus, the vocative "Lord" can mean no more than "sir," it clearly means more in some cases, such as Luke 5:8 (the first instance). The cumulative effect of the vocatives and their combination with the narrator's "the Lord" need to be taken into account. Taken as a whole, the usage anticipates the exaltation of Jesus to the divine throne (Lk 20:41-44; cf. Acts 2:34-36), while claiming that Jesus is already the Lord even in his life of service and humiliation. Once again it would seem to be especially important to Luke that Jesus, unique though he undoubtedly is, sets an example for his followers (Lk 22:24-27).

5. Gospel of John.

Like Mark's Gospel, John's is a Gospel that is overwhelmingly focused on the identity and mission of Jesus. In many respects, its Christology is a fuller development of Mark's Christology. Almost all of the main themes and terminology of John's Christology can be found, at least embryonically, in Mark. John draws out their meaning at greater length, incorporating, no doubt, the results of his own extensive reflection on them. In consequence, Jesus' divine identity emerges in more explicit terms, including the applying the word "God"* (theos) to Jesus, something that only this Gospel does explicitly (Jn 1:1, 18; 20:28), although Mark certainly implies it (Mk 10:18). Some scholars have thought that John's is the only Gospel that ascribes true divinity to Jesus, but, as we have seen, a Christology of divine identity is to be found in all three Synoptic Gospels, expressed in a variety of different motifs. John has his own ways of expressing such a Christology (of which the use of the term theos is not the most important). Some scholars have also maintained that in this Gospel Jesus' divine identity is stressed at the expense of his real humanity (an issue to be discussed below).

A key feature of this Gospel's presentation of Jesus' divine identity is a concern to present it as compatible with Jewish monotheism, not a departure from monotheism. We find this already in the opening verse of the Gospel, which echoes the first verse of Genesis. Whereas the Synoptic Gospels in their various ways relate the story of Jesus to the biblical story of God and his people, John goes back, with Genesis, to the eternity before creation and finds the preexistent Christ, whom he here calls "the Word," already "with God" (see Logos). According to the Jewish Scriptures, it was God's Word that created the world. This Word was not someone or something other than God, but intrinsic to the one God's unique identity. By recalling the divine Word and, later in the prologue, declaring Jesus Christ actually to be this Word, incarnate in human form, the evangelist is including Jesus in the unique divine identity in a way that, for readers familiar with Jewish monotheistic thinking, need not be seen as transgressing monotheism. The Word both "was God" and "was with God" (Jn 1:1), included in the divine identity as a distinguishable entity. The peculiarly emphatic statement that nothing at all was created other than through the Word (Jn 1:2) uses well-known monotheistic rhetoric to make crystal clear that the Word belongs with God on the divine side of the ontological division between God the Creator and everything else, which is his creation. At this stage, of course, it is not clear that the Word is a personal entity. This emerges as the prologue continues, especially in John 1:14-18, where it is explained that God's Word is related to God as a unique Son to his Father. From this point on the Gospel no longer calls Jesus "the Word." The incarnation* has revealed that "Son" is the more adequate term, pointing to an interpersonal relationship within the divine identity, which John's Gospel often makes clear existed in God even before the incarnation (e.g., Jn 17:5, 24).

The inclusion of Jesus in a monotheistic definition of God is also to be found in John 10:30-31, where Jesus claims, "I and the Father are one," and the Jewish leaders attempt to stone him for blasphemy. This is an allusion to the Shema ("The LORD our God, the LORD is one"), comparable with Paul's christological reformulation of the Shema (1 Cor 8:6). The subsequent statement that "the Father is in me and I am in the Father" (Jn 10:38) expounds the "oneness" of Jesus and the Father as a relationship of special intimacy, such that both together constitute the one God.

The most remarkable expression of divine identity Christology in John is the series of absolute "I am"* (egō eimi) sayings. There are two series of seven "I am" sayings in the Gospel. The "I am" sayings with predicates (Jn 6:35 [repeated Jn 6:41, 48]; 8:12; 10:7 [repeated Jn 10:9]; 11 [repeated Jn 10:14]; 11:25; 14:6; 15:1) characterize Jesus in terms of the salvation that he gives (e.g., “I am the bread of life”). The absolute “I am” sayings (Jn 4:26; 6:20; 8:24, 28, 58; 13:19; 18:5 [repeated Jn 18:6, 8]) express who Jesus is in himself, in his divine identity, as the basis for his salvific role. The first two of the series and the last could be understood as having implied predicates (Jn 4:20: “I am [the Messiah you speak of]”; Jn 6:20: “It is I”; Jn 18:5: “I am [Jesus of Nazareth]”), but they acquire a deeper meaning in the light of their place in the series. The Greek egō eimi is the LXX rendering of the Hebrew ʾānī hūʾ (“I am he”), which functions as a kind of self-declaration of God’s uniqueness by God himself in Deuteronomy 32:39 and in the strongly monotheistic prophecies of Deutero-Isaiah (Is 41:4; 43:10, 13, 25; 46:4; 48:12; 51:12; 52:6). It is not, as such, a form of the divine name (YHWH), as has sometimes been supposed, but it is an unmistakable indication of the unique identity of the one God. There is also much in the contexts of these sayings of Jesus that recalls God’s unique claims in Deutero-Isaiah.

As the one who has come from heaven to earth (Jn 1:14), Jesus is the connection between heaven and earth (see the allusion to Jacob’s ladder in Jn 1:51) and between Spirit (the divine life) and flesh (mortal life). This idea is expressed in the distinctively Johannine sayings that speak of the Son of Man ascending and descending (Jn 3:13; 6:62; cf. Jn 1:51) or refer otherwise to Jesus coming down from heaven (Jn 6:38, 42, 51, 58) and returning to the Father (Jn 13:1; 16:10; 17:13). As the unique Son of the Father, Jesus can reveal the Father as no one else can (Jn 1:18; 6:46), such that “whoever has seen me has seen the Father” (Jn 14:9; cf. Jn 12:45). Key christological themes such as these require that Jesus be both truly human and truly God. He “portrays” God in visible “flesh” (Jn 1:14–18), and he mediates eternal life from God to mortal flesh.

Accordingly, Jesus’ humanity in John is not just affirmed but stressed: it includes not only real flesh and blood (Jn 1:14; 19:34), but also genuine human emotions (Jn 11:3, 33, 35, 38; 12:27). Moreover, John does not just leave divinity and humanity in tension. There are two christological themes that show how Jesus expressed what it is to be God in appropriately human ways. One is Jesus’ sonship in subordination and obedience to the Father. The theme of Jesus as Son of God the Father is much more fully expounded in John than in the other Gospels. The theme, common to all the Gospels, that Jesus exercises uniquely divine prerogatives appears in John as an aspect of his sonship. He claims the prerogative of working on the *Sabbath, as his Father does (Jn 5:17), and in the ensuing debate with the Jewish leaders this claim is subsumed into the *authority to give life and the authority to judge the whole world. These forms of uniquely divine sovereignty are both given him by the Father (Jn 5:22, 27) and fully his own (Jn 5:21, 22, 26). But in response to the accusation that Jesus called “God his own Father, thereby making himself equal with God” (Jn 5:18), Jesus is at pains to make clear that he is not, as it were, setting himself up in competition with God: he “can do nothing on his own, but only what he sees the Father doing” (Jn 5:19 [cf. Jn 5:30]). If for Jesus to be the Son is to be sent by the Father to do the Father’s will in dependence on the Father, as the Father’s plenipotentiary agent, then it is a way of being God that can be appropriately expressed in a human life.

The second theme is the glory of God in Jesus’ humiliation. The glory of God is the radiance of the divine character that Jesus reflects in his life in the flesh (Jn 1:14–18). Paradoxically, it comes to the point of fullest revelation in Jesus’ degradation and death on the cross on the way to resurrection and exaltation (Jn 12:23; 13:31–32). Living a human life to this abject end is the form that God’s love for the world takes in Jesus.

John’s Gospel includes a long series of confessions of Jesus’ identity by characters in the story (Jn 1:29, 34, 41, 45, 49; 4:42; 6:14, 69; 11:27; 12:13; 20:28). These deploy common christological titles and designations such as “Messiah” and “Son of God” as well as more unusual ones such as “Savior of the world” and “the Holy One of God.” In this way, John’s Gospel affirms all the ways in which Jesus was known to early Christians while reserving the most adequate confession to the one that Thomas makes only after the resurrection: “My Lord and my God” (Jn 20:28). John’s Gospel does not replace but rather brings to fullest development the christological insights of all the other Gospels.

See also ASCENSION OF JESUS; BIRTH OF JESUS; CHRIST; DEATH OF JESUS; GOD; HOLY SPIRIT; “I AM” SAYINGS; INCARNATION; LAMB OF GOD; LOGOS; LORD; RESURRECTION; SERVANT OF YAHWEH; SON OF DAVID; SON OF GOD; SON OF MAN; TEACHER; TRANSFIGURATION; WISDOM.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. P. N. Anderson, The Christology of the Fourth Gospel: Its Unity and Disunity in Light of John 6 (Valley Forge, PA: Trinity Press International, 1997); D. M. Ball, “I Am” in John’s Gospel: Literary Function, Background and Theological Implications (JSNTSup 124; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1996); R. Bauckham, Jesus and the God of Israel: God Crucified and Other Studies on the New

Testament's Christology of Divine Identity (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2008); M. F. Bird, Are You the One Who Is to Come? The Historical Jesus and the Messianic Question (Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2009); M. E. Boring, "Markan Christology: God-Language for Jesus," NTS 45 (1999) 451-71; H. D. Buckwalter, The Character and Purpose of Luke's Christology (SNTSMS 89; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1996); R. A. Burridge, Four Gospels, One Jesus? A Symbolic Reading (London: SPCK, 1994); M. L. Coloe, God Dwells with Us: Temple Symbolism in the Fourth Gospel (Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 2001); S. J. Gathercole, The Preexistent Son: Recovering the Christologies of Matthew, Mark, and Luke (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2006); B. R. Gaventa and R. B. Hays, eds., Seeking the Identity of Jesus: A Pilgrimage (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2008); L. E. Keck, Who Is Jesus? History in Perfect Tense (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2001); J. Kennedy, The Recapitulation of Israel: Use of Israel's History in Matthew 1:1-4:11 (WUNT 2/257; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2008); D. A. Lee, Flesh and Glory: Symbol, Gender, and Theology in the Gospel of John (New York: Crossroad, 2002); R. N. Longenecker, ed., Contours of Christology in the New Testament (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2005); D. D. Kupp, Matthew's Emmanuel: Divine Presence and God's People in the First Gospel (SNTSMS 90; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1996); R. F. O'Toole, Luke's Presentation of Jesus: A Christology (SubBi 25; Rome: Pontifical Biblical Institute, 2004); C. K. Rowe, Early Narrative Christology: The Lord in the Gospel of Luke (Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2009); M. L. Strauss, The Davidic Messiah in Luke-Acts: The Promise and Its Fulfillment in Lukan Christology (JSNTSup 110; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1995); C. H. Williams, I Am He: The Interpretation of 'ani hū' in Jewish and Early Christian Literature (WUNT 2/113; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2000); B. Witherington III, The Christology of Jesus (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1990); idem, The Many Faces of the Christ: The Christologies of the New Testament and Beyond (New York: Crossroad, 1998).

R. J. Bauckham

CHRONOLOGY

Attempts to determine any precise chronology of Jesus' life and death must grapple with issues of the ability of the NT sources to provide definitive chronological data and of the reliability of various external sources for dating events mentioned in the NT (e.g., Josephus, Roman political records). Since chronological precision is a modern rather than an ancient value in biography and historiography, any proposed chronology for the life of Jesus will deal in probabilities or possibilities rather than certainty. With this proviso in mind, the dating of Jesus' birth, ministry and death is discussed here.

1. Birth of Jesus
2. Commencement and Duration of Jesus' Ministry
3. Death of Jesus
4. Summary of the Dates

1. Birth of Jesus.

The early Christians were not as concerned with the date as they were with the fact of Jesus' birth (see Birth of Jesus). Both the year and the time of year can only be approximately determined.

1.1. Year of Jesus' Birth. In attempting to pinpoint the year of Jesus' birth, one must look at it in relationship to Herod's death and the census of Quirinius.

1.1.1. Herod the Great's Death as the Terminus ad Quem. According to Matthew 2:1 and Luke 1:5, Jesus' birth came before Herod's death (see Herodian Dynasty). According to *Josephus, an eclipse of the moon occurred shortly before Herod's death (Ant. 17.167). This is the only eclipse mentioned by Josephus, and this eclipse occurred on March 12/13, 4 B.C. After Herod's death Josephus mentions that the Passover (see Feasts) was celebrated, the first day of which would have occurred on April 11, 4 B.C. Hence, Herod's death would have occurred between March 12 and April 11, and thus Jesus' birth would have been no later than March/April 4 B.C.

1.1.2. Census of Quirinius as the Terminus a Quo. According to Luke 2:1-5, the census of Quirinius was taken just before Jesus' birth, and thus Jesus could not have been born before the census. The date of this census is difficult to pinpoint. Although no Roman historian specifically mentions this census, there were periodic censuses. Furthermore, Luke was not likely to have confused this census with the one held in A.D. 6 because the latter was just after the deposition of Herod's son Archelaus, whereas the context of the birth narrative of Jesus was in the days of Herod the Great (for an extended discussion of this Lukan reference, see Bock). Trying to synchronize Quirinius's governorship of Syria with the time just before Herod's death proves difficult. Some suggest that he was governor not only in A.D. 6, but also from 11/10 to 8/7 B.C. Others suggest that this census took place before Quirinius was governor in A.D. 6/7, and some think that Quirinius had been proconsul of Syria and Cilicia during the last years of Herod the Great under the legates Saturninus and Varus. Regardless of what construct one might propose, it is not improbable that Quirinius was involved with a census during the last years of Herod, although there is no historical evidence of such a census. Toward the end of his reign Herod fell out of favor with *Rome (ca. 8/7 B.C.). This was followed by his sons engaging in an intense struggle for the throne at a time when Herod was extremely ill. All of these factors would allow for the Roman government to take a census in his land in order to assess the situation before his death, possibly sometime between 6 and 4 B.C.

1.2. Date of Jesus' Birth. The traditional date of Jesus' birth for the Western Church has been December 25, while the Eastern Church has observed a January 6 date. The account of shepherds attending their flock during the night (Lk 2:8) makes a mid-winter date possible.

1.3. Conclusion. Assuming the census of Quirinius occurred sometime during the period 6-4 B.C., Herod's death having occurred in the spring of 4 B.C., Jesus would have been born sometime between 6 B.C. and the spring of 4 B.C.

2. Commencement and Duration of Jesus' Ministry.

Except the account of Jesus' visit to the *temple when he was twelve years old (Lk 2:41-51), the Gospels provide no record of Jesus' life after infancy until the beginning of his public ministry.

2.1. Commencement of John the Baptist's Ministry. Luke 3:1-3 specifically states that *John the Baptist's ministry began in the fifteenth year of Tiberius. Although there has been debate on how this is to be reckoned, the most natural way to calculate it is on the basis of either the Julian calendar used by Rome, making it the fifteenth year from January 1 to December 31, A.D. 29, or to reckon it from the beginning of Tiberius's reign (the normal Roman method), which would place it during the period August 19, A.D. 28, to August 18, A.D. 29. Using either one of these calendars, the fifteenth year of Tiberius would have occurred sometime between August 19, A.D. 28, and December 31, A.D. 29. Hence, John the Baptist's ministry seems to have begun sometime during this period.

2.2. Commencement of Jesus' Ministry. The Gospels give the impression that not long after the beginning of John the Baptist's ministry Jesus was baptized and began his ministry. If Jesus was born in 6-4 B.C. and baptized in A.D. 29, he would have been in his early thirties at the time of the commencement of his public ministry. This fits Luke's statement that Jesus was about thirty years of age (hōsei etōn triakonta) when he began his ministry (Lk 3:23).

2.3. First Passover of Jesus' Ministry. The first recorded visit of Jesus to Jerusalem after his *baptism is found in John 2:13-3:21. John records that on that occasion the Jews spoke of the Herodian temple having been constructed forty-six years ago (Jn 2:20). Josephus states that temple construction began in Herod's eighteenth year (Ant. 15.380), which coincides with the arrival of Augustus in Syria (Ant. 15.354); and according to Cassius Dio, this occurred in the spring or summer of 20 B.C. (Hist. 54.7.4-6). Herod's eighteenth year would have been from Nisan 1, 20 B.C., to Nisan 1, 19 B.C. There were two stages in building the temple. The first was the inner sanctuary, called the naos, located within the priests' court. This sanctuary was completed by the *priests in one year and six months (Josephus, Ant. 15.421). The second stage was the whole temple area, including the three courts, and was called the hieron. This was not completed until A.D. 63. This distinction is maintained by Josephus and the NT writers. In discussing the temple with Jesus, the Jews refer to the naos as having stood for forty-six years (Jn 2:20). If the construction of the naos began in 20/19 B.C. and was completed in one-and-a-half years (i.e., in 18/17 B.C.), forty-six years would bring the date to the year A.D. 29/30. Consequently, Jesus' first Passover during his public ministry might best be placed in the spring of A.D. 30.

2.4. Duration of Jesus' Ministry. Evidence relating to the length of Jesus' ministry has historically been gathered primarily from John's Gospel. John mentions three Passovers (Jn 2:13; 6:4; 11:55). However, John's chronology may be read to include an additional year of Jesus' ministry between the Passovers of John 2:13 and John 6:4. First, after the Passover of John 2:13 Jesus ministers in Judea and then goes to Samaria. There Jesus mentions that there are four months until harvest (Jn 4:35), which would refer to the following January or February. While some would read this as a proverbial statement, it might be a literal chronological reference. A second time note occurs in John 5:1, where another feast is mentioned. Although not specified, some interpreters understand it to be another Passover, although it could also refer to the Feast of Tabernacles. These two time notes would suggest that John portrays another Passover between the Passovers of John 2:13 and John 6:4. This would make a total of four Passovers during Jesus' public ministry in John. If this is historically rooted, then Jesus' ministry would have been over three years in length.

3. Death of Jesus.

Discussion of the timing of Jesus' death has focused on the day of the week and month as well as the year of his death.

3.1. Day of the Week. Traditionally, Jesus is thought to have died on the Friday of passion week (see Passion Narrative). In Matthew 12:40 Jesus says, "For as Jonah was three days and three nights in the belly of the whale, so shall the Son of Man be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth." Furthermore, the NT repeatedly refers to Jesus' resurrection as having occurred on the third day (not the fourth day) (e.g., Mt 16:21; 17:23; Lk 9:22; 18:33; Acts 10:40; 1 Cor 15:4). Moreover, the Gospels specifically mention the day before the *Sabbath (Friday) as the day of his death (Mt 27:62; Mk 15:42; Lk 23:54; Jn 19:14, 31, 42). Given that Jewish reckoning of days included a part of a day as counting for the whole, this NT evidence points to Friday as the day of Jesus' death.

Although the Gospels' passion narratives do not recount strict chronology, the passion week might be charted as in table 1, with variations allowed for any particular evangelist's telling of the passion story.

3.2. Day of the Month. All the Gospels state that Jesus ate the *Last Supper the day before his crucifixion (Mt 26:20; Mk 14:17; Lk 22:14; Jn 13:2; see also 1 Cor 11:23). The Synoptic Gospels (Mt 26:17; Mk 14:12; Lk 22:7-8) portray the Last Supper as a Passover meal, while John omits any reference to the meal being a Passover celebration (Jn 13:2). Additionally, the Synoptics seem to indicate that Jesus was crucified on Friday, Nisan 15, after eating the Passover meal with his disciples on Thursday evening. On the other hand, John states that the Jews who took Jesus to the praetorium did not enter it "in order that they might not be defiled but might eat the Passover" (Jn 18:28), and that Jesus' trial was on the "day of preparation for the Passover" and not after eating the Passover (Jn 19:14). On the face of it, John narrates Jesus being tried and crucified on Friday, Nisan 14, just before the Jews ate their Passover.

Several theories have been proposed in the attempt to reconcile the Synoptics and John. Some think that the Last Supper was not a Passover meal but rather a meal the night before the Passover (Jn 13:1, 29). However, the Synoptics explicitly state that the Last Supper was a Passover (Mt 26:2, 17-19; Mk 14:1, 12, 14, 16; Lk 22:1, 7-8, 13, 15). In trying to harmonize the accounts, some have proposed that Jesus and his *disciples had a private Passover, arguing from clandestine features of the Passover preparations and the omission of any mention of a lamb in the Passover meal in the Synoptics (France; Wright, 555-56). In this reading, Jesus would have celebrated Passover a day early with his disciples (evening of Nisan 14, just as the new day began at sundown) and was crucified sometime midday on

Table 1. Chronology of Passion Week

Day	Event	Scripture
Saturday	Arrival at Bethany	Jn 12:1
Sunday	Crowd came to see Jesus	Jn 12:9-11
Monday	Triumphal entry	Mt 21:1-9; Mk 11:1-10; Lk 19:28-44
Tuesday	Fig tree cursed	Mt 21:18-19; Mk 11:12-14
	Cleansing of temple	Mt 21:12-13; Mk 11:15-17; Lk 19:45-46
Wednesday	Fig tree withered	Mt 21:20-22; Mk 11:20-26
	Temple controversy	Mt 21:23-23:30; Mk 11:27-12:44; Lk 20:1-21:4
	Olivet discourse	Mt 24:1-25:46; Mk 13:1-37; Lk 21:5-36
Thursday	Last Supper	Mt 26:20-30; Mk 14:17-26; Lk 22:14-30
	Betrayal and arrest	Mt 26:47-56; Mk 14:43-52; Lk 22:47-53; Jn 18:2-12
	Trial by Annas and Caiaphas	Mt 26:57-75; Mk 14:53-72; Lk 22:54-65; Jn 18:13-27
Friday	Trial by Sanhedrin	Mt 27:1; Mk 15:1; Lk 22:66
	Trial by Pilate, Herod	Mt 27:2-30; Mk 15:2-19; Lk 23:1-25; Jn 18:28-19:16
	Crucifixion and burial	Mt 27:31-60; Mk 15:20-46; Lk 23:26-54; Jn 19:16-42
Saturday	Dead in tomb
Sunday	Resurrection	Mt 28:1-15; Mk 16:1-8; Lk 24:1-35; Jn 20:1-21:23

Nisan 14, as John seems to more clearly indicate. Alternately, C. Blomberg reads the Johannine evidence as confirming, along with the Synoptics, that Jesus celebrated the Passover on Nisan 15 (Thursday evening) and was killed that same day (Friday day of Nisan 15) (Blomberg, 246-47).

Another means of harmonizing the Synoptics and John involves the suggestion that Jesus and the disciples celebrated Passover with a different calendar. Some have suggested that Jesus celebrated it according to the Qumran calendar, although there is no evidence that Jesus and his disciples followed the Qumran calendar. Others think that it was celebrated on two consecutive days because it would have been impossible to slay all the Passover lambs on one day. Finally, it may be that different calendars were in use during the period. On the one hand, the Synoptic Gospels followed the method of the Galileans and the *Pharisees. By this reckoning, the day was measured from sunrise to sunrise, with Jesus and his disciples having their Paschal lamb slaughtered in the late afternoon of Thursday, Nisan 14, and eating the Passover with unleavened bread later that evening. On the other hand, John's Gospel followed the method of the Judeans in reckoning the day from sunset to sunset. Thus, the Judean Jews had the Paschal lamb slaughtered in the late afternoon of Friday, Nisan 14, and ate the Passover with the unleavened bread that night, which by then had become Nisan 15. In this scenario, Jesus had already eaten the Passover meal when his enemies, who had not yet celebrated the Passover, arrested him.

Those who feel no need to harmonize the Synoptics with John regarding which day of the month of Nisan Jesus was crucified often suggest that John has interpreted the Passover chronology symbolically. "Both traditions—a paschal Last Supper and a paschal crucifixion—are theologically pregnant" (Keener, 372).

3.3. Year of Jesus' Death. The year of Jesus' death can be narrowed by several considerations.

3.3.1. Officials of the Trial. According to the Gospels, the three officials involved in Jesus' trial were Caiaphas the high priest (Mt 26:3, 57; Jn 11:49-53; 18:13-14), who began his office in A.D. 18 and was deposed at the Passover of A.D. 37 (Josephus, Ant. 18.35; 4.90-95); Pilate (see Pontius Pilate), prefect of Judea (Mt 27:2-26; Mk 15:1-15; Lk 23:1-25; Jn 18:28-19:16; Acts 3:13; 4:27; 13:28; 1 Tim 6:13) from A.D. 26 to 36 (Josephus, Ant. 18.89); and Herod Antipas, tetrarch of Galilee and Perea (Lk 23:6-12) from 4 B.C. until A.D. 39 (Josephus, Ant. 18.240-256; 19.351). Thus, Jesus' trial occurred between A.D. 26 and 36.

3.3.2. Contributions of Astronomy. If we conclude that Jesus' death occurred on Friday, Nisan 14, and sometime between A.D. 26 and 36 (see 3.2), the evidence from astronomy (which determined the setting of Jewish months) narrows the possibilities to A.D. 27, 30, 33, 36.

3.3.3. Ministry of Jesus. In the light of the foregoing discussion of the ministry of Jesus, it is safe to eliminate A.D. 27 and A.D. 36 because neither fits within the framework of his ministry. The year A.D. 30 is accepted by many as most likely. But this date presents difficulty if one accepts the commencement of John the Baptist's ministry occurring in the fifteenth year of Tiberius, A.D. 29 (Lk 3:1-3) and the three- to four-year Johannine chronology for Jesus' ministry (2.4). If the latter are accepted, then A.D. 33 seems to fit the evidence best.

3.3.4. Confirmation of History. Pilate is portrayed by his contemporary Philo (Legat. 301-2) and later by Josephus (Ant. 18.55-59; J.W. 2.167-77) as one who is greedy, inflexible and cruel, and who resorted to robbery and oppression, a portrait not out of keeping with Luke 13:1. However, during his trial of Jesus, Pilate is seen as one who was readily submissive to the pressures of the religious leaders who were demanding that Jesus be handed over to them.

How can such a change be explained? It must be understood that Pilate probably was appointed by Sejanus, a trusted friend of Tiberius as well as the prefect of the Praetorian Guard. A dedicated anti-Semite, Sejanus wanted to exterminate the Jewish race (Philo, Flacc. 1; Legat. 159-61). When Pilate made trouble for the Jews in Palestine, Sejanus accepted his actions and did not report it to Tiberius. However, when Sejanus was deposed and executed by Tiberius on October 18, A.D. 31, Pilate no longer had protection in Rome. In fact, it is most likely that Herod Antipas reported his causing a riot, probably at the Feast of Tabernacles in A.D. 32 (Philo, Legat. 299-305). In light of this precedent, we can understand why, when in the midst of a trial it was witnessed that Jesus stirred up trouble in Judea and Galilee (Lk 23:5), Pilate was eager to allow Herod Antipas to try Jesus (Lk 23:6-12).

In this context a trial date of A.D. 33 makes good sense for three reasons: (1) Pilate, on hearing that Jesus caused trouble in Galilee, handed Jesus over to Herod Antipas. Although this was not required by Roman law, it would have been calculated to avoid a further report from Herod to the emperor; (2) The lack of progression in the trial account of Luke 23:6-12 makes sense if Herod Antipas did not want to make a judgment that Pilate might use against him; and (3) Luke 23:12 states that Pilate and Herod Antipas were friends from that day onward, which fits better a post-A.D. 32 date, because the two were clearly at odds with each other in A.D. 32. Hence, a date of A.D. 33 seems to best fit the historical evidence, although many scholars alternately argue for A.D. 30.

4. Summary of the Dates.

Dates for the birth, life and death of Jesus as discussed above may be charted as in table 2.

See also BIRTH OF JESUS; DEATH OF JESUS; HERO-DIAN DYNASTY; JESUS IN NON-CHRISTIAN SOURCES; JOSEPHUS; PONTIUS PILATE; TEMPLE.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. W. R. Armstrong and J. Finegan, “Chronology of the NT,” ISBE 1:686-93; R. T. Beckwith, “St. Luke, the Date of Christmas and the Priestly Courses at Qumran,” RevQ 33 (1977) 73-94; idem, Calendar and Chronology, Jewish and Christian: Biblical, Intertestamental, and Patristic Studies (AGJU 33; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1996); C. L. Blomberg, The Historical Reliability of John’s Gospel: Issues and Commentary (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2001); D. Bock, Luke (2 vols.; BECNT 3; Grand Rapids: Baker, 1996); J. Finegan, Handbook of Biblical Chronology (Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1964); R. T. France, “Chronological Aspects of ‘Gospel Harmony,’” VE 16 (1986) 33-59; H. W. Hoehner, The Chronological Aspects of the Life of Christ (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1977); A. Jaubert, The Date of the Last Supper (New York: Alba, 1965); J. Jeremias, The Eucharistic Words of Jesus, trans. N. Perrin (3rd ed.; New York: Scribner, 1966); C. S. Keener, The Historical Jesus of the Gospels (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2009); I. H. Marshall, Last Supper and Lord’s Supper (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1980); G. Ogg, The Chronology of the Public Ministry of Jesus (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1940); E. Ruckstuhl, Chronology of the Last Days of Jesus, trans. V. J. Drapela (New York: Desclee, 1965); N. T. Wright, Jesus and the Victory of God (COQG 2; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1996).

H. W. Hoehner and J. K. Brown

CHURCH

Church is the collective term for the local assembly or universal body of individuals bearing allegiance to Jesus. Though the word is rare in the Gospels, the church is the assumed backdrop and audience for all the Gospels.

- 1. Terminology
- 2. Jesus
- 3. Mark
- 4. Matthew
- 5. Luke
- 6. John

1. Terminology.

The word ekklēsia (“church”) is used 114 times in the NT, mostly in the Pauline corpus (62x), Acts (23x) and Revelation (20x), for a local group (Rom 16:1, 5), or assembly of the group (Mt 18:17; Acts 11:26), or the entire (Acts 8:3; 12:1) or universal church (Col 1:18, 24). The whole church is, then, not so much the sum of its parts as it is the universal expressed in the particular group. The derivation of ekklēsia from ek (“out of”) and kaleō (“to call”)—“those called out”—does not appear to be significant in the NT.

As it had been for centuries (e.g., Thucydides, Pel. 1.87; Xenophon, Hell. 1.7.9; Aristotle, Ath. pol. 43.4), so too in the world of Jesus and the Gospel writers, ekklēsia was used of any meeting or gathering (e.g., 1 Macc 3:13), including of a political body, and a crowd or unruly gathering of people (e.g., Josephus, Life 268; Ant. 12.164; 19.332; cf. Acts 19:32, 39-40).

The LXX generally used ekklēsia to translate the qāhāl (“assembly”) of prophets (1 Sam 19:20), Israel (e.g., 1 Kings 8:14; 1 Chron 13:2), a mob (Sir 26:5) or the people of Lord (Deut 23:2-4; 1 Chron 28:8; Neh 13:1; Mic 2:5). The earliest Christian use of ekklēsia often forms part of an established term, “church of God” (ekklēsia tou theou [e.g., 1 Cor 1:2; 10:32; 15:9; 2 Cor 1:1], sometimes in the plural [1 Cor 11:16; 1 Thess 2:14; 2 Thess 1:4]). Since “church of God” was also used at the time for the eschatological gathering of God’s people (1QM IV, 10), early Christians prob-

Table 2. Summary of Dates of Birth, Life and Death of Jesus

Jesus’ birth	6 B.C.–spring 4 B.C.
Herod the Great’s death	March/April 4 B.C.
Commencement of John the Baptist’s ministry	A.D. 29
Commencement of Jesus’ ministry	ca. A.D. 29
Jesus’ death	Nisan 14 or 15, A.D. 30 or 33
Jesus’ resurrection	Nisan 16 or 17, A.D. 30 or 33

ably used the term (often abbreviated as “church”) to express their self-understanding as those at the center of God’s eschatological activity (see Roloff, 411-12). This point is reinforced by the future perspective for the building of the church in Matthew 16:18, while Luke uses “church” only of the followers of Jesus after Easter, even though the term was readily available to him. This also raises the question of Jesus’ intentions in relation to the church.

2. Jesus.

The classic view is that although the church was born at Pentecost, it was inaugurated by Jesus in his teaching and the involvement of his followers in his *mission. However, in view of Jesus’ eschatological perspective, preaching the imminence of the *kingdom of God (Mk 1:15) and, arguably, not anticipating any period of history beyond his death and vindication, it could be, as A. Schweitzer proposed, that he neither founded the church nor expected his group of followers to continue (Denaux). Instead, as A. Loisy famously put it, “Jesus announced the kingdom of God and it was the church that came” (Barrett, 68).

Nevertheless, Jesus clearly intended to establish a group in continuity with, yet distinct from, the existing people of God. At his *baptism Jesus identified not only with an imminent eschatological perspective held by *John, but also with a man who had established a group of followers arguably distinct from current national society (Mt 3:9 // Lk 3:8). In his turn, Jesus had a group of followers, and his choosing twelve from among them suggests that although he never applied the term “*Israel” to his group, he envisaged them as such. Further, in addressing his followers as a “flock” (Lk 12:32), he probably saw the group as distinct from the whole, a remnant (cf. Mic 4:4-7). However, the group was neither exclusive (as at Qumran) nor academic (as for a rabbi), but rather was the nucleus of the new people of God, commissioned to encourage others to join (e.g., Mk 6:6-13). Regardless of Jesus’ expectations beyond his death, it is clear from the people involved, the importance of Jesus to the group, as well as the shared meals and ethical concerns, and the message of the kingdom, which they held in common with Jesus, that this group was contiguous with, and became, the church.

3. Mark.

The most direct access to the earliest Gospel’s understanding of the church probably is gained through the theme of *discipleship and particularly the associated metaphor of the boat, an image explicitly used in the period of God’s people (1QH^a XI, 6), and of the church in later Christian literature (e.g., Clement of Alexandria, Quis div. 34.3; Tertullian, Bapt. 12.7; Cyprian, Ep. 74.11.3). Consistent with the importance of obedience (Mk 10:28-31), the first disciples, on being called, leave one boat (Mk 1:19-20) for another, which becomes particularly significant in Mark’s narrative, where the disciples are important (Mk 4:1—8:21). Those in the boat with Jesus are sharply distinguished from others (Mk 4:1-2, 11; 6:31-32): neither the crowd nor the enemies of Jesus are ever in the boat (Mk 3:9) (Best 1981, 231). The church, understood through the image of the boat, is the place of withdrawal and communion and of teaching for the disciples (Mk 8:13-21), as well as the means to convey Jesus as teacher (Mk 4:1) and healer from one mission venue to another (Mk 4:35-36; 5:2, 21; 6:34, 45, 53-55; 8:10, 13). The Twelve, perhaps representing those engaged in full-time mission activity (Best 1986, 158), called not only to be “with him” but also for mission (Mk 3:14-15), are imperiled when Jesus is not with them in the boat (only at Mk 6:45-52) or is not trusted (Mk 4:37-41). However, the active presence of Jesus calms a storm of demonic forces threatening the boat (cf. Mk 1:25 with Mk 4:39). Equally threatening to the church is a failure of mission (Mk 9:18-19), which is countered through Jesus’ teaching (Mk 9:29). Also, failures of relationships are corrected through humility (Mk 9:33-36) and mutual service (Mk 9:35; 10:43-44), as well as care for weaker members (Mk 9:33-35). The most tragic failure of the church, represented by Peter, the failure of confession (Mk 14:71) is overcome by an admission of failure (Mk 14:72) and *forgiveness by Jesus (Mk 16:7).

4. Matthew.

Among the Gospel writers, only Matthew uses the term ekklēsia (Mt 16:18; 18:17 [2x]). Its sparing use, Jesus’ future statement “I will build [oikodomēsō] my church” (Mt 16:18), and the mission of the disciples taking place beyond the horizon of the narrative (Mt 10:16-23) show that Matthew considered the church had its roots in Jesus’ intention but its existence after his earthly ministry. Peter, addressed first as “Simon son of Jonah,” then as “Peter” (Petros) the “rock” (petra [Mt 16:18; cf. Mt 4:18; 10:2]) on which “my church” will be built (Mt 16:17-18), echoes the story of Abram’s name change to “Abraham” in relation to him becoming the father of a multitude of nations (Gen 17:1-8) and the image of him as a rock in relation to the foundation of God’s people (Is 51:1-2).

The singular “my church” (mou tēn ekklēsian) and the building image identify Peter as the preeminent apostle and foundation of the church, the new people of God. Consistent with the stability and permanence of a “rock,” despite hardships and suffering (Mt 16:24-25; cf. Mt 10:16-25; 24:9-22), the “gates of Hades”—the demonic (1 En. 10:4-6, 12-14; Jub. 5:6, 10), death (1 En. 22:8-13) or mortal danger (Is 38:10; Wis 16:13; 3 Macc 5:51; Pss. Sol. 16:2)—“will not overpower” the church (Mt 16:18; cf. Mt 28:20).

In light of a saying about *Pharisees locking people out of the kingdom (Mt 23:13), changing the image of Peter’s responsibility to having “keys” (Mt 16:19) suggests a teaching authority that, taking into account the shared responsibility of discipline (Mt 18:16-18), is also likely assumed to be shared by the leaders of the church.

The instructions on how to deal with an offending member, similar to those set out in the Rule of the Community from Qumran (1QS V, 24—VI, 1), come in the context of the so-called fourth discourse (Mt 18:1-35), which appears to be directed to authority figures (Mt 18:6-14). They are charged to be humble (Mt 18:1-5) and to care for the church, represented as a flock of sheep (Mt 18:12-13) and a *family (Mt 18:15 [“brother”]), so that neither they as leaders (Mt 18:6-9) nor any of the “little ones” (Mt 18:6, 10, 14) “stumble” (Mt 18:6, 8, 9)—that is, apostatize (cf. Mt 13:21).

Emulating the *shepherd (Mt 18:12, 15), the offended member is to take the initiative in pointing out the sin. If not heard, first privately or then with one or two witnesses, or then before the church (where Jesus is present [Mt 18:20]), the person is to be excommunicated (Mt 18:15-17). Given the context of the caring shepherd (Mt 18:12-13) and extravagant forgiveness (Mt 18:21-22) as well as Matthew’s concern for the outsider (Mt 8:5-13; 9:9-13), the purpose of these instructions probably is restoration (cf. Lev 19:17-18).

For Matthew, the church is both the continuation of Israel and a response to its rejection of Jesus (Mt 27:11-26). The rejection includes a failure to produce the fruit of quantitative expansion (Mt 13:23) and good works that he expects (Mt 21:34, 41; cf. Mt 3:8), as is seen in the *parable of the wicked tenants (Mt 21:33-46), which concludes with Jesus saying, “The kingdom of God will be taken away from you and given to a people that produces the fruits of the kingdom” (Mt 21:43). The transfer of the kingdom takes place upon the *death and *resurrection of Jesus, as that is the focus of the parable (Mt 21:41-42). The apocalyptic signs of an earthquake (Mt 27:51; cf. Is 5:25; 1 En. 1:6; As. Mos. 10:4-5) and of *Gentiles confessing Jesus to be God’s *Son (Mt 27:54) also suggest that Jesus’ death had eschatological significance and prepared for the mission of the church to the Gentiles (Mt 28:16-20).

5. Luke.

Luke has written most directly and at length about the church primarily in Acts, through his story of the corporate life of the followers of Jesus. However, not only does Luke’s Gospel provide the basis and many of the themes for understanding his view of the church, but also he locates the origins of church not in Pentecost, but rather in Jesus collecting around him and appointing the *apostles (Lk 6:13). In the term apostle, with its roots in OT prophetic call and sending stories (Is 6:8; 61:1; Jer 1:7; Ezek 2:1-4), the purpose of the church is said to represent God. That the group of twelve (Lk 6:13) must be maintained (Acts 1:15-26) conveys the idea that “Israel” continues in the life and story of the church. What was expected for Israel—for example, a kingdom (Acts 1:6) and the Spirit (Acts 2:1-41)—had been realized in the church, the new or renewed Israel, or people of God (Acts 15:14; 18:10). However, Luke not having a settled term for the followers of Jesus suggests that the precise nature of the church was still developing.

From the group of apostles, renewed by the risen Jesus (Acts 1:24; 9:4-6, 15-16) and empowered and directed by the Spirit (Acts 1:8), the church continues to grow through those being saved (Acts 2:47; 6:7; 12:24; 16:5). Nevertheless, it is God (Lk 1:47, 69, 71; 18:26), his word (Lk 8:11-12), and primarily Jesus (Lk 2:11, 30; 7:3; 17:19; 19:9-10), or his power (Lk 8:46-48), his word (Lk 6:9; 7:50; 8:50; 18:42) or command (Lk 8:29, 36), not the church or joining it, that bring *salvation. Yet, taking one’s place among the other people of God is a natural and assumed consequence of salvation (Lk 15:1-32; Acts 2:47).

Noting the description of his Gospel as “all that Jesus began to do and teach” (Acts 1:1) and the parallels drawn between the ministry of Jesus and that of the early church—receiving the same Spirit (Lk 3:21-22; Acts 2:4), casting out *demons, *healing the sick and preaching the kingdom of God (Lk 4:40-41; Acts 5:16; 8:12-13)—Luke is likely proposing that the church, as individuals and as a collective, does not merely emulate Jesus, but rather continues to embody his ministry between Pentecost and the parousia (Acts 1:6-8). In this, Jesus is the church modeled, and the church is modeled on Jesus, so that in Jesus appearing to be the principal actor of Acts, Luke blurs the distinction between the so-called epochs of Jesus and of the church. Jesus' followers continue to consult him (Acts 1:24), heal in his name (Acts 3:6; 4:10), even see and meet him in visions (Acts 7:56; 9:5).

Through the elevation of particularly Paul to the apostolate (Acts 14:4, 14), Luke proposes that the church is carried forward in and by those who encounter and are called by the risen Jesus. Taking into account other ancient literature (e.g., Herodotus, Hist. 9; Lucretius, On the Nature of Things), readers probably are to regard the open end of Acts as Luke's invitation for them to continue in their own lives the story of the church begun in his Gospel.

6. John.

Most probably in recognition of the church coming to flower only after Easter, the term "church" is absent from John's Gospel. Also, the Twelve, who represent the church, play little role in the narrative: their names are not listed, they perform no *miracles, they are not sent on mission. Instead, it is Jesus who dominates this Gospel. Yet, the implied ecclesiology, seen across the narrative but most clearly in four passages, locates the origin, definition and function of the church not only in the ministry of Jesus, particularly his relationship with his followers, but also in a continuation of that relationship.

First, in the discourse on the good shepherd (Jn 10:1-42), where the perspective is outward-looking (Jn 10:1-10), an intimate relationship is implied between Jesus and believers (Jn 10:14-16), with no hierarchy or diversity of function acknowledged among them. Jesus makes a puzzling statement when he says, "I have other sheep that do not belong to this fold. I must bring them also, and they will listen to my voice. So there will be one flock, one shepherd" (Jn 10:16). Similar imagery occurs in Caiphas's prophecy that Jesus would die "not for the nation only, but to gather into one the dispersed children of God" (Jn 11:52), suggesting that Jesus' other flock is the Gentiles rather than dispersed Jews (as in Ezek 34:11-13). However, alternatively, the other sheep (i.e., they are believers) could be heretical Christians (Jn 17:20-21). In any case, John's Gospel assumed that others needed to join them in order to bring about unity in the church.

Second, in the discourse on the true vine, with its internal perspective (Jn 15:1-27), Jesus is the vine, and the believers all equally "remain" (menō [Jn 15:4-7, 9-10, 16]) in the one vine; there is an individualism, with no initial interest in how the branches relate to each other (Jn 15:1-11). However, from the explanation of the parable of the vine (Jn 15:9-14), the fundamental requirement to produce fruit through remaining in the vine most probably is not good works but rather love for other members of the church.

Third, in the prayer of Jesus (Jn 17:1-26), with OT farewell speeches as models for a final discourse (e.g., Gen 49; Deut 33; 1 Sam 12), the ecclesiological agenda of John's Gospel is clear. Although the purpose of the prayer is at first christological and sums up the narrative (Jn 17:1-5), it goes on to a concern for persecution (Jn 17:11-19) and the unity of the church, which is to reflect the unity between the Father and Jesus and be the means of the church revealing God's *glory (Jn 17:20-26).

Fourth, although the *Beloved Disciple has been the dominant figure in later scenes in this Gospel (Jn 13:23; 19:25-27; 20:1-10), the final chapter, perhaps appended by what R. Bultmann called the "ecclesiastical redactor," reestablishes the dominance of Peter, who, despite earlier success (Jn 6:68-69), has failed in his confession (Jn 18:15-27) and is not said to believe (Jn 20:6-8). Now, Peter recognizes Jesus (Jn 21:7) and leads the mission of the church—fishing successfully (Jn 21:3, 11). Peter, who is commissioned by the good shepherd to act for him (21:15-17), will pay the same ultimate price (Jn 21:18-19) in caring for the whole flock (Meier). As with the other Gospels, John can be read at two levels: as a story of Jesus and as a history of the implied community of readers.

See also APOSTLE; DISCIPLES AND DISCIPLESHIP; GENTILES; ISRAEL; KINGDOM OF GOD/HEAVEN; MISSION; SHEPHERD, SHEEP.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. C. K. Barrett, Jesus and the Gospel Tradition (London: SPCK, 1967); E. Best, Following Jesus: Discipleship in the Gospel of Mark (JSNTSup 4; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1981); idem, Disciples and Discipleship: Studies in the Gospel According to Mark (Edinburgh: T & Clark, 1986); R. F. Collins, "Did Jesus Found the Church: Which Church?" LS 21 (1996) 356-64; R. A. Culpepper, "The Quest for the Church in the Gospel of John," Int 63 (2009) 341-54; A. Denaux, "Did Jesus Found the Church?" LS 21 (1996) 24-45; D. J. Harrington, God's People in Christ: New Testament Perspectives on the Church and Judaism (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1980); J. P. Meier, "The Absence and Presence of the Church in John's Gospel," Mid-Stream 41 (2002) 27-34; J. Roloff, "ἐκκλησία," EDNT 1:410-15; R. Schnackenburg, The Church in the New Testament, trans. W. J. O'Hara (New York: Herder, 1965); E. Schweizer, Church Order in the New Testament, trans. F. Clarke (SBT 32; London: SCM, 1961); G. H. Twelftree, People of the Spirit: Exploring Luke's View of the Church (London: SPCK; Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2009); T. Woodroof, "The Church as Boat in Mark: Building a Seaworthy Church," ResQ 39 (1997) 231-49.

G. H. Twelftree

CIRCUMCISION. See JUDAISM, COMMON.

CLEAN AND UNCLEAN

The words clean and unclean have meaning within particular, culture-specific purity codes. Pollution taboos and concerns about purity pervaded Greek and Roman culture as well as Jewish culture, making the concepts of "clean" and "unclean" (or "pure" and "polluted") as intelligible to Gentiles as to Jews. These codes concern proper ordering, regulating "what and who belong when and where" (Neyrey, 93), and in what condition, and thus they enable people in a society to know when order is being maintained and when something is out of place and requiring attention. This is especially important in regard to interaction with the "holy"—a society's God or gods. The "holy" is invested with power either for blessing or destruction. People rely on the divine for the goods on which their lives depend, but the numinous must be approached with care, often only by certain members of society (hence the creation of internal hierarchy in the group), and always by those who have undergone ritual purification to remove uncleanness or defilement, which must never come into contact with holiness. Jesus lived and moved within, and often bumped up against, the purity codes of first-century A.D. Judaism. This requires of modern readers of the Gospels a sympathetic understanding concerning why "purity" was important and meaningful to people, so that we do not dismiss Jesus' opponents as incomprehensible, shallow or legalistic.

1. Living Before the Holy One
2. Purity Lines in Israel and Early Judaism
3. John's Immersion Rite and Jesus
4. Purity Codes, Jesus and the Evangelists

1. Living Before the Holy One.

God commanded Aaron to "distinguish between the holy and the common, and between the unclean and the clean," and to teach the people how to do the same (Lev 10:10). This verse introduces the two main pairs of terms used within Israel to construct its purity map. Each pair has a neutral term and a more loaded term. "Common" (or "profane") is a neutral term, referring to the ordinary spaces and things of the world that are accessible to human beings. "Holy" is the corresponding marked term, referring to special spaces or things that have been "set apart" from the ordinary (the "common") as belonging in some special way to God. "Clean" is a neutral term, referring generally to a person or thing in its "normal," proper state. "Unclean" is the corresponding marked term, denoting that something has crossed the line from the normal state into a dangerous state of pollution (Nelson, 21). In Israelite culture breaches of boundaries rendered something unclean, as when a person had a discharge or a torn skin surface (e.g., leprosy), or when an animal combined characteristics thought to be proper to different environments (e.g. lobsters, which live in the sea but walk on legs). Pollution and defilement disqualify one from entering God's presence and fellowship and, if passed on, potentially prevent others from securing God's much-needed favor, and might even provoke the Holy God to "break out" against the whole people.

One term from each pair would jointly describe any single object or person at a given time. The typical lay Israelite was "clean" and "common" most of the time. If, for example, a woman suffered a bloody discharge, she became "unclean" and "common." The tithes collected for the priests were "clean" and "holy," while food sold in the market was (supposed to be) "clean" and "common." Thus, the former were to be eaten only by the "holy" priests in a state of "cleanness," and if a "common" lay Israelite ate of them, he or she would thereby "profane" what was holy and risk divine wrath. A graveyard was "unclean" and "common," while the temple precincts were "clean" and "holy." A particularly problematic combination is "unclean" and "holy," which were held to be incompatible (except in special circumstances, such as the ashes of the red heifer in Num 19 [see Nelson, 33]). It was the duty of Israel to preserve the "holy" from being profaned and used as "common," or from being brought into contact with the impure (the "unclean"), so that the source of holiness, God, would continue to show favor toward Israel and would not be provoked either to withdraw from the people or consume them.

Israel believed that the Holy God lived in the midst of his special people, God's "special possession" (Deut 4:20; 7:6). God's presence gave Israel access to great benefits, as God protected and prospered his people (see Lev 26:3-12), but God's holiness would not tolerate the presence of defilement or abomination in the holy land that God had chosen for himself and for his people as a dwelling place. God's presence thus also brought significant danger, lest Israel affront the Holy God with defilements and uncleanness, resulting in disasters for Israel (Lev 26:14-33), just as it had for the former inhabitants of the holy land, the Caananites (Lev 18:24-25, 27; 20:22-23). The *law of Moses, the Torah, essentially was instruction about how to live as a holy nation in the presence of a Holy God, instruction that includes, but is not limited to, ethics.

2. Purity Lines in Israel and Early Judaism.

Because of its consciousness of living in the presence of the holy, the ancient Israelites drew extensive lines of purity in an attempt to create a model of God's cosmic order and to locate one's place within that order. As a result, one could know when pollution had been contracted and what needed to be done to dispel it. Purity codes fulfill vitally important social functions by drawing lines around and within the social body. The Israelites are a "holy people" (Wis 10:15), in contrast to the Gentile nations, who are unclean by definition. Thus, there is an important, boldface line drawn around Israel, circumscribing it from association with the practitioners of abomination. Circumcision—a religious rather than a medical procedure—inscribes upon the body of the male Jew this distinctiveness from the Gentiles. Gentiles are not excluded from joining the people of God, but they must enter it not only by putting away their idols but also by accepting circumcision.

Within Israel, an internal hierarchy was created on the basis of access to the Holy God, a hierarchy reflected in the sacred precincts of the *temple itself. At the top of this hierarchy stood the high priest, then the *priests, and then the Levites. For the priests, as those brokering access to the divine, came the added risks and responsibilities for remaining clean and holy for contact with God. Lay Israelites, though "holy to the Lord," were not as holy as the priests; Israelite women were unclean one-fourth of their adult lives on account of menstruation, with the result that their access to the holy places was even more limited. Those whose lineage could not be verified and those (males) whose reproductive organs were damaged were in the outer margins of Israel's purity map (Neyrey, 95-96). Those "born of illicit unions" (Deut 23:2) and their descendants to the tenth generation were barred from the congregation. Since the "race" was holy, those whose place in that "race" was questionable were pushed to the outermost fringes.

Just as Israel was holy to God, so was the land it inhabited. Moreover, Jerusalem was the holy city, of greater sanctity than the rest of Israel, because it contained the temple, the place where the sphere of human action intersects with the sphere of God's realm. The holy places are a sort of overlapping area where these two spheres coexist and thus where transactions (such as sacrifices) between the two spheres become possible. The division of the temple into a series of courts, a holy place and a holiest place reflects the increasing sanctity of spaces as one approached the very presence of God. As might be expected, increasingly stricter purity requirements and pollution taboos regulated access to the inner courts and holy places.

Times and seasons are also divided into sacred and common. The *Sabbath, or seventh day of the week, was set apart as a holy day. It was not to be profaned (treated as common or ordinary) by people working on that day—that is, by bringing the activity of the other six days into the sacred time of the seventh day. The severe penalties for profaning the Sabbath (see Ex 31:12-17) show the importance of this sacred time as a marker of the social identity of the Jewish people, another practice that clearly "set apart" the people of Israel from the nations around them. New moons and other sacred days, such as Passover, the week-long Festival of Booths, the Day of Atonement, and Rosh Hashanah (see Feasts), also were observed in special ways, but the Sabbath was by far the most regular, visible sign of the Jew's distinctiveness, and therefore not surprisingly it was a frequent point of contention between Jews (e.g., the disputes between Jesus and the Pharisees).

Foods also were classified according to the categories of "clean" (i.e., proper for a Jew to ingest) and "unclean" (not proper for a Jew, but fine for Gentiles, who themselves are unclean). Meat permissible for Jews to consume was limited to land mammals that both ruminates (chew the cud) and have a split hoof (rather than a paw, like the weasel, or a single hoof, like the horse). It was essential that the animal have both features. Seafood for Jews was limited to fish with both fins and scales (rather than shells or legs). Birds could be eaten as long as they were not birds of prey (i.e., feeding on other animals or carcasses). Insects were unclean, save for the locust and grasshopper family (see Lev 11:3, 9, 12, 20-21).

Concern over clean and unclean in regard to foods reinforced Jewish identity and group boundaries in some very practical ways. The fact that Jews studiously avoided certain foods (particularly pork) was well known to the Gentiles in whose midst they lived. The Jews' cuisine, therefore, becomes another essential point at which the lines between insider (Jew) and outsider (Gentile) were drawn. Jews had to be sure that the source of their food was "clean"—that is, that an animal had been slaughtered in the proper way, so as to drain all the blood rather than leave it to settle in the meat as the Gentiles did (Lev 17:10-14; Deut 12:16), and killed without any connection with the polluting idols of the world around them. Especially in the Diaspora, therefore, Jews tended to develop their own markets for food and gather their communities around these markets. Dietary restrictions were remarkably effective for reinforcing social grouping.

Assigning specific portions of sacrifices to God, to priests and, in the case of "well-being sacrifices," to lay persons added another dimension to the social function of purity laws concerning food. God's portion was too holy for any human to ingest; the priests' portions were too holy for the lay people to ingest (Lev 22:10). While the distinction between clean and unclean animals is common to all Israelites as a sign of Israel's separation from the nations, there is another dimension to food (seen in tithes and the division of the meat of well-being offerings) that reinforces Israel's internal social structures.

Finally, Jewish purity codes were concerned with the boundaries of individual Jewish bodies. Many regulations display a strong interest in the wholeness of the body's surfaces, which in turn reflects the interest in the wholeness of the boundaries of the social body (the firm, fixed definition of who belongs to the group and who does not). Concern over what enters and exits a body also correlates with the larger concern over what enters and exits the social body and the desire for regulating that flow (Douglas, 115). For this reason, much discussion of bodily pollution focuses on surfaces (clothing and the skin), on fluids that cross through the "gates" of the body, and on bodies that have crossed the boundary between life and death (Neyrey, 102-3).

The death of a community member evokes powerful feelings and a sense that something numinous and threatening has broken into normal life. Dead bodies, therefore, and the houses in which they are laying, are sources of pollution. The loss of integrity to the body's outer boundary associated with a variety of disorders lumped together under the heading of "leprosy" is another potent source of uncleanness, resulting in the removal of the leper from the congregation (Lev 14:45-46; Num 12:12). All discharges related to the sexual apertures and reproductive processes are polluting, no doubt because the processes of birth as well as death are seen as charged with sacral power and danger.

Pollution could come through what passed into the mouth. There was no provision for purification after eating unclean foods, though purification for unwitting offenses (e.g., eating clean foodstuffs that had been polluted by the activity of unclean "swarming" creatures such as lizards and rodents) no doubt was possible. Israelites were especially careful to protect the foods that were set apart for the priests in Jerusalem from such contamination, so as not to send pollution to the temple and defile its personnel. Many kinds of pollution are regularly incurred in the course of everyday life, and for these there exists a complex system of rituals that allow the polluted person to be integrated back into a state of cleanness (or purity). Ultimately, the Day of Atonement rituals were meant to cleanse the sanctuary itself from the accumulated defilements of a year's worth of the people's pollution and sins, known and unknown. Such removal of pollution from the presence of the Holy God was essential if he was to continue to live in the midst of Israel without either withdrawing (thus making his favors unavailable) or consuming the people.

The Torah made no distinction between moral law and cultic law in terms of the pollutions caused by violations of the standards and the requirement of purificatory rites. The Torah was integrated as a single code. Holiness is enacted through the avoidance of defiling foods (Lev 11), but also through the pursuit of fairness, honesty and justice in all dealings with other people (Lev 19). The "sin offering" (or, better, "purification offering" [see Milgrom, 253; Sanders, 108]) is made both for certain moral offenses and for the pollution incurred without any moral failure (as in the case of childbirth). It was not ethically "wrong" to contract bodily pollution. In fact, it was often unavoidable. Women will menstruate; men will emit semen; corpses will need proper burial by their kin. Such pollution brought no moral guilt. Nevertheless, physical pollution had to be dealt with just as surely as inner, heart-pollution had to be atoned for. Both were equally "deviations from the norm" requiring purgation of the pollution (Sanders, 108). Both "ethical" transgressions, such as fraud, and the unnoticed contraction of "ritual" uncleanness, such as contact with an unclean person or animal, require a kind of "guilt offering" (Lev 5:2-7; 6:2-7).

A fundamental principle behind these codes is the imitation of God's holiness as God's holy people: "You shall be holy, for I am holy" (Lev 11:44-45; 19:2). Carefully selecting clean animals for food (e.g., cows, fish and certain birds) and avoiding unclean animals (e.g., pigs and shellfish, which were permissible for Gentiles but not for Jews) mirrored God's careful selection of Israel as clean and proper to be God's own, distinguishing between Israel and the many unclean nations (Lev 20:22-26). Just as God set apart the Sabbath day from the other days on which God worked, so Israel rested on the Sabbath, reflecting God's rhythms in creation and bearing witness to God as creator (Ex 31:12-17).

Israel's purity codes were not only rich with meaning for the practicing Jew; they also gave form and boundaries to Israel's national identity and social cohesion. In the practical working out of these rules, purity concerns kept observant Jews close together and erected high boundaries between the congregation of observant Jews and the world of Gentiles. The book of Jubilees (ca. 160 B.C.) stresses the importance of this separation: "Separate yourselves from the nations, and eat not with them, and do not do according to their works, and become not their associates. For all their works are unclean, and all their ways are a pollution and an abomination and uncleanness" (Jub. 22:16). This is of great importance. If the Jews limited their contact with Gentiles and were at least aware of the necessity of keeping the boundary high and well defined, they could hope to avoid being swallowed up into *Hellenism. *Israel (defined ethnically, not geographically) would not become "like the nations" and lose their covenant relationship with God.

Different groups manifested different levels of concern with maintaining purity and avoiding pollution. Interest and care were, understandably, highest in the temple (where the Holy God lived) and in groups that regarded themselves as some kind of alternative gateway to God's court (such as the Qumran *Essenes). Strong taboos warned against defiling the sacred precincts, with the result that Israelites took great care to approach the temple safely, in a state of cleanness (Sanders, 71). Even away from the temple, however, many Israelites were concerned not to multiply pollution in the land, which might result in national disaster. This did not make for a paranoid avoidance of pollution, but called rather for an awareness of how and when one contracted pollution so that one could observe the proper purification for unavoidable pollution. As long as the proper purifications were performed, no danger would ensue.

To be avoided by all Jews, however, were the prohibited pollutions. These included the intentional (or neglectful) delay of purifications for permitted pollution (see Lev 17:15-16; Num 19:12), corpse pollution for priests (save for the closest of relatives), sexual pollutions (incest, intercourse with a menstruating woman, bestiality, homosexuality [Lev 18:6-30; 20:10-21]), defilement by association with idols and idol worship (e.g., Lev 20:2-5), murder (see Num 35:33-34), neglect of circumcision (Gen 17:14) and defilement of the sacred (e.g., entering the temple while unclean or breaking the Sabbath).

One important variable in observance of purity laws became an occasion for some degrees of segregation within Israel. The majority of the people were not, it appears, concerned with "secondary pollution"—that is, pollution caused by touching something touched by a person or thing that was in a state of uncleanness. Pharisees were concerned with this level of contamination. These stricter Jews were wary about how close their association should be with less strict Jews. Essenes (including the men who inhabited the Qumran settlement) were the strictest about the avoidance of pollution and the safeguarding of their "priestly" purity. They went to the extremes of segregation from the rest of the holy people of God. Purity regulations designed to bind Israel together in solidarity in the midst of the nations thus also contained the seeds for sectarianism within Israel.

3. John's Immersion Rite and Jesus.

The story of Jesus' public ministry begins with the work of his cousin *John, who offered people immersion in running water. The Torah's purity laws prescribe immersion as a part of the purification process for many kinds of bodily pollution, including *leprosy (once healed [Lev 14:8-9]) and bodily discharges (or contact with someone who has such a discharge [Lev 15:5-8, 10-11, 13, 18, 21-22]), as well as for priests after handling the corpses of animals or people (Lev 16:26, 28; Num 19:7-8). Immersion was part of the preparation of priests for ordination (Ex 29:4) and of the high priest on the Day of Atonement (Lev 16:4). These immersions protected the nation from the deadly results of provoking the Holy God with their pollution: "Thus you will keep the people of Israel separate from their uncleanness, so that they do not die in their uncleanness by defiling my tabernacle that is in their midst" (Lev 15:31).

Immersion was also part of certain initiation rituals. The Essenes practiced an initial immersion for the Jews who converted to their group, again to remove the pollution that converts had accrued from the time prior to their joining the sect (since no purification performed outside the sect was valid [see 1QS III, 3-9]). This immersion, however, was granted only after a novice had demonstrated the reality of *repentance and reformation of heart by bringing forth the appropriate behavioral fruits in response to the instruction that he had received over the course of that year. Converts and initiates would then continue to practice immersion as part of the ongoing cycle of contracting bodily pollution and seeking purification of the same.

A Judean approaching John in the Jordan would recognize that John's immersion was more than a routine purification rite. In line with initiatory purifications, John's immersion offered a decisively fresh start in regard to putting away pollution, specifically in preparation for encountering the Holy God, whose agent was coming to usher in God's *kingdom. Preparation included both the renewal of covenant obedience and purification of outward uncleanness. Repentance and the renewal of good works and social justice (the "fruit worthy of repentance") were prerequisite to this immersion (Lk 3:7-14). Like the Essenes (1QS V, 13-15) or Philo (Deus 7-9), John proclaimed that immersion would do nothing for bodily pollution unless inner pollution was first cleansed by a return to holy and just living (see also the account of John in Josephus, Ant. 18.116-117).

Jesus identifies immersion for purification of the body, and by extension the repentance from transgression and rededication to a life productive of the fruits that please God, as part of the "righteousness" that God seeks from God's people (Mt 3:15), the righteousness that his own disciples must also pursue (Mt 5:20). Thus, he identifies himself with John's work by undergoing immersion himself. This need not imply that Jesus thought himself to be sinful and in need of repentance (the cleansing of inner pollution); no doubt he still would have valued the cleansing of physical pollution that he, being fully human, naturally would have contracted. Christian *baptism would become something quite new and different after the *death and *resurrection of Jesus—an initiation rite that allowed the convert to enter into a mystical participation in that dying and rising to new life (see Rom 6:3-11; Gal 3:26-29; Col 2:10-14). But at least one Christian leader would continue to think about those initial phases of joining the church in terms similar to John's, inviting believers to draw near to the Holy God "with our hearts sprinkled clean from an evil conscience and our bodies washed with pure water" (Heb 10:22), free from both inner and outer pollution. It may be more in line with this understanding that Jesus sent his own disciples out to immerse others (Mt 28:20).

4. Purity Codes, Jesus and the Evangelists.

Avoiding certain foods, observing the sanctity of the Sabbath, and the myriad other purity regulations were meaningful manifestations of Jewish identity as a people belonging to the Holy God; they were not merely externalistic and legalistic rules. Only from such a vantage point can we understand both why many Jews, including some Christian Jews, considered them inviolable and what was at stake when Jesus and some of his followers pushed against and sought to redefine these practices.

First, Jesus shows a striking willingness to cross lines of purity in regard to other, potentially polluting human beings that many of his contemporaries would not cross because of their concern to guard against defilement. Jesus does this, however, in order to bring the unclean, the defiled and the sinner back to a state of cleanness, wholeness and integration into the community. Jesus' enacts a conceptualization of holiness as *mercy, *love and compassion, very much in keeping with the prophetic tradition of Israel that he quotes so frequently. For example, when Pharisees seek to challenge his eating with *sinners and thus inviting pollution, he quotes Hosea 6:6: "I desire mercy and not sacrifice" (see Mt 9:10-13). The command "Be holy, for I am holy" is fulfilled not in the protection of purity ("separate yourselves from uncleanness" [see Lev 15:31]), but rather in extending wholeness to the unclean ("Be merciful, just as your Father is merciful" [Lk 6:36]).

Early in his ministry Jesus encounters a leper (Mt 8:2-4 // Mk 1:40-45). The leper is perpetually unclean, but Jesus nevertheless touches him and makes him clean. Jesus is not defiled by this touch, but rather extends cleansing by this touch. Jesus stays at the house of "Simon the leper" in Bethany in connection with his last visit to Jerusalem, a rather open and flagrant flouting of purity codes because whoever stays under a roof with a leper, as with a corpse, contracts defilement. A hemorrhaging woman, unclean from an irregular flow of blood (see Lev 15:19-30), pushes her way through a crowd (polluting them), touches Jesus (risking polluting him), and is healed. Power goes out from Jesus rather than pollution coming upon him (Mt 9:20-22). Jesus is not reluctant to touch a corpse, and his touch restores life (Mt 9:23-26; Lk 7:11-17). The exorcism of the Gerasene demoniac restores a man who lived among the tombs—unclean places in which he continuously contracted corpse defilement—to a place in the ordered world. The Gospels thus present Jesus encountering a stream of ritually impure and potentially polluting people, but in the encounter their contagion does not defile Jesus; rather, his holiness purges their pollution, renders them clean (Neyrey, 111, 124), and integrates them again into the mainstream of Jewish society where they can reclaim their birthright, as it were, among the people of God.

Second, Jesus does not guard against the defilement that pollutes by entering the mouth nearly as carefully as do some of his contemporaries. He eats with sinners and tax collectors whose observance of purity codes may be quite loose (Mk 2:15); he shares a meal with crowds of thousands, never raising the question of their suitability for table fellowship (Mk 6:37-40; 8:1-10). An important controversy story (Mt 15:1-20; Mk 7:1-23) focuses on the question of pollution entering through the mouth. When the Pharisees, who rinsed their hands before eating as a safeguard against pollution, observe Jesus' disciples eating without following this rite, they challenge Jesus (Mt 15:2) for not teaching his disciples an adequate way of preserving purity. Jesus responds by remapping purity and pollution along ethical lines: "It is not what goes into the mouth that defiles a person, but it is what comes out of the mouth that defiles" (Mt 15:11). Jesus further explains to his disciples that what comes out of the mouth comes from the heart of a person. Speech defiles if that speech suggests sins, destroys reputations, and pollutes relationships; this is the defilement to guard against (Mt 17:19).

Mark's version of this episode is even more radical. Matthew leaves the debate poised against the value of the hand-rinsing purification (Mt 15:20), but Mark's Jesus overturns the dietary regulations as a whole. Here Jesus' rebuttal to the Pharisees is "There is nothing outside a person that by going in can defile, but the things that come out are what defile" (Mk 7:15). It is vice or sin that defiles a person, whether spoken, enacted or merely thought or desired. Mark further interprets this to mean that since true defilement comes from ethical failure, regulations concerning clean and unclean foods are pointless distractions ("Thus he declared all foods clean" [Mk 7:19]).

Prioritizing personal ethics over external pollution in terms of being clean in God's sight reappears in Jesus' denunciation of the scribes and Pharisees' practice of cleaning "the outside of the cup and of the plate" when "inside they are full of greed and self-indulgence" (Mt 23:25-26). The cup and the plate become images for the Pharisees themselves, who strictly observe bodily purifications but, Jesus suggests, are polluted inwardly by greed and slavery to the passions. Jesus censures them for not pursuing the inner, ethical cleansing that alone makes the outward purificatory rites meaningful. Luke's version of this saying is more radical: Jesus tells the scribes to "give for alms that which is inside" (i.e., to reverse the practice of robbery and greed), after which "everything will be clean for you" (Lk 11:37-41). The emerging principle is that ridding oneself of ethical vice is the necessary cleansing, increasingly the only observance of clean and unclean that God requires.

Third, Jesus does not observe the sacredness of times to the satisfaction of certain other Jews, performing (or allowing his disciples to perform) activities not deemed proper to the Sabbath by his contemporaries. Jesus enters into debate about what profanes or sanctifies the Sabbath on two points. The first involves human comfort and hardship when a group of Pharisees censure his disciples for profaning the Sabbath by gathering grain from a field. Jesus responds first by implication that he and his disciples have embarked upon a holy mission for God as had David and his soldiers, and so they are freed from ordinary restrictions and are carrying on holy work just as the priests do in the temple, offering sacrifices (i.e., working) in the temple even on the Sabbath day (Mt 12:3-6; cf. Num 28:9-10). Jesus adds a second appeal to the principle of mercy (Mt 12:7; cf. Hos 6:6), which Mark reflects in the saying "The Sabbath was made for humankind, and not humankind for the Sabbath" (Mk 2:27). The Sabbath is not being sanctified if it means hardship for human beings; it is to be a day of joy and rest, and if that means preparing a meal rather than feeling pangs of hunger, so be it.

The second debate is much more prominent in all four Gospels. Several different Jewish voices challenge the appropriateness of performing a work of healing on the Sabbath (Pharisees in Mt 12:10, 14; a synagogue leader in Lk 13:14). A healer could heal on Friday or Sunday just as easily without having to violate the Sabbath (Lk 13:14). Jesus rejects this position, framing an argument from the lesser to the greater to show its absurdity. The Pharisees (or the synagogue leader) would agree that providing one's animals with basic care or helping them out of distress was acceptable on the Sabbath. How much more, then, it should be acceptable to help the more valuable creatures (Abraham's daughters and sons [Lk 13:16]) out of distress on that day. Compassion remains the trumping value. For Jesus, the doing of good is always timely, while the withholding of good is an evil work that defiles the Sabbath (Lk 6:9).

The similar debate in John 5:10-11, 17-18 adds an important dimension to this discussion, asking what it means to be in line with God's rhythms with regard to time. The Sabbath reflected God's own rhythm of work and rest in the first week of creation, so that Sabbath observance was understood as a way of moving with God through the cycles of life. Jesus brings a new dimension to this, claiming that God is still working, even working on the Sabbath, to bring healing to people (Jn 5:17; see also Jn 9:3-4, 16 on "God's works"), and so Jesus claims to move truly in step with God's rhythms. Acts of compassion are never "out of season," and time is hallowed not by abstaining from such acts but rather by their performance. In this episode, however, Jesus goes further than healing on the Sabbath: he orders the man, "Stand up, take your mat and walk"—that is, to carry a burden on the Sabbath (forbidden in Jer 17:19-27; Neh 13:15-21). The evangelist's point is clear: following Jesus will mean contravening Jewish purity maps, but such contravention is required in witness to what God is working in the present through Jesus and the community of Jesus' followers.

The early Christians also radically changed the Jewish maps of sacred space, largely depicting the replacement of the Jerusalem temple as sacred space with new configurations of sacred space located in the individual believer, the community of Christians, and the presently unseen realm of God. This innovation has its roots in Jesus' ministry. Jesus clearly assumes the holiness of the Jerusalem temple (see Mt 23:16-21); in fact, in his view it is the priestly aristocracy who have insufficiently recognized the temple's sanctity. His high view of the holiness of the temple leads him to drive the money changers and merchants from the "court of the Gentiles" (or, perhaps more properly for the first century A.D., "the court open to people from all races" [4 Macc 4:11]), thus from the sacred precincts where such business dealings are "out of place." He indicts the temple authorities for sanctioning the profanation of holy space (Mt 21:12-13) and thus hindering God's purposes for that space, which will be fulfilled now not in that space but rather in the new community of the disciples, who will be sent to bring all the nations to the "worship of the one God" (Mt 28:19-20) (see Temple Act).

Mark interprets Jesus' overturning of the tables as a symbolic announcement of the temple's desanctification on account of the priests' abuses. He underscores this by placing the episode of indictment of the temple within the interpretive framework of the story of the cursing of the fig tree. Just as Jesus came to inspect the fig tree, whose leaves gave the sign of being fruitful, at a time when one would not expect such an inspection ("for it was not the season for figs" [Mk 11:13]), so Jesus came to the bustling temple to inspect its fruits. Finding none on the tree, he cursed it, and after a short while it withered away. Finding none in the temple, he effectively curses it in his indictment and shortly after will predict its destruction (Mk 13:1-2). After a few decades, the temple was destroyed, and thus the Jews' sacred space was obliterated (see also Lk 21:20-24). The rending of the curtain in the temple's holy place signals its desacralization at Jesus' death in preparation for its destruction. This reading of the event contrasts the more popular and benign reading of it as a sign that the way into God's presence is now open to all. Access to the holy of holies per se is not broadened; rather, access to God's favor and forgiveness is thereafter to be sought in the sacred spaces of the gathered disciples (Mk 11:21-25).

In John's Gospel Jesus is depicted as reconfiguring sacred spaces even more radically, setting aside limited locales of sacred space (the fixed centers of Jerusalem and Mount Gerizim) in favor of sacred space that opens up wherever people worship God "in spirit and in truth" (Jn 4:21-23). Moreover, at the indictment of the Jerusalem temple (which now opens rather than closes Jesus' public ministry), Jesus announces a new sacred space that replaces the Jerusalem temple (Jn 2:19-22; cf. Mk 14:58): Jesus' body, crucified and raised from the dead.

Jesus was not unconcerned about purity. But he redefines, and claims the "authority to redefine, what is clean and unclean. In the Gospels "God's own voice explicitly legitimates Jesus as the one who has the authority and knowledge to show the way that pleases God, to reflect God's holiness in the world (Mk 1:11; 9:7 par.). As Jesus brings wholeness and cleanness to the unclean, crossing the boundaries of pure and impure without fear of defilement, so Jesus is able to redefine those boundaries.

Jesus' actions in his ministry make a deep impression on his followers. His disregard for many boundaries, and his commitment to crossing those boundaries for the sake of bringing God's mercy to others, led the church to understand that the crucial boundary of Jew and Gentile was no longer to be observed. The period after Jesus' ministry was no longer the time for protecting one's purity by avoiding contact with defiling persons; rather, it was a time for pursuing an open strategy of entering into unclean places to proclaim God's cleansing. Even as old purity lines were breaking down, new purity lines were being formed. Jesus' followers later would be called hagioi ("holy ones, saints"), set apart for God from the profane activity and associations that characterized their life as Gentiles before receiving the Holy Spirit. The definitions are new, but they are still based on, motivated by, and conceived in terms of the cultural value of purity and the fear of pollution.

See also DEMON, DEVIL, SATAN; ETHICS OF JESUS; GENTILES; HEALING; JUDAISM, COMMON; LEPROSY; PHARISEES; SABBATH; SIN, SINNER; TEMPLE; WATER.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. D. A. deSilva, Honor, Patronage, Kinship and Purity: Unlocking New Testament Culture (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2000); M. Douglas, Purity and Danger: An Analysis of Concepts of Pollution and Taboo (London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1966); T. Kazen, Jesus and Purity Halakhah: Was Jesus Indifferent to Impurity? (ConBNT 38; Stockholm: Almqvist & Wiksell, 2002); J. Klawans, Impurity and Sin in Ancient Judaism (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2000); B. Levine, Leviticus (JPSTC; Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 2003); J. Milgrom, Leviticus (3 vols.; AYB 3, 3A, 3B; New Haven: Yale University Press, 1991-2001); R. P. Nelson, Raising Up a Faithful Priest: Community and Priesthood in a Biblical Theology (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1993); J. Neusner, "The Idea of Purity in Ancient Judaism," JAAR 43 (1975) 15-26; J. H. Neyrey, "The Idea of Purity in Mark's Gospel," Semeia 35 (1986) 91-128; J. J. Pilch, "Biblical Leprosy and Body Symbolism," BTB 11 (1981) 108-13; J. Riches, "Jesus and the Law of Purity," in Jesus and the Transformation of Judaism (New York: Seabury, 1982) 112-44; E. P. Sanders, Judaism: Practice and Belief, 63 BCE-66 CE (Philadelphia: Trinity Press International, 1992).

D. A. deSilva

CLEANSING OF THE TEMPLE. See TEMPLE ACT.

COMMANDMENT

Since Jesus was a Jew faithful to his tradition, his commitment to the commands of *God is understandable and expected. So central were these commands to him that he explained how none should ever be changed or broken (Mt 5:18-19). This attitude compares well with prevailing Jewish notions in the same era. "Commands" (Heb. mišwōt) appears 180 times in the OT and is first used in Genesis 26:5 with Abraham. Eventually Judaism (Rabbi Akiba) concluded that there were 613 commands from God, and they formed the center of religious piety and were frequently organized around the Decalogue. In Jesus' day it was not unusual to see Jewish tombs and sarcophagi marked with the Greek inscription "one who loved the commandments." This is the same sentiment found in Psalm 119:97. By the age of thirteen, Jesus was expected to be responsible for knowing and obeying the "commands" of God (m. 'Abot 5:25). (In later Jewish tradition the Talmud formalized the duty of the thirteen-year-old, but it was not until the Middle Ages that the well-known ritual of the Bar Mitzvah evolved, whereby a boy became a "son of the commandments.")

1. Usage
2. Authenticity
3. Matthew and Mark
4. Luke
5. John
6. Summary

1. Usage.

The most common term representing the idea of a "command" (particularly, a command of God) is the Greek word entolē. In most cases the LXX uses entolē to translate the Hebrew mišwā (root šwh). In the NT entolē occurs sixty-seven times, twenty-six of these in the Gospels. The verbal form, entellō ("to command"), occurs eleven times in the Gospels.

"Command" occurs throughout the Gospels (Matthew 6x; Mark 6x; Luke 4x; John 10x), and in most cases, with few exceptions (Lk 15:29; Jn 11:57), it refers to a binding, authoritative command from God. The Synoptic uses of the term belong to only three passages: (1) the discussion about ritual defilement (Mt 15:1-20 // Mk 7:1-23); (2) the rich man and Jesus (Mt 19:16-22 // Mk 10:17-22 // Lk 18:18-23); and (3) the discussion about the greatest commandment (Mt 22:34-40 // Mk 12:28-34 // Lk 10:25-28). Three uses are incidental (Lk 1:6; 15:29; 23:56), and two are unique: a discussion about *divorce (Mk 10:5), and one use in the *Sermon on the Mount (Mt 5:19). John's ten uses are important and will require a separate treatment.

2. Authenticity.

Even skeptical critics of the Gospels have confidence in the authenticity of many of these sayings from Jesus. They point to multiple attestation because in particular the *love command appears in Mark, Q and John. But today these arguments have shifted to context. In the current debates about the authenticity of the words and deeds of Jesus scholars work to reconstruct the context of first-century A.D. *Judaism and there find a convincing platform for the sayings of Jesus. And here many have found that Jesus' discussions about fidelity to the law and its commands resonate well with Jewish debates in the first century A.D.

The use of OT law in Qumran as well as in apocryphal and pseudepigraphical literature, Philo and *Josephus indicates that Judaism was debating the nature of faithful piety within its legal framework (so Esser; Schrenk; Sanders; Keener, 1999; France). Many teachers sought a comprehensive rule by which life could be guided, while others spent exhaustive effort cataloguing and weighing specific commands. The former were willing to discuss the “great laws” that might govern life completely, and here discussion often moved to the importance of Deuteronomy 6:5 and Leviticus 19:18, two texts cited by Jesus in Mark 12:29-31. E. P. Sanders notes, “The law was meant to be interiorized, taken into the heart and observed naturally because one’s heart was right” (Sanders, 213). On the other hand, some would work to quantify and measure the details of legal observance (for examples, see Keener 1999, 551). And this effort eventually would result in the Mishnah, a comprehensive treatment of Jewish ethical casuistry (see Rabbinic Traditions and Writings).

This is perhaps our most basic insight into a concern belonging to Jesus. He was willing to engage this debate, express his opinion and no doubt enter into public controversies with his opponents. In Matthew 23, for example, he is critical of those who weigh the relative weight of specific commands (vows anchored to the temple or its gold [Mt 23:16]). And he employs the vocabulary of this discussion to point out that if it comes to matters “weighty” and “light,” then they have missed what is most important: *justice, *mercy and *faith—high principles that for him were essential to a life devoted to the *law (Mt 23:23).

He rejected those who relaxed “the least” commands (those deemed minor on some moral scale [Mt 5:19]) and criticized those who built moral casuistries. He may have found that these interests were pursuing the wrong goal. His followers were expected to achieve a righteousness that exceeded that of the “scribes and Pharisees” (Mt 5:20). He was willing to teach that a life built around God’s commands had an organizing center, and only when this was discovered could a complete righteousness be found.

But one hallmark of authenticity can be found in distinguishing marks that set Jesus apart. In each of the Gospels (as well as in Paul’s writings) the love command taken from Leviticus 19:18 is elevated beyond what we might expect. Specific citations of the verse are unknown before the Gospels, but allusions to it among Jewish teachers were common (Dunn; Keener 2009; Meier). Jesus takes this verse and moves it to the center of his teaching.

3. Matthew and Mark.

The first two Gospels are quite close in their treatment of the law and its commands, and both contain three very similar passages. Matthew’s interest in the law is well known. He alone, for instance, uses the term anomia (“lawlessness”) as an exhortation to those who willfully ignore God’s commands (Mt 7:23; 13:41; 23:28; 24:12). In Matthew every use of entolē refers to a command of God, and his interest in righteousness (dikaiois [17x]) is almost double that of the other Gospels. For these two gospels, and particularly for Matthew, therefore, obedience to God’s commands is essential to the meaning of *discipleship. This is likely an echo of the Jewish milieu that informs the context of Jesus and his ministry.

3.1. Ritual Defilement (Mt 15:1-20 // Mk 7:1-23).

When Jesus is approached (Matthew: *Pharisees and *scribes; Mark: Pharisees) about matters of ritual defilement (in this case, unwashed hands), his objection indicates his principle concern. According to Jesus, the point of the law is not in the extended legislation of its details (which he refers to as “your tradition”), because in this very legislation the truest command of God may be lost altogether. Mark explains the ritual obsession with utensil purity so well known from this period (Mk 7:3-4). Beginning about 150 B.C. and ending approximately A.D. 70, Judaism was deeply committed to ritual washing and rules for purity (see Clean and Unclean). Matthew details how even a command from the Decalogue can be made void by a tradition that skirts its intent (Mt 15:5-6). Matthew’s most interesting departure from Mark is his omission of Mark 7:19: “In saying this, Jesus declared all foods clean” (cf. Mt 15:18-20). This may well reflect Matthew’s sensitivity to the ongoing value of Jewish law and tradition (cf. Mt 5). Nevertheless, Matthew is cautious with a promotion of law as an end in itself. Matthew 23, though not referring to entolē, shares this same conceptual space. Jesus is angered at how the desires of God can be bypassed while religious legislation (“traditions”) is held fast. In both Gospels the same point is made: Matthew summarizes: “And why do you transgress the commandment of God for the sake of your tradition?” (Mt 15:3). Mark is similar: “You have let go of the commands of God and are holding on to human traditions” (Mk 7:8). Here the command of God is a direction for life that cannot be annulled or abridged by human legislation.

3.2. The Rich Man (Mt 19:16-22 // Mk 10:17-22; Mt 19:16-22 [// Lk 18:18-23]). The second uses of entolē appear in the pericope (which Luke shares) of a wealthy man who inquires about eternal life. His question centers on the particularity of his actions in life: “What good deed must I do?” When Jesus directs him to “the commandments,” matters are still not clear. The “commands of God” should be the focus of his energies, and in this case Jesus recites a portion of the Decalogue. The man’s further question implies that he is looking for the very sort of ethical prescription that Jesus will not give. Jesus’ directive (“Sell everything and follow me!”) once again reveals Jesus’ typical answer. The command of God is a comprehensive command, not a series of prescriptions.

That the Decalogue cannot be used as such a casuistic moral list is clear in Matthew’s rendering of the story. Each list ends with the fifth commandment, but then Matthew adds Leviticus 19:18 (“love your neighbor as yourself”) as included in Jesus’ list. This is the springboard for Jesus’ subsequent teaching. Giving wealth to the poor is grounded in the higher principle of loving one’s neighbor.

3.3. The Greatest Commandment (Mt 22:34-40 // Mk 12:28-34 [// Lk 10:25-28]). No doubt the most important use of entolē is found in the Synoptic discussion of a lawyer’s query about “the greatest” or “most important” command. Mark provides a lengthy treatment that mirrors Matthew closely. Luke’s parallel is a conflation with the story of the rich man (Mk 10:17-22). Luke records the lawyer asking about eternal life. Even though Matthew/Mark and Luke launch the pericope differently, all three narratives arrive at the same result.

Here the background of moral casuistry is essential, particularly for Matthew and Mark. Jewish teachers commonly tested each other with questions such as this, and in this case Jesus is presented with a classic dilemma of law. Surely not all laws could be equally important: some must be “weighty,” others “light” (cf. m. ’Abot 2:1; in b. Menah. 43b Rabbi Meir discusses the significance of neglecting particular thread colors in the ritual fringes attached to garments).

The danger in the sort of moral speculation invited by the lawyer is that it creates an ethical hierarchy weighing the slightest details of religious behavior. Some commands of God may enjoy an unwarranted precedence over others. Jesus therefore presses toward “first principles.” In Matthew 23:23 he uses language common to this discussion: there are indeed weighty matters that deserve close attention. Jesus finds this in the command to love. He takes the so-called double command of love—love God and love neighbor—from Deuteronomy 6:5 and Leviticus 19:18 respectively. In Matthew the wording follows the LXX almost exactly.

The two commands were not uncommon among Jewish teachers (T. Iss. 5:2: “Love the Lord and your neighbor” [also T. Iss. 7:6]; T. Dan 5:3: “Throughout all your life, love the Lord, and one another with a true heart”). The first command derives from Deuteronomy 6:4 and was a part of the sacred Shema, the creed recited by pious Jews twice daily. Such love for God was the key to fulfilling the entire law. The second command (loving one’s neighbor) came from Leviticus 19:18. Here in the Gospel the two are connected by the rabbinic principle of gezerah shavah (“equal category”), in which two texts could be connected through their use of a common word. In this case, it was the imperative to love.

Jesus’ distinctive teaching is found in his conclusion. Mark records, “There is no commandment greater than these” (Mk 12:31 TNIV). Matthew writes, “All the Law and the Prophets hang on these two commandments” (Mt 22:40 TNIV). Luke provides no concluding reinforcement. This “love command” from Jesus becomes his first principle in his teaching (see Mt 5:43) and no doubt was remembered as what was characteristic of him. In Romans 13:9 Paul recites the Decalogue precisely as Jesus does in these verses and then draws in the same summary: “He who loves his neighbor has fulfilled the law.”

Matthew in particular underscores the importance of command and obedience. His presentation of Jesus begins with overt comparisons to Moses the great lawgiver (Mt 5:17-20), and it ends with Jesus exhortation “Obey all that I have commanded you.” If the double command to love was at the heart of Jesus’ ethics, Matthew is a short step from emphases in John’s Gospel. The pursuit of the law and its righteousness must be centered in a profound love of God and a profound love of one another.

4. Luke.

Attention to this motif in Luke’s Gospel is surprisingly limited (with the exception of the story of the rich man in Lk 18:18-23 [see 3.2 above]). The term entolē does not form the basis of an ethical command. It refers to the law generically (Lk 1:6; 23:56) or refers to an order given from one person to the next (Lk 15:29; cf. Lk 4:10). Luke knows the discussion about the “double command” and mentions it (Lk 10:27) but does not press home its full implications as do Mark and Matthew. Perhaps his audience is not concerned about the rabbinic debates so central to the other Gospel writers.

But it is to Luke that we owe the most poignant representation of the love command. Following the discussion about the greatest command (Lk 10:25-28), Luke provides the story of the good Samaritan (Lk 10:29-37) as the premier example of what it means to show this love commanded in Leviticus 19. It ends with Jesus saying, "Go and do likewise."

5. John.

The word entolē enjoys marked attention in John. Jesus' own life was lived in obedience to the command of God (Jn 10:18; 12:49-50; 15:10b; cf. Jn 14:31). But rather than cite a command from God, the Fourth Gospel provides us with commands from Jesus. This is a natural development, given John's high *Christology. In Johannine thought, to obey Jesus is the same as obeying the Father. Obedience to Jesus' commands is also evidence of how disciples love him (Jn 14:15, 21; 15:10). But above all, the love command (echoing the Synoptic emphasis) forms the center of what Jesus requires and is a constant thread in the Johannine farewell discourse (Jn 13:34; 15:12, 17). "My command is this: Love each other as I have loved you" (Jn 15:12 TNIV).

In John 13:34 Jesus refers to this as a "new commandment." There was little new in the idea that devoted believers would love one another (see Lev 19:18), but what is new is that Jesus is the source of this command, and his life is the model of how it should be practiced. The love modeled by Jesus is a love that lays down its life for the other (Jn 10:11, 15, 17-18). Therefore, Jesus' command is for a sacrificial love that does not merely respect the needs of neighbors, but also suffers on their behalf.

6. Summary.

Jesus' treatment of the command of God consistently underscored first principles of fidelity to God's original intention and a life shaped by a disciplined devotion rather than catalogued obedience. Typically in Mark 10:1-9 his answer about divorce subverts traditions that avoid God's command as he presses the Pharisees back to God's first command in Genesis. In most cases (seen particularly in the parables) Jesus promotes a religious life for his followers grounded in a life expressed in love.

This double command of love is what set his teaching apart in the memory of the early church. In Christian ethics the "law of love" no doubt shaped what was distinctive about how the early Christians viewed their moral obligations. The "law of love" evolved into an established command directly from Jesus that would hallmark Christian discipleship (Jn 13:34-35; Rom 13:8-10; Gal 5:14; Jas 2:8; Did. 1:2; 2:7; Barn. 19:5; Gos. Thom. 25).

See also DIVORCE; ETHICS OF JESUS; JUSTICE,

RIGHTEOUSNESS; LAW; LOVE, LOVE COMMAND.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. D. C. Allison Jr., "Mark 12:28-31 and the Decalogue," in The Gospels and the Scriptures of Israel, ed. C. A. Evans and W. R. Stegner (JSNTSup 104; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1994) 270-78; M. Bockmuehl, Jewish Law in Gentile Churches: Halakhah and the Beginning of Christian Public Ethics (Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2003); R. F. Collins, "Commandment," ABD 1:1097-99; idem, "Matthew's ἐντολαί: Towards an Understanding of the Commandments in the First Gospel," in The Four Gospels 1992: Festschrift Frans Neirynck, ed. F. van Segbroeck (3 vols.; BETL 100; Leuven: Leuven University Press, 1992) 2:1325-48; J. Crossley, "Mark 7.1-23: Revisiting the Question of 'All Foods Clean,'" in The Torah in the New Testament: Papers Delivered at the Manchester-Lausanne Seminar of June 2008, ed. M. Tait and P. Oakes (LNTS 410; London: T & T Clark, 2009); J. D. G. Dunn, Jesus Remembered (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2003); H. H. Esser, "ἐντολή," NIDNTT 1:331-39; N. Filip, "The Double Commandment of Love in Lk 10,27: A Deuteronomistic Pillar or Lukan Redaction of Mk 12,29-33?" in Scriptures in the Gospels, ed. C. M. Tuckett (BETL 131; Leuven: Leuven University Press, 1997) 559-70; R. T. France, The Gospel of Matthew (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2007); D. A. Hagner, Matthew 1-13 (WBC 33A; Dallas: Word, 1993); R. B. Hays, The Moral Vision of the New Testament: Community, Cross, New Creation; A Contemporary Introduction to New Testament Ethics (San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1996); C. Keener, A Commentary on the Gospel of Matthew (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1999); idem, The Historical Jesus of the Gospels (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2009); M. Limbeck, "ἐντολή," EDNT 1:459-60; W. Loader, Jesus' Attitude Towards the Law: A Study of the Gospels (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2002); idem, "Attitudes to Judaism and the Law and Synoptic Relations," in New Studies in the Synoptic Problem: Oxford Conference, April 2008; Essays in Honour of Christopher M. Tuckett, ed. P. Foster et al. (BETL 239; Leuven: Peeters, 2011) 347-69; J. P. Meier, A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus, 4: Law and Love (New Haven: Yale University Press, 2009) 478-646; E. P. Sanders, Judaism: Practice and Belief, 63 BCE-66 CE (Philadelphia: Trinity Press International, 1992); G. Schrenk, "ἐντολή, ἐντέλλομαι," TDNT 2:544-46; K. Snodgrass, "Matthew and the Law," in Treasures New and Old: Recent Contributions to Matthean Studies, ed. D. R. Bauer and M. A. Powell (SBLSymS 1; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1996) 99-127.

G. M. Burge

COMMISSIONING OF DISCIPLES. See APOSTLE.

COMMUNITY. See CHURCH.

CREATOR. See GOD.

CRITERIA OF AUTHENTICITY

The criteria of authenticity have been an important part of Jesus research from the early part of the twentieth century. They represent a form of historiography that is relatively unique to NT studies, in that they purport to identify a variety of criteria by which to render historical judgments regarding the authenticity or inauthenticity of actions and sayings of Jesus.

1. History of Development
2. The Traditional Criteria
3. New Developments in Criteria Research

1. History of Development.

Treatment of the criteria of authenticity is often hampered by a failure to discuss them in the context of their origins and development (for historical surveys, see Schillebeeckx, 62-100; Theissen and Winter; Porter 2000). Instead, most treatments of the criteria present them synoptically in their fully developed forms (e.g., Walker; McEleney; Barbour; Stein; Polkow; McKnight 1988; Meier, 167-95; Evans 1995, 13-26; 1996, 127-46; Shin, 135-220). This is potentially misleading because it gives the impression that the criteria do not reflect contemporary issues in Jesus research that led to their development and refinement, but that they emerged fully formed or, perhaps worse still, were part of a package of criteria that existed independently of the issues to which they were addressed.

The use of criteria to discuss Jesus goes back to the early church itself. For example, when Tertullian distinguishes among the four Gospels, he attributes some to the *apostles and others to apostolic men, and he criticizes Marcion for having used Luke's Gospel, written by an apostolic man (Tertullian, Marc. 4.2, 5). This criterion distinguishes reliability on the basis of proximate authorship, with the implication that the apostles as followers of Jesus were more closely associated with the events than those who were not. Eusebius mentions that Papias speaks of Matthew writing logia (statements) of Jesus in the "Hebrew" dialect (Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 3.39.16). This criterion attributes authentic words of Jesus in Matthew to a Semitic-language Gospel, as reflecting the original or first language of Jesus. Irenaeus, in his description of the fourfold Gospel, attributes each to one of the corners of the universe (Irenaeus, Haer. 3.11.8-9), and Clement of Alexandria refers to John's Gospel as the "spiritual Gospel" (Clement, Hypotyposesis, cited in Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 6.14). Irenaeus makes a distinction between four different Gospels while maintaining their basic similarity (and suitability to be in a gathering of four), while Clement is noting a distinction between John's Gospel and the other three. The shared assumption is that there is a coherence to the Gospel accounts, which multiply attest to the actions and words of Jesus.

Several of the criteria still used in Jesus research gained important impetus during the Renaissance and Reformation. G. Theissen and D. Winter trace the criterion of dissimilarity—authentic Jesus tradition is dissimilar to either the early church or Judaism of the time (see 2.1 below for further discussion)—back at least to Martin Luther, who differentiated authentic material about Christ from what was said by the Jews or the Gentiles (double dissimilarity) (Theissen and Winter, 261). Other well-known figures in Jesus research who used forms of this criterion before the rise of form criticism include H. S. Reimarus, W. M. Leberecht de Wette, D. F. Strauss, G. Dalman, A. von Harnack, J. Weiss, P. Schmiedel, A. Schweitzer, A. Jülicher, H. Holtzmann, J. Weiss and W. Heitmüller, among many others (see Theissen and Winter, 261-75; cf. Porter 2009). Employing perhaps a form of the criterion of embarrassment, or at least a form of dissimilarity, T. Morgan (publishing in 1738-1740) distinguished between how the church represented Jesus and the reality (Theissen and Winter, 263). In the sixteenth century, some scholars recognized that the Gospels, though written in Greek, reflected translations from the original Semitic language of Jesus, which came to be identified as Aramaic (or Chaldean). Rudimentary forms of the Semitic-language criterion (though not always Aramaic) were made by people such as T. Beza (Casey, 3), J. J. Scaliger and B. Walton (Schweitzer, 270-71).

Despite these earlier origins, especially in conjunction with the rise of historical criticism, the traditional criteria of authenticity reached the apex of their development and exemplification in the early to middle parts of the twentieth century, and especially in relation to the development of form criticism and its resulting legacy in Germany.

2. The Traditional Criteria.

The number of traditional criteria identified by scholars varies significantly. Here I identify seven traditional criteria that have been utilized in various configurations over at least the last one hundred years. Not all of these criteria are utilized by all scholars of the historical Jesus. Because of problems and shortcomings with a number of these traditional criteria—not least that they have not been able to establish an agreed-upon body of authentic Jesus material (see the criticisms below)—some of these criteria have been called into question, and further criteria have been developed in an attempt to be able to establish this authentic Jesus tradition. As a result, a number of scholars have differentiated the criteria, between those that are valid or primary criteria and those that are invalid or secondary (e.g., Meier; Schillebeeckx; Evans 1997b; cf. Polkow). With the invalidation of some criteria, others have been proposed. Whereas the number of criteria that have been identified is theoretically quite large, this list encompasses the majority usually employed in Jesus research. In the next section I present several more recently introduced criteria.

2.1. Double Dissimilarity. Although its origins and use go back much earlier, the criterion of double dissimilarity reached its apex during the form-critical era. Form criticism had shown that individual units of tradition were shaped during transmission by the church, so that any Gospel tradition that cohered with church tradition was suspect as to authenticity. Similarly, since Jesus was a Jew, one could not depend on Gospel tradition that cohered with early Judaism as being authentic either. The result was the criterion of double dissimilarity. Thus, it is appropriate that form critics such as R. Bultmann almost tacitly relied upon this criterion. For example, in his discussion of Jesus' similitudes, he counts those as genuine that are in contrast to Jewish thought and do not have Christian characteristics (Bultmann 1968, 205), although this formulation is introduced in a casual way. When E. Käsemann rejuvenated German form-critical Jesus research, he went further than his teacher Bultmann when he declared that only one criterion can satisfy the requirements for providing authentic Jesus material: it provides no foundation either in the Judaism of the time or early Christianity (Käsemann, 36-37). The fundamental importance of this criterion is seen in the fact that both the liberal scholar N. Perrin, who averred that only material that is dissimilar to Judaism and the early church can be ascribed to Jesus (Perrin 1970, 71), and the conservative scholar M. Hengel, who used this criterion to establish the authenticity of Jesus' statement in Matthew 8:22 regarding the dead burying the dead (Hengel 1981, 5), both used the same method.

Such a widely used criterion has attracted significant negative response. Some note that this criterion cannot define what is authentic Jesus material but can only dispute material already identified as authentic. Thus, the material that makes its way through the fine sieve may result in a critically established body of authentic material, but it is a critically assured minimum that results in a minimalist Jesus who is distinct from both of his primary cultures. Thus, the criterion, in being asked to do so much, provides so little (Meyer 1979, 86). It is hard to know how this Jesus would have been understood in the ancient world, as he is far from being a fully developed person. Further, the criterion itself equivocates over the concept of dissimilarity and utilizes degrees of dissimilarity rather than dissimilarities in kind. There is a significant amount of commonality within the Jesus tradition, and so dissimilarity becomes a relative term of approximation. Within its terms of reference, the scope of this criterion is confined to the general content of Jesus' words but does not address the actual words of Jesus. This is because the criterion functions in response to patterns of thought. Further, the criterion is dependent for its success on the depth of knowledge of the Jewish and early Christian worlds of the first century A.D. Scholarship has to admit that knowledge of both early Judaism and early Christianity is far from being comprehensive enough to be able to define with certainty the full extent of their beliefs. Inevitably, as a result, the criterion is often said to favor either the Jewish or early Christian contexts, on the basis of one's extent of knowledge. The result is that some scholars have adopted only a single dissimilarity criterion, in relation to the early church, which provides no guidance in relation to early Judaism. This criterion is also thought to be limited in scope because it confines itself to Judaism and the early church while neglecting virtually entirely the Greco-Roman world of the first century A.D., another important context for Jesus. Finally, there has been a question whether the criterion is even relevant for establishing authentic Jesus material at all, since it is formulated around the identification of dissimilarity and dissimilarity alone (Holmén).

2.2. Least Distinctiveness. This criterion is closely related to the rise of form criticism because it depends upon defining the rules of transmission of the various Gospel literary forms, such as *parables, *miracle stories and pronouncement stories. The criterion of least distinctiveness assumes that the various literary forms have identifiable structures and that they follow various rules of stylistic development, treated almost as “laws” of transmission. These rules include such tendencies as the growth and expansion of a tradition, the addition of detail, the deletion of Semitisms, the addition of direct discourse to a narrative, and conflation of multiple accounts. Knowing these rules, one can theoretically separate the authentic from the inauthentic Jesus material within the individual forms on the basis of the most distinctive material that embraces the above changes reflecting later secondary additions, while the least distinctive material reflects the primary literary form. The least distinctive material, therefore, has the greater claim to being authentic Jesus material. Bultmann, for example, contends that the basic elements of a given account, such as its major point and its basic structure, are faithfully preserved during transmission, but that numerous insignificant details are altered in the course of retelling (Bultmann 1960, 41-42). He was followed in his use of this criterion by other form critics such as M. Dibelius and V. Taylor.

The criterion of least distinctiveness has been criticized on two major fronts, one a general and the other a specific criticism. The first, general objection is the recognition that the transmission of traditions in oral cultures is far more complex than the form critics realized (see Orality and Oral Transmission). Significant research into transmissional tendencies in ancient and modern epic-type poetry has indicated that the process of reciting and conveying accounts is far more complex and is not the regularized process that had been posited by form criticism. The second criticism focuses more specifically upon the transmissional patterns found in the Gospels themselves. E. P. Sanders critically assessed the various proposed “laws” of transformation said by form critics to be operative in the Gospels. The criteria that he assesses include those regarding increasing length and increasing detail of later accounts, the elimination of Semitisms, the tendency to utilize direct discourse, and the tendency toward conflation of competing accounts. On the basis of analysis of the Gospels themselves, as well as postcanonical literature, Sanders concludes that, to the contrary, there are “no hard and fast laws of the development of the Synoptic tradition” (Sanders 1969, 272). There are instead competing tendencies that pull against each other. In fact, he goes further and observes that on “all counts the tradition developed in opposite directions” (Sanders 1969, 272). In light of these difficulties, this traditional criterion is not used as much as it once was.

2.3. Coherence or Consistency. Even though the concepts of coherence and consistency can be differentiated, they are placed together here because usually they are conflated in Jesus research. This criterion is also important in the development of *form criticism because it addresses the nature of the individual literary forms and their relation to the larger Jesus tradition. This criterion essentially contends that Jesus tradition that coheres or is consistent with already established authentic Jesus material should thereby also be considered authentic. Proponents of this criterion include Bultmann in his treatment of the *eschatological sayings of Jesus, in which such statements were evaluated according to whether they cohered with Jesus’ eschatological perspective found elsewhere (Jesus’ eschatological orientation was considered one of the firm results of scholarship) (Bultmann 1968, 105). *Parables research has made widespread use of this criterion, as eschatology has been one of the important factors to consider in assessing their authenticity. C. H. Dodd and J. Jeremias (Jeremias 1972 [orig. 1947]) have been followed in their use of this criterion by many since, such as N. Perrin (Perrin 1967) and C. E. Carlston. This criterion continues to be widely used in Jesus research because of its expansive opportunities. This criterion provides for a means of adding to, rather than subtracting from, authentic tradition once a firm minimum of authentic Jesus material is established on the basis of other criteria.

Despite the continued widespread use of the criterion of coherence or continuity, a number of criticisms have been directed at it. For example, M. D. Hooker, in trenchant critiques of the use of the criteria (Hooker 1970; 1972), points out the highly subjective interpretive nature of such a criterion, as it depends upon being able to define and then utilize highly problematic notions. What may appear to be coherent or consistent for one scholar may seem to lack coherence or consistency when examined by another. The basis of common appeal to adjudicate such disagreements is unclear. A further criticism of this criterion is that it must, in effect, assume the conclusion that it wishes to find. In other words, this criterion is dependent upon being able first—and by some other criterion—to establish what constitutes authentic Jesus tradition, by which one is then able to test the further coherence or consistency of other tradition. A third limitation is that this criterion is at best only a secondary and dependent criterion, not a primary and constructive one. That is, this criterion is wholly dependent upon other criteria by which the established core of authentic material is established, against which other tradition is judged. It therefore is dependent for its results upon not only the means by which coherence and consistency are judged, but also the quality of the other criteria used to establish the core authentic tradition. It is vulnerable to a cascading effect regarding authenticity if the core material is shown to be inauthentic. This raises a further question regarding how this criterion can establish authenticity of material when it cannot actually propose and establish genuinely authentic material, and how it is that the other criteria cannot be used in place of this criterion, as they are primary criteria. Finally, since this criterion is used to expand the body of authentic material already recognized as genuine, this raises the legitimate question of why virtually everything in the Gospel tradition is not counted as authentic, as this material already arguably coheres with or is consistent with the other Gospel material by virtue of inclusion.

2.4. Multiple Attestation or Cross-Section Method. This is one of few criteria not first widely promoted by German form criticism in the first half of the twentieth century. It was instead more rigorously developed in earlier English-language scholarship, before finding more widespread adoption in form criticism and later redaction criticism. There is a noticeable difference in orientation of this criterion compared to those closely associated with German form criticism. Whereas German criteria are often minimalistic, such as double dissimilarity, the criterion of multiple attestation or cross-section is more optimistic and maximalist in its orientation. This criterion has two different conceptualizations: the first is reliant upon independently attested traditions in which authentic material is found in a cross-section of these sources, and the second, later form is dependent upon multiple literary forms even within the same sources. The criterion of multiple attestation or cross-section, developed by F. C. Burkitt on the basis of comparison of Mark and Q and adopted and extended by others (e.g., Manson), attempts to provide an external starting point for determining authentic material by drawing upon the main, independent sources that make up the Synoptic Gospels. These sources now usually include the Gospel of Mark, the non-Markan tradition common to Matthew and Luke known as Q, independent material unique to Matthew (M), and independent material unique to Luke (L). Some later research has posited John's Gospel as a fifth independent source, and some have wished to include extracanonical sources, such as the agrapha of Jesus, the Gospel of Thomas, and other apocryphal Gospel sources. Thus material that is multiply attested in these independent sources is considered to be authentic Jesus material. Dodd was responsible for focusing this criterion upon independent literary forms even within the same sources. Rather than examining the major sources of the Gospel accounts, Dodd posited that material found in two or more of the literary forms of the Jesus tradition (such as aphorisms, parables, sayings, dialogues, miracles stories) is early and may be authentic (Dodd, 26-29). Thus Jesus' pronouncements on the *kingdom of God are deemed authentic because they are found in multiple literary forms. The first form of this criterion dependent upon the major sources of the Gospel tradition continues to be widely used, but the second less so.

There are at least four significant criticisms of this criterion. The first is that it can arrive only at approximate conclusions and not specific conclusions regarding the words of Jesus. This criticism can be made of several of the criteria but especially of this one. Because it relies upon separate and in some ways disparate accounts, this criterion at best can establish general themes reflected in the independent traditions and cannot establish particular wording, such as a saying of Jesus. A second criticism, and one especially directed at Dodd's use of literary forms, involves the difficulty in defining and regularizing the various literary forms. The result can be a multiplication of literary forms in the interest of establishing independent forms to establish authenticity. A third criticism is that this criterion establishes a procedure by which the various sources or literary forms are used, but it does not provide a means of assessing the reliability of the sources themselves. The criterion has been thus building an edifice of multiply attested Jesus tradition upon a foundation that may or may not be reliable. The criterion itself does not establish a means of assessing that reliability. The fourth and final criticism of this criterion is that it is, in its most widely used form, dependent upon a particular view of the Synoptic problem and the relationships of the Gospels. This position asserts Markan priority, the existence of Q, and, in its later form, independent M and L material, besides a particular independent relationship of John's Gospel and other sources to the Synoptic sources. If this theory of Gospel relationships does not hold, the results of multiple attestation are directly and seriously affected.

2.5. Semitic Language Phenomena and/or Palestinian Environmental Features. This criterion has been developed in two distinct forms, with the major form drawing upon Semitic- and in particular Aramaic-language features, and the minor form upon Palestinian environmental features. For both, the assertion is that Jesus tradition that demonstrates these Semitic- or Aramaic-language phenomena or Palestinian environmental features is more likely to be authentic than material that does not evidence them. In other words, various Semitisms, such as the use of particular phrases (e.g., “son of man”), vocabulary or other constructions, indicate that the material originated in a Semitic environment. Features such as references to practices, customs, *geography or beliefs of first-century A.D. Palestine similarly indicate an origin of the episode or words within that environment. This criterion have been widely used in the modern era of Jesus research, including by figures such as A. Meyer, G. Dalman, C. F. Burney and C. Torrey, and more recently J. Jeremias (Jeremias 1955), M. Black, J. A. Fitzmyer and M. Casey, among many others. The usual research method of many of these scholars is to determine and establish a Semitism by the scholar’s ability to retrovert what is purportedly an awkward or unusual instance of Greek back into a hypothesized Semitic original. The ease with which one can do this is thought to indicate the likelihood of its Semitic origins. A more recent development is to find dictional, thematic and even exegetical coherence with Semitic sources as a means of establishing common interpretive traditions with such sources as the Targumim (e.g., Chilton; Evans 1997a).

There have been a number of criticisms of the Semitic-language criterion, while the environmental-features version has become relatively unimportant in recent research. One criticism of the former criterion is the failure in its more recent uses to take the multilingual environment of first-century A.D. Palestine and Galilee into account (see Languages of Palestine). Although scholars such as Dalman and Fitzmyer have often recognized this linguistic context, more recent scholars have often created a bifurcation between Greek, the lingua franca of the first-century A.D. Mediterranean world, and the Semitic language, especially Aramaic, that Jesus would have spoken, without acknowledging the complex linguistic environment in which Jesus functioned. Recent research has led to recognition that Jesus was at least occasionally a Greek-language user. A second criticism concerns retroversion and the lack of criteria by which one determines the “un-Greekness” of the Gospel text and the genuineness of the Semitic reconstruction. The history of discussion of the Greek of the NT includes discovery that this Greek is part of the common (Koine) Greek used during this time, and many of the earlier supposed Semitic features, while certainly not being classical in their formulation, are part of this Koine Greek. A third criticism relates to recent thought regarding language usage. Modern lexicography and translation theory have shown that languages rarely have lexical iconicity between each other, and that translation often is complex, so that a source language might be rendered in a variety of ways in the receptor language (Hurst). Even more recently developed forms of this criterion have distinct limitations, as correlations in diction, theme and exegesis depend upon other criteria, such as coherence and the ability to establish authentic tradition, as a basis for comparison.

2.6. Embarrassment or Movement Against the Redactional Tendency. The criterion of embarrassment has had a resurgence of interest and utilization, as a number of scholars have promoted it as a means of establishing firm Jesus tradition. This criterion, though also known by a number of other names (see Polkow, 341), probably had its earliest modern formulation by Schmiedel and has been used by others, such as E. Käsemann, E. Schillebeeckx and especially J. P. Meier and D. G. A. Calvert. It possibly had its origins in Käsemann’s casual statement that authentic material does not reflect the tradition of Jewish Christianity, which had modified some Jesus tradition that was “too bold for its taste” (Käsemann 1964, 37). There are two major forms of this criterion. One formulates it as divergence from the redaction (Calvert). This means that material that is included but does not promote the author’s agenda is moving against the redactional tendency and hence is authentic. This form of the criterion is similar to the criterion of least distinctiveness noted above, and it has been used by the Scandinavian school of Jesus research (e.g., Riesenfeld; Gerhardsson; Byrskog). Meier (Meier 1991, 169) and others have rejected this formulation and preferred one that sees the authentic material as those traditions that cannot be easily attributed to creation by the early church. In other words, material that would have embarrassed the early church, such as Jesus’ baptism by John or his lack of knowledge, would have claim to be authentic.

Despite the widespread use of this criterion in recent Jesus research, it has several distinct limitations, as Meier and others have recognized. One of these is that the number of clear instances of embarrassment in the Jesus tradition is relatively small and certainly not sufficient to create an adequate portrait of Jesus. In fact, it would be a Jesus who only did or said things that would prove to be embarrassing to his early followers. A second is the difficulty in establishing what would have been embarrassing to the early church, given that we are judging on the basis of later, modern standards. A third limitation is that despite the reformulation in two different ways, this criterion even in the form that Meier and others endorse is still a form of the criterion of dissimilarity (Polkow, 341). In particular, it is a criterion of dissimilarity from the early church, but it is easily also seen as a criterion of dissimilarity from Judaism. This invokes the same limitations as noted above, in which a minimalist Jesus becomes the only Jesus whom one can endorse as authentic. This perhaps explains why Meier says that this criterion is dependent upon other criteria (Meier 1991, 171). It is dependent because, on its own, it can at best only arrive at a reduced-size Jesus, and it requires other criteria to expand the scope of authentic tradition.

2.7. Rejection and Execution or Historical Coherence. In recent Jesus research this criterion has gained in importance, so that it is considered the most important criterion by at least some, such as J. P. Meier (Meier 1991, 177) and C. A. Evans (Evans 1995, 13-15). Meier identifies it as the criterion of rejection and execution, Evans as historical coherence. This criterion states that material that coheres with the rejection and execution of Jesus, because this is an event unexpected by early Christianity, is authentic. The origins of this criterion have been traced by Evans (Evans 1995, 13) back to Sanders's (Sanders 1985, 7) treatment of the actions of Jesus, in which the authentic tradition reflects events significant enough that Jesus must have performed them so as to attract the attention of the authorities sufficient for his execution. However, this criterion is clearly also related to the criteria of coherence or consistency, embarrassment, least distinctiveness and even dissimilarity (whether single or double). Meier and Evans use this criterion in different ways. Evans, in giving it priority over the others, wishes to begin with the essential actions of Jesus as a firm platform for assessing the other actions and sayings. For Meier, the criterion is less precise in its results and instead points to the death of Jesus as the starting point for evaluating other actions or sayings that help to explain his death.

This criterion is being used in two different ways by Meier and Evans, ways that are perhaps incompatible. Evans uses this criterion in a specific way. He assumes the death of Jesus at the hands of the authorities as the basis for creating a network of related facts in relation to which any other saying or action can be considered authentic as long as it is historically coherent. Meier uses this criterion in a more abstract way, not as a means of judging individual actions or sayings within the Jesus tradition but rather as a means of drawing attention to the central importance of Jesus' death and those events that are compatible with it. Rather than being a criterion of dissimilarity, this criterion is essentially one of similarity, and hence it has many of the strengths and weaknesses of the criterion of coherence and consistency. However, the difference is that in some ways this criterion posits or assumes the core authentic tradition that forms the basis of expanding the sphere of coherent authentic material.

2.8. Historical Plausibility. The criterion of historical plausibility, though only first proposed by G. Theissen and D. Winter in 1997 (ET, Theissen and Winter 2002), is treated here because it is a reconfiguration of the major traditional criteria. Rejecting the criterion of double dissimilarity, they reformulate their criterion of historical plausibility in two parts: Jesus' relation to Judaism as a plausibility of context, and Jesus' relation to early Christianity as a plausibility of consequence. Rather than thinking disjunctively, they wish to think in probabilities and plausible scenarios for Jesus, scenarios that cannot be rejected unless one can create a more plausible one. Theissen and Winter's plausibility of context entails two traditional subcriteria: resistance to the redactional tendency and coherence. They see these as working together, whereby resistance to the redactional tendency entails events that go against the early church but are reflective of historical influence. The concept of coherence reintroduces the criterion of multiple attestation, in which multiple independent traditions attest to an earlier tradition, whether these are found in Gospel sources, literary forms or even variant forms of the same tradition. Theissen and Winter's plausibility of consequence also includes two subcriteria. The first is conformity to context, and the second contextual individuality. Again, though these appear to be antagonistic, Theissen and Winter assert their complementarity. Context requires that the things that Jesus said and did were at home within the first-century A.D. world in which he lived. However, they also want to distinguish Jesus from other charismatic figures of the time in his actions and words. Theissen and Winter claim that their criterion of historical plausibility draws together in a creative tension a contextually plausible portrait of Jesus that is also unique against his historical backdrop.

Despite the commendable effort to formulate a new criterion that moves beyond the strictures of the traditional criteria, Theissen and Winter's criterion of historical plausibility represents more a shift in emphasis than a genuine formulation of a new criterion. Thus, three major criticisms can be raised against their attempt. The first is that they have not severed their fundamental reliance upon the traditional criteria of authenticity. Even if they wish to emphasize similarity rather than dissimilarity, the shortcomings of the several criteria that they use as subcriteria remain. Thus, their criterion of plausibility is jeopardized by their reliance upon the traditional criteria of dissimilarity in several forms, coherence, and multiple attestation. Even if these criteria are considered adequate for expanding the authentic tradition, they cannot provide a substantial foundation of authentic material as the basis of further discussion. A second criticism involves the failure to make clear how to use potentially conflicting criteria, in particular dissimilarity and coherence. On the one hand, the criterion of plausibility utilizes several different types of dissimilarity criteria, while, on the other hand, arguing for coherence and similarity. Despite their claims, it is difficult to know when weight should be given to one and when to the other. The third and final criticism addresses Theissen and Winter's stated intention of offering a complex portrait of Jesus. If this is true, their restriction to the traditional criteria, even if they are repackaged in a new configuration, entails that they will create such a portrait within the confines of traditional authenticity criteria.

3. New Developments in Criteria Research.

In light of the shortcomings of the traditional criteria for determining authenticity of Jesus material, there have been a number of efforts to move beyond these criteria and propose new ways of examining the evidence. In this section I will treat four of these attempts.

3.1. Indices, Not Criteria. One of the responses to past development and continuous use of criteria is rejection of the term criterion and adoption of the term index. This apparently was first proposed by B. F. Meyer (Meyer 1979, 86-92) and was followed by several scholars, including R. Riesner (Riesner, 86-87) and, to varying degrees, S. McKnight (McKnight 1988, 66-69). Though clearly informed by traditional criteria, Meyer wishes not only to substitute one term for another but also to shift an entire historiographical framework. Jesus research has fully embraced both the terminology and the approach implied by the criteria of authenticity. As noted above, the tendency is to try to find criteria that deliver assured results regarding the Jesus tradition. Furthermore, the criteria themselves are treated as focused and specific in their formulations. Those who argue for an indexical approach find both the terminology and their formulaic utilization inappropriate for a historically based endeavor such as examination of the Gospels for authentic Jesus tradition. Scholars who believe that the term index is more informative are concerned with the methods used in historical Jesus research to establish authenticity and historicity. They are skeptical regarding the traditional notion of a criterion because they believe that the use of the term criterion and the approach that this exemplifies ask for a level of certainty that historical method, rightly understood, simply cannot deliver. The concept of criteria is used in an absolute way to indicate that there is a precise and even singular way to establish historicity, as opposed to material that is seen not to be historical. However, such criteria do not fit well within the historiographical method that relies upon forming hypotheses and testing inferences so that one can use data to establish facts. The term index is proposed as an alternative to criterion because it does not imply a constrained approach, but it does recognize that there are various factors that influence historical judgments. Historical judgments are not based on simplistic equations but instead end up being statements about probabilities, rather than assertions of certainties, on the basis of the weight of the evidence. There is much merit in the proposal that the notion of "indices" replace that of criteria. However, even for those who endorse this proposal in theory, it often is difficult to move beyond the traditional criteria, as they have been firmly enshrined in Jesus research.

3.2. Double Similarity. The criterion of double dissimilarity has been widely used in Jesus research despite the limitations of its productivity in identifying significant amounts of authentic Jesus material. The results have largely been negative. As a result, there have been several responses to it. One is complete abandonment, another is to limit it to single dissimilarity (from the church), while still another is to transform it into something else. N. T. Wright has proposed a counter to these negative conclusions of the criterion of double dissimilarity in what he calls the criterion of "double similarity" (Wright 1996, 131-33). Wright defines it as, "When something can be seen to be credible (though perhaps deeply subversive) within first-century Judaism, and credible as the implied starting-point (though not the exact replica) of something in later Christianity” (Wright 1996, 132). What he means by this is that authentic material must be credible in both first-century A.D. Judaism and as the instigation of later developments in Christianity. Wright’s perspective does transfer the balance from skepticism to optimism in sorting through Jesus tradition. To help in this process, he posits this criterion of double similarity as responding to five observations about Jesus: his fitting into first-century A.D. Judaism, his purpose of bringing Israel together, the hostility that such actions will elicit from the authorities, Jesus’ vindication and the arrival of God’s kingdom, and the theological consistency of the account.

There are two obvious drawbacks to this new proposal. The first is its clear dependence upon the traditional criteria, especially the criterion of double dissimilarity. Wright has simply reversed the formulation of his criterion of double similarity so that he is more affirming of the points of commonality, but they are still assessed in comparison with the situation in first-century A.D. Judaism and developments within early Christianity. Thus, the criticisms of double dissimilarity mentioned above may well apply here also, including the tendency to be reductionistic and to find the minimalist Jesus. The second criticism concerns the lack of means of establishing a set of core authentic material. The positive criterion of similarity cannot establish core authentic Jesus tradition. Whereas the criterion of double dissimilarity examines the Jesus tradition and then (overly) reduces it, the criterion of similarity must begin with some body of authentic material that it attempts to build upon. The criterion alone cannot provide this foundation. Wright’s use of this criterion of similarity is apparently related to his grounding of his historiographical method in the underdeveloped “critical realism” (Wright 1992, 31-46) of B. Lonergan mediated through Meyer (Meyer 1989; see also Dunn, 110-11; McKnight 2005, 26). Critical realism is an attempt to mediate between naïve realism and phenomenism. It takes a realist view of phenomena but examines them from a critical though not skeptical perspective. However, Wright’s use of Lonergan’s critical realism does not pay close attention to the warrants or justification of belief, and so it does not solve the problem of providing the basis for his view of reality (see Porter and Pitts).

3.3. Greek-language Criteria. As noted above, discussion of language in relation to Jesus has concentrated upon Semitic languages, especially Aramaic. There has been recent discussion of the multilingual milieu of first-century A.D. Palestine and

Galilee and a recognition that Jesus may have known and even used Greek on occasion, possibly even in his teaching. As a result, S. E. Porter has developed and introduced into historical Jesus research three criteria based on Greek language (Porter 2000; 2003; 2006): Greek language and its context, textual variance, and discourse features. The first examines various episodes in the Gospels in light of the multilingual cultural contexts of the Gospels to determine whether these units display plausible correlations between the participants and their language or actions. In other words, in light of the possibility of Jesus using Greek, this criterion attempts to determine whether in a given instance there are determinable features of the episodes that indicate that Greek was used on this specific occasion. The second criterion, textual variance, builds upon the first and attempts to determine whether, on a given occasion, one can determine whether Jesus actually said the words that are recorded. This determination is based upon an assessment of the stability of the Greek textual tradition. Based upon a type of textual criticism, this criterion attempts to determine whether individual Gospel accounts record authentic words of Jesus in the tradition on the basis of textual variants. The third criterion, discourse features, identifies significant linguistic features in the words of Jesus, whether individual literary forms such as a parable or a larger discourse unit, and those same features within the Gospel narrative. The findings of such a study provide the basis for establishing the linguistic tendencies of a given Gospel writer, against which the wording of a given passage purportedly uttered by Jesus can be tested. Porter has applied these three criteria to a number of passages in the NT and identified contexts and instances where Jesus may have spoken the words involved (e.g., Mk 15:2 par.). Then, on the basis of traditional criteria, he has established the probability that Jesus may have spoken these words in the particular context. Scholars have responded in several different ways to these new criteria. Some have welcomed, if not the criteria themselves, at least the possibility of introducing new criteria into the debate and their methodological soundness (Shin, 186-87; McKnight 2005, 45). Others, especially those who resist the notion that Jesus spoke Greek, have dismissed the criteria (Dunn, 83). Those who resist new criteria and wish to reinforce the traditional criteria tend to believe that such criteria are unnecessary and have hence ignored them. Others note that the criteria are still dependent upon the traditional criteria (Bird). The use of the traditional criteria is a recognizable potential vulnerability of this approach, although the new criteria are not dependent upon them.

3.4. Criteria and Ancient Historiography. The last new development to note here is recent discussion of the practice of historiography and its relationship to the traditional criteria. In its early days, historiography was positivistic in that it believed that to know something was to explain it. Such historiography was rule-driven and reductionistic. The progressive development of historiography has involved the recognition that historiography may have rules, but these rules are motivated by a variety of factors, including probability, subjectivity and theories of truth. The results in modernist historiography have been recognition of the difficulties of writing history but the belief that data can lead to determination of facts. Postmodern historiography has taken what is sometimes referred to as a linguistic turn, in which language itself has a formative role to play in history. The result has been an emphasis upon history as narrative and story, in which a coherence theory of truth replaces that of correspondence (see Carr). Current historiography is characterized as an ongoing debate about method, with both modernist and postmodernist approaches being used. Even though it appears that modern historiography itself is an unsettled discipline, what is clear is that, apart possibly from its earliest period, it does not recognize and utilize the types of criteria that are commonly found in Jesus research. If anything, these resemble the early positivistic approach to historiography. As a result, a number of NT scholars interested in questions about Jesus have attempted to draw upon approaches found in secular historiography in their Jesus research. In an approach sympathetic to postmodernist historiography, McKnight acknowledges the role that one's personal orientation to the evidence plays in Jesus research (McKnight 2005). In a more modernist approach to the subject, M. R. Licona attempts to find rules of probability and evidence that allow him to assess the evidence for the resurrection of Jesus.

See also FORM CRITICISM; HISTORICISMS AND HISTORIOGRAPHY; ORALITY AND ORAL TRANSMISSION; QUEST OF THE HISTORICAL JESUS; REDACTION CRITICISM.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R. S. Barbour, Tradition-Historical Criticism of the Gospels (London: SPCK, 1972); M. F. Bird, "The Criterion of Greek Language and Context: A Response to Stanley E. Porter," JSHJ 4 (2006) 55-67; M. Black, An Aramaic Approach to the Gospels and Acts (3rd ed.; Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1967); R. Bultmann, "The New Approach to the Synoptic Problem," JR 6 (1926) 337-62; repr. in Existence and Faith: Shorter Writings of Rudolf Bultmann, ed. S. Ogden (New York: Meridian, 1960) 35-54; idem, The History of the Synoptic Tradition, trans. John Marsh (2nd ed.; Oxford: Blackwell, 1968); F. C. Burkitt, The Gospel History and Its Transmission (3rd ed.; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1911); S. Byrskog, Jesus the Only Teacher: Didactic Authority and Transmission in Ancient Israel, Ancient Judaism and the Matthean Community (ConBNT 24; Stockholm: Almqvist & Wiksell, 1994); D. G. A. Calvert, "An Examination of the Criteria for Distinguishing the Authentic Words of Jesus," NTS 18 (1971-1972) 209-19; C. E. Carlston, "A Positive Criterion of Authenticity?" BR 7 (1962) 33-44; D. Carr, "Philosophy of History," in The Cambridge Dictionary of Philosophy, ed. R. Audi (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1995) 584-86; M. Casey, Aramaic Sources of Mark's Gospel (SNTSMS 102; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1998); B. D. Chilton, A Galilean Rabbi and His Bible: Jesus' Use of the Interpreted Scripture of His Time (GNS 8; Wilmington, DE: Michael Glazier, 1984); M. Dibelius, From Tradition to Gospel, trans. B. L. Woolf (London: Ivor Nicholson & Watson, 1934); C. H. Dodd, The Parables of the Kingdom (London: Nisbet, 1935); J. D. G. Dunn, Jesus Remembered (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2003); C. A. Evans, Jesus and His Contemporaries: Comparative Studies (AGJU 25; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1995); idem, Life of Jesus Research: An Annotated Bibliography (rev. ed.; NTTS 24; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1996); idem, "From Gospel to Gospel: The Function of Isaiah in the New Testament," in Writing and Reading the Scroll of Isaiah: Studies of an Interpretive Tradition, ed. C. C. Broyles and C. A. Evans (2 vols.; VTSup 70/1-2; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1997a) 2:651-59; idem, "Life of Jesus," in Handbook to Exegesis of the New Testament, ed. S. E. Porter (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1997b) 427-75; J. A. Fitzmyer, The Semitic Background of the New Testament (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans; Livonia, MI: Dove, 1997); B. Gerhardsson, Memory and Manuscript: Oral Tradition and Written Transmission in Rabbinic Judaism and Early Christianity; with, Tradition and Transmission in Early Christianity, trans. E. J. Sharpe (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans; Livonia, MI: Dove, 1998); M. Hengel, The Charismatic Leader and His Followers, trans. J. C. G. Greig (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1981); T. Holmén, "Doubts about Double Dissimilarity: Restructuring the Main Criterion of Jesus-of-History Research," in Authenticating the Words of Jesus, ed. B. Chilton and C. A. Evans (NTTS 28/1; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1998) 47-80; M. D. Hooker, "Christology and Methodology," NTS 17 (1970) 480-87; idem, "On Using the Wrong Tool," Theology 75 (1982) 570-81; L. D. Hurst, "The Neglected Role of Semantics in the Search for the Aramaic Words of Jesus," JSNT 28 (1986) 63-80; J. Jeremias, The Eucharistic Words of Jesus, trans. A. Ehrhardt (Oxford: Blackwell, 1955); idem, The Parables of Jesus, trans. S. H. Hooke (3rd ed.; London: SCM, 1972); E. Käsemann, "The Problem of the Historical Jesus," in Essays on New Testament Themes, trans. W. J. Montague (SBT 41; London: SCM, 1964) 15-47; M. R. Licona, The Resurrection of Jesus: A New Historiographical Approach (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2010); T. W. Manson, The Teaching of Jesus: Studies of Its Form and Content (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1931); N. J. McEleney, "Authenticating Criteria and Mk 7:1-23," CBQ 34 (1972) 431-60; S. McKnight, Interpreting the Synoptic Gospels (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1988); idem, Jesus and His Death: Historiography, the Historical Jesus, and Atonement Theory (Waco, TX: Baylor University Press, 2005); J. P. Meier, A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus, 1: The Roots and the Problem of the Person (ABRL; New York: Doubleday, 1991); B. F. Meyer, The Aims of Jesus (London: SCM, 1979); idem, Critical Realism and the New Testament (Allison Park, PA: Pickwick, 1989); N. Perrin, Rediscovering the Teaching of Jesus (NTL; London: SCM, 1967); idem, What Is Redaction Criticism? (GBS; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1970); D. Polkow, "Method and Criteria for Historical Jesus Research," SBLSP 26 (1987) 336-56; S. E. Porter, The Criteria for Authenticity in Historical-Jesus Research: Previous Discussion and New Proposals (JSNTSup 191; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2000); idem, "Luke 17.11-19 and the Criteria for Authenticity Revisited," JSHJ 1 (2003) 201-24; idem, "Reading the Gospels and the Quest for the Historical Jesus," in Reading the Gospels Today, ed. S. E. Porter (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2004) 27-55; idem, "The Criterion of Greek Language and Its Context: A Further Response," JSHJ 4 (2006) 69-74; idem, "A Dead End or a New Beginning? Examining the Criteria for Authenticity in Light of Albert Schweitzer," in Jesus Research: An International Perspective, ed. J. H. Charlesworth and P. Pokorný (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2009) 16-35; S. E. Porter and A. W. Pitts, "Epistemology," in Standing on the Shoulders of Giants: Engaging the Work of Crossan, Sanders, and Wright, ed. Robert W. Webb and M. A. Powell (London: Continuum, forthcoming); H. Riesenfeld, The Gospel Tradition, trans. E. M. Rowley and R. A. Kraft (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1970); R. Riesner, Jesus als Lehrer: Eine Untersuchung zum Ursprung der Evangelien-

Überlieferung (4th ed.; WUNT 2/7; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1994); E. P. Sanders, The Tendencies of the Synoptic Tradition (SNTSMS 9; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1969); idem, Jesus and Judaism (London: SCM, 1985); E. Schillebeeckx, Jesus: An Experiment in Christology, trans. H. Hoskins (New York: Seabury, 1979); P. W. Schmiedel, "Gospels," in Encyclopaedia Biblica: A Critical Dictionary of the Literary, Political and Religious History, the Archaeology, Geography and Natural History of the Bible, ed. T. K. Cheyne and J. S. Black (4 vols.; London: Adam & Charles Black, 1899-1907) 2, cols. 1761-1898; A. Schweitzer, The Quest of the Historical Jesus: A Critical Study of Its Progress from Reimarus to Wrede, trans. W. Montgomery (London: Adam & Charles Black, 1910); H. W. Shin, Textual Criticism and the Synoptic Problem in Historical Jesus Research: The Search for Valid Criteria (CBET 36; Leuven: Peeters, 2004); R. H. Stein, "The 'Criteria' for Authenticity," in Gospel Perspectives: Studies of History and Tradition in the Four Gospels, ed. R. T. France and D. Wenham (2 vols.; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1980-1981) 1:225-63; V. Taylor, The Formation of the Gospel Tradition (2nd ed.; London: Macmillan, 1935); G. Theissen and D. Winter, The Quest for the Plausible Jesus: The Question of Criteria, trans. M. E. Boring (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2002); W. O. Walker, "The Quest for the Historical Jesus: A Discussion of Methodology," ATR 51 (1969) 38-56; N. T. Wright, The New Testament and the People of God (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1992); idem, Jesus and the Victory of God (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1996).

S. E. Porter

CROSS. See DEATH OF JESUS.

CROWD. See PEOPLE, CROWD.

CRUCIFIXION. See DEATH OF JESUS.

CYNICS AND CYNICISM

Ancient Cynicism, a notorious movement within Greco-Roman philosophy, was known for a lifestyle that embodied nature-inspired values, including asceticism and self-sufficiency. In recent years, a number of scholars have made comparisons and correlations between ancient Cynicism and the early Jesus movement. From within this context has emerged the Cynic Jesus theory, which suggests that the historical Jesus and/or his earliest followers are best understood in light of ancient Cynicism.

1. Ancient Cynicism
2. The Cynic Jesus Theory

1. Ancient Cynicism.

1.1. Origins of Cynicism. Scholars continue to debate whether Socrates' student Antisthenes (ca. 445 to post-366 B.C.) or Diogenes of Sinope (ca. 404–323 B.C.) should be credited as the first Cynic. In any case, Diogenes came to be recognized as the paradigmatic embodiment of the ancient Cynic. The name "Cynic" derives from the Greek word for "dog" (kyōn), a nickname apparently given to Diogenes in light of his public behavior. Although ancient Cynicism often has been portrayed as marginal to, if not in outright conflict with, classical Greek ideals, some have recently argued that the rise of Cynicism in the fourth century B.C. can be understood in light of a widespread admiration of the renunciation of wealth (Desmond 2006).

1.2. History of Cynicism. Scholars regularly identify two periods of Cynicism in the ancient world: Early and Imperial. Early Cynicism stretched from the early fourth to the mid-to-late third centuries B.C. During this period, famous Cynics such as Crates of Thebes and his wife, Hipparchia, Bion of Borysthenes, Menippus of Gadara, and Diogenes himself came to define the Cynic way of life. Although the early Cynics left no literary works of their own, they are known through hundreds of anecdotes (chreiai) collected by later writers (e.g., Diogenes Laertius) (see Chreia/Aphorism).

Imperial Cynicism is tied to something of a Cynic renaissance that began in the mid-first century A.D. Between these periods we have little hard evidence of Cynicism. Scholars debate whether this is due to its actual decline or simply to our lack of sources. With Imperial Cynicism came Cynics (or Cynic sympathizers) such as Demetrius, Dio Chrysostom, Epictetus, Demonax, Peregrinus and Oenomaus of Gadara. The extant collection of pseudonymous Cynic epistles stems primarily from this period. During the Imperial period, the earlier portrait of the thoroughly shameless and irascible Cynic was sanitized, synthesized (e.g., with Stoic elements) and thus idealized so as to better fit with Roman virtues. Although it appears that ancient Cynicism as a living, distinct movement came to an end sometime around the sixth century A.D., a number of scholars have noted a rising admiration for, and retrieval of, the spirit of ancient Cynicism in (post)modern times, as exemplified in the work of F. Nietzsche and M. Foucault (see Cutler).

1.3. The Cynic Lifestyle as Philosophy. As a movement, Cynicism was unique among Greco-Roman philosophies in that it shunned abstract, speculative thought. Rather, it was characterized by a distinctive way of life that served to embody its philosophical and ethical convictions in a set of attitudes and practices. Like other philosophies of the day, it offered a way of life designed to lead one to happiness and fulfillment. As exemplified by Diogenes, when it came to religious matters, classical Cynicism appears to have maintained a skeptical agnosticism; religion was seen to be a distraction to the Cynic way of life (Goulet-Cazé).

As they wandered throughout the ancient Mediterranean world, Cynics generally were recognizable by their appearance: barefoot, long hair and beard, a ragged and dirty cloak, a walking staff, and a carrying bag that doubled as a begging bowl. In light of their characteristic appearance, J. D. Crossan's memorable depiction of the ancient Cynics as "hippies in an age of Augustan yuppies" is quite apt (Crossan, 421). Fundamental to the Cynic vision is the notion that the bounds of nature offer the only legitimate social conventions; whatever violates nature is to be avoided, and whatever is in line with nature is to be embraced. Thus, Cynics were committed to the values of self-sufficiency (autarkeia), indifference (apatheia) and radical freedom (eleutheria), especially freedom of speech. One of the goals of the Cynic philosopher was to awaken those trapped within a web of artificial social conventions to their tragic state. This transgressive form of community service was accomplished through "shameless" public behavior (anaideia, adiaphora) and offensively bold speech (parrēsia). The classic image is of a Cynic philosopher standing on a streetcorner in his dirty robe, hurling insults at passersby, performing "acts of nature" out in the open (e.g., sleeping, urinating, defecating, sexual shenanigans) and begging for food. All of this was designed to jar the Greco-Roman populace from their self-induced stupor, awakening them to the truth that the simple ways of nature provide the path to human contentment.

2. The Cynic Jesus Theory.

Over the centuries, occasional comparisons have been made between the ancient Cynics and the early Jesus movement. Throughout the twentieth century, various scholars focused their comparisons by proposing that ancient Cynicism offered a helpful background and set of parallels by which to make sense of some aspects of early Christianity. A critical moment came with G. Theissen's proposal that "Jesus did not primarily found local communities, but called into being a movement of wandering charismatics" (Theissen, 8), a claim that elicited comparisons between itinerant Christian preachers and wandering Cynic philosophers (see Theissen, 14-15). Much of the attention here has focused on Jesus' mission discourse located in the *Q material (i.e., Lk 10:1-16), wherein Jesus' instructions to his disciples regarding dress and accessories sound remarkably similar to the well-known Cynic garb.

For a smaller number of scholars, comparisons between the early Jesus movement and ancient Cynicism have become more robust. Here, the idea of the direct influence of Cynicism on Jesus and/or his earliest followers is suggested, if not overtly argued. Scholars known for their work in this area include F. Downing (see Downing 1988; 1992) and several members of the Jesus Seminar (see Crossan; Mack; Seeley; Vaage). In its North American version, the Cynic Jesus theory rests on several pivotal claims, including (1) first-century Lower *Galilee, the primary setting of Jesus' life and ministry, was a significantly *Hellenized, urbanized environment and thus a likely context within which to find Cynic philosophers; (2) contrary to the traditional perspective, Jesus and/or his earliest followers did not hold either to a future-oriented *apocalyptic *eschatology or a cross-centered soteriology; (3) rather, the earliest detectable stratum of the Jesus tradition (i.e., the earliest layer of the Q material as reconstructed by J. Kloppenborg) reveals a Jesus whose teachings, both in style and content, are in remarkable alignment with ancient Cynicism. For example, with regard to style, the Gospel tradition's pronouncement stories beg for comparison with the early Cynic chreiai, while Jesus' witty aphorisms (e.g., Mk 8:35; 10:31; Lk 6:39) are reminiscent of the numerous, similarly provocative Cynic maxims. With regard to content, a number of themes are common both to Cynicism and the early Jesus movement, including the renunciation of wealth (Lk 6:20-21; 12:33), home (Lk 9:58) and *family (Lk 12:49-53; 14:26); criticism of the *rich (Lk 6:24-25; 12:15-21), *hypocrites (Lk 6:41-45; 12:54-59) and the ruling elite (Lk 13:31-32); the call to a simple life in harmony with nature (Lk 12:22-31); a program of itinerant wandering and unashamed begging (Lk 10:1-14); and the practices of boldly challenging social conventions and establishing a countercultural vision of life (for a collection of parallels, see Downing 1988).

The Cynic Jesus theory appears to have reached the height of its influence in the 1990s. Since that time it has been subjected to a number of criticisms (see, e.g., Betz; Boyd; Eddy; Witherington, 117-45). For example, although first-century Lower Galilee certainly was touched by Hellenistic culture in a variety of ways, both literary and archeological evidence reveal a Torah-true Jewish populace that was highly resistant to religio-philosophical pagan influences (see Chancey). Regarding the similarities between Cynicism and the teachings of Jesus, their commonalities are, in fact, shared by a wide range of ancient ascetic types. Cynics hardly cornered the market on criticism of opulence and hypocrisy in the Greco-Roman world. More importantly, this theory tends to ignore the clear differences between the Cynics and the early Jesus tradition (a point demonstrated in detail by Witherington, 128-41). Take one important example: rather than embracing radical self-sufficiency and religious agnosticism, the early Jesus movement taught a radical devotion to, and dependence on, *God, and a deep interconnectedness and mutual dependency within the Christian community (e.g., Mt 22:36-40; Lk 10:21-22; 12:31-32; 22:25-27).

In response, some defenders of the theory have softened claims of identification or even direct influence, arguing instead that the relationship between Cynicism and the early Jesus movement is one merely of "analogy" for comparative purposes (e.g., Seeley). However, once the relationship is reduced to mere analogy, then the significant differences must be highlighted alongside similarities, and the force of the originally provocative theory is significantly diminished.

See also HELLENISM; QUEST OF THE HISTORICAL JESUS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. H. D. Betz, "Jesus and the Cynics: Survey and Analysis of a Hypothesis," JR 74 (1994) 453-75; G. A. Boyd, Cynic Sage or Son of God? (Wheaton, IL: Victor Books, 1995); M. A. Chancey, Greco-Roman Culture and the Galilee of Jesus (SNTSMS 134; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2005); J. D. Crossan, The Historical Jesus: The Life of a Mediterranean Jewish Peasant (San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1991); I. Cutler, Cynicism from Diogenes to Dilbert (Jefferson, NC: McFarland, 2005); W. Desmond, The Greek Praise of Poverty: Origins of Ancient Cynicism (Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press, 2006); idem, Cynics (Stocksfield: Acumen, 2008); F. G. Downing, Christ and the Cynics: Jesus and Other Radical Preachers in First-Century Tradition (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1988); idem, Cynics and Christian Origins (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1992); P. R. Eddy, "Jesus as Diogenes? Reflections on the Cynic Jesus Thesis," JBL 115 (1996) 449-69; M.-O. Goulet-Cazé, "Religion and the Early Cynics," in The Cynics: The Cynic Movement in Antiquity and Its Legacy, ed. R. B. Branham and M.-O. Goulet-

- Cazé (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1996) 47-80; J. S. Kloppenborg, The Formation of Q: Trajectories in Ancient Wisdom Collections (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1987); B. L. Mack, The Lost Gospel: The Book of Q and Christian Origins (San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1993); D. Seeley, "Jesus and the Cynics Revisited," JBL 116 (1997) 704-12; G. Theissen, Sociology of Early Palestinian Christianity, trans. J. Bowden (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1978); L. E. Vaage, Galilean Upstarts: Jesus' First Followers According to Q (Valley Forge, PA: Trinity Press International, 1994); B. Witherington III, Jesus the Sage: The Pilgrimage of Wisdom (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1994). P. R. Eddy

D

DARKNESS. See LIGHT AND DARKNESS.

DAVID, DAVIDIC MESSIANISM. See SON OF DAVID.

DEAD SEA SCROLLS

The Dead Sea Scrolls comprise approximately nine hundred scrolls dating from the third century B.C. to the first century A.D., discovered in the desert above the northwestern shores of the Dead Sea, not far from Masada. Other scrolls have been discovered in the region over the centuries since the Second Temple period, but this article focuses on those found in the eleven caves near Qumran from the first cave's rediscovery in 1946/47.

1. The Significance of the Dead Sea Scrolls for the Study of the Gospels
2. Overview of the Dead Sea Scrolls
3. The Dead Sea Scrolls and the Scriptures
4. Theological Conversations in the Dead Sea Scrolls

1. The Significance of the Dead Sea Scrolls for the Study of the Gospels.

The DSS were variously composed, copied and collected by members of a developing movement calling themselves the Yahad ("community"), ones who have entered a "new covenant" (CD-B XIX, 33-34; 1QS I, 16; cf. Lk 22:20) and a group devoted to the study, interpretation and faithful living out of their scriptures. Descriptions within the DSS of the faith and practice of its people overlap at some points with descriptions of the *Sadducees, Zealots, *Pharisees and Jewish Christians found in the NT and in the Greek and Latin classical sources. However, the greatest overlap is with the descriptions of *Essenes contained in the first-century A.D. writings of Philo, *Josephus and Pliny. The most significant points of contact are the descriptions of Essenes variously described as living in a desert community near the Dead Sea, while others lived in cities; some were celibate, and others were married. A probationary period of two to three years was required prior to initiation. At least some maintained a level of separation from the *temple and nurtured alternative forms of worship. Most were not actively militaristic, and some practiced a form of community of goods.

Competing sensational and even fictionalized claims about the contents of the DSS have tended to raise both hopes and fears about the potential impact that the scrolls would have for understanding the historical Jesus and the Gospels; however, these, together with countering claims and disclaimers, frequently have confused rather than enlightened. For example, the biblical scrolls could either be presented as "proof" of the reliability of the Bible or as "disproof" of its authority, depending on the selection of texts, the handling of the variants and scribal initiatives. Among the more notorious conspiracy theories is that the "church" strove to keep the DSS secret because of the potential damage that they might do to the Christian faith.

That said, although the DSS mention neither Jesus nor *John the Baptist, and although no copies of the NT were found in the caves, these texts are most valuable to those students of the Scriptures whose interest runs more deeply than a shallow "proof" or "disproof" of the Gospels. As the sectarians became increasingly distinct from other Jewish groups, their identity became linked, increasingly, to their distinct and differentiating interpretations and applications of their scriptures. However, there remained a shared thought world inherited by Jesus and his followers. A careful study of the similarities and differences between the DSS and the Gospels locates Jesus and the Gospel writers within dynamic, ongoing theological conversations and controversies.

2. Overview of the Dead Sea Scrolls.

It was during a period of Middle East political violence in 1946–1947 that the first of more than nine hundred DSS were rediscovered by a Bedouin shepherd chasing a goat into a cave near Khirbet Qumran, about 8.5 miles south of Jericho. Subsequent explorations until 1956 revealed scrolls in eleven different caves, all told. Photographs and transcriptions of virtually all of the scrolls are now published, most in forty volumes of the official edition, the Discoveries in the Judean Desert (DJD) series (DSS line number references in this article use the system found in the DJD series). A steady stream of translations and commentaries continues to appear, but much of the interpretive work on the scrolls still awaits the attention of students and scholars.

The Yahad at Qumran was a scribal, scroll-producing community; plaster tables and inkwells were found at the site, and the presence of tabs and ties in Cave 8 suggests that at least some of the scrolls were prepared at Qumran. Most sectarian compositions and copies of preexisting scrolls conformed to “Qumran scribal practice,” characterized by a plene (“full”) spelling system incorporating additional vowel letters. However, the community also collected scrolls copied elsewhere and brought to Qumran by its members.

Representative sectarian and presectarian texts from a broad range of compositional dates may be roughly divided according to genre. Of the 944 scrolls, 211 are “biblical” (206 in Hebrew, with Aramaic portions in Daniel and Ezra; 5 in Greek) and 733 are “nonbiblical” (608 in Hebrew; 118 in Aramaic; 7 in Greek). The distinction between “biblical books”—those later canonized within both the HB and the Protestant OT—and “nonbiblical books,” though anachronistic, is familiar and convenient. The number of extant copies of each may be an indication of their relative importance for the community: Psalms (34), Deuteronomy (30), Isaiah (21), Genesis (20), Exodus (17), Leviticus, (15), Numbers (8), Daniel (8), Minor Prophets (8), Ezekiel, (6), Jeremiah (6), Ruth (4), Job (4), 1–2 Samuel (4), Lamentations (4), Judges (3), 1–2 Kings (3), Ecclesiastes (3), Joshua (2), Proverbs (2), 1–2 Chronicles (1), Ezra (1), Song of Songs (1), Nehemiah (0) and Esther (0). Jubilees (15) and some of the constituent books of 1 Enoch (20) may have been received as authoritative scripture at Qumran, while the absence of the book of Esther, for example, and the few remains of 1–2 Chronicles and other historical books suggest a somewhat lesser importance. Collected together with the biblical psalms in the great Psalms Scroll (11Q5) are those previously known from the Greek psalter (Ps 151) and Syriac manuscripts (Pss 154–155) as well as some psalms not canonized in any tradition.

Among a rich collection of songs, prayers and liturgies in the DSS are those written in the first person and expressed as prayers. The Hodayot, or Thanksgiving Hymns (1QH^a; 1Q35; 4Q427; 4Q428; 4Q429; 4Q430; 4Q431; 4Q432), reveal an intimate spirituality and personal identification with the biblical psalmists and prophets. Repeatedly, the author expresses thanksgiving in the midst of suffering, loss, illness, attack by enemies and betrayal by friends. Psalms attributed to Solomon and David (11Q11) proclaim authority over *demons, while Exorcism (4Q560) names male and female “wasting demons,” the “fever demon,” the “chills demon” and the “chest-pain demon” (cf. Mt 12:22–24; Mk 9:14–29; 10:46–52; Lk 4:38–39; 8:26–39). Other psalms are attributed to David and to Manasseh (4Q380; 4Q381) and the songs in Barkī Napshi (“Bless, O My Soul”) (4Q434; 4Q435; 4Q436; 4Q437; 4Q438) weave scriptures within new expressions of praise—for example, “Bless the Lord, O my soul, ‘for He has saved the life of the poor’ and the humble he has not spurned . . . paid attention to the cry of orphans for help . . . multiplying his mercies . . . He has saved them” (excerpted from 4Q434 1 I, 1–8 [cf. Jer 20:13; Lk 1:46–55, 68–79]).

Festival Prayers (1Q34; 4Q507; 4Q508; 4Q509 + 4Q505) were to be recited at the Day of Atonement and Feast of Weeks (see Feasts), the Daily Prayers (4Q503) recited morning and evening, and the Songs of Sabbath Sacrifice (4Q400; 4Q401; 4Q402; 4Q403; 4Q404; 4Q405; 4Q406; 4Q407; 11Q17) at *Sabbath burnt offerings, bringing the worshiper into unity with worshipping *angels. Words of the Luminaries (4Q504; 4Q505; 4Q506) are prayers for forgiveness and portray an acceptance of God’s discipline of the worshipers as God’s chosen, “first-born” son (cf. Mt 12:18; Lk 9:35;). The War Scroll (1QM) is a dramatized liturgy of eschatological war, replete with banners and blessings in which the “Children of Light” battle against the “Children of Darkness” alongside tens of thousands of angels (cf. “children of light” who do not walk in darkness in Jn 12:35–36, and the eschatological role of angels in the separation of the evil from righteous in Mt 13:49–50). Curses (4Q280) and Blessings (4Q286; 4Q287; 4Q288; 4Q289 [cf. 1QS II, 1–18]) reminded this newly redefined priesthood whom they needed to bless and whom to curse (cf. Deut 27–28; *blessings and woes in Mt 5:3–12; 23:13–36; Lk 6:20–26).

The community’s scriptures were also interpreted in various types of commentaries, narrative retellings and parabiblical writings. In the Pesher to Habakkuk (1QpHab) quotations from the biblical prophet are followed by a pesher, a contemporizing, sometimes eschatological interpretation. For example, the “righteous” man and the “wicked” man are interpreted as the “Teacher of Righteousness” and the “Wicked Priest” (probably the high priest) (1QpHab I, 13 [cf. Hab 1:4b]). Commentaries on Genesis (4Q252; 4Q253; 4Q254; 4Q254a) contain pesherim together with interpretive retellings of selected passages. For example, the anticipated righteous messiah, the Branch of David, was expected to fulfill the blessing upon Judah (4Q252 V, 2-3; cf. Gen 49:10; Mt 22:42; Jn 7:42). Meanwhile, Testimonia (4Q175) anticipates the coming of a Moses-like prophet (cf. the appearance of *Moses and *Elijah in Mt 17:3-4; Mk 9:4-5; Lk 9:30-33), a “star” (cf. Mt 2:2) and “scepter” representing a messianic king and a future priest, and Tanhumim (4Q176) seeks to comfort the oppressed and abandoned with its collection of consoling passages.

Other texts are apocalyptically oriented. Typically associated with Enoch (4Q201; 4Q202; 4Q204; 4Q205; 4Q206; 4Q207; 4Q208; 4Q209; 4Q210; 4Q211; 4Q212), and later preserved in portions of 1 Enoch, these purport to reveal matters both of origins and end times, from the origin of evil through to eschatological judgment and restoration at the end of days (cf. Mt 25:31-46). The Book of Giants (1Q23; 1Q24; 2Q26; 4Q203; 4Q530; 4Q531; 4Q532; 4Q533) records the nightmares of giants who ask Enoch to intercede for them; however, Enoch returns a message of judgment for their acts of bloodshed and violence (cf. Gen 6:1-5, 11-13). New Jerusalem (1Q32; 2Q24; 4Q554; 4Q554a; 4Q555; 5Q15; 11Q18) envisions a new temple surpassing the dimensions even of the temple in Revelation (cf. Jn 2:13-22). Melchizedek (11Q13) anticipates a priestly “Melchizedek” who would announce the *Jubilee; God’s judgment would be executed, captives delivered, and the “Children of Light” atoned for on this eschatological Day of Atonement, the “year of Melchizedek’s favor” (cf. Lk 4:16-30). The Aramaic Apocalypse (4Q246) proclaims a coming “son of God,” a “son of the Most High” (cf. Mt 4:3; Mk 5:7; Lk 1:32; Jn 5:25).

Other important texts render legal interpretations and guidelines for community life. The Damascus Document (CD-A; CD-B; 4Q266; 4Q267; 4Q268; 4Q269; 4Q270; 4Q271; 4Q272; 4Q273) exhorts the atoned for and forgiven “members of the new covenant” (CD-A VI, 19 [cf. Lk 22:20]) to hold fast in order to receive everlasting life (CD-A III, 13-20). Because regulations concerning sexual activity and childbirth and penalties for complaining against the “mothers” of the congregation are included in this particular catalogue, the Damascus Document may have addressed the broader movement of the Yahad, including women, of which the Qumran community was a desert-dwelling planting. The Community Rule (1QS; 4Q255; 4Q256; 4Q257; 4Q258; 4Q259; 4Q260; 4Q261; 4Q262; 4Q263; 4Q264; 4Q264a; 5Q11) served as an instructor’s manual for teaching the sectarians to seek God “with all their heart and all their soul” and to do everything commanded through Moses as interpreted within the Community Rule (1QS I, 1-3). Included are descriptions of initiation, the annual covenant renewal ceremony, a teaching on the two spirits that prompt good and evil actions, and instructions on living together in truth, humility and loving-kindness (1QS V, 3-4). Halakhic Letter (4Q394; 4Q395; 4Q396; 4Q397; 4Q398; 4Q399) contained “some of the works of the law,” such as regulations concerning sacrifices and restrictions on foreigners, the castrate, blind and deaf with respect to the sanctuary (4Q394 8 III, 6—IV, 4) (cf. accounts of Jesus’ healings and the invitation to the disabled in Mt 11:4-5; Mk 7:37; Lk 14:13).

Examples of wisdom literature are also found among the DSS. “Folly” is the antithesis of Wisdom as a woman in the Wiles of the Wicked Woman (4Q184). Wisdom is accessed specifically through Torah in Ben Sira (2Q18) in contrast to an esoteric understanding of poverty and the mysteries of existence accessed only by special divine revelation in Mysteries (1Q27; 4Q299; 4Q300; 4Q301) and Instruction (1Q26; 4Q415; 4Q416; 4Q417; 4Q418; 4Q418a; 4Q418c; 4Q423). Found among the wisdom texts is an Aramaic Targum of Job (11Q10) and a copy of Beatitudes (4Q525) with eight blessings followed by a longer one (cf. Jesus as the implied source of wisdom in the beatitudes of Mt 5:3-12; cf. Lk 6:20-23). The persecuted follow the Torah of the Most High and do not abandon wisdom in 4Q525. These beatitudes promise happiness for the present and hint at blessedness in the future, in contrast to Jesus’ words that anticipate blessings to be realized more explicitly at the end of the age.

3. The Dead Sea Scrolls and the Scriptures.

The DSS reveal a broader range of authoritative “scripture” than is found in any Bible today. Some of the writings possessed a persistent and timeless authority, while the authority of others was transient, bound more closely to the times and places in which they were composed. The sheer number of different interpretations found among the DSS attests to the deep love that members of the Yahad had for their scriptures. For them the revelation of God through their various ancestors still lived and breathed in their day, and by interpreting this revelation for a new generation, scribes extended and enlarged the authority of these texts. Some examples in this section are taken from G. J. Brooke, J. J. Collins and C. A. Evans (see the bibliography).

3.1. Scripture and Authority. One measure of each biblical book's authoritative strength is the number of times it is cited. Compared to the NT, which cites Psalms most frequently, followed by Isaiah, Deuteronomy, Exodus and Genesis, the nonbiblical scrolls cite Isaiah most frequently, followed by Psalms, Deuteronomy, Numbers and Genesis. In contrast, the historical books are cited only infrequently in the DSS. Citations were sometimes prefaced with formulas, following patterns in already recognized Scripture: "As it is written, 'In the wilderness prepare the way of the LORD, make straight in the desert a highway for our God the Lord, make straight in the desert a highway for our God'" (1QS VIII, 13-14, citing Is 40:3; cf. 1QS IX, 19-20). Here is a fine example of the practice in the sectarian scrolls and in the Gospels of contemporizing prophetic Scripture differently for the purposes of self-expressed identity. John the Baptist, the desert dweller, is identified as the voice calling from the wilderness (Mt 3:1-6; Mk 1:1-4; Lk 3:1-6; Jn 1:19-23), while the members of the Yahad perceived themselves to be the chosen ones called into the wilderness where they were "paying" for iniquity and preparing for the coming of God (1QS VIII, 1-14; cf. Is 40:1-3). While "wilderness" may have also been understood metaphorically (see Mountain and Wilderness), the physical move into the desert would have served to reliteralize the metaphor and to legitimate claims made for the fulfillment of Isaiah 40:1-3.

The rewriting of Scripture was a well-established practice in the Second Temple period, possibly legitimized by examples in which "original" and "updated" versions coexisted as authoritative scripture (Ex 20:1-17; 34:1; Deut 5:1-22). By linking their own interpretations to Moses or to other scriptural figures and texts, interpreters could stand in the prophetic tradition of authentically expressing scriptural traditions, even claiming to be writing new, authoritative scripture (cf. Mt 5:17-48). Variations between already recognized scripture and interpretation ranged from the relatively minor in the Reworked Pentateuch (4Q158; 4Q364; 4Q365; 4Q365a; 4Q366; 4Q367), to more significant reworkings in the Temple Scroll (11Q19), through to substantial re-interpretation in the Genesis Apocryphon (1Qap-Gen ar). The large number of different rewritings of Genesis, Exodus and Deuteronomy served to honor and authorize the original tradition. Perhaps the choice to scripturalize four different *Gospels instead of one harmonized account might be understood in this context.

The sectarians made intertextual connections between their scriptures. In instructing members of the covenant concerning how accusations should and should not be brought against other members, the Damascus Document cites excerpts from Leviticus 19:16-18 and appeals to Nahum 1:2 for reassurance that God himself would take care of vengeance (CD IX, 2-8; cf. Mt 18:15-20 with Lev 19:17; Deut 19:15). Specific combinations of Scriptures may have been associated with a specific stance on an issue. For example, when the Pharisees asked Jesus about an interpretation of Moses that was more "lenient" toward men who wanted to *divorce and dismiss their wives, Jesus appealed to Genesis 1:26; 7:9 in support of a "stricter" view (Mt 19:3-12; Mk 10:2-12). The Damascus Document also appeals to Genesis, adding another Scripture in support of its own "strict" view: "The foundation of creation is 'male and female He created them' [Gen 1:27] . . . those who went into the ark 'went into the ark two by two' [Gen 7:9] . . . concerning the Leader it is written 'he shall not multiply wives to himself' [Deut 17:17]" (CD-A IV, 19—V, 2).

Importing proof texts from scriptures was another common practice. The "star" to come out of Jacob and the "scepter" to arise out of Israel (Num 24:17) were interpreted as the "Interpreter of the Law" and the coming Davidic "Leader of the whole nation" (CD VII, 16-21 [cf. Mt 2:2; note also Is 7:14; 11:1; Jer 31:15; Mic 5:2 in Matthew's infancy narrative]). From their point of view, what the biblical prophets had foretold finally was being fulfilled or about to be fulfilled (cf. Lk 24:27; Jn 5:45-47). Proof texts were also placed within new contexts clearly dissonant from their original contexts, a hermeneutical practice apparently acceptable to the sectarians. While Habakkuk 1:13 directs a complaint against the silence of God, the interpreter nuances the text, finding both traitors and God's chosen ones in the text (1QpHab V, 6-12; cf. Hos 11:1 ["Out of Egypt I called my son"] in Mt 2:14-15; cf. Jer 31:15 in Mt 2:17-18). The importation of the entire original context was not necessary for a "correct" interpretation because it was believed God revealed the "hidden meaning" from recorded Scripture to inspired interpreters, the prophets of that day.

3.2. Shifting Authoritative Figures. In the Aramaic texts figures such as Enoch (1 Enoch), Noah (Genesis Apocryphon) and Levi (Aramaic Levi Document) appear as primary authoritative recipients and transmitters of divine revelation. In Jubilees, written in Hebrew, divine revelation to these three figures is recontextualized within an expanded revelation given to Moses on Mount Sinai (Jub. 1:1). Authority thus shifted more securely to Moses and the texts associated with him. In the NT the teachings of Moses were recontextualized within the teachings of Jesus, who speaks explicitly on his own authority: “You have heard that it was said. . . . But I say to you” (Mt 5:17-48). For the early Christians, Jesus superseded Moses as the primary authoritative revealer, and Jesus’ reinterpretation of Moses became Scripture.

4. Theological Conversations in the Dead Sea Scrolls.

The sectarians disagreed bitterly with a Jerusalem group they called the “Flattery-Seekers” (CD-A I, 18-19; 4Q163 23 II, 10-11; 1QH^a X, 15). Otherwise known as lying “Shoddy-Wall-Builders” and “White-Washers” (CD-A VIII, 12-13; CD-B XIX, 24-25 [cf. Mt 23:27-28]), these were likely the Pharisees (cf. accounts of conversations between Jesus and the Pharisees shaped to emphasize them as adversaries in Mt 22:15-46; Mk 12:13-17; Lk 20:20-26). Other adversaries of the Yahad included the “Wicked Priest,” the “Man of the Lie,” the Kittim and the “Children of Darkness.” Yet, not all communication between leaders of different movements was adversarial. The Halakhic Letter is conciliatory, expressing hope that its interpretation of “some of the works of the Law” might act as a beneficial corrective for the other group (4Q398 14-17 II, 2-4). In the Gospels certain conversations are also friendlier—for example, the rich young ruler (Mt 19:16-22; Mk 10:17-22; Lk 18:18-23), the scribe (Mk 12:28-34) and Nicodemus (Jn 3:7:50-52). While a greater theological coherence characterizes the collection of the DSS than the whole of Second Temple literature, there was not uniformity. The selected theological questions below are drawn from texts from the overall history of the Yahad, and although the responses were not necessarily held concurrently, they do reflect a range of perspectives.

4.1. How Does God Communicate with His People? Ways that God’s people could receive special knowledge and revelation were in conversational textual tension. While written Scriptures were the most obvious source (see 3 above), the astrological texts show that some Jews studied the stars, interpreting the thunder occurring in various signs of the zodiac as omens of violence, famine and sickness (4Q318; cf. 4Q208; 4Q209; 4Q210; 4Q211). Angels could transmit either harmful or beneficial knowledge (1 En. 1–11), and an angel dictated the story of Israel to Moses (Jub. 1:27; 2:1). Dreams and visions are recorded, such as Noah’s dreams of eschatological judgment by fire (e.g., 1QapGen ar XIII–XV). Finally, the meaning of Scripture was revealed to inspired, priestly interpreters who contemporized biblical prophetic words and explained the mysteries of God’s insights to their followers (1QpHab II, 7-10; 1QH^a XX, 14-16). In comparison, Jesus’ birth was revealed through the more important ways Jews understood God could communicate with his people: through a sign in the stars (Mt 2:1-2), contemporizing interpretation from the biblical prophets (Mic 5:2 in Mt 2:5-6), angels and dreams (Mt 1:20; Lk 1:26-38; 2:9-14) and Holy Spirit-inspired speech in the mouth of a priest (Lk 2:25-35).

4.2. Who Are the True People of God? Language previously applied to all Israel now applied exclusively to this “remnant” that would inherit the land (CD-A I, 4-8) as the “blameless and true house in Israel” (1QS VIII, 9), language betraying a particularly “sectarian” mindset. In 1QS VIII, 1-10a the community identified itself as the eternal planting (cf. Jn 15:1-11), temple (cf. Mt 26:61; Jn 2:19-21), acceptable sacrifice (cf. Jn 1:29, 36), tested wall and cornerstone (cf. Is 28:16; Mt 21:42-43; Mk 12:10; Lk 20:17). As the “Children of Light,” they were distinguished from the “Children of Darkness” (1QS III, 13; 1QM I, 1; cf. Mt 5:14; Lk 16:8; Jn 1:1-9; 12:36) and had chosen the “Way,” living literally and figuratively in the wilderness as a repenting, immersing community (1QS IX, 17-22; V, 13-14; cf. Is 40:3; Mt 3:1-2; Mk 1:2-4; Lk 3:3-6; Jn 1:23). In contrast to the “Wicked Priest,” who became wealthy by forcibly seizing riches (1QpHab VIII, 3-13), the sectarians consciously identified with “the poor” and “meek” who would inherit the earth (4Q171 1-2 II, 8-11; cf. Ps 37:11; 1QH^a X, 34-37). Metaphorical and literal interpretations of “poverty” permeate the presectarian and sectarian texts, challenging the blessedness of prosperity and encouraging followers to show their poverty to “all who seek pleasure” (4Q418 81, 18-19; cf. 1QH^a XIII, 16-18; Mt 5:3; 19:21; Lk 6:20) (see Rich and Poor). By reaccentuating shared scriptural language and applying this language to itself, a group could, in effect, claim to be the true people of God. Differences in praxis also served to distinguish groups from each other.

4.3. What Is True Worship? The sectarians objected to the misuse of the temple, viewing it as impure because of the failure of the Jerusalem priesthood to distinguish between what was clean and unclean—for example, the practice of lying with a menstruant woman (CD-A V, 6-9). The community perceived itself as “temple” (1QS VIII, 8-10) and did not require the Jerusalem temple for true worship (cf. Jn 4:19-24). Jesus objected to the misuse of the temple, but for other reasons (Mt 21:12-13; Mk 11:15-17; Lk 19:45-46; Jn 2:14-22). As an alternative to worship at the temple, Mosaic Torah, newly interpreted, informed “true worship” by means of particular observances, such as fasting, purity, calendar and festivals.

In keeping with Mosaic Torah, the sectarians advocated *fasting (4Q266 11, 5-8), and the Day of Atonement was termed a “festival of fasting” (4Q508 2, 2-3). In the NT the disciples of John and the Pharisees fasted, but the disciples of Jesus reportedly did not (Mt 9:14; Mk 2:18; Lk 5:33; but cf. Mt 6:17-18). Whether and when *table fellowship should be open or closed was viewed and practiced differently; Pharisees observed certain hand washings and questioned the practice of Jesus’ disciples (Mk 7:1-23; cf. Mt 15:1-3; Lk 11:37-41). Those joining the Yahad participated in pure community meals only after a two-year initiation period (1QS VI, 16-23). Jesus ate with tax collectors and sinners (Mk 2:15-17; cf. Mt 9:10-13; Lk 5:28-32) but alone with his disciples when celebrating the Passover with them (Lk 22:7-17). The sectarians sought to purify themselves from both ritual and moral impurities, repenting of evil before stepping into the purifying waters of the immersion pools (4Q278; 4Q512; cf. Lev 11—15; 1QS V, 13-18; Mt 3:7-10; Mk 1:2-4) (see Clean and Unclean). The presence of multiple calendar texts (e.g., 4Q317—330) confirms the importance of the “right” calendar for the practice of true worship. The scrolls rejected the lunar calendar followed by most Jews, instead ordering feast days and priestly rotations according to a 364-day lunisolar calendar. Therefore, the “Wicked Priest” from Jerusalem was free to attack the “Teacher of Righteousness” on the sectarians’ differently scheduled Day of Atonement (1QpHab XI, 4-8). The extent to which additional Sabbath laws were authoritative expansions of Mosaic Torah was also discussed. No caregiver was to carry a baby on the Sabbath, and no one should help an animal give birth on the Sabbath or rescue an animal from the well into which it had fallen (CD-A XI, 11-14; cf. Deut 5:12; Is 58:13-14). These regulations imply a polemical response to a more lenient, compassionate trajectory of Sabbath laws reaching also into the Gospels (cf. Mt 12:1-14; Lk 14:1-6; Jn 5:9-18).

4.4. What About Evil? Transgressing boundaries between heaven and earth, angels intermarried with women, fathered giants, and brought destructive knowledge onto the earth (1 En. 6—11; cf. Mt 4:1-11; Mk 1:12-13; Lk 4:1-13). In the DSS evil was viewed more consistently as originating from this fall than from the fall of humans in Eden (cf. Gen 3; 6:1-4). The giants died in the flood (4Q370 1 I, 5-6), but their spirits survived as demons (1 En. 15:4-11). Satan is named (Jub. 46:2; 11Q5 XIX, 15), as is the Satan-like Mastema and his demons responsible for disease (4Q390 2 I, 7; 11Q11 II, 4; Jub. 10:8-13). Belial and his spirits exercised control over humans (CD-A XII, 2; 1QM XIII, 1-2), his “three traps” described as fornication, wealth and defiling the sanctuary (CD-A IV, 15-18) (see Demon, Devil, Satan).

Evil spirits could be contained and controlled by prayer (4Q560; 11Q11). Noah asks God to imprison all of the demons, but Mastema successfully appeals for one-tenth to remain. Yet, the good angels provide Noah with medicines to counteract their work (Jub. 10:4-14). Abram lays hands on Pharaoh, successfully praying for deliverance from an impotence-causing evil spirit for which none of the Egyptian healers had the remedy (1QapGen ar XX, 16-29; cf. Mk 5:1-13; Lk 11:14-23; 13:11-13).

Responsibility for evil was linked to culpability and consequent eschatological punishment. Earlier texts suggest that the “fiery abyss” was prepared specifically for the fallen angels (1 En. 10; 21; cf. Mt 25:41), but there was a strengthening affirmation of human responsibility. For example, “flames of fire with all the angels of destruction” were expected to come against those who rebelled against the “proper way” (CD-A II, 5-6; 1QS IV, 11-12).

4.5. Messianic Expectation. The priestly Teacher of Righteousness, leader of the sectarians, was remembered not as a messianic figure but rather as an eloquent speaker and inspired interpreter of scriptures (4Q171 III, 15-17; IV, 27; CD-B XX, 32-33; 1QpHab VII, 4-5). Likely the author of many of the Thanksgiving Hymns, the words given to him by God were as a “spring of living waters” (1QH^a XVI, 17; cf. Jn 4:10-15; 7:38). He understood suffering, having been persecuted and betrayed (1QpHab V, 9-12; XI, 4-6; cf. Mt 26:45-46). An eschatological, messianic, suffering servant high priest with teaching and atoning functions was modeled after the Servant Songs in Isaiah (4Q541; cf. Mt 12:15-21; Lk 22:37) (see Servant of Yahweh). However, although crucifixion was approved as a death sentence for a man who betrayed his own people (11QT19 LXIV, 6-9; cf. Deut 21:22-23), the messiah was expected to kill his enemies, not be crucified by them (4Q285 7 1-5).

The Yahad expected several messiahs to fulfill different roles in the end times (1QS IX, 9-11), anticipating a prophet like Elijah (4Q558 1 51 II, 4; cf. 4Q521), a princely or Davidic messiah, (4Q174 1 I, 11-13; 4Q285 6 + 4, 1-10), and a priestly messiah who would take precedence over all others at the messianic banquet in the last days (1Q28a [1QSa] II, 11-22). Among the Gospels, Matthew emphasizes the Davidic aspect of a messiah (Mt 1:1; 21:1-11) (see Son of David), while Luke and John emphasize the prophetic (Lk 4:24; 13:33; Jn 7:52), and Jesus' seamless robe (Jn 14:23; cf. Heb 5:5-6) evokes the robe of the high priest (LXX Ex 28:4; Lev 16:4). In the DSS, the Davidic messiah was expected to defeat Israel's enemies (4Q285), and an eschatological priestly messiah was expected in fulfillment of Isaiah 61:1 (11Q13 II; cf. Lk 4:16-21). The Messianic Apocalypse (4Q521) anticipated the coming of the messiah, for that was when the Lord would set prisoners free, open the eyes of the blind, raise up the bowed down, heal the critically wounded, revive the dead, send good news to the afflicted, satisfy the poor, guide the uprooted, and make the hungry rich (4Q521 2 II + 4 1-13; cf. 4Q521 7 + 5 II, 5-11). The Messianic Apocalypse, Luke and Matthew all based their lists loosely on Isaiah 35:5; 61:1 from either the Hebrew or the Greek texts; however, the "raising" or "reviving of the dead" was a shared development not present in Isaiah (Mt 11:2-6; Lk 7:18-23; cf. Lk 18:35-43).

Metaphorically, Israel was God's son, Ephraim his firstborn (Jer 31:9), and David was the firstborn son of God (Ps 89:20-29). While the DSS followed the metaphorical use of the language, naming the coming Davidic messiah as prince, ruler and God's firstborn son (4Q369 1 II, 1-11) and also "son of the Most High" (4Q246), in the Gospels Jesus was received as the true son of God (Mt 1:20; Lk 1:32-35; Jn 10:22-39).

See also ESSENES; JERUSALEM; JUDAISM, COMMON; MIDRASH; PHARISEES; PRIESTS AND PRIESTHOOD; RABBINIC TRADITIONS AND WRITINGS; REVOLUTIONARY MOVEMENTS; SADDUCEES; SCRIBES; TARGUMS; TEMPLE.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. M. Abegg Jr., "The Messiah at Qumran: Are We Still Seeing Double?" DSD 2 (1995) 125-44; M. Abegg Jr., P. Flint and E. Ulrich, The Dead Sea Scrolls Bible (San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1999); D. C. Allison Jr., Scriptural Allusions in the New Testament: Light from the Dead Sea Scrolls (North Richland Hills, TX: BIBAL Press, 2000); G. J. Brooke, The Dead Sea Scrolls and the New Testament (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2005); idem, Qumran and the Jewish Jesus: Reading the New Testament in the Light of the Dead Sea Scrolls (Cambridge: Grove Books, 2005); idem, "Shared Exegetical Traditions between the Scrolls and the New Testament," in The Oxford Handbook of the Dead Sea Scrolls, ed. T. H. Lim and J. J. Collins (Oxford University Press, 2010) 565-91; J. H. Charlesworth, ed., John and the Dead Sea Scrolls (New York: Crossroad, 1991); J. J. Collins, The Sceptre and the Star: The Messiahs of the Dead Sea Scrolls and Other Ancient Literature (New York: Doubleday, 1995); J. J. Collins and C. A. Evans, eds., Christian Beginnings and the Dead Sea Scrolls (Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2006); P. R. Davies, G. J. Brooke and P. R. Callaway, The Complete World of the Dead Sea Scrolls (London: Thames & Hudson, 2002); C. A. Evans and P. W. Flint, Eschatology, Messianism, and the Dead Sea Scrolls (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1997); J. A. Fitzmyer, The Dead Sea Scrolls and Christian Origins (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2000); D. Flusser, Judaism and the Origins of Christianity (Jerusalem: Magnes, 1988); G. W. E. Nickelsburg and M. E. Stone, eds., Early Judaism: Texts and Documents on Faith and Piety (rev. ed.; Minneapolis: Fortress, 2009); G. W. E. Nickelsburg and J. C. VanderKam, 1 Enoch: A New Translation (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2004); D. W. Parry and E. Tov, eds., The Dead Sea Scrolls Reader (6 vols.; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2004-2005); D. M. Peters, Noah Traditions in the Dead Sea Scrolls: Conversations and Controversies of Antiquity (SBLEJL 26; Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature, 2008); K. Stendahl and J. H. Charlesworth, eds., The Scrolls and the New Testament (COL; New York: Crossroad, 1992); J. C. VanderKam and P. Flint, The Meaning of the Dead Sea Scrolls: Their Significance for Understanding the Bible, Judaism, Jesus, and Christianity (San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 2002); M. Wise, M. G. Abegg and E. Cook, The Dead Sea Scrolls: A New Translation (rev. ed.; San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 2005).

D. M. Peters

DEAFNESS. See BLINDNESS AND DEAFNESS.

DEATH OF JESUS

That Jesus was executed under *Pontius Pilate is a firm fact of history. But the Gospels see in this fact the accomplishment of the plan of God for the redemption of his people and the world. As we seek to understand Jesus' death in the Gospels, we must remember that, as ancient historical biographies (bioi), the Gospels do not present systematic treatises of the meaning of the cross or, for that matter, of any other theological theme (see Gospel: Genre). Each Gospel's theology of the cross is embedded in its plot structure. Therefore, this article attempts to unpack the Gospels' narrations of Jesus' death by paying particular attention to the contribution of each Gospel.

1. Crucifixion in the Ancient World
2. The Crucifixion of Jesus
3. Why Was Jesus Crucified?
4. Dating the Crucifixion
5. The Death of Jesus in Mark's Gospel
6. The Death of Jesus in Matthew's Gospel
7. The Death of Jesus in Luke's Gospel
8. The Death of Jesus in John's Gospel
9. Conclusion

1. Crucifixion in the Ancient World.

There has been a lack of precision in scholarship in terms of defining what "crucifixion" entailed in the ancient world, as well as imprecision in the lexical study of the key terms used for the practice in the Gospels (see Samuelsson). The verb stauroō, customarily translated "to crucify," occurs thirty-five times in the Gospels, twenty-nine of which refer to the act of "crucifying" Jesus. The noun stauros ("cross") occurs sixteen times in the Gospels, eleven of which refer to the vertical wooden object, with an attached crossbeam (cf. Lk 24:39; Jn 20:27), to which Jesus was nailed. But the verb and the noun do not simply mean "to crucify" and "cross." Rather, the noun seems to have originally referred to an upright pole or stake, and the verb, following suit, indicated the action of "driving in stakes" or the "setting up of poles" (LSJ, 1635; Kuhn, 270; Chapman, 10). There are contexts, of course, where the noun indicates a stake or pole (with or without crossbeams) on which a person is impaled or nailed, dead or alive, and where the verb indicates the action of suspending people on a stake or pole, dead or alive. But these terms in the ancient literature do not in themselves distinguish between the varied forms of penal suspension or between antemortem and postmortem suspension (Chapman, 21-31). Thus, there was no unique Greek terminology for "crucifixion" in the sense of the English usage of the term (Chapman, 21; Samuelsson, 143; Pounds, 401). However, it seems clear enough that the semantic range of the terms stauroō and stauros can and does include the general punishment by human suspension in its varied forms found in Greek literature, including those found in the Gospels' descriptions of Jesus' execution. Thus, the general form (and associated acts) of Jesus' "crucifixion" is a particular and identifiable type (allowing for variations in method) of penal suspension in the Roman world (Pounds, 403-4; contra Samuelsson), and as such, his "crucifixion" should be identified as an "executionary suspension of a person on a cross-shaped object" (Chapman, 32). In what follows here "crucifixion" and "crucify" are consistently employed for the sake of uniformity, but it should be noted that some of the passages mentioned are insufficiently clear as to the precise form and procedure of the execution. Nevertheless, the texts below do witness to the practice of penal suspension in its varied forms, and many of the passages reveal comparable, and sometimes identical, elements with Jesus' penal suspension or crucifixion.

"Crucifixion" (from Lat. crux ["cross"] and figere [to "attach"]) was a widespread and common method of capital punishment in the ancient world. Crucifixion was a horribly violent, sadistic and cruel affair. Cicero speaks of the punishment as the "most cruel and disgusting penalty" (Verr. 2.5.64.165-70) in which victims "died in pain and agony" and suffered the "worst extreme of the tortures inflicted on slaves" (Verr. 2.5.66.169). The main reason for the use of crucifixion as a punishment was its deterrent value (Hengel), which is noted by Josephus (J.W. 5.449-51). This is why the ancients placed crosses along well-traveled highways, on hilltops and at city gates.

Even before Roman times crucifixion was widely practiced among the Persians, Assyrians, Scythians, Indians, Carthaginians, Celts, Britons and Germans. The Romans may have taken over the practice from the Carthaginians (Hengel, 23; O'Collins, 1207). During the Hellenistic period crucifixion was used in military campaigns for instances of high treason, social rebellion, crime against the state and insubordination to the king. For example, on one occasion Alexander the Great (356-323 B.C.), well known for employing crucifixion, had two thousand survivors from the siege of Tyre crucified (Curtius Rufus, Hist. Alex. 4.4.17). Perdikkas (360-321 B.C.), the administrator of the kingdom after Alexander's death, had the Cappadocian king Ariarathes and his relatives tortured and crucified in 322 B.C. (Diodorus Siculus, Bib. hist. 18.16.3), and in 314 B.C. a rebellion in Sicyon, near Corinth, led to "about thirty" of the inhabitants being crucified (Diodorus Siculus, Bib. hist. 19.67.2). Josephus reports that Antiochus IV (r. 175-164 B.C.) crucified many Jews, "while still alive and breathing," who resisted forced Hellenism (Ant. 12.256).

Under the Romans crucifixion increased, and even by modest estimates at least thirty thousand people were crucified by the Romans (Cook 2013, 1). In Roman times the practice was reserved for slaves, criminals and for the most part noncitizens (peregrini), although sometimes freedmen, freedwomen and soldiers were subjected to the punishment. Roman citizens and the upper classes were largely exempt from this form of punishment. The practice was identified by Cicero as supplicium servile ("the punishment of slaves"), and thus to him it was unthinkable for a Roman citizen to be crucified (Verr. 2.5.64.165-70). Roman crucifixion was employed for similar crimes as in the Hellenistic period: high treason against the state (such as desertion from the military), perceived threats to Roman rule and social order, brigandage and especially for sedition against the empire. For example, after a revolt following the death of Herod (4 B.C.), Varrus, the Roman governor of Syria, crucified two thousand Jews (Josephus, Ant. 17.295). Similarly, during the reign of Caligula (r. A.D. 37-41), Flaccus, the Roman prefect of Egypt, tortured and crucified Jews in the amphitheater of Alexandria as a spectacle of entertainment (Philo, Flacc. 83-86). Instances may be multiplied.

Crucifixion was rare among the Jews. However, there is evidence that the practice was adopted from the Hellenistic world in the pre-Roman Hasmonean period and used in cases of betraying one's people to a foreign enemy (Hengel, 84). The best-known example is Alexander Janneus (r. 102-76 B.C.), who crucified eight hundred Pharisees who opposed him (Josephus, J.W. 1.97-98; Ant. 13.380-83). Based on Deuteronomy 21:22-23, Jewish law allowed that blasphemers and idolaters be hanged on a tree (cf. m. Sanh. 6:4-5) to show that they were "cursed by God" (Deut 21:23). In Qumran's Temple Scroll (11Q19 LXIV, 6-13), Deuteronomy 21:22-23 was applied to crucifixion as a punishment for treason (see Chapman, 128-32).

The form and procedure of crucifixion varied considerably, and this gave free rein to executioners' sadistic ingenuity. Seneca bears witness to the variations in the method of crucifixion and the sadistic torture that often accompanied it: "I see before me crosses not all alike, but differently made by different peoples: some hang a man head downwards, some force a stick upwards through his groin, some stretch out his arms on a forked gibbet. I see cords, scourges, and instruments of torture for each limb and each joint: but I see death also" (Marc. 20.3). There were, however, certain "common" procedures and accompanying practices in Roman crucifixion. There was usually one vertical beam to which a crosspiece was attached either at the top to give the shape of a T (crux commissa) or just below the top, as in the form most familiar in Christian symbolism, † (crux immissa) (O'Collins, 1208-9). Other shapes, however, are also attested, such as crux decussata (X) and crux simplex (I). Various forms of torture usually preceded crucifixion. The victim often was forced to carry the cross to the place of execution, which was sometimes the location of the offense or outside the city (Cook 2013, 28), perhaps to symbolize ostracization from society. The victim was stripped, bound or nailed to the beam with outstretched arms. The feet or heels were bound or nailed to the upright beam. Sometimes a placard (titulus) was placed on the cross or around the victim's neck announcing the crime(s) (Suetonius, Cal. 32.2; cf. Mk 15:26). The victim may have had a seat (sedile) or a small wooden peg for a footrest that would prolong the torturous pain and stave off death by asphyxiation. Sometimes victims would remain alive for days, with death coming by either loss of blood (due to previous tortures) or asphyxiation.

2. The Crucifixion of Jesus.

The Gospels' passion narratives provide us with the most detailed accounts of Roman crucifixion. The basic presentation of Jesus' crucifixion and the events that immediately led up to it accord well with what we know from the limited literary descriptions of Roman crucifixions. That the Roman soldiers scourged Jesus (Mt 27:26; Mk 15:15) and stripped him of his clothes (Mt 27:28; Mk 15:16-17) would not have been considered unusual treatment (cf. Josephus, J.W. 2.306; 5.449; Ag. Ap. 1.191; 2.53; Livy, Hist. 2.5.8; 26.40.13; Cicero, Verr. 5.62.162; Tacitus, Hist. 3.77). The soldiers' mocking and ridiculing of Jesus as a pretender king have ample parallels in accounts of crucifixion (Philo, Flacc. 36-39) (see further 5.2 below). Victims often were forced to carry their crosses to the place of execution (Jn 19:17). However, according to the Synoptic Gospels, Simon of Cyrene was compelled to carry Jesus' cross at some point along the way (Mt 27:32; Mk 15:21; Lk 23:26), probably because Jesus was physically unable to do it after having been weakened and traumatized by the scourging. Although it is not explicitly stated, Jesus was nailed to the cross by his hands and feet (implied in Lk 24:39; Jn 20:27). Also consistent with normal protocol, a placard was placed on the cross outlining the "charges" that warranted crucifixion (Mt 27:37; Mk 15:26; Lk 23:38; Jn 19:19-20). That Jesus was crucified with two "brigands" (lēstēs) (Mt 27:38; Mk 15:27 [Lk 23:33 has kakourgos, "evildoer"]) is consistent with the kinds of crimes that would lead to crucifixion. Pilate allows Jesus' corpse to be removed the day of his crucifixion for proper Jewish burial (Mt 27:57-59; Mk 15:42-47; Lk 23:50-56; Jn 19:38-42), and this corresponds to the fact that Jews often were allowed to give proper burials to their own (Philo, Flacc. 83-86; cf. Deut 21:23), especially on feast days.

In addition to the limited literary remains of Roman crucifixions, we have one archeological remnant of a crucified victim from roughly the time of Jesus. In 1968 archeologists found four cave tombs at Giv'at ha-Mivtar (Ras el-Masaref), just north of Jerusalem. One of the skeletons was of a man named "Jehohanan," who was between twenty-four and twenty-eight years of age when he was crucified by the Romans in the A.D. 20s. It was originally concluded that Jehohanan's arms were nailed to the patibulum ["crossbeam"] through the forearms (Charlesworth). But now it appears that his arms were tied rather than nailed to the cross. Also, the initial investigation concluded that a nail penetrated Jehohanan's right and left heel bones, piercing the right heel bone (calcaneum) first, then the left. But it now appears that only the right heel bone was penetrated by the nail. And finally, Jehohanan's legs probably were not broken as a final act of mercy (coup de grâce) as previously thought (see Zias and Sekeles; Zias and Charlesworth). Differences in the precise method of Jehohanan's crucifixion and Jesus' crucifixion witness to the varied methods of Roman crucifixion. But this finding also provides concrete evidence that Pilate (or the centurion) allowed the burial of a crucified Jewish individual, just as the Gospels report happened in Jesus' case.

That Jesus was executed by the Romans as a would-be "king of the Jews" is considered by E. P. Sanders to be a "firm fact" of history (Sanders, 294). The most important text for this fact of history outside of the Gospels is Josephus's Jewish Antiquities 18.63-64. The pertinent lines are as follows: "And he [Jesus] gained a following both among Jews and among many of Greek origin. And when Pilate, because of an accusation made by the leading men among us, condemned him to the cross, those who loved him previously did not cease to do so." Josephus's account reveals that Jesus was in fact crucified under Pontius Pilate, and that Jesus' execution came about by some kind of cooperation between the Romans and Jewish "leading men" who made accusations against Jesus. Evidence for Jesus' crucifixion is also found in the Roman historian Tacitus's (A.D. 55/56-120) account of the fire of Rome (A.D. 64). He reveals that Nero blamed and punished Christians, "from whose name comes from Christ, who suffered the extreme penalty during the reign of Tiberius at the hands of the procurator Pontius Pilate, and a most mischievous superstition, thus checked for the moment, again broke out not only in Judea but also in Rome" (Ann. 15.44). Tacitus thus reports that Jesus was executed under Pilate by means of the "extreme penalty," which could only be crucifixion. The most relevant Jewish source, perhaps from the Tannaitic period (A.D. 10-220), is Sanhedrin 43a in the Babylonian Talmud, which states that Jesus was "hanged" on the eve of the Passover because he "practiced sorcery and enticed Israel to apostasy." Clearly, Jesus was crucified and not hanged, but his execution on the eve of the Passover corresponds to John's chronology (Jn 19:14).

3. Why Was Jesus Crucified?

Attempts to answer why Jesus was executed must account for the two players who had a hand in Jesus' arrest, trial and condemnation: Pilate and the Jewish authorities. As mentioned above, what Josephus tells us accords with what we find in the Gospels: Pilate authorized Jesus' execution, and he did so because "leading men among us" made certain "accusations" against Jesus (Ant. 18:63-64).

Why did the Jewish authorities perceive Jesus to be deserving of death? Scholars used to point to Jesus' controversies with the *Pharisees about the Torah as the impetus for Jesus' execution (see Dunn, 784-85). In fact, many controversies concerning halakhah issues feature the Pharisees (Mk 2:15-27 par.; Mk 3:6 // Mt 12:14 // Lk 6:11; Mk 7:1-23 // Mt 15:1-20 // Lk 11:37-41; Mk 8:11-13 // Mt 16:1-4; Mk 8:14-21 // Mt 6:5-12 [with the *Sadducees] // Lk 12:1 [Pharisees only]; Mk 10:2-12 // Mt 19:3-12; Mk 12:13-17 [Pharisees and Herodians] // Mt 22:15-22). In addition, Mark 3:6 plainly states that the Pharisees took counsel "as to how they might destroy him." But there is no evidence that the Pharisees ever tried to arrest or execute people for differing with them over Torah interpretation, nor did they have the political power to do so. Rather, it appears that the chief priests are the main instigators in the narratives of Jesus' arrest and his being delivered to the high priest and then to Pilate (Sanders, 309; Dunn, 784-85) (sometimes the *elders, *scribes [associated with the temple] and temple officers are present as well [the arrest: Mt 26:47-56; Mk 14:43-52; Lk 22:52; Jn 18:3; Jesus delivered to the high *priest: Mt 26:57-68; Mk 14:53-65; Jesus delivered to Pilate: Mt 27:1; Mk 15:1; Lk 22:66; 23:1]). The exceptions are Matthew 27:62 and John 18:3, where the Pharisees appear with the chief priests. This suggests that the main factors behind

Jesus' arrest and death sentence were not Torah controversies but rather issues surrounding the *temple and the priestly authorities who maintained the temple's function.

Many of Jesus' sayings and actions no doubt were viewed as being critical of the temple. For instance, Jesus' extending *forgiveness to the paralytic in Mark 2:5 (cf. Mt 9:2; Lk 5:20), especially if Jesus did such a thing on more than one occasion, would have outraged the temple priests because Jesus would be offering forgiveness outside the temple and the sacrificial cult officiated by the authorities. Furthermore, many of Jesus' activities could be judged as disregarding purity laws (see Clean and Unclean): he touched *lepers (Mk 1:40-45), a "dead" girl (Mk 5:41), and a woman with a hemorrhage (Mk 5:24-34); he had *table fellowship with tax collectors and sinners (Mk 2:16), and he did not follow purity washing rites (Mk 7:1-8, 14-23). But Jesus not only was known for compromising the temple cult and associated purity rites (see Dunn, 789; Theissen and Merz, 431-32); he actually threatened the temple establishment itself.

Most would agree that Jesus' demonstration in the temple (Mt 21:12-13; Mk 11:15-17; Lk 19:45-46), along with his pronouncement of the temple's destruction (Mt 24:2; Mk 13:2; Lk 21:6), amounted to the last straw for the chief priests. Immediately after Jesus' words in the temple (Mk 11:17) the chief priests and scribes "sought to destroy him" (Mk 11:18; Lk 19:47). Jesus' actions in the temple, especially if meant to symbolize its destruction, would have been seen as a threat to the temple itself, for even a minor gesture against the temple could elicit strong hostility or possibility the threat of death by the authorities (Sanders, 270-71, 302-3).

According to Mark, the chief priests' official charge leveled against Jesus at the hearing before the high priest was the following: "We heard him say, 'I will destroy this temple made with hands, and in three days I will build another made without hands'" (Mk 14:58 [cf. Mt 26:61]). Mark and Matthew maintain that this was a false charge. However, according to the Synoptics, Jesus did speak about the temple's demise (Mt 24:2; Mk 13:2; Lk 21:6). The closest testimony that we have to the chief priests' charge against Jesus is his saying in John 2:19: "Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up." Since the Johannean temple saying is likely to be authentic (see Becker, 329; Theissen and Merz, 432), there is every reason to believe that the chief priests' charge in Mark 14:58 was grounded in sayings of Jesus about the destruction (and restoration) of the temple (though Jesus never said that he himself would destroy the temple). That Jesus spoke about the temple's destruction would have been highly sensitive, both politically and theologically, especially for the temple *priests and Caiaphas, who maintained the temple establishment and for whom the temple was the power base. So Jesus' *temple action, along with his prophecy of its destruction, supplied the basis for bringing Jesus before Caiaphas (Dunn, 632-33; Theissen and Merz, 433).

Although the temple action seems to have pushed the chief priests over the edge regarding Jesus, it was Jesus' alleged *blasphemy that served as the legal offense to justify his death (Mt 26:65-66; Mk 14:63-64). In Jesus' hearing before the high priest, Caiaphas asked him, "Are you the Messiah, the son of the Blessed One?" (Mk 14:61). Jesus' response, which is met with the charge of blasphemy, follows: "I am; and you shall see the Son of Man sitting at the right hand of Power, and coming with the clouds of heaven" (Mk 14:62). It does not appear that Jesus' words here fall technically under the category of "blasphemy" that deserves death, since Jesus did not "blaspheme the Name" (Lev 24:16; m. Sanh. 7:5). However, blasphemy was used in a wider sense to indicate any insult against God and especially ascribing to oneself prerogatives that belong to God alone (Brown 1994, 523; Hagner, 2:801; Bock, 77-78). Jesus' words here, with their allusions to Psalm 110:1 and Daniel 7:13, could have been perceived as a claim to do just that: when Jesus is vindicated, he will take his place alongside Yahweh (cf. Dan 7:13), thus threatening the unique otherness of God (cf. Mt 9:2-6; Mk 2:5-10; Lk 5:20-24; Jn 10:30-33) (Dunn, 751-52; Golden, 66).

What convinced Pilate to authorize Jesus' crucifixion? Jesus' trial before Pilate focused on Jesus' claim to kingship (Mt 27:11; Mk 15:2; Lk 23:3; Jn 18:33), sometimes combined with the claim to be the Messiah (Mt 27:17, 22; Lk 23:1) (see Christ). Although implied in Mark and Matthew, it is Luke and John that emphasize the political nature of Jesus' kingship and the threat that it would have been to Rome. In Luke 23:2 the chief priests and scribes charge Jesus with sedition. They testify that Jesus was "forbidding us from paying taxes to the emperor, and saying that he himself is the Messiah, a king." The former charge was a false accusation (cf. Lk 20:20-26). But even the possibility that a person, especially one with a following, had spoken against paying taxes to the emperor and had claimed to be a king would have amounted to a direct challenge to the emperor's sole rule (see Rome). In John 19:12 Pilate is portrayed as wanting to release Jesus, but he is forced to act on the basis of this charge leveled at him by Jesus' opponents: "If you release this man, you are no friend of Caesar; everyone who makes himself out to be a king opposes Caesar." To Roman ears Jesus would be claiming to be the authentic king instead of Caesar (Blinzler, 213).

The setting and timing of Jesus' trial would be even more reason for Pilate to give into the pressure to do away with the Jewish troublemaker. Flocks of people descended on *Jerusalem at Passover, and so the threat of popular unrest, and even desires for God's deliverance from foreign occupation, would have been heightened. Josephus describes the tense atmosphere in Jerusalem during such occasions, "when the multitude came together to Jerusalem, to the feast of unleavened bread, and a Roman cohort stood over the cloisters of the temple, for they always were armed and kept guard at the festivals, to prevent any sedition which the multitude thus gathered together might make" (J.W. 2.224). Josephus also notes that Roman authorities had little patience with Jewish prophetic figures (Ant. 20:97-98, 167-70; J.W. 2.258-63), and he maintains that most crucifixions in Palestine were political executions that functioned to put down seditious movements (cf. Ant. 17.295; J.W. 2.253) (see Revolutionary Movements).

It is likely, then, that Pilate would have moved against Jesus even over an accusation that he was a political "rebel" with seditious motives (similarly Sanders, 304). The fact that Jesus was crucified with two "rebels" or "brigands" (lēstēs) (Mt 27:38; Mk 15:27), and that the placard on the cross announced his crime, "king of the Jews," supports the conclusion that Jesus' crucifixion was a political one (Cook 2011, 197-98; Bruce, 17). This background encourages us to take seriously the Johannine account of the *Sanhedrin's fear that if Jesus continued to gain a following, the Romans could hold Jerusalem and its leadership accountable (Jn 11:48). In a move of political expediency, Caiaphas concludes that the miracle worker Jesus must be sacrificed (Jn 11:50).

4. Dating the Crucifixion.

The Gospels agree that Jesus was crucified on a Friday, the day before the *Sabbath (Mt 27:62; Mk 15:42; Lk 23:54; Jn 19:31, 42). The difficulty arises as to how this Friday relates to the Passover. The Synoptics clearly say that the *Last Supper was the Passover meal (Mt 26:18-19; Lk 14:12; Mk 14:12), Nisan 14. This means that Jesus' arrest, trial, death and burial took place on Friday, the Passover of Nisan 15. But for John, Jesus was crucified on the "day of preparation for Passover" (Jn 18:28; 19:14), Nisan 14. Since the Jewish day began at sunset, the Passover would have been eaten after the crucifixion in the early evening of Friday, Nisan 15 (see Chronology).

Some have suggested that the discrepancy may be understood on the basis of different reckonings of a "day" according to different calendar observances. For instance, Galileans, Pharisees and Mark, all of whom followed a Galilean calendar, understood a day from sunrise to sunrise. Thus, Jesus and the disciples would have eaten the Passover meal on Thursday evening, Nisan 14. Judeans, Sadducees and John, all of whom followed a Judean calendar, considered a day from sunset to sunset. Thus, the meal would have been celebrated on Friday evening, Nisan 15. The problem with these options is that they demand that there would have been two days of Passover sacrifices, which is highly unlikely. Others point to the theological motivations that stand behind the different chronologies: Mark wanted to make the Last Supper a Passover meal, and John was determined to portray Jesus as the final Passover sacrifice. A variant of this option is to argue that John's timing of Jesus' death is basically correct: Jesus died on Nisan 14 during the slaughter of the Passover lambs (Jn 19:31), but he celebrated the Last Supper earlier than the time of the Passover meal on Nisan 15, perhaps a day earlier or sometime during the Passover week. This would mean that Mark adjusted the Last Supper to make it a Passover meal (McKnight, 270-71). In this scenario Mark was not entirely unjustified in identifying the Last Supper with the Passover meal, since it probably was Jesus' intention to evoke Passover in his last meal even if it did not happen precisely on the day when Jews were eating their Passover meal. Regardless of the merit of this last view, the important fact remains that all four Gospels clearly associate Jesus' death with Israel's Passover, and in this regard the Gospels are in fundamental agreement.

What year was Jesus crucified? We know that Pontius Pilate was prefect of Judea during the years A.D. 26-36/37. If we follow the data from astronomical calculations (e.g., the Jewish table of new moons), we are left with two alternatives. On Johannine reckoning, Jesus was crucified on Nisan 14, April 7, A.D. 30, or April 3, A.D. 33. But on the Synoptic chronology, A.D. 34 or 27 is more likely (Donfried, 1016). If we follow the near consensus that John's chronology is preferable, then we are left with April 3, A.D. 33, or April 7, A.D. 30. It is notoriously difficult to choose between these valid options, and good arguments support both (for A.D. 30, see Meier, 406-7; Donfried, 1016; for A.D. 33, see Maier, 126; Riesner, 57-58). In the final analysis, the following conclusion probably is best: "The various data do not, then, allow us at this time to decide the matter with certainty. But the A.D. 30 date is slightly preferable" (Carson, Moo and Morris, 127).

5. The Death of Jesus in Mark's Gospel.

Mark presents Jesus as the suffering Messiah whose ignoble death on a Roman cross, rather than shaming him, revealed his identity as God's *Son (Mk 15:39). Furthermore, Jesus' way of suffering and death, ordained by his Father, forms the pattern of true *discipleship and brings about redemption for his people.

5.1. The Death of Jesus in the Plot of Mark's Gospel. The beginning of Mark's Gospel (Mk 1:1-13) identifies Jesus as the messianic Son of God (Mk 1:1), who will bring about *God's promises to redeem his people (Mk 1:2-3; cf. Is 40:3). Jesus is empowered by God's Spirit (Mk 1:10) and authorized by the Father as his Son (Mk 1:11) to proclaim the arrival of God's rule (Mk 1:15) in his ministry, suffering, death and resurrection. Jesus' ministry is carried out in the context of intense conflict with the Jewish religious leaders (Kingsbury 1989, 55), though others (the crowd, Judas, Herod, Pilate) play important roles. There are indications early on that this conflict will lead to Jesus' death. *John the Baptist's arrest (Mk 1:14) and execution by Herod Antipas (Mk 6:16) foreshadow Jesus' own arrest and crucifixion by Pilate (Mk 10:33; 14:41; 15:1, 10, 15), and Jesus' veiled statement about the bridegroom in Mark 2:20 points to the fact that the conflict with the religious leaders will end in his death.

The Sabbath controversy (Mk 3:1-6) ends with the note that the Pharisees "took counsel with the Herodians against him as to how they might destroy him." This prepares for the *passion narrative (Mk 14:1-15:47), in which Rome (represented by Pilate) and the Jewish religious leaders (represented by the high priest) will come together to bring about Jesus' crucifixion. The second half of Mark's Gospel narrates Jesus' journey to Jerusalem (Mk 8:27-10:52) and ends with his arrest, suffering, death and resurrection (Mk 11:1-16:8). Here the conflict reaches its resolution in Jesus' death and resurrection (Kingsbury 1989, 42, 55). Despite his rejection by his people, Jesus is the messianic Son of God (Mk 1:1, 11; 9:7), and his crucifixion, suffering and death are consistent with God's redemptive plan in Scripture.

Jesus' passion predictions (Mk 8:31; 9:9-13, 31; 10:33-34) are located in Mark's central section (Mk 8:22-10:52), in which Jesus' teachings emphasize discipleship as he moves toward his fate in Jerusalem (Mk 11:1-15:47). The Markan passion predictions share several common elements: as the *Son of Man, Jesus will suffer, be mistreated, rejected, put to death and then vindicated from the grave (Mk 8:31; 9:9-12, 31; 10:33-34), all of which accords with the divine plan (cf. the divine "must" [dei] in Mk 8:31; 9:12) and Scripture (Mk 9:13; 14:21). There continues to be debate concerning the scriptural background to the passion predictions. Were they primarily modeled on the Suffering Servant in Isaiah 53 (Jeremias 1971) (see Servant of Yahweh), the Son of Man in Daniel 7 (Moule; Hooker; Barrett) or the suffering righteous one in the psalms of lament (Pesch)?

In Mark 9:11-13 Jesus relates his suffering and death as the Son of Man to the eschatological figure of *Elijah. Jesus affirms the tradition of the eschatological coming of Elijah (Mk 9:12) and identifies John the Baptist with Elijah (cf. Mk 6:15; 8:28) when he says, "Elijah has come, and they did to him whatever they wished, just as it is written of him" (Mk 9:13). The reference here is to John's rejection by Israel's leaders and his execution by Herod Antipas (cf. Mk 1:14; 6:25-28). Thus, the fate of John the Baptist, as Elijah, parallels Jesus' fate (cf. Mk 6:14-17; 11:29-32) as the Son of Man (Mk 9:12). Some scholars believe that it is significant that Malachi 4:5-6 and some early Jewish texts (Sir 48:10-11; 4Q521; 4Q558; 4 Ezra 6:24-26) link Elijah's coming with the eschatological time of distress (see Bryan, 92-103; Pitre, 181-85), so that Jesus' suffering and death, as well as his forerunner's (Mk 1:2-15; 6:14-29; 9:12-13), may be understood in the context of the eschatological time of distress.

That the Son of Man must "suffer many things" and "be treated with contempt" (Mk 9:12) has directed interpreters to the similar treatment of the Suffering Servant in Isaiah 52:13-53:12 (France 2002; Cranfield). It is telling that Mark's verb exoudenēō ("to treat with contempt") in Mark 9:12 (only here in the NT) is used of the Suffering Servant in Isaiah 53:3 (he will "be treated with contempt") in the LXX versions of Aquila, Symmachus and Theodotion. However, the noun form (exoudenēma, "object of contempt") of Mark's verb is also used of the righteous sufferer in LXX Psalm 21:7 (MT Ps 22:7; ET 22:6) (Pesch), and this psalm as well as other lament psalms will be important in Mark 15.

Three other important elements are present in Mark's passion predictions: Jesus will be "delivered over" (paradidōmi) to his death (Mk 9:31; 10:33; 14:21, 41), and he will rise again "after three days" (Mk 8:31; 9:31; 10:34), all as the "Son of Man." That Jesus will be "delivered over" seems to derive from LXX Isaiah 53:6, 12 (Collins 2007; Marcus 1993), though it could have been inspired by LXX Daniel 7:25 (Allison; Evans; McKnight).

Jesus' predictions of vindication "after three days" seem to allude to Hosea 6:2 (Proctor; Evans; Delling), which probably was already interpreted as a reference to God raising his people from the dead. The later Hosea Targum interprets Hosea 6:2 eschatologically as a promise of Israel's resurrection from the dead, and as such the Hosea Targum stands in the interpretive trajectory that associates resurrection with eschatological national restoration (cf. Ezek 37; Dan 12) (Macintosh; Wright 2003) (see Exile and Restoration). This eschatological interpretation of Hosea 6:2 may have circulated in the time of Jesus (Bayer; Evans), and if this is a/the background to the phrase "after three days," then Jesus' resurrection vindication would be the beginning of the new age of resurrection of God's restored people. Some have argued that "after three days" could allude to the "time, times, and half a time" in Daniel 7:25 (Allison; McKnight; Pitre), which points to the divinely limited period in which God's people undergo eschatological distress (cf. Dan 7:21, 23-25; 12:1) until vindication (through resurrection [Dan 12:1-3]) and the arrival of the kingdom (Dan 7:18, 27; 12:1-3, 13). Since these two possible scriptural backgrounds (Hos 6:2 [and its later interpretations] and Dan 7:25) to Mark's "after three days" concern God's vindication of his people in his divinely set time frame, they are not mutually exclusive.

The unifying aspect of the passion *predictions is that Jesus suffers, dies and is vindicated as the Danielic Son of Man. The structure and movement of the eschatological scenario in Daniel 7—12 and the passion predictions are similar (see Allison): the saints of the Most High, identified with the Son of Man, are delivered into the time of distress and suffering (Dan 7:19-21) but will, in God's timing, receive the kingdom and final vindication (Dan 7:22, 27; 12:1-3). Similarly, Jesus the Son of Man, as the representative of the messianic community, will be delivered into the hands of his enemies only to be vindicated by resurrection from the grave after three days.

Mark 10:45 is unique in that Jesus, for the first time, clearly indicates the saving significance of his death: the Son of Man came "to give his life as a ransom [lytron] for many." Jesus' service of others by giving his life for them (Mk 10:45) provides the basis or ground (gar [Mk 10:45]) for his expectation that his disciples will likewise give their lives in service to others (Mk 10:43-44). Thus, the Son of Man's way of suffering and death is the pattern for life in God's kingdom (cf. Mk 8:31-38). Although some scholars have not been convinced (e.g., Hooker; Barrett; Gundry 1993), many see the terminology in Mark 10:45 ("serving," "giving life," "ransom [lytron] for many") as evocative of LXX Isaiah 53:10-12 (Collins; France 2002; Jeremias 1971). Although Mark's lytron ("ransom") is not a translation of ʾāšām ("guilt offering" or "offering for sin") in Isaiah 53:10, some interpreters argue that the semantic domain of lytron can approximate the notion of ʾāšām (Davies and Allison; Evans; Moo; Jeremias 1971), so that in Mark 10:45 Jesus' giving of his life as a ransom for many essentially fulfills the task of the Servant of the Lord (Cullmann; Watts; France 2002; Davies and Allison; Evans). The presence of Isaiah 53 in the passion narrative (e.g., Is 53:7 in Mk 14:16; 15:5; Is 53:12 in Mk 14:48; 15:27; Is 53:9 in Mk 15:43-46; for additional parallels, see Edwards; Marcus 1993) often is highlighted to support further the Isaianic background of Mark 10:45. In addition to the general connections between Mark 10:45 and Isaiah 53:10-12, lytron can be used as a synonym for "expiation" or "propitiation" (esp. LXX Ex 21:29; 30:11-16) (Collins 2009; Jeremias 1971), and the verb lytroō ("to ransom, redeem") is used often of God's redemptive release of *Israel from the bondage of exile (Ps 78:42; Is 43:14, 22, 23; 51:10-11; 52:3, 9; Jer 31:11; Mic 4:10; 6:4; Zech 10:8), a redemptive activity that implies dealing with Israel's sins (Pitre, 412-13). If lytron in Mark 10:45 draws on these Septuagintal uses, Jesus would be giving his life as a lytron ("ransom") understood metaphorically as an atonement for the sins of many (Collins 2009) in fulfillment of prophetic promises of Israel's second-exodus restoration.

What of the indications that Jesus gives his life as the Danielic Son of Man in Mark 10:45? One of the problems with seeing Daniel 7 as a background to Mark 10:45 is that the exalted son of man in Daniel 7 is served by others, but Jesus as the Son of Man in Mark 10:45 serves others by dying for them. Mark (and Jesus) may have intended a reference to the Danielic Son of Man in order to redefine the son of man in light of Jesus' destiny as the Suffering Servant of the Lord (Black). That is, Jesus will fulfill the full destiny of the glorified and powerful Son of Man (cf. Mk 13:26; 14:62), but only after he has suffered and died.

In the end, it is best to conclude that, in regard to Mark's passion predictions in general and Mark 10:45 in particular, Mark (and perhaps traditions before him and Jesus himself) has drawn together various streams of scriptural expectation (lament psalms; Is 53; Dan 7) to interpret Jesus' sufferings and vindication (Davies and Allison; Marcus 1993; Telford; Bayer) (see Old Testament in the Gospels).

5.2. The Death of Jesus in Mark's Passion Narrative. The religious leaders' opposition to Jesus reaches its climax in the passion narrative (Mk 14:1–15:47). Having concluded that Jesus must be eliminated, the temple authorities instigate Jesus' arrest (Mk 14:46–49), his hearing before the high priest (Mk 14:53–65) and his trial before Pilate (Mk 15:1–14), all of which lead to Pilate's decision, in capitulation to the chief priests and the crowd, to crucify Jesus (Mk 15:11–15). For Mark, these events are fulfillments of Jesus' words in Mark 10:34 as well as God's will revealed in the Scriptures (Mk 14:49).

With his arrest and crucifixion looming, Jesus calls his disciples together for the Last Supper (Mk 14:22–25). The supper is placed in the context of Israel's Passover feast (Mk 14:1, 12–16; cf. Mt 26:17–25; Lk 22:7–23) and is identified as the Passover meal (Mk 14:12–18; cf. Mt 26:17–20; Lk 22:8–15). With the normal Passover lamb absent from this meal, Jesus' words "This is my body" (Mk 14:22) suggest that he interprets the Passover lamb in terms of himself (Jeremias 1966). It would follow, then, that Jesus' interpretation of the cup is intended to evoke the blood of the Passover lamb (Ex 12:7, 13). Jesus reinterprets Israel's great paradigmatic experience of deliverance in light of the giving of his own life "for many" (Mk 14:24; cf. Mk 10:45). Now God's final act of deliverance, a kind of second exodus, is centered on Jesus as the eschatological Passover sacrifice (Jeremias 1966), a sacrifice that constitutes the new messianic people of God around the Jesus the Messiah. As the Last Supper commemorates this second-exodus event in Jesus' death, it also points ahead to an eschatological meal "in the kingdom of God" (Mk 14:25 [cf. Mt 26:29; Lk 22:16, 18]).

After Jesus' trial Pilate orders the soldiers to scourge and crucify Jesus. The treatment of Jesus that follows (Mk 15:17–19, 29–32) and, of course, the crucifixion itself (Mk 15:22–25) probably echo the abuse of the Suffering Servant (Is 50:6, 53:7–9) (Dodd; Lindars; Green 1988), but similar echoes can also be found in the experiences of the suffering righteous in the psalms (Ps 22:7; 31:18–24; 35:15–16; 70:5; 102:8). From the soldiers' perspective, their treatment of Jesus in Mark 15:17–19 is aimed at mocking his kingly aspirations. This fact may parallel similar parodic treatment of royal figures in the ancient world. Philo's account of the Alexandrians' treatment of Karrabas contains some remarkable parallels with Jesus' treatment by the soldiers (Flacc. 36–39). In Mark, the soldiers dress Jesus in purple and place a crown of thorns on his head (Mk 15:17), all meant to parody Hellenistic royalty (Jeremias 1966; Mann). Having dressed Jesus as a king, the soldiers pay homage to him with the exclamation "Hail, king of the Jews!" (Mk 15:18), imitating the customary Latin royal acclamation, Ave Caesar ("Hail, Caesar") (Mann; Evans, who cites Suetonius, Claud. 21:6; see also Philo, Flacc. 39). The soldiers continue their royal parody by genuflecting before Jesus as if he were a king (Mk 15:19). The reed used to beat Jesus' head was a stand-in for a scepter (Mk 15:19).

After Jesus is led to Golgotha (Mk 15:22), he is offered "wine mixed with myrrh," but he does not take it (Mk 15:23). Some have argued that the substance was intended as an anesthetic agent to dull the pain (Mann; Brown 1994). Appeal is often made to the merciful provision of "strong drink" and "wine" for the dying and suffering in Proverbs 31:6, cited in later Jewish tradition for this reason (b. Sanh. 43a). Jesus' refusal of the drink would then suggest his active acceptance of the Father's cup of suffering for him (cf. Mk 10:38; 14:36) (Cranfield). But the "strong drink" (methē) and "wine" (oinos) in LXX Proverbs 31:6 is not the "wine mixed with myrrh" in Mark 15:23. There is little evidence that "myrrh" was an analgesic agent (Gould; Evans), and the context (Mk 15:16–22) strongly suggests that it was the soldiers, who express no desire to alleviate Jesus' suffering, who offered Jesus the drink. Another interpretation suggests that the offer was a form of torture (Kostenniemi, Nisula and Toppari). Although this view makes sense in the context of the soldiers' ill treatment of Jesus, it rests on the unproven premise that a large amount of myrrh was used in the wine, which would make it impossible to consume. Some evidence suggests that wine mixed with myrrh was a delicacy. According to Pliny the Elder, "The finest wines in early days were those spiced with the scent of myrrh" (Nat. 14.15.92 [cf. Nat. 14.19.107]). If this is the substance referred to in Mk 15:23, then soldiers would be offering a drink fit for royalty as another gesture of mockery aimed at Jesus' supposed kingship (Evans).

The final act of kingly mockery is the crucifixion itself (Mk 15:25–27). In the Greco-Roman world crucifixion functioned as a parody of kingly enthronement (Marcus 2006), and this is precisely what we find in Mark. On the cross, Jesus is flanked on his right and left by his royal entourage, in the persons of two brigands (Mk 15:27), recalling James and John's request to sit at Jesus' right and left "in your glory" (Mk 10:37) (cf. Philo, Flacc. 38). Jesus is raised or, better, enthroned high on a cross (Marcus 2006; Schmidt; Nickelsburg), with the charge “king of the Jews” (“above his head” [Mt 27:37]). The Markan irony is deafening. The mockery of Jesus’ kingship by the soldiers, the passers-by and the chief priests (Mk 15:17-32) unwittingly but correctly identifies Jesus as Israel’s king (Green 1988). The crucifixion as a mockery of enthronement turns out to be Jesus’ exaltation as God’s messianic Son, correctly recognized by, of all people, a Roman centurion (Mk 15:39).

Psalms of lament dominate Mark 15, associating Jesus’ suffering with the figure in the psalms (Marcus 1993; Landowska) (cf. Ps 22:18 in Mk 15:24; Ps 22:7 in Mk 15:29; Ps 22:1 in Mk 15:34; Ps 69:21 in Mk 15:36). One such psalm is quoted by Jesus before his last breath: “My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?” (Ps 22:1 [LXX 21:2] in Mk 15:34). It may be that the entirety of Psalm 22 is being evoked so that Jesus’ sense of abandonment would be read in light of the psalmist’s renewed faith in God and the vindication at the end of the psalm (Ps 22:25-31) (Dodd; Marcus 1993). But this possibility should not deflect from the fact that Jesus quotes only the first verse of Psalm 22, in which the psalmist communicates his real sense of abandonment from God and struggle in his suffering (cf. Mk 14:36). In first-century A.D. Judaism the sufferer in the psalms of lament was King David himself. Thus, the laments in these psalms would have been understood as David’s laments (Ahearne-Kroll). By associating Jesus’ experiences of suffering and abandonment with the similar experience of David in the lament psalms, Mark has undercut the dominant view of the Messiah as a militant Davidic king (cf. Pss. Sol. 17) with another tradition about King David: his sufferings and sense of abandonment. In the end, Jesus, like David in Psalm 22, did not ultimately lose trust in God (Evans, 507).

After Jesus’ cry of Psalm 22:1, some of the bystanders said, “He is calling for Elijah” (Mk 15:35), after which “someone” (tis) ran and soaked a sponge with “sour wine” (oxos) and attempted to get Jesus to drink it (Mk 15:36). It is not entirely clear how this attempt is related to what is said in the next line: “Permit me; let us see if Elijah comes to take him down” (Mk 15:36). The offer of “sour wine” is likely the last of the Markan evocations of a lament psalm (Moo; Juel): LXX Psalm 68:22 (MT 69:22; ET 69:21). “Sour wine” (oxos) was an ordinary drink (Pliny the Elder, Nat. 23.27.54-55; see BDAG; Brown 1994; Cranfield; Lane cites Num 6:3; Ruth 2:14) used for quenching thirst (Plutarch, Lives 2.306-7) in the ancient world. Accordingly, the offerer would be hoping to extend Jesus’ life to see if Elijah would appear (Collins 2007; Pesch). This could be read as a genuine hope to see the eschatological Elijah usher in the kingdom (cf. Mal 4:5; Mk 6:15; 8:28; 9:11-12; 15:35), but the Markan context suggests that the Elijah comment is also mockery. Furthermore, the motivation of those who offer sour wine in Psalm 68:22 is clearly one of ill treatment (cf. LXX Ps 68:22 [MT 69:22; ET 69:21]). Thus, it must be judged that the offer of sour wine is another gesture mocking Jesus’ supposed kingship (Brown 1994) and thus supports the Markan ironic contrast between Jesus’ shameful treatment and his true identity as Israel’s king. This certainly is how Luke understood Mark (Lk 23:36).

Jesus’ sense of abandonment evident in his words from the cross (Mk 15:34) and his agonizing death (Mk 15:37) are accompanied by two *apocalyptic events: darkness falling over the land (Mk 15:33), probably indicating *judgment (cf. Joel 2:2, 31; Amos 8:9; Zeph 1:15) (Brown 1994), and the tearing of the temple’s veil (Mk 15:38), the significance of which is less clear. That the veil was “torn” (schizō) recalls the theophany in Mark 1:10-11, where the heavens were “torn open” (schizō) and God speaks. Thus, the tearing of the veil, whatever else it may symbolize, suggests that God is not absent after all from the events surrounding the crucifixion. Many have interpreted the tearing of the temple’s veil as a sign that Jesus’ atoning death has made God’s temple presence available to all (Hagner, 2:849), with the result that the temple cult is no longer needed (Kingsbury 1989, 54). Recent research has shown that the temple’s inner “veil” (katapetasma), which certainly is in view here (cf. Mt 27:51), functioned to separate the holy of holies (the location of God’s presence) from the holy place, or, the holy (God) from the less holy (human-kind) (Ex 36:31-33; cf. Lev 16:2, 15) (Gurtner). Jesus’ death in Mark 15:37, which seems to effect the tearing of the veil in Mark 15:38, would be seen as removing the prohibition against access to the holy God. But in the narrative context the symbolism may also indicate a sign of judgment, first on the temple (Senior 1991, 126-29; Evans, 509) as the seat of the temple authorities (chief priests, scribes, elders) who make up the main opposition to Jesus (Mk 11:18, 27) (Pesch, 2:498-99), and also on those who carry out Jesus’ arrest (Mk 14:43, 55; 15:1). God’s judgment on the temple symbolized by the tearing of the veil is a precursor to the temple’s complete destruction predicted by Jesus in Mark 13:2 because the temple authorities who represent Israel have rejected God’s messianic Son. The tearing of the temple’s veil therefore indicates God’s displeasure but also his desire to draw people into his gracious presence made possible by the death of his Son (Green 1988).

The events at the cross end with a confession-like statement from the centurion who saw Jesus die: "Truly this man was (the) Son of God" (Mk 15:39). On the narrative level, the Roman centurion has observed all the events leading up to Jesus' last breath, and his response contrasts sharply with the chief priests, scribes and the Jewish crowd (Kingsbury 1989, 129). Regardless of what a Roman centurion could have meant by such designation ("son of God"), his statement in Mark (cf. Mt 27:54) amounts to extreme irony. Whereas the Roman soldiers disrespect Jesus by mocking his kingship (Mk 15:16-26) and crucifying him as a pretend king (Mk 15:24), a centurion, of far higher rank, agrees with Mark and, most importantly, with *God the Father about the true identity of Jesus. In the midst of the sadistic, dishonorable and parodic treatment of Jesus' crucifixion, his dignity and identity as God's messianic Son remain intact. Jesus' glory shines through his suffering and death (Gundry 1993; Marcus 2006; Evans).

6. The Death of Jesus in Matthew's Gospel.

Jesus' sacrificial death in Matthew's Gospel is the ultimate fulfillment of the divine plan to save the Messiah's people from their sins (Mt 1:21; 26:28). Although he is the innocent Son of God, Jesus will not buckle under satanic temptation to forgo his Father's will for him to suffer and die for his people. What is more, the event of the cross in Matthew is a unique apocalyptic event in which the prophetic promises of Israel's restoration as resurrection are inaugurated.

6.1. The Death of Jesus in the Plot of Matthew's Gospel. The phrase "from that time Jesus began" in Matthew 4:17; 16:21 has long been recognized as an important structural clue to the Gospel of Matthew (Kingsbury 1988; Powell). While Matthew 4:17 formally marks the beginning of Jesus' public ministry, Matthew 16:21 comprises the first passion *prediction, in which Jesus "began to show his disciples that he must go to Jerusalem, and suffer many things from the elders and chief priests and scribes, and be killed, and be raised up on the third day." As such, at Matthew 16:21, the narrative shifts in focus to Jesus' impending passion in Jerusalem. These two indicators of narrative flow, Matthew 4:17 ("preaching") and Matthew 16:21 ("passion"), are significant to Matthew's plot and reveal the importance of Jesus' death for Matthew's story (Powell). At the beginning of the Gospel the narrator says, "And she will bear a Son; and you shall call his name Jesus, for it is he who will save his people from their sins" (Mt 1:21). We are not told how *salvation from sins will be accomplished or that it is in any way connected to Jesus' death. However, when the reader reaches the Last Supper and hears Jesus say that his blood is poured out "for many for forgiveness of sins" (Mt 26:28), it becomes apparent that Matthew 1:21; 26:28 form a kind of frame around the story and thereby suggest that the promise in Matthew 1:21 is ultimately fulfilled in Jesus' death, which effects the forgiveness of sins (Mt 26:28) (Gurtner, 127-28). It is now clear why Jesus "must" go to Jerusalem and die (Mt 16:21).

The real conflict in Matthew's story is between God and Satan, a conflict that forms the main plot line (Powell) (see Demon, Devil, Satan). This plot line is played out through two subplots: Jesus' conflict with the religious leaders and his conflict with his disciples. In the temptation narrative (Mt 4:1-11) Satan attempts to thwart God's purposes in his Son made clear in Matthew 1:21. Immediately after God declares Jesus to be his "beloved Son" at the *baptism (Mt 3:17), Satan tempts Jesus precisely as God's Son (Mt 4:3, 6). Satan's *temptations are aimed at Jesus' exercising of his sonship in a way that would bypass the necessity of suffering (cf. Mt 16:21). In the passion narrative we hear the temptations of Satan in the words of the passers-by: "If you are the Son of God, come down from the cross" (Mt 27:40; cf. Mt 26:63). The taunt in Matthew 27:43 also echoes Satan's temptation in Matthew 4:6. After having confessed Jesus as "the Christ, the Son of God" (Mt 16:16) and having heard that Jesus "must" suffer and die (Mt 16:21), Peter unwittingly takes the view of Satan when he rebukes Jesus for saying that he would have to die (Mt 16:22). This confirms that Satan's goal is for Jesus to renounce suffering and death, but Jesus will not forgo the cross because he is determined to provide forgiveness for his people's sins (Mt 26:28).

After Jesus' temptation and before the beginning of his ministry (Mt 4:17), Matthew tells us that "when he heard that John had been taken into custody, he withdrew into Galilee" (Mt 4:12). Later, John is killed by Herod Antipas (Mt 14:10), and again Matthew states that "when Jesus heard it, he withdrew from there in a boat" (Mt 14:13). The reader can see here a connection between the adversity that John experienced and the adversity threatening Jesus (cf. Mt 11:18-19). If John the Baptist, the "greatest" prophet (Mt 11:11-12) and the preparer for the Messiah, has been defeated in death, then God's Son may be at risk by the powers as well.

Although the first allusion to Jesus' impending death comes in the "bridegroom" saying in Matthew 9:14-17, the first sign that Jesus' conflict with the religious leaders will end in his death is found in the controversy with the Pharisees about the Sabbath (Mt 12:1-14). At the end of the story the Pharisees plan how they might "destroy him" (Mt 12:14). Following this, in response to the scribes' and Pharisees' request for a sign, Jesus offers the *"sign of Jonah" (Mt 12:40). Although not so clear at this point in the narrative, certainly at the end of the story (cf. Mt 27:63) the sign of Jonah would be seen as a reference to Jesus' death and probably also his resurrection (Mt 12:39-40).

The first passion prediction, in Matthew 16:21 (cf. Mt 17:12, 22-23; 20:18; 26:2, 24), makes explicit what is implicit in the sign of Jonah (Mt 12:40): Jesus the Messiah must suffer, die and be raised from the dead. Matthew sees this as a divine necessity (dei, "it is necessary"), as did Mark. Also as in Mark, Jesus' way to the cross is the way of discipleship in which one must take up a cross and follow Jesus (Mt 16:24). This is also made clear in Matthew's "ransom" saying but in a slightly different way than in Mark 10:45. Matthew uses a comparison: "just as" (hōsper) the Son of Man serves the needs of others by giving his life as a ransom for many, so also should his disciples (Mt 20:26-28).

6.2. The Passion Narrative in Matthew's Gospel.

Matthew follows Mark in setting Jesus' passion in the context of Israel's Passover feast (Mt 26:1-2, 17-19, 20-29). One of the most distinctive Matthean elements is found in Jesus' words at the Last Supper. After giving the cup to the disciples, Jesus states, "This is my blood of the covenant, which is poured out for many for forgiveness of sins" (Mt 26:28). The unique Matthean phrase "for forgiveness of sins" functions as a flashback to and an inclusio with the stated purpose of Jesus' ministry in Matthew 1:21: "he will save his people from their sins." This means that Jesus' death is the supreme soteriological event in Matthew. The same biblical background discussed in relation to Mark 14:24 is operative for the phrase "my blood of the covenant" in Matthew 26:28 in that it likely alludes to the covenant-renewal ceremony in Exodus 24:8 and perhaps also to the sin-offering rituals in which blood played an important role and the forgiveness of sins is said to be the result of the rituals (Lev 4:13-35; 5:11-13; cf. Lev 16:15-16, 19; Num 15:22-26, 27-28). What may support Exodus 24:8 as the primary background for Matthew is the cry of the people in Matthew 27:25: "His blood be on us and our children." This cry may have an ironic double meaning (Hamilton) in that the people accept guilt for the shedding of Jesus' blood, but at the same time Jesus' cleansing blood is applied to these guilty Israelites just as the sacrificial blood is sprinkled "on" (al) Israel in Exodus 24:8.

At Jesus' hearing before the high priest, Caiaphas begins the proceedings with the following question: "I adjure you by the living God, that you tell us whether you are the Christ, the Son of God" (Mt 26:63). Jesus' responds in two parts. First, his response in Matthew 26:64a, "You have said so" (su eipas), confirms the truth implied in Caiaphas's question (cf. Mt 26:25) (Senior 1998, 213). Second, Jesus makes further claims about himself: "Nevertheless I tell you, from now on you will see the Son of Man sitting at the right hand of Power, and coming on the clouds of heaven" (Mt 26:64b). Jesus' statement here is a combination of Psalm 110:1 and Daniel 7:13. Prior to the passion narration, *"Son of Man" referred mainly to Jesus' rejection and suffering (cf. Mt 8:20; 11:19; 12:40; 17:12, 22-23; 20:18), but the designation is also used to refer to Jesus when he returns as the eschatological judge (Mt 16:27-28; 24:27, 30-31), and this is the reference in his response to Caiaphas. Also as in Mark, Jesus is charged with *blasphemy, which in turns warrants his death (Mt 26:65-66). It is likely that the same theological issues that we observed in Mark 14:61-64 stand behind the charge of blasphemy here in Matthew.

From this point on there is a striking emphasis on bloodguilt and Jesus' "blood" (Mt 27:6, 8, 24, 25), particularly his "innocent blood" (Mt 27:4, 14, 19). Judas confesses his complicity in "betraying innocent blood" (Mt 27:4), and his money is identified as "blood money" (timē haimatos [Mt 27:6]). The reader has already been told in Jesus' rebuke of the scribes and Pharisees (Mt 23) that these leaders stand in a long line with their ancestors of persecuting, "crucifying" and shedding the blood of God's messengers (Mt 23:34). The crucifixion of Jesus is, of course, the apex of this unjust activity. The result is expressed in Matthew 23:38: "Your house is being left to you desolate." Jesus' prediction of the temple's destruction follows a few verses later (Mt 24:2). But, as mentioned above in connection with the cry of the people in Matthew 27:25, there is another, more hopeful line running through the story: Jesus saves his people from sins (Mt 1:21) by the shedding of his blood (Mt 26:28) (Hamilton; Cargal). "The death of Jesus—precisely because it is the shedding of innocent, sacrificial blood—creates the possibility of forgiveness even for the persons who bear responsibility for putting him to death" (Carroll and Green, 48).

Matthew takes over the Markan scene of the mockery of Jesus in the praetorium through to the insults leveled at Jesus by the brigands crucified on either side of him (Mt 27:27-44; cf. Mk 15:16-32). There are, however, a few notable differences. Matthew intensifies the disgraceful treatment of Jesus by making it explicit that the soldiers “stripped” him of his clothes (Mt 27:28a; implied in Mk 15:17). Furthermore, the soldiers put a “scarlet robe” (chlamys kokkinē) on Jesus (Mt 27:28b) as opposed to Mark’s “purple cloak” (porphyra) (Mk 15:17). Whereas Mark’s “purple” color was associated with royalty, Matthew’s “scarlet” color was cheaper to produce and was the color of Roman soldiers’ cloaks (Davies and Allison; Luz). The Matthean context nevertheless demands that the “robe” functions as a mock royal garb (Senior 1985)—that is, a “cheaper imitation” (Luz, 3:514) of a proper royal robe. In Matthew 27:34 the soldiers offer Jesus “wine” mixed “with gall” (oinos meta cholēs) instead of Mark’s “wine mixed with myrrh” (Mk 15:23). Matthew’s use of “gall” (cholē) echoes the first line of LXX Psalm 68:22 (MT 69:22; ET 69:21), in which the psalmist is given “gall” by his foes. In Matthew 27:48 the evangelist retains Mark’s echo of the second line of LXX Psalm 68:22 in the offer of “sour wine” (oxos) (cf. Mk 15:23). The result is that Matthew has split LXX Psalm 68:22 between Matthew 27:34 and Matthew 27:48 (Luz) and by doing so has brought Jesus’ sufferings and ill treatment more in line with the unjust treatment of David in LXX Psalm 68:22.

In another reference to a lament psalm, the religious leaders mock Jesus (LXX Ps 21:9 [MT 22:9; ET 22:8] in Mt 27:43): “He trusts in God; let him deliver him now, if he takes pleasure in him.” This is the last of three challenges to Jesus on the cross that are directed at him as “Son of God” and “King of Israel”: (1) the passers-by (Mt 27:40a); (2) the passers-by and the religious leaders (Mt 27:40b, 42); (3) the chief priests, scribes and elders (Mt 27:43). These taunts form one challenge to Jesus: bypass the cross (Davies and Allison, 620). This challenge harkens back to Satan’s threefold attempt to convince Jesus to bypass his sufferings and death. But Jesus’ royal divine sonship is revealed precisely in his ill treatment, suffering and death, as recognized by the centurion and companions (Mt 27:54: “Truly this was the Son of God”) and further authenticated by the sovereign authority given to him at the close of Matthew’s story (Mt 28:19).

Matthew’s crucifixion account (Mt 27:45-54) largely follows Mark’s (Mk 15:33-39). The apocalyptic tearing of the temple veil (Mt 27:50-51) likely signifies judgment on the temple leadership in light of Jesus’ oracles of judgment against the temple in Matthew 23:38; 24:2 (Carroll and Green, 48; Senior 1998, 334) and judgment on the religious leaders’ and the crowds’ complicity in the spilling of Jesus’ innocent blood (Hamilton). But there is also a positive connotation to the tearing of the temple’s veil. Since the temple’s inner veil separated God’s holy presence from an unholy people, its tearing symbolizes that God’s presence has now been made available to all by the atoning blood of Jesus (Mt 26:28) (Gurtner). Between the tearing of the veil (Mt 27:51) and the confession of Jesus as Son of God (Mt 27:54) Matthew has placed two additional apocalyptic happenings: an earthquake and the resurrection of the saints (Mt 27:51b-53). For Matthew, Jesus’ death effects both the rending of the veil and the resurrection of the saints (Senior 1998). The resurrection of the saints draws on OT and Jewish eschatological expectation (cf. Dan 12:2; Ezek 37:12-13) (Allison; see also Sim; Gundry 1994), especially Ezekiel 37:12-13 (Luz; Davies and Allison; France 2007; Senior 1998; Brown 1994). Ezekiel’s prophecy, linked with the eschatological reign of the Davidic Messiah (Ezek 37:24-25) (Brown 1994), promises to Israel, dead in “exile, that one day “you will come up out of your graves” (Ezek 37:12) and experience final restoration from the judgment of exile (Ezek 37:14, 21-22; cf. Is 26:14; Dan 12:2-3). The centurion and companions’ realization of Jesus’ true identity is their response to “what took place” (Mt 27:54), which includes all of the events in Matthew 27:50-53 (Jesus’ death, the rending of the veil, an earthquake, the resurrection of the saints). Thus, they bear witness to the revelation of Jesus’ death and its eschatological life-giving effects (Gurtner; Senior 1998). The prophecy of restoration as resurrection in Ezekiel 37 concludes with God’s sanctuary and dwelling place returning to be with his restored people “forever” (Ezek 37:26, 28). Similarly, Matthew’s Gospel ends with the promise of the divine presence in Jesus; Emmanuel (“God with us” [Mt 1:23]) has returned to his new people and will be with them “until the end of the age” (heōs tēs synteleias tou aiōnos) (Mt 28:20) (Kupp; Davies and Allison).

7. The Death of Jesus in Luke’s Gospel.

In Luke’s Gospel the opposition to Jesus culminates in Jerusalem with his death. The opposition is not simply human, since it will become clear that satanic darkness looms over Jesus’ arrest and cross. Nevertheless, Jesus is intent on going to Jerusalem, and he fully embraces his fate as the innocent Suffering “Servant. Although Luke does not portray Jesus’ suffering and death in atoning terms as clearly as do the other Gospels, Jesus' death is sacrificial and is tied directly to the establishment of a new covenant relationship between God and his people.

7.1. The Death of Jesus in the Plot of Luke's Gospel. Luke's Gospel is organized around three sections: a beginning (Lk 1:5—2:52) that presents Jesus to the reader; a middle (Lk 3:1—21:38) in which Jesus focuses his ministry to Galilee (3:1—9:50), journeys to Jerusalem (9:51—19:48) and ministry in Jerusalem (Lk 20:1—21:38); and an ending (Lk 22:1—24:53) that narrates Jesus' passion and resurrection. Conflict is important to Luke's plot, and central to this conflict is Jesus' death. Although an explicit reference to the religious leaders' desire to kill Jesus is not expressed until Luke 19:47, as early as Luke 2:34 readers are told that Mary's child is appointed "to be a sign to be opposed," and in Luke 4 the evangelist states that synagogue leaders "were filled with rage" (Lk 4:28) at Jesus' teaching and tried "to throw him down the cliff" (Lk 4:29), but Jesus slipped through their midst (Lk 4:30). In Luke 6:7–11 the scribes and Pharisees, indignant at Jesus' activities on the Sabbath (Lk 6:1–8), are "filled with fury" and counsel together about "what they might do to Jesus" (Lk 6:11).

A shift in the narrative toward the events of Jesus' *passion, *resurrection and *ascension in Jerusalem is indicated in Luke 9:51, where Jesus expresses his determination to go to Jerusalem to fulfill his God-given fate there: "When the days were approaching for him to be taken up [analēmpsīs]," Jesus "set his face toward Jerusalem" (cf. Lk 9:53; 13:22, 33–35; 17:11; 18:31; 19:11, 28, 41). The noun analēmpsīs ("to be taken up" or "ascension") can mean simply "death" (Pss. Sol. 4:18), and some believe this is the primary reference in Luke 9:51 (Marshall). However, in Acts the corresponding verb "to take up" (analambanō) refers to the ascension (Acts 1:2, 11, 22; cf. Mk 16:19; 1 Tim 3:16). In light of the fact that Luke 9:51 anticipates the events that will take place in Jerusalem (which include Jesus' suffering, death and resurrection [Lk 19:31–33]) and the presence of *Elijah *typology in Luke 9:54 (cf. 2 Kings 2:10–11 [note the use of analambanō there]), Jesus' being "taken up" (analēmpsīs) probably refers most immediately to his ascension (Green 1997), although an allusion to the crucifixion and resurrection is also possible (Grundmann 1966).

As Jesus journeys closer to his fate in Jerusalem, the scribes and Pharisees' hostility toward him and their plots to trap him increase in intensity (Lk 11:53–54). Jesus' response to the Pharisees in Luke 13:33–35 reveals his single focus to reach Jerusalem (Lk 13:32), where he will die (Lk 13:33), because Jerusalem (i.e., its religious elite) has a habit of killing God's prophets and will do so again, but this time it will be God's *prophet par excellence, his Son (cf. Lk 20:9–16). The consequence of killing Jesus will be that Jerusalem will be judged (Lk 13:35). By the time the reader reaches the explicit notice in Luke 19:47 that the chief priests and scribes want to "destroy" Jesus, it is clear that his conflict with them will end in his death, which is, paradoxically, God's will for him evident in Luke's first passion prediction (Lk 9:22; cf. Lk 22:20; 22:22, 37; 24:7, 26, 44). As in Mark and Matthew, the resolution to this conflict comes in the culmination of the story in Jesus' passion (Lk 22–23) and resurrection (Lk 24). But for Luke, the resolution is not yet realized; it must await Jesus' parousia at the end of the age (Kingsbury 1991) (cf. Acts 1:11). The irony in Luke's conflict is that although the religious leaders and Satan win the battle (Jesus has died as a false prophet, a messianic claimant and a Roman lawbreaker [cf. Lk 23:2]), God has won the war in that death did not defeat Jesus but rather effected God's redemptive purposes (Lk 22:20; cf. Lk 1:32–33, 68, 72; 2:25, 38).

The role of the demonic in Luke's portrayal of Jesus' death deserves special focus. After it is clear that the devil will not succeed in his attempt to draw Jesus away from his God-given mission, we are told that the devil left Jesus "until an opportune time" (Lk 4:13). It probably is correct to see the devil's "final assault" against Jesus (Lk 22:3–6) as the narrative fulfillment of the devil's "opportune time" in Luke 4:13 (Kingsbury 1991; Green 1997; Garrett 1990). In Luke 22 the evangelist states that "Satan entered into Judas" (Lk 22:3) right before he betrays Jesus by colluding with the religious authorities (Lk 22:4). Furthermore, there may be an intended linguistic connection between Judas seeking a "good opportunity" (eukairia) to betray Jesus in Luke 22:6 and the devil's "opportune time" (kairos) in Luke 4:13 (Green 1997, 753–54). Satan continues to make the most of his "opportune time" by attempting to "sift" Peter (Lk 22:31), and Luke 22:53 makes clear that Jesus' arrest is under the "power/authority of darkness" (exousia tou skotous [Lk 22:53]), a phrase that is clearly equated with the "power/authority" of Satan in Acts 26:18 ("darkness" [skotos] = "power/authority of Satan" [exousia tou satana]).

Some have argued that Jesus' statement "I saw [etheōroun] Satan fall" in Luke 10:18 is a prophetic visionary utterance on analogy with Daniel's use of the same verb form (etheōroun) to introduce future events (cf. LXX Dan 7:2, 4, 6, 7, 9, 11, 13). One interpretation is that the occasion of Satan's downfall is Jesus' resurrection and ascension to his heavenly throne (Garrett 1990; 1992). Alternatively, the reference could be to the future defeat of Satan at the end of the age anticipated in many Second Temple Jewish texts and in Revelation (cf. 11Q13 II, 2-13; 1 En. 10:4-5; T. Dan 5:10-13; T. Levi 18:2-12; T. Naph. 8:2-4; Rev 20:10) (so Green 1997). Both views probably have merit: Jesus' death, the goal of Satan's conspiracy through willing human subjects, has been overturned in Jesus' vindication from the grave, which in turn anticipates Satan's ultimate downfall at the end of the age. Luke's understanding of Jesus' death therefore has clear satanic and cosmic dimensions, not completely unlike the views of Matthew and John.

7.2. The Death of Jesus in Luke's Passion Narrative. Luke begins his passion narrative (Lk 22:1–23:56) by indicating that the Feast of Unleavened Bread and the Passover were drawing near (Lk 22:1; cf. Mk 14:1) and with the ominous note that “the chief priests and scribes were seeking how to put Jesus to death” (Lk 22:1; cf. Mk 14:1). Luke then moves directly into the narrative about Judas's betrayal of Jesus to the chief priests (Lk 21:3-6). In Luke 22:7 the day of unleavened bread and the sacrifice of the Passover lamb have now come. The *Last Supper (Lk 22:15-20) points to the great paradigmatic event of God's exodus deliverance commemorated by the Passover meal (Lk 22:1, 7-8, 11, 13, 15) and anticipates a future kingdom meal that Jesus will eat and drink with his people (Lk 22:15-17, 29-30).

Jesus uses the elements of the meal (bread, cup, wine) to interpret his impending death. Jesus sees his death as inaugurating the new covenant foretold in Jeremiah's promise (Jer 31:31-34) that one day God would restore Israel from *exile. Luke's phrase “covenant in my blood” probably alludes to Exodus 24:8, with the result that Jesus' new covenantal sacrifice enables people to participate in the eschatological new-covenant relationship with God promised in Jeremiah 31:31-34 (Green 1997).

After the Last Supper (Lk 22:15-20) and before the betrayal and arrest (Lk 22:47-54), Jesus interprets his nearing fate in Jerusalem in light of the Suffering Servant (Lk 22:37, citing Is 53:12; cf. Is 53:7-8 in Acts 8:32-33). This quotation of Isaiah raises the issue of the meaning of Luke's identification of Jesus with the Isaianic Servant. It seems clear that, broadly speaking, Luke patterns Jesus' death and resurrection/vindication on the paradigm of Isaiah's Servant (Is 52:13–53:12) (see esp. Green 2012, 80-84; cf. Koet). The career of the Servant is marked by rejection and unjust suffering and death at the hands of his oppressors, even though he was completely innocent (Is 53:8-9). He is therefore designated “the righteous one” (dikaïos) (LXX Is 53:11). The suffering and death of the Servant is God's will for him (Is 53:6, 10). But, since God is faithful to his Servant, he will vindicate him from death (Is 53:10). This pattern of suffering, death and vindication that Jesus shares with the Servant is nowhere more apparent than in Luke's passion predictions: “Thus it is written, that the Christ should suffer and rise again from the dead the third day” (Lk 24:46 [cf. Lk 9:22]).

The Lukan Jesus recapitulates the pattern of the Suffering Servant (from suffering and death to vindication), but Luke nowhere directly associates Jesus' death with the Servant's vicarious death for sin (although it could be argued that this is implied). Nevertheless, it is important to recognize that a sacrificial and atoning interpretation of Jesus' death is not absent in Luke-Acts. This is evident in Luke 22:19-20, where Jesus interprets his death as a sacrificial event that effects redemption for and transformation of his people. Furthermore, it is clear that Luke is comfortable with an atoning interpretation of Jesus' death when, in Acts 20:28, he has Paul say that God has “obtained” the church by means of “the blood of his own Son.” Luke thus has portrayed Jesus' death as a salvific event without specifically citing the portions of Isaiah 53 that speak of the Servant's vicarious death for sins (cf. Is 53:5-6, 11, 12).

In his passion narrative Luke emphasizes Jesus' innocence. The chief priests and scribes attempt to convince Pilate that Jesus must die a criminal's death. Their accusation is found in Luke 23:2: Jesus has “misled/corrupted our nation,” “hindered us from paying taxes to Caesar,” and claimed to be “the Messiah, a king.” Immediately following this three-fold charge, Pilate, apparently not threatened by Jesus' claim to be a king, says to the religious leaders that he finds no fault in Jesus (Lk 23:4). But the chief priests press their charges even further in Luke 23:5. The threat of the spreading of a seditious movement provides Pilate with his cue to send the matter to *Herod. Still, Pilate is not fully convinced of the charge, and neither is Herod (Lk 23:13-15). And a third time Pilate addresses the leaders: “I have found in him no cause deserving of death” (Lk 23:22).

The responses to Jesus' crucifixion by the two criminals on either side of Jesus mirror the two possible responses to Jesus' crucifixion. The first criminal “was hurling abuse” (lit., “blaspheming” [blasphēmō]) at him (Lk 23:39), recapitulating charges and abuses leveled at Jesus by the religious leaders and mockers (Lk 22:65; 23:2, 35, 37). The second criminal's response partly serves to further Luke's emphasis on Jesus' innocence: "We indeed have been condemned justly, for we are getting what we deserve for our deeds, but this man has done nothing wrong" (Lk 23:41). The criminal's request that Jesus remember him when "you come in your kingdom" (Lk 23:42) reveals that he recognizes that Jesus will survive his cross, and that he is in fact a king, the Messiah, and not a pretender or criminal after all. It is correct, then, to conclude that this criminal "implicitly confesses his faith that Jesus is the Christ or Son of Man" (Marshall, 872) (cf. Lk 24:26). Remarkably, and uniquely in Luke, Jesus, as he hangs on the cross, *prays for his Father to forgive his tormentors and executioners (Lk 23:34).

The events and sayings at the cross (Lk 23:44-47) follow some of the content and order of Mark 15:33-39, but there are important differences, especially when reading these in the context of Luke's narrative. Read in the context of Luke-Acts, the reference to the "darkness" that covered the land (Lk 23:44) is a metaphor for diabolical forces (Fitzmyer 1985), particularly related to Satan's conspiracy in Jesus' arrest and death (Lk 22:53; cf. Acts 26:18). The intended symbolism of the tearing of the inner veil (surely the one intended, as in Mark and Matthew, by the term katapetasma [Lk 23:45]) is notoriously difficult to pinpoint. The occurrence in Luke may suggest less about judgment on the temple and/or Jerusalem (so Green 1997; contra Marshall) and more about the revelation of God's presence so inextricably linked with inner sanctum behind the veil. God's presence is now revealed outside the confines of the temple and its symbolic cultic world (Green 1997; similarly, Nolland) and ultimately in Jesus. At his death, Jesus prays a Davidic psalm of lament, Psalm 31:5: "Father, into your hands I commit my spirit" (Lk 23:46). Jesus' prayer here, as does the psalmist's prayer, communicates trust in God (cf. Ps 31:14) in the face of "adversaries" and "enemies" (cf. Ps 31:11, 15).

When the centurion at the cross "saw what had taken place," he "glorified/praised God" and confessed, "Indeed, this man was innocent/righteous" (Lk 23:47). In Luke, "glorifying/praising" (doxazō) God is a common human response when one experiences God or a mighty act of God (Lk 2:20; 5:25, 26; 7:16; 13:13; 17:15; 18:43), and thus the centurion recognizes God's presence and activity in the events narrated in Luke 23:44-46. The adjective dikaïos in Luke 23:47 can mean either "righteous/just" or "innocent" or perhaps both (Brown 1994). The term probably emphasizes that Jesus is innocent of the crimes that warranted his death, and therefore the centurion echoes the theme of Jesus' innocence evident in Luke's passion narrative (see above). However, in Luke's second volume Jesus is identified as the "righteous one" (dikaïos) in the context of his unjust crucifixion (Acts 3:14; 7:52), and the designation here alludes to the messianic Davidic "righteous one" (Jer 23:5; Zech 9:9) and/or the Suffering Servant as the "righteous one" (Is 53:11). The centurion's confession of Jesus as dikaïos, then, may mean that Jesus is God's messianic righteous one, who was unjustly put to death.

8. The Death of Jesus in John's Gospel.

In John's Gospel Jesus' death is ultimately the expression of God's *love for the world in that it mediates eschatological life to others and inaugurates a new-exodus redemption. The cross is also the location of a cosmic battle between Satan ("ruler of this world") and God, a battle in which God's Son is shown to be the glorious Son of Man, who defeats the cosmic enemy and therefore provides release from satanic bondage.

8.1. The Death of Jesus in the Plot of John's Gospel. In John's Gospel the pursuit to kill Jesus is particularly prominent and more violent than we find in the other Gospels. Early on Jesus' conflict with the Jewish leaders turns to their "seeking all the more to kill him" (Jn 5:18 [cf. Jn 7:1, 19, 25; 8:37, 40]). In fact, even when it is said simply that the Jews and others "seek" (zēteō) Jesus, the implication is almost always "to seek" to kill him (Jn 7:11; 10:39; 18:4, 7, 8; 11:56; 18:4, 7, 8). John is unique among the evangelists when he states that the Jews were "seeking" (zēteō) "to stone" Jesus on a number of occasions (Jn 10:31, 32, 33; 11:8), as well as directly identifying Jesus' opponents as those who are in league with the murderous desires of the devil (Jn 8:44). This death pursuit ultimately wins out when Jesus is arrested by a Roman cohort, then tried and crucified as a criminal (Jn 18:28—19:18).

This conflict and successful death plan are part of a greater cosmic conflict that begins in the prologue. The *Logos, as the light of the new creation, shines "in darkness," and "the darkness could not overcome/overtake [katalambanō] the light" (Jn 1:5) (see Light and Darkness). This assures readers from the outset that the darkness will not succeed in its opposition to destroy Jesus and his salvific mission. This theme of cosmic conflict between the forces of light and darkness—that is, between the Logos and Satan—anticipates the opposition to Jesus as the "light of the world" in the ensuing story. In John 1:10-11 it becomes clear that the cosmic battle between light and darkness will play out on the stage of human history in Jesus' ministry: he will be rejected by the cosmos (Jn 1:10) and then by "his own" (Jn 1:11b), with "his own" taking the role of the Jewish leaders in the narrative.

In John 1:29 (cf. Jn 1:31) we find one of the quintessential Johannine christological and soteriological statements: "Behold, the Lamb of God who takes away the sin of the world" (see Lamb of God). Most have concluded that the "lamb" identifies Jesus as the final Passover sacrifice, though other backgrounds may be operative as well. The Passover reference in John 1:29 is supported by clear associations between the Passover sacrifice and Jesus' death in the passion narrative (Jn 19:14, 29, 31-37). As in the other Gospels, Jesus' death inaugurates a new exodus.

The first explicit reference to Jesus' death in John's Gospel comes in John 2:21-22 in the context of the temple pericope. The narrator quotes LXX Psalm 68:10 (MT 69:10; ET 69:9) in John 2:17: "His disciples remembered that it was written, 'Zeal for your house will consume/devour [katesthiō] me.'" But John has changed the psalm's aorist tense verb (katephagen, "has consumed") to the future tense (kataphagetai, "will consume") so that it concerns Jesus' future death. Jesus' prophetic statement in John 2:19, "Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up," which the narrator tells us has to do with "the temple of his body" (Jn 2:21), functions as an ironic prophetic imperative statement (Wilckens) that calls the Jewish leaders to carry out their opposition to its desired end, Jesus' death. Jesus' zeal for God's temple will "devour" him and lead to his premature death.

The controversies between Jesus and the "Jews" in John 8:31-59 provide important clues about the death of Jesus in the plot of John's Gospel. After Jesus informs the Jews that he can make them free (Jn 8:32, 36), they counter by claiming that they are "descendants of Abraham" and thus are not enslaved by anyone (Jn 8:33). But, because they are "seeking to kill" Jesus (Jn 8:40, 59), they are not acting in accordance with God as their Father (Jn 8:42) but rather unwittingly in accordance with the "desires" of another, the devil, who "was a murderer from the beginning" (Jn 8:44). This state of affairs suggests that the plot of the chief priests, Pharisees and the high priest in John 11:47-50, 53 is part of the cosmic conflict hinted at in John 1:5. The personified "darkness" (the devil/Satan) attempts to destroy God's Son through his willing human accomplices (see Demon, Devil, Satan). Nevertheless, God's saving plan in his Son will not be thwarted: Jesus' death indeed will benefit "the nation" (Jn 11:51) and will bring about the redemptive gathering into one of God's children (Jn 11:52, cf. Jn 1:12-13).

John 12:31 plays a crucial and highly ironic role in the devil's plot to kill Jesus. At the moment when the devil's plot to do away with Jesus seems to have worked—at the cross—we are told in John 12:31 that Jesus' death will effect the "casting out" of the devil (as the "ruler of this world") from his realm of authority. As the cross looms closer, the devil's role in Jesus' death is evident in the context of the Johannine Last Supper (Jn 13) and the *farewell discourse (Jn 14-17). In John 13:2 the narrator states that the devil had "put into the heart of Judas Iscariot . . . to betray him," and in John 13:27 readers are informed, "Satan then entered into him. Jesus therefore said to him, 'What you do, do quickly.'" Jesus himself had previously predicted Judas's betrayal and identified him as "a devil" (Jn 6:70). Later, Jesus looks back to what was said to be accomplished at the cross in John 12:31: "The ruler of this world has been judged" (Jn 16:11). Consistent with John's eschatology elsewhere (Jn 3:19; 4:23; 5:24; 11:25-26), he has presented the cross event as the defeat of the cosmic enemy, a defeat that in Second Temple Judaism was reserved for the end of the age.

The cross event has other salvific effects. The Johannine hyper texts present Jesus' death as an event that is "on behalf of" (hyper) others in some way. The precise benefit for others pertains to the context: Jesus' death will effect "life for the cosmos" (Jn 6:51), protect his sheep and unify them (Jn 10:11, 15-16) and bring about the long-awaited gathering of God's children (Jn 11:50, 52; cf., e.g., Deut 30:3-4; Is 11:12; 40:11; 43:5; 56:8; Jer 31:8, 10; Ezek 34:13, 21; 39:27). In the passion narrative the water that came out of Jesus' body, which John associates with the Spirit (Jn 7:39), signifies that Jesus' death imparts life eternal to those who believe (Carroll and Green).

Another Johannine way of describing Jesus' death is found in the "lifting up of the Son of Man" texts (Jn 3:14; 8:28; 12:32, 34). "To lift up" (hypsōō) is classic Johannine double entendre. The verb can mean "to lift up" in the figurative sense of "exalt," but it can also mean to "to lift up" in the literal sense (i.e., raised up in crucifixion). When used of Jesus' death in John, it means both. Most scholars agree that these texts were inspired by Isaiah's fourth Servant Song (Is 52:13-53:12) (e.g., Brown 1966; Reim), and this connection is particularly evident in John 12 (see Servant of Yahweh). As Isaiah's Servant is "lifted up" (hypsōō) and "glorified" (doxazō) in LXX Isaiah 52:13, so also Jesus is "glorified" (doxazō) (Jn 12:23) and “lifted up” (hypsoō) (Jn 12:32). But whereas the Servant in Isaiah is “lifted up” and “glorified” after his humiliation and death (Is 53:2-10), Jesus is exalted and glorified in the cross event (Jn 12:23), so that Jesus’ exaltation/glorification and death appear to be an indivisible event in John (Blank). The cross, then, reveals Jesus’ true divine identity (Jn 8:28), his oneness with his Father (Appold; Nicholson) and ultimately is the pathway back to his heavenly abode with his Father (Jn 13:1). The cross truly is a revelatory event in John. But it would be a mistake to characterize John’s understanding of the cross only as a revelatory event or as a pathway back to the Father, as some have argued (Käsemann; Nicholson; U. Müller). Rather, the Fourth Gospel holds together, without contradiction, the cross as a revelation of glory and the cross as a soteriological event (Zumstein; Turner; T. Müller).

John’s christological reflections on Isaiah 52:13—53:12 have profound theological and christological implications. Strikingly, not only is Isaiah’s Servant portrayed as the “lifted up” and “glorified” one (Is 52:12), but also Yahweh appears on his “exalted” (hypēstos) and “lifted up” (epairō) throne with his “glory” (doxa) filling the earth (Is 6:1-3) as well as he himself being identified as the “exalted” and “lifted up” one (Is 57:15). This connection between Isaiah 52:12 and Isaiah 57:15 (cf. Is 6:1) suggests that in Isaiah 52:12 the Servant is exalted to the unique heavenly throne of God after having suffered and died (Is 53). “The Servant . . . in both his humiliation and his exaltation belongs to the identity of the unique God. This God is not only the high and lofty one who reigns from his throne . . . ; he also abases himself to the condition of the crushed and lowly (Isa 57:15)” (Bauckham, 51). Isaiah’s portrayal of the Servant as the one who shares the divine identity of the lifted-up and glorified God but who is also the one who suffered and died seems to have informed John’s view of Jesus and his death. In this connection, it is significant that John brings together Isaiah 53 and Isaiah 6 in John 12:38-41. Referring to Isaiah 6:1, John says that Isaiah saw Jesus’ “glory” (Jn 12:41), whereas in Isaiah 6:1-3 the prophet sees Yahweh “high” and “exalted” on his throne (Is 6:1). This suggests that in John’s Gospel the glory of Jesus that Isaiah saw (Jn 12:41) was the glory that the Son shared with the Father “before the world began” (Jn 17:5; cf. Jn 1:1). The Son became a human being, and his divine glory was perceived in his humanity (Jn 1:14). As a human being, the divine Son is humiliated at the “hour” of the cross and dies there, and it is in this event that the Father glorifies his name and his Son (Jn 12:27-28; 17:1). But it is not as though the Son lost his glory in the incarnation or the cross event; rather, in the cross Christ’s divine glory and identity (Jn 1:1, 14) shine through and are revealed anew (Jn 17:5). When John insists that Jesus’ glory and identity are revealed in and through his cross, Jesus takes on the task of the high and lifted-up Yahweh in Isaiah 57:15 who humbles himself to minister to the situation of the “lowly of spirit” and the “contrite” (see Bauckham, 48-51) while always remaining the glorious sovereign God.

With Jesus’ arrest and death drawing near, in John 12:12-36 he enters into Jerusalem for the last time. He is welcomed by the Passover crowd “that had come to Jerusalem to the feast” (Jn 12:12). The crowd cries out Psalm 118:26 and identifies Jesus as the “King of Israel” (Jn 12:13). John’s quotation of Zechariah 9:9 in John 12:15 (“Look, your king is coming”) follows. These details make clear that John intends his readers to see Jesus’ entry into Jerusalem as the entry of Israel’s messianic king. But there is great irony in John 12: “the hour has come” for this king of Israel to be glorified in death (Jn 12:23). This prepares readers for the soldiers’ mocking comment hurled at Jesus at his trial, “Hail, King of the Jews” (Jn 19:3), and Pilate’s question to the chief priests, “Shall I crucify your king?” (Jn 19:15).

8.2. The Death of Jesus in John’s Passion Narrative. The Johannine passion narrative (Jn 18—19) emphasizes themes that have already been broached in the previous chapters. The setting of Jesus’ arrest, trial and crucifixion is specifically said to be Passover on three occasions (Jn 18:28, 39; 19:14). Other allusions in John 19 indicate that John wants his readers to see Jesus as the final Passover sacrifice that inaugurates a second-exodus deliverance: Jesus’ crucifixion at the precise time of the Passover sacrifice (Jn 19:14); the mention of “basin” and “hyssop” at the moment of Jesus’ death (Jn 19:29-30; cf. Ex 12:22); the “blood” from Jesus’ side (Jn 19:34), echoing the use of blood in the Passover rituals (Ex 12:13, 22); Jesus’ legs not being broken (Jn 19:31-33, 36), which recalls the same treatment of the Passover lamb (Ex 12:46). These associations probably are to be read in light of the previous identification of Jesus as the “Lamb of God” in John 1:29.

Another clear theme displayed in the passion narrative is that Jesus’ trial and crucifixion happened in the context of a clash between Jesus’ kingship, the power of Rome and the Jewish leaders’ plot to kill him. The chief priests pressure Pilate to put Jesus to death for being an “evildoer” (Jn 18:30) and for claiming to be the Son of God (Jn 19:7). Pilate’s interrogation of Jesus concerns his supposed kingship (Jn 18:37), and he is crucified for ostensibly being the "King of Jews" (Jn 19:16-19, 21). The official death plan made in John 11:48-50 has come to pass. But neither the ruler of this cosmos nor his subjects (Jewish leaders and Pilate) are really in control of these events. The events of the passion happened in accordance with Jesus' word (Jn 18:9; cf. Jn 18:32) and his Father's will revealed in Scripture (Jn 19:24, 28, 36-37). The divine Son is in total control of his death, as has been made clear already (cf. Jn 10:17-18).

The crucifixion could be viewed as evidence that Jesus was defeated as a false prophet and a blasphemous claimant to be God's Son. However, in John's theology of the cross Jesus' death was the ultimate revelation of his glory and union with the Father, an event that accomplished eschatological life for his newly gathered children (Jn 11:52; cf. Jn 1:12-13) and their release from the enemy who held the cosmos in bondage to sin and unbelief (Jn 1:29; 8:39-44; 16:8-11). Jesus' death is also an expression of God's love for the world (Jn 3:14-16) and Jesus' love for his own (Jn 10:15; 15:12-13). Jesus' love for his friends is proved in the laying down of his life for them, which is the ultimate exemplar for obeying Jesus' command "Love one another, just as I have loved you" (Jn 15:12).

9. Conclusion.

The death of Jesus the Messiah was a scandal for early Christians. How could God's Son and Israel's Messiah be killed on a shameful Roman cross? This is simply unthinkable. Nevertheless, the four Gospels, while maintaining their own unique presentations of Jesus' death, are in full agreement that Jesus' shameful suffering and death fulfilled God's will to bring about the redemption of his people. As such, Jesus' death was the culmination of scriptural motifs such as Passover and Isaiah's Servant, so that Jesus' death effected a new exodus, a new Passover, deliverance for those who believe. Finally, the Gospels, to one degree or another, make clear that Jesus' death was an "apocalyptic event in which the enemy of God and his people—Satan of old—was conquered and the new age of God's righteous rule inaugurated.

See also BLASPHEMY; BURIAL OF JESUS; DEMON, DEVIL, SATAN; GOLGOTHA; LAST SUPPER; PASSION NARRATIVE; PONTIUS PILATE; PREDICTIONS OF JESUS' DEATH AND RESURRECTION; RESURRECTION; SANHEDRIN; SERVANT OF YAHWEH; TEMPLE; TRIAL OF JESUS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. S. P. Ahearne-Kroll, The Psalms of Lament in Mark's Passion Narrative (SNTSMS 142; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2007); D. A. Allison, The End of the Ages Has Come: An Early Interpretation of the Passion and Resurrection of Jesus (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985); M. Appold, The Oneness Motif in the Fourth Gospel: Motif Analysis and Exegetical Probe into the Theology of John (WUNT 2/1; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1976); C. K. Barrett, "The Background of Mark 10:45," in New Testament Essays: Studies in Memory of Thomas Walter Manson, 1893-1958, ed. A. J. B. Higgins (Manchester: Manchester University Press, 1959) 1-18; R. Bauckham, God Crucified: Monotheism and Christology in the New Testament (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1998); H. F. Bayer, Jesus' Predictions of Vindication and Resurrection: The Provenance, Meaning and Correlation of the Synoptic Predictions (WUNT 2/200; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1986); J. Becker, Jesus of Nazareth, trans. J. E. Crouch (Berlin: de Gruyter, 1998); M. Black, "Servant of the Lord and Son of Man," SJT 6 (1953) 1-11; J. Blank, Krisis: Untersuchungen zur johanneischen Christologie und Eschatologie (Freiburg: Lambertus, 1964); J. Blinzler, The Trial of Jesus: The Jewish and Roman Proceedings Against Jesus Christ Described and Assessed from the Oldest Accounts, trans. I. McHugh and F. McHugh (Cork: Mercer Press, 1959); D. Bock, "Jesus as Blasphemer," in Who Do My Opponents Say That I Am? An Investigation of the Accusations Against Jesus, ed. S. McKnight and J. B. Modica (LNTS 327; London: T & T Clark, 2008) 76-94; C. Böttrich, "Proexistenz im Leben und Sterben: Jesu Tod bei Lukas," in Deutungen des Todes Jesu im Neuen Testament, ed. J. Frey and J. Schröter (WUNT 181; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2007) 413-36; R. E. Brown, The Gospel According to John I-XII (AB 29; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1966); idem, The Death of the Messiah: From Gethsemane to the Grave; A Commentary on the Passion Narratives in the Four Gospels (2 vols.; New York: Doubleday, 1994); F. F. Bruce, "The Trial of Jesus," in Studies of History and Tradition in the Four Gospels, ed. R. T. France and D. Wenham (GP 1; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1980) 7-20; W. Brueggemann, Isaiah 40-66 (WestBC; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1998); S. M. Bryan, Jesus and Israel's Traditions of Judgement and Restoration (SNTSMS 117; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2002); T. B. Cargal, "His Blood Be upon Us and upon Our Children': A Matthean Double Entendre?" NTS 37 (1991) 101-12; J. T. Carroll and J. B. Green, The Death of Jesus in Early Christianity (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1995); D. A. Carson, D. J. Moo and L. Morris, An Introduction to the New Testament (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1992); D. W. Chapman, Ancient and Christian Perceptions of Crucifixion

- (Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2010); J. H. Charlesworth, "Jesus and Jehohanan: An Archaeological Note on Crucifixion," ExpTim 84 (1973) 147-50; B. D. Chilton, The Glory of Israel: The Theology and Provenience of the Isaiah Targum (JSOTSup 23; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1983); A. Y. Collins, Mark: A Commentary (Hermeneia; Minneapolis: Fortress, 2007); idem, "Mark's Interpretation of the Death of Jesus," JBL 128 (2009) 545-54; H. Conzelmann, The Theology of St. Luke, trans. G. Buswell (New York: Harper & Row, 1960); J. G. Cook, "Roman Crucifixions: From the Second Punic War to Constantine," ZNW 104 (2013) 1-32; idem, "Crucifixion and Burial," NTS 57 (2011) 193-213; C. E. B. Cranfield, The Gospel According to Saint Mark (rev. ed.; CGTC; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1977); O. Cullmann, The Christology of the New Testament, trans. S. C. Guthrie and C. A. M. Hall (rev. ed.; Philadelphia: Westminster, 1963); W. D. Davies and D. C. Allison, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Gospel According to Saint Matthew, 3: Commentary on Matthew XIX-XXVIII (ICC; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1997); G. Dellling, "τρεῖς, κτλ.," TDNT 8:216-25; J. Dennis, "The 'Lifting Up of the Son of Man' and the Dethroning of 'the Ruler of this World': Jesus' Death as the Defeat of the Devil in John 12:20-36," in The Death of Jesus in the Fourth Gospel, ed. G. van Belle (BETL 200; Leuven: Peeters, 2007) 677-91; idem, "Seeking Jesus: Observations on John's Vocabulary of Death," in Repetitions and Variations in the Fourth Gospel: Style, Text, Interpretation, ed. G. van Belle, M. Labahn and P. Maritz (BETL 223; Leuven: Peeters, 2009) 157-70; C. H. Dodd, According to the Scriptures: The Sub-Structure of New Testament Theology (London: Nisbet, 1952); C. Dohman and P. Stenmans, "בָּרַךְ," TDOT 7:13-22; K. P. Donfried, "Chronology, New Testament," ABD 1:1011-22; J. D. G. Dunn, Jesus Remembered (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2003); J. R. Edwards, "The Servant of the Lord and the Gospel of Mark," in Biblical Interpretation in Early Christian Gospels, 1: The Gospel of Mark, ed. T. R. Hatina (LNTS 304; London: T & T Clark, 2006) 131-50; C. A. Evans, Mark 8:27-16:20 (WBC 34B; Nashville: Thomas Nelson, 2001); J. Fitzmyer, The Gospel According to Luke: Introduction, Translation, and Notes (2 vols.; AB 28, 28A; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1981-1985); J. T. Forestell, The Word of the Cross: Salvation as Revelation in the Fourth Gospel (AnBib 57; Rome: Biblical Institute Press, 1974); R. T. France, The Gospel of Mark: A Commentary on the Greek Text (NIGTC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2002); idem, The Gospel of Matthew (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2007); J. Frey, "Die 'theologia crucifixi' des Johannesevangeliums," in Kreuzestheologie im Neuen Testament, ed. A. Dettwiler and J. Zumstein (WUNT 151; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2002) 169-238; S. R. Garrett, "Exodus from Bondage: Luke 9:31 and Acts 12:1-24," CBQ 52 (1990) 656-80; idem, "The Meaning of Jesus' Death in Luke," WW 12 (1992) 11-16; S. H. Golden, "A Jewish Perspective of Jesus," BTB 34 (2004) 54-68; E. P. Gould, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Gospel According to Mark (ICC; New York: Scribner, 1922); J. B. Green, The Death of Jesus: Tradition and Interpretation in the Passion Narrative (WUNT 2/33; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1988); idem, The Gospel of Luke (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1997); idem, "Was It Not Necessary for the Messiah to Suffer These Things and Enter into His Glory?" The Significance of Jesus' Death for Lukan Soteriology," in The Spirit and Christ in the New Testament and Christian Theology, ed. I. H. Marshall, V. Rabens and C. Bannema (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2012) 71-85; W. Grundmann, Das Evangelium nach Markus (THKNT 2; Berlin: Evangelische Verlagsanstalt, 1964); idem, Das Evangelium nach Lukas (THKNT 3; Berlin: Evangelische Verlagsanstalt, 1966); R. H. Gundry, Mark: A Commentary on His Apology for the Cross (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1993); idem, Matthew: A Commentary on His Handbook for a Mixed Church Under Persecution (2nd ed.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1994); D. M. Gurtner, The Torn Veil: Matthew's Exposition of the Death of Jesus (SNTSMS 139; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2007); D. A. Hagner, Matthew (2 vols.; WBC 33A, 33B; Dallas: Word, 1993-1995); C. S. Hamilton, "His Blood Be upon Us: Innocent Blood and the Death of Jesus in Matthew," CBQ 70 (2008) 82-100; M. Hengel, Crucifixion in the Ancient World and the Folly of the Message of the Cross, trans. J. Bowden (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1977); M. D. Hooker, The Gospel According to Saint Mark (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1991); J. Jeremias, The Eucharistic Words of Jesus, trans. N. Perrin (New York: Scribner, 1966); idem, New Testament Theology: The Proclamation of Jesus (New York: Scribner, 1971); D. Juel, Messiah and Temple: The Trial of Jesus in the Gospel of Mark (SBLDS 31; Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1977); E. Käsemann, The Testament of Jesus: A Study of the Gospel of John in the Light of Chapter 17, trans. G. Krodel (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1968); J. D. Kingsbury, Matthew as Story (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1988); idem, Conflict in Mark: Jesus, Authorities, Disciples (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1989); B. J. Koet, "Isaiah in Luke-Acts," in Isaiah in the New Testament, ed. S. Moyise and M. J. J. Menken (NTSI; London: T & T

- Clark, 2005) 79-100; E. Kostenniemi, K. Nisula and J. Toppari, "Wine Mixed with Myrrh (Mark 15.23) and Crurifragium (John 19.31-32): Two Details of the Passion Narratives," JSNT 27 (2005) 379-91; H.-W. Kuhn, "σταυρώω," EDNT 3:270; D. D. Kupp, Matthew's Emmanuel: Divine Presence and God's People in the First Gospel (SNTSMS 90; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1996); B. Landowska, "Das Leben für andere hingeben: Alttestamentliche Voraussetzungen für die Deutung des Todes Jesu," in Deutungen des Todes Jesu im Neuen Testament, ed. J. Frey and J. Schröter (WUNT 181; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2005) 97-118; W. L. Lane, The Gospel of Mark (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1974); B. Lindars, New Testament Apologetic: The Doctrinal Significance of the Old Testament Quotations (London: SCM, 1961); U. Luz, Matthew: A Commentary, trans. J. E. Crouch, ed. H. Koester (3 vols.; Hermeneia; Minneapolis: Augsburg, 1989-2005); A. A. Macintosh, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on Hosea (ICC; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1997); P. L. Maier, "The Date of the Nativity and the Chronology of Jesus' Life," in Chronos, Kairos, Christos: Nativity and Chronological Studies Presented to Jack Finegan, ed. J. Vardaman and E. M. Yamauchi (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1989) 113-32; C. S. Mann, Mark: A New Translation with Introduction and Commentary (AB 27; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1986); J. Marcus, The Way of the Lord: Christological Exegesis of the Old Testament in the Gospel of Mark (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1993); idem, "Crucifixion as Parodic Exaltation," JBL 125 (2006) 73-87; I. H. Marshall, The Gospel of Luke: A Commentary on the Greek Text (NIGTC; Exeter: Paternoster, 1978); F. Matera, The Kingship of Jesus: Composition and Theology in Mark 15 (SBLDS 66; Chico, CA: Scholars Press, 1982); S. McKnight, Jesus and His Death: Historiography, the Historical Jesus, and Atonement Theory (Waco, TX: Baylor University Press, 2005); J. P. Meier, A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus, Vol. 1: The Roots of the Problem and the Person (New York: Doubleday, 1991); D. J. Moo, The Old Testament in the Gospel Passion Narratives (Sheffield: Almond, 1983); C. F. D. Moule, The Origin of Christology (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1977); T. Müller, Das Heilsgeschehen im Johannesevangelium: Eine exegetische Studie, zugleich der Versuch einer Antwort an Rudolf Bultmann (Zürich: Gotthelf, 1961); U. B. Müller, "Die Bedeutung des Kreuzestodes Jesu im Johannesevangelium: Erwägungen zur Kreuzestheologie im Neuen Testament," KD 21 (1974) 49-71; G. C. Nicholson, Death as Departure: The Johannine Descent-Ascent Schema (SBLDS 63; Chico, CA: Scholars Press, 1983); G. W. E. Nickelsburg, "The Genre and Function of the Markan Passion Narrative," HTR 73 (1980), 153-84; J. Nolland, Luke 9:21-18:34 (WBC 35B; Nashville: Thomas Nelson, 1993); G. G. O'Collins, "Crucifixion," ABD 1:1207-10; R. Pesch, Das Markusevangelium (2 vols.; HTKNT 2; Freiburg: Herder, 1979-1991); B. Pitre, Jesus, the Tribulation, and the End of Exile: Restoration Eschatology and the Origins of the Atonement (WUNT 2/204; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck; Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2005); B. Pounds, "Book Review: Gunnar Samuelsson, Crucifixion in Antiquity: An Inquiry into the Background of the New Testament Terminology of Crucifixion (Dissertation, University of Gothenburg, 2010)," JSNT 33 (2011) 398-405; M. A. Powell, "The Plot and Subplots of Matthew's Gospel," NTS 38 (1992) 187-204; M. Proctor, "'After Three Days He Will Rise': The (Dis)Appropriation of Hosea 6.2 in the Markan Passion Predictions," in Biblical Interpretation in Early Christian Gospels, 1: The Gospel of Mark, ed. T. R. Hatina (LNTS 304; London: T & T Clark, 2006) 131-50; G. Reim, Studien zum alttestamentlichen Hintergrund des Johannesevangeliums (SNTSMS 22; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1974); R. Riesner, Paul's Early Period: Chronology, Mission Strategy, Theology, trans. D. Stott (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1998); G. Samuelsson, Crucifixion in Antiquity: An Inquiry into the Background of the New Testament Terminology of Crucifixion (WUNT 2/310; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2011); E. P. Sanders, Jesus and Judaism (London: SCM, 1985); T. E. Schmidt, "Mark 15.16-32: The Crucifixion Narrative and the Roman Triumphal Procession," NTS 41 (1995) 1-18; D. Senior, The Passion of Jesus in the Gospel of Matthew (Wilmington, DE: Michael Glazier, 1985); idem, The Passion of Jesus in the Gospel of Luke (Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1989); idem, The Passion of Jesus in the Gospel of Mark (Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1991); Matthew (ANTC; Nashville: Abingdon, 1998); D. C. Sim, Apocalyptic Eschatology in the Gospel of Matthew (SNTSMS 88; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1996); W. R. Telford, The Theology of the Gospel of Mark (NTT; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1999); G. Theissen and A. Merz, The Historical Jesus: A Comprehensive Guide, trans. J. Bowden (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1998); M. Turner, "Atonement and the Death of Jesus in John—Some Questions to Bultmann and Forestell," EvQ 62 (1990) 99-122; R. E. Watts, "Jesus' Death, Isaiah 53, and Mark 10:45: A Crux Revisited," in Jesus and the Suffering Servant: Isaiah 53 and Christian Origins, ed.

W. H. Bellinger and W. R. Farmer (Harrisburg, PA: Trinity Press International, 1998) 125-51; U. Wilckens, Das Evangelium nach Johannes (NTD 4; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1998); N. T. Wright, The New Testament and the People of God (COQG 2; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1992); idem, The Resurrection of the Son of God (COQG 3; Minneapolis: Fortress, 2003); J. Zias and J. H. Charlesworth, "Crucifixion: Archaeology, Jesus, and the Dead Sea Scrolls," in Jesus and the Dead Sea Scrolls, ed. J. H. Charlesworth (New York: Doubleday, 1992) 273-89; J. Zias and E. Sekeles, "The Crucified Man from Giv'at ha-Mivtar: A Reappraisal," IEJ 35 (1985) 22-27; J. Zumstein, "L'interprétation johannique de la mort du Christ," in The Four Gospels, 1992: Festschrift Frans Neirynck, ed. F. Van Segbroeck et al. (3 vols.; BETL 100; Leuven: Leuven University, 1992) 3:219-38.

J. Dennis

DECAPOLIS. See ARCHEOLOGY AND GEOGRAPHY.

DEITY OF CHRIST. See CHRISTOLOGY; GOD; INCARNATION.

DEMON, DEVIL, SATAN

Although the concepts of demons and the devil are foreign to much of contemporary thought (including some modern Christian thought), the defeat of these beings is central to the Gospel tradition. The defeat of Satan is viewed as a fundamental aspect of the redemption of the human being, and it is achieved through the obedience of Jesus, through his exorcisms and through his *death and *resurrection. Although many today find "talk of the devil" an embarrassment, ignoring this aspect of redemption inevitably leads to an impoverishment of NT theology.

1. Devil and Demons in the Old Testament and Ancient Judaism
2. Terms for the Devil and Demons in the Gospels
3. Temptations of Jesus
4. The Devil as an Enemy of the Kingdom of God
5. The Judgment of the Devil
6. Exorcisms by Jesus as Defeat of Satan's Kingdom
7. Historicity of the Exorcisms
8. Deliverance and Miracles
9. The Devil in the Final Hours of Jesus
10. Demons and the Death of Jesus
11. Demons and the Resurrection of Jesus
12. Questions of Interpretation

1. Devil and Demons in the Old Testament and Ancient Judaism.

1.1. The Devil in the Old Testament. Whereas in the NT "Satan" is always a proper name, this is generally not the case in the OT. Indeed, it is only in 1 Chronicles 21:1, a late text, that the Hebrew śātān is used as a proper name (where he tempts David to hold a census [cf. 2 Sam 24:1]). In other texts śātān refers rather to an office. So in Zechariah 3:1-2 we have the definite article before śātān; likewise the definite article appears before śātān in Job (Job 1:6, 7, 9, 12; 2:1, 2, 4, 7), where he appears as a son of God, a member of the heavenly council. Then there are texts that refer to śātān as "an adversary" without the definite article (e.g., Ps 109:6). In 1 Kings 11:23, 25 śātān could simply mean "adversary" in the sense of leader of a faction; however, the term could have the more fundamental sense of a "legal adversary" (i.e., an accuser) and be related to the guilt of Israel and particularly of Solomon (von Rad, 73). Especially striking is Numbers 22:22, 32, where the angel of the Lord appears in the way of Balaam as a śātān (i.e., an adversary).

Apart from Sirach 21:27, the LXX does not use satanas; rather, diabolos is employed, rendering the Hebrew term śātān in eighteen instances. The Greek term diabolos normally means "slanderer," and this captures much of Satan's activity in the OT. Although the term satanas itself is not generally used, śātān is rendered by the Greek satan, but only in three instances (1 Kings 11:14 [twice], 23). Then śātān is rendered by epiboulos ("traitor") in 1 Samuel 29:4 (see 9 below, on Judas Iscariot).

Another OT term that proves important for the Gospels is ba'al zēbūb, the god of Ekron (2 Kings 1:2-3, 6, 16). Zēbūb is the collective noun for "flies," and as "lord of the flies" (cf. LXX: baal muian) he is a god who could cause or cure disease. However, it has been suggested that the MT should read ba'al zēbūl (cf. beelzeboul in Mt 10:25; 12:24, 27; Mk 3:22; Lk 11:15, 18-19), meaning "baal the prince" or "baal of the high house."

1.2. Demons in the Old Testament. The term daimonion is used eighteen times in the LXX (eight of them in Tobit); for example, in Isaiah 65:11 (BA; S has daimōn, the word's only occurrence in LXX) it renders gad, the Syrian god of fortune, and in LXX Psalm 95:5 (MT 96:5) all the gods of the peoples are called daimonia. But there are in addition a variety of other "demonic" beings: satyrs (Lev 17:7; 2 Chron 11:15; Is 13:21; 34:14), the leech (Prov 30:15), Azazel (Lev 16:8, 10, 26) and Lilith (Is 34:14). "Demons" are in fact "worldly" beings (this, as we will see, will have important implications for the Gospels). Isaiah 34, in speaking of the judgment on the nations, tells of how God will employ “demonic” beings as a judgment: their lands will be possessed by the hawk, hedgehog, owl, raven, jackals, ostriches, wildcats, hyenas, goat-demons, and by Lilith (Is 34:11-15).

1.3. The Devil and Demons in Ancient Judaism.

In certain ancient Jewish texts a fundamental development occurs that explains many of the thought structures concerning the devil and demons in the Gospel narratives. First, a number of texts develop Genesis 1—3 (the devil being identified with the serpent) in such a way as to explain how sin, illness and physical death entered the world as a result of the devil’s temptation of Adam and Eve (Barr, 16-20). Second, a number of texts, many of them belonging to the apocalyptic tradition, develop Genesis 6:1-4 to account for the presence of “fallen angels.” Therefore although the tradition of the “fall” was not greatly developed in the OT itself, it takes on a central role in some later Jewish texts, and this becomes fundamental in understanding Jesus’ battle with the devil in his temptations, exorcisms, preaching ministry, and his death and resurrection.

An example of this development is in Wisdom 2:24: “but through the devil’s envy death entered the world, and those who belong to his company experience it” (NSRV). The association of the devil and death (see 10 below) was extended to the devil and illness, and this forms the fundamental paradigm for Jesus’ healing and exorcism ministry. Also because the devil tempted Eve (in the Jewish tradition Eve, not Adam, carries the blame [Sir 25:24]), he came to be associated with false teaching; hence the demons’ confession of Jesus’ sonship can hardly be viewed as “intelligent” (see 12 below).

Together with Genesis 3, Genesis 6:1-4 was fundamental for the development of demonology. In ancient Judaism the devil becomes a figure of evil, and a mythology is developed mainly around Genesis 6:1-4. So 1 Enoch 6—11 relates the rebellion of the angels (“the Watchers”), which in turn influenced Jubilees (e.g., 1 En. 5:10-11). Jubilees, written in the middle of the second century B.C., is one of the earliest and most extensive retellings of the stories of Genesis and the first half of Exodus, and it is significant that angels, which occasionally appear in Genesis, are given a more prominent role, and demons, which never appear in Genesis and Exodus, are also prominent. Other significant examples of the fall of the angels are in the *Dead Sea Scrolls (CD-A II, 18-21; 4Q203; 4Q531; 4Q532; 4Q533).

Hence the devil, who in the OT is an accuser, becomes a figure of evil. Therefore we see an increasing dualism developing in the intertestamental period and an increasing interest in demons. An interesting example of this is Belial, who in the OT denotes something like “uselessness” or “wickedness” but not in any sense a heavenly figure opposed to God. But in the intertestamental period he becomes a satanic figure (e.g., T. Dan 1:7-9; 1QM I, 13-15; 1QH^a XI, 28-29).

The devil is noticeably absent in 4 Ezra and has a negligible role in rabbinic literature, which can be explained by there being no expectation of his destruction in the end time, by his role being replaced by the “evil urge,” and by rabbinic reaction to Christian theology.

2. Terms for the Devil and Demons in the Gospels.

Following the LXX, the NT uses the term diabolos; although the Greek term usually means “slanderer” (“Slanderers [diabolous] he hated more than thieves” [Xenophon, Ages. 11.5]), the term in the NT is used for the chief enemy of Jesus and of the kingdom of God. The term diabolos is never used in Mark but occurs six times in Matthew, five times in Luke (2x in Acts) and three times in John. The other major term is satanas, occurring four times in Matthew, six times in Mark, five times in Luke (2x in Acts) and once in John.

Beelzeboul is employed in Matthew 10:25; 12:24 (// Mk 3:22; Lk 11:15); Matthew 12:27 (// Lk 11:18-19). The intended sense is “lord of the house” (see Mt 10:25b), zēbūl meaning “height, abode, dwelling” (see 1 above).

The devil is referred to as “the evil one” (ho ponēros) in Matthew 13:19, 38 (see also Jn 17:15). The final petition of the Lord’s Prayer (Mt 6:13; Lk 11:4) traditionally has been understood in the West as “deliver us from evil” (rysai hēmas apo tou ponērou); however, the Eastern tradition may be correct in understanding this as “deliver us from the evil one” (Davies and Allison, 1:614-15); Matthew 5:37 may also refer to “the evil one” rather than the abstract “evil.” The term “the tempter” (ho peirazōn) is used just once (Mt 4:3); “prince of demons” (ho archōn tōn daimoniōn) is used in Matthew 9:23; 12:24 (// Mk 3:22; Lk 11:15); in the parable of the tares he is “the enemy” (ho echthros [Mt 13:39; Lk 10:19]); in John 12:31; 16:11 he is “the ruler of this world” (ho archōn tou kosmou toutou) (cf. John 14:30).

The usual term for “demon” is daimonion, used eleven times in Matthew (but note the use of daimōn in Mt 8:31), thirteen times in Mark, twenty-three times in Luke and six times in John. Other terms include “evil spirits” (Mt 12:45; Lk 7:21; 8:2) and “unclean spirit/s” (Mk 1:23, 26; 3:11; 5:2, 13; 6:7; 7:25 and par.).

3. Temptations of Jesus.

The first explicit appearance of the devil in the Synoptic Gospels is the *temptation of Jesus (this is not in John). He is led by the Spirit into the wilderness, where he is tempted by Satan (Mk 1:13) or the devil (Mt 4:1; Lk 4:2). Compared to Mark, Matthew and Luke give a more extensive narrative: Jesus fasted “forty days and forty nights” (Mt 4:2 [cf. Ex 24:18]), and three temptations are described (commanding stones to become bread, throwing himself down from the pinnacle of the temple, and worshiping the devil in order to gain the kingdoms of the world). In each of the temptations the devil begins the dialogue with “If you are the son of God,” suggesting that the main emphasis of the text is christological. Satan’s plan is to separate Jesus from his Father, and the emphasis of the temptation narrative is that Jesus protects his status as *Son of God through his obedience to the word of God as witnessed in the OT. The devil is portrayed as an imposter: he quotes Scripture in the second temptation in Matthew (third in Luke) (Ps 91:12) and claims in the third temptation in Matthew (second in Luke) to be in possession of the “kingdoms of the world” (tas basileias tou kosmou [Mt 4:8]). Although Satan does in fact have his “kingdom” (see 6 below), the temptation narrative hardly suggests that the devil is in possession of the “kingdoms of the world.”

Matthew’s version ends with Jesus saying, “Depart, Satan” (Mt 4:10), and the devil leaving him (Mt 4:11). But Luke ends tellingly: “When the devil had finished every test, he departed from him until an opportune moment” (Lk 4:13 NRSV). Many understand the “opportune moment” to be the arrest of Jesus, when Jesus tells those who arrest him, “This is your hour, and the power of darkness” (Lk 22:53 NRSV). But already in Luke 4:16–30 we see satanic activity in human opposition to Jesus, such activity also being manifest in the “cosmic” evil of demon possession, illness (e.g., Luke 4:31–41) and the untamed forces of nature (Luke 8:22–25).

4. The Devil as an Enemy of the Kingdom of God.

The Synoptic Gospels portray two kingdoms at war with each other: the *kingdom of God and the kingdom of Satan. Although Satan cannot be said to possess “the kingdoms of the world” (Mt 4:8), he does have his own kingdom, as is suggested by Jesus’ teaching in Mark 3:24–27 (// Mt 12:25–29; Lk 11:17–20). Jesus explains how a kingdom divided against itself cannot stand; on the assumption that Satan has a kingdom, he thereby argues that it is impossible to cast out demons by the prince of demons. But through the exorcisms Satan’s kingdom is diminishing, and God’s kingdom is growing.

The devil is seen as an opponent of the kingdom in some of the *parables of the kingdom. In the parable of the sower, Satan (Mk 4:15; Mt 13:19 [the evil one]; Lk 8:12 [the devil]) snatches the seed that is “sown in the heart.” In the parable of the tares, the enemy who sows weeds among the wheat (Mt 13:25, 28) is identified with the devil in the interpretation (Mt 13:39). God’s kingdom is being established through the actual preaching of the parables understood as “speech events” (Jüngel, 135–38).

In John the opponents of Jesus are the Jewish people who take on a “demonic aspect”; although there are “Jews” who follow Jesus (e.g., the disciples, Nathaniel), they clearly are the exceptions. A particularly difficult passage is John 8:30–59. Although Jesus addresses those who believed in him (Jn 8:31), their faith is so seriously defective that they accuse Jesus of having a demon (Jn 8:48, 52), and Jesus accuses them of having the devil as their father, who is both a murderer and a liar (Jn 8:44–46).

5. The Judgment of the Devil.

In the Synoptic tradition this *judgment is seen in the parable of the tares, where the “fruit” of the devil’s work is destroyed at the harvest time (Mt 13:30). This points to the principle that judgment of the devil and his works is delayed until the final day of judgment. This view is also found at the end of the judgment of the nations (Mt 25:31–46), where the king tells those on his left, “You that are accursed, depart from me into the eternal fire prepared for the devil and his angels” (Mt 25:41 NRSV).

Although there is this emphasis on the judgment of the devil on the last day in the Synoptic Gospels, judgment is also realized in the present through the preaching (see 4 above), through the exorcisms, and through the cross and the resurrection (see 10, 11 below).

John also writes explicitly about the judgment of the devil. The “ruler of this world” is driven out because of Jesus’ sacrificial death (Jn 12:31–32); ultimately, he has no power over Jesus (Jn 14:30), and the Paraclete will convince the world that “the ruler of this world” has been condemned (Jn 16:11).

6. Exorcisms by Jesus as Defeat of Satan’s Kingdom.

In the strict sense of the word, exorcism means that someone is possessed by an evil spirit and this evil spirit is driven out (Twelftree, 13). This must be distinguished from those cases where someone is oppressed by an evil spirit and the spirit is driven away (Deines, 368). This corresponds to the distinction that many make between demonic possession and demonic oppression, a point to which we will return.

In the Gospels “exorcism” certainly is seen as a type of “healing,” and in each of the Synoptic Gospels (John does not relate any exorcisms) a particular relationship between exorcism and healing can be discerned.

Mark has ten healing stories, but only once is an illness explicitly attributed to demonic activity (Mk 9:14-29). Of the nine other healings, one perhaps could infer demonic cause (Mk 1:29-31; 1:40-45; 2:1-12; 3:1-6; 5:21-43; 6:54-56; 7:31-37; 8:22-26; 10:46-52). Overall, there are four “exorcism” stories. Three of these (Mk 1:21-28; 5:1-20; 7:24-30) could be understood as healing of “mental illnesses.” A fourth, Mark 9:14-29, already mentioned, is definitely a healing of a physical illness. Then there are summary passages where Jesus is described as healing the sick and casting out demons of those possessed (Mk 1:32-34; 3:10-12). Mark 1:34 distinguishes between sicknesses that are healed and demons that are cast out. There is also the description of the disciples as healing and exorcising (Mk 6:13) that makes the same sort of distinction. Although one could make a case that the two groups of stories—healing and exorcism—are to be distinguished (Mk 9:14-29 being an exception), one could legitimately argue that the evangelists assume that Satan was the “cause” of illness, and therefore all healings are to be understood as “deliverances” (see 10 below); however, in view of the distinction made above between demonic possession and demonic oppression, it would be mistaken to understand all healing as “exorcism” (a view suggested by Böcher, 80).

Matthew seems to make the boundaries between healing and exorcism more fluid. He assigns to demons cases of muteness (Mt 9:32-33 [this story is not in Mark]), blindness and muteness (Mt 12:22-23 [not in Mark]) and epilepsy (Mt 17:14-21 [this parallels Mk 9:14-29, but only in Matthew is the boy said to be an “epileptic” [Mt 17:15]]). Further, he lists demon possession along with epilepsy and paralysis as infirmities that Jesus “healed” (Mt 4:24). Like Mark, he also has summary statements about Jesus’ healing and exorcising activity (Mt 8:16-17), although the distinction between healing and exorcism is not as sharp as in the parallel of Mark 1:32-34. Matthew has no parallel to Mark 6:13, which tells of the disciples’ healing and exorcising activity.

Luke “blurs the lines between healing and de-

monic activity more than any other New Testament writer” (Thomas, 225). In the summaries we see a mixing of healing and exorcism; so in Luke 4:40-41 there is a sentence structure that suggests two parts of one activity. As J. Nolland argues, “Exorcising is not, as in Mark, a separate activity: as many of the sick were healed, demons came out of them. As had the teaching of Jesus (v 33), so now his healing hands flush out the demons” (Nolland, 214).

Then again, Luke 6:18-19 is striking in that “those who were troubled with unclean spirits were healed.” This suggests a close link between healing and exorcism. The report to *John the Baptist in Luke 7:21-23 also links demon possession (note the use of the term “evil spirits”) and illness. In Luke 8:2 we read of “some women who had been cured of evil spirits and infirmities.” In Luke 10:17-20 the subjugation of demons most likely includes both exorcism and healings. The story of the mute demon in Luke 11:14 again brings together the demonic and physical illness. Then the story of the healing of the crippled woman “whom Satan bound for eighteen long years” in Luke 13:10-17 could again suggest that, for Luke, illness is generally caused by the devil. Striking also is the story of the healing of Peter’s mother-in-law, in which Jesus stood over her and rebuked the fever, and it left her (Lk 4:38). As J. Green points out, “Luke paints this scene very much as an exorcism, even if no mention is made of demons per se” (Green 1997, 225). That is, Jesus “stood over her,” a practice paralleled in exorcisms in the Magical Papyri (PGM 4:745, 1229, 2735), and he “rebuked” (epetimēsen) the fever just as he rebuked (epitimēsen) the demon in the previous story (Lk 4:35), the healing of a man with an unclean spirit (Lk 4:31-37). One of the striking things here, however, is that we have what could be described as a “devout” person afflicted by Satan (cf. Paul and his affliction caused by a “messenger of Satan” [2 Cor 12:7-9]).

Although Luke, like Mark and Matthew, often distinguishes between “healing” and “exorcism,” his overall view is that demons/Satan are responsible for illness. As Green emphasizes, “Almost every account of healing in the Third Gospel is portrayed as an encounter with diabolic forces” (Green 1995, 78). This, as he points out, is particularly apparent in Luke 13:10-17. Green’s claim may seem exaggerated if certain healings are examined in isolation; so the following texts do not appear at first sight to be “an encounter with diabolic forces”: Luke 5:12-16 (cleansing of a leper); Luke 5:17-26 (healing of a paralytic); Luke 6:6-11 (healing of a man with a withered hand); Luke 7:1-10 (healing of a centurion’s servant);

Luke 7:11-17 (raising of widow of Nain's son); Luke 8:40-56 (girl restored to life and healing of a woman with a hemorrhage); Luke 14:1-6 (healing of a man with dropsy); Luke 17:11-19 (cleansing of ten lepers); Luke 18:35-43 (healing of a blind beggar). However, when these healings are seen in the context of the temptation of Jesus (Lk 4:1-13), Green's point holds because this forms a "prelude" (my term) to the opposition to Jesus, which begins at Luke 4:14. So there is human opposition (e.g., Lk 4:16-30), demonic opposition seen in the exorcisms (Lk 4:33-36, 41; 8:26-39), demonic opposition in sickness that Jesus encountered, and demonic opposition in the forces of nature. All are manifestations of "cosmic evil." However, there is a clear exception. The muteness of Zechariah (Lk 1:18-20) is seen as an act of God, and such an illness (and subsequent healing [Lk 1:64]) stands out on its own in this Gospel. But this narrative also occurs in the first two chapters of Luke, which have their own special "Septuagintal" flavor. Not only is the language "Septuagintal," but so too are some of the theological ideas. So Zechariah and Elizabeth are "righteous before God, living blamelessly according to all the commandments and regulations of the Lord" (Lk 1:6). Prior to the coming of the Messiah, there is an openness to good works and piety. Perhaps there is also an "openness" to God making someone mute. Any work of the devil is somewhat veiled in Luke 1—2 (Lk 1:79; 2:34), but this changes in Luke 4 when the devil "steps out from behind the curtain for a direct confrontation with the one through whom God would manifest his redemptive will" (Green 1997, 192).

The general picture, therefore, is that as we move from Mark to Matthew and then to Luke, the distinction between exorcism and healing becomes less clear. But in all three Gospels there are cases where Jesus heals by an exorcism (see below on how this could possibly be understood).

It is striking that in the exorcisms by Jesus "ritual" plays virtually no part. In comparison with other "exorcists," Jesus refrained from using physical means to achieve an exorcism. Compare, for example, the exorcism (or, to be more precise, the "driving away" of the demon) achieved by burning the heart and liver of a fish in Tobit 8:2-3 (cf. Tob 6:6-7, 16-18a). There is also a report by Josephus of a "ring" being used in an exorcism (Josephus, Ant. 8.46-48). By comparison, there is a remarkable lack of ritual in Jesus' exorcisms. However, a "ritual" in the broadest sense could be said to be involved in the story of the Gerasene demoniac in that with the swine rushing down the cliff into the sea, "an unmistakable sign is given that the exorcism has been effective" (Barrett, 56). Further, one could also say, with T. Klutz, that there is a "ritual of relocation and 'anti-rite' in Jesus' performance of exorcism" (Klutz, 144). He compares Luke 8:26-39 with Leviticus 16:1-34, the Yom Kippur ritual. On the one hand, there are similarities. Both texts concern an elimination rite or a "rite of relocation" (Klutz, 145). So the transfer of impure spirits to the pigs corresponds to the scapegoat carrying the sins of Israel into the desert (Lev 16:20-21). But, on the other hand, Klutz argues that there are also deep oppositions. For example, the scapegoat ritual serves the "collective interest" of atoning for the sins of the people Israel (Lev 16:15-22), whereas Jesus subordinates collective purity for the individual (Lk 8:35-39); further, the scapegoat ritual is "iterative," whereas Jesus' exorcisms are "eschatological, climactic and once-for-all." Jesus' exorcisms stood in a "partly countercultural and partly contracultural position vis-à-vis the Jewish ethnic subculture of Palestinian society" (Klutz, 144). Klutz believes that Jesus' specific (perhaps unique) views on ritual may add to the historicity of episodes like that of the Gerasene demoniac and suggests that Jesus was more critical of Jewish codes of impurity than some scholars have allowed. Therefore, even in this exorcism, which has ritual elements, Jesus' approach seems to be distinctive.

Another distinctive element is that generally Jesus does not lay on hands as Abraham does in 1QGenesis Apocryphon, where Abraham (Abram) is reported to say, "So I prayed [for him] [i.e., the king of Egypt] and I laid my hands on his [head]; and the scourge departed from him and the evil [spirit] was expelled [from him], and he lived" (1QapGen XX, 28-29). Although generally Jesus does not lay on hands in exorcism, there are one or two possible exceptions that we know of. One is Luke 13:13: "When he laid his hands on her, immediately she stood up straight and began praising God" (NRSV). This, as noted above, probably is to be understood as an exorcism. Another possible exception is Luke 4:40-41. Although laying on of hands is related to healing (Lk 4:40), this healing, as we noted above, is integrally related to exorcism (Lk 4:41).

It sometimes has been argued that Jesus' exorcisms are rather unusual in that he does not usually "pray" in his exorcism activity. This is sometimes contrasted with the activity of Hanina ben Dosa in b. Berakot 34b. Here Hanina ben Dosa prays for Rabbi Gamaliel, who had fallen ill. Afterwards he explains, "If my prayer is fluent in my mouth, I know that he is accepted: but if not, I know that he is rejected."

Likewise, Hanina ben Dosa prays for the son of Rabbi Johanan ben Zakkai. However, it should be noted that this healing and the previous one are not described as exorcisms. The contrast therefore between Jesus and Hanina ben Dosa is not as stark as some have seen it to be. This is especially so since Jesus himself in his “healings” sometimes does “pray.” A better contrast is between Jesus and the Abraham of 1QGenesis Apocryphon, who prays for the king of Egypt (quoted above). It must also be pointed out that although Jesus does not usually “pray” in his exorcisms, his whole exorcism ministry is underpinned by an intense prayer life. In this connection, Mark 9:29 is of interest: “This kind can come out only through prayer” (NRSV). This suggests that prayer underpins his whole exorcism ministry rather than being used in that particular instance. In fact, in this exorcism (Mk 9:14-29) Jesus does not “pray” to cast out the spirit. The interpretation that the text is speaking of prayer life underpinning the exorcism appears to be held by later scribes who added “and fasting” (the best textual witnesses omit “and fasting” [N* B 0274]); hence, this later tradition is suggesting that just as prayer supports the ministry of exorcism, so does fasting.

A further difference between Jesus’ exorcisms and the few Jewish exorcisms that we know of is that Jesus does not use a powerful name as was typical of exorcisms (both Jewish and pagan). Neither does Jesus use the formula “I adjure you.” On the use of powerful names and the adjuration, see the Paris Magical Papyrus, lines 3018-3028 (but note that this is dated around A.D. 300): “After placing [the patient] opposite [to you], conjure [horkize]. This is the conjuration [horkismos]: ‘I conjure [horkizō] you by the god of the Hebrews, Jesus, IABA IAË ABRAÖTH AIA THÖTH ELE ELÖ AEÖ EOY IIBAECH ABARMAS IABARAO U ABELBEL LÖNA ABRA MAROIA BRAKION, who appears in fire, who is in the midst of land, snow, and fog, TANNËTIS; let your angel, the implacable, descend and let him assign the daimon flying around his form, which god formed in his holy paradise” (Betz, 96 [the capital letters indicate magical names that usually are untranslatable]). By contrast, in Jesus’ exorcisms there is simply a command: “I command you” (Mk 9:25). He does not use a powerful name; the power lies in his own “I.”

7. Historicity of the Exorcisms.

Six arguments can be advanced for the historicity of the exorcisms. First, it is unlikely that the early church fabricated exorcisms stories, since the narratives belong to an early and primitive tradition. Note the very first exorcism in Mark (Mk 1:23-28), which contains an Aramaic idiom (lit., “a man in an unclean spirit” [Mk 1:23]) and an unusual messianic title (“the holy one of God” [Mk 1:24]). Second, Jesus’ opponents do not dispute that Jesus cast out demons; rather, they suggested that he casts out demons by the prince of demons (Mk 3:22-27 [// Mt 12:22-30; Lk 11:14-15, 17-23]). Already in Justin Martyr (Dial. 69.6-7) there is the tradition that Jesus was viewed as a sorcerer, a view found in late rabbinic tradition (b. Sanh. 43a). Third, Jesus’ name was used by others in exorcism (Lk 10:17; Acts 19:13), which suggests Jesus had a reputation as an exorcist. Fourth, there are exorcism sayings as well as stories (found in multiple sources). Fifth, if Jesus as an exorcist was a creation of the early church, we would expect forms that approximate those we know of from Jewish and Greco-Roman worlds. Two elements missing in Jesus’ recorded exorcisms are use of physical aids (cf. Tobit) and the use of a powerful name or formula (see 6 above, on the debate regarding prayer and laying on of hands). The only significant parallel to Jesus’ exorcisms is b. Me’il. 17b: in response to the demon that is believed to have entered the emperor’s daughter, Rabbi Simeon ben Yose (fourth-generation Tannaim) commands, “Ben Temalion, get out! Ben Temalion, get out!” Sixth, Jesus was the first to relate exorcisms to *eschatology (Mt 12:28). Jesus, in casting out demons, was casting out Satan himself (Lk 10:18).

The historicity of the exorcisms of Jesus appears to be widely established. However, some confusion reigns where scholars claim that Jesus cast out demons and yet do not believe that demons “exist” in any meaningful sense (on this, see Bell, 77).

8. Deliverance and Miracles.

Above, we noted a distinction between demonic possession and oppression. Whereas exorcism is required for the former, it is not required for the latter. A term that encompasses both is “deliverance.” Much literature assumes that deliverance from the devil is a subset of *miracles. However, deliverance could be a category that actually defines miracles themselves (“Miracle is the mighty act in which the one God confronts the demonic powers” [Heim, 190]). Since the Enlightenment, miracles often have been understood as “breaking/ changing a scientific law” (e.g., E. Andrews defines a miracle as “an event consequent upon a localized change in the laws of nature” [Andrews, 47]). However, “Nowhere in Scripture is the causal nexus treated as the antithesis of miracle" (Heim, 189). In the Gospels it is not the power of laws of nature that is broken, but rather the power of the devil (as noted in Luz 2001, 57). Viewing "miracle" as an attack on the demonic not only is more faithful to the biblical tradition, but also brings together "healings," "exorcisms" and "nature miracles"; it also encompasses "providential acts" and "conversion" (Bell, 111-14). Healings are encompassed because illness generally is viewed as demonic in the Gospel tradition. Nature miracles such as the stilling of the storm are attacks on the demonic. The OT speaks of the threatening and chaotic forces of nature (e.g., 2 Sam 22:5), and there is the OT mythology of Leviathan and Rahab. The lives of Jesus and his disciples are threatened by the demonic forces of the wind and the waves (Mk 4:35-41). Jesus "rebukes" the wind (Mk 4:39; cf. Mk 1:25). It is significant that the stilling of the storm is followed by the story of the Gerasene demoniac.

9. The Devil in the Final Hours of Jesus.

In the hours leading up to Jesus' death there appears to be a concentration of demonic activity against Jesus, this activity being manifest principally in the human beings instrumental in killing Jesus.

Luke's Gospel is particularly graphic in this regard. His passion narrative begins by relating that "Satan entered Judas" (Lk 22:3), who then went away to plan Jesus' betrayal (Lk 22:4-6). In the *Last Supper narrative, Jesus tells Peter of how "Satan has demanded to sift all of you like wheat" (Lk 22:31 NRSV). The sense of this is not simply that Satan will test the faithfulness of the disciples as Satan did of Job (Job 1-2); rather, the emphasis is on Satan inciting the disciples. Jesus says that he has prayed for Peter so that his "faith may not fail." Yet we know that in the short term (Lk 22:34, 54-62) his faith did in fact fail (contrast Acts 2:14-42). The time of testing in Gethsemane is a diabolic assault (Lk 22:42-44), implied by Jesus' words to his inner circle: "Get up and pray that you may not come into the time of trial" (Lk 22:46). The gathering of satanic forces is again clear when Jesus says to those arresting him: "But this is your hour, and the power of darkness" (Lk 22:53). Judas and the temple leadership "share the bond of diabolic influence" (Green 1997, 785).

John in his own way portrays the demonic atmosphere in the betrayal of Jesus. The evangelist tells of how "Satan entered" Judas when he received the piece of bread (Jn 13:27) and ominously adds, when Judas leaves the assembled disciples, "And it was night" (Jn 13:30).

10. Demons and the Death of Jesus.

John makes it clear that the death of Jesus is to be seen as a "great exorcism" (Jn 12:31-32). The forces of evil gather against Jesus, but these forces are defeated.

The relation between the demons and the death of Jesus is not explicitly stated in the Synoptic Gospels; nevertheless, there is a clear theological theme running through the Gospels that requires some explanation. Here, Mark's Gospel will be the basis, but we will examine material from Matthew and Luke as well.

The exorcisms occupy the first part of Mark's Gospel, the first one occurring in Mark 1:21-28, the last one in Mark 9:14-29. If we consider healings as well, we find them limited also to this first half of the Gospel (the first in Mk 1:29-31, the healing of Peter's mother-in-law, and the last in Mk 10:46-52, the healing of Bartimaeus). But it would be a mistake to think that it was only in the first part of Mark's Gospel that Jesus was in conflict with demons. The fight runs throughout the entire Gospel: the temptations are an unsuccessful attempt to separate Jesus from his Father; in the cry of dereliction it appears that Satan has in fact achieved this (Mk 15:34 [// Mt 27:46; contrast Lk 23:46]). This is underlined by the darkness that appears "over the whole land" from noon until three in the afternoon (Mk 15:33 [// Mt 27:45; Lk 23:44]).

The darkness, representing demonic activity, is also reflected in human ignorance and confusion regarding the person of Jesus. This ignorance surfaces throughout the Gospel and reaches its climax in the events running up to the death of Jesus. This ignorance is demonically inspired. In this connection, one has to question the extent to which the various "christological" confessions of the demons (Jesus is "the Holy One of God" [Mk 1:24], "the Son of God" [Mk 3:11], "Son of the Most High God" [Mk 5:7]) are intelligent confessions. The so-called messianic secret in this case is not that the demons know Jesus' true identity as the Messiah (see Christ) and are commanded to be silent about this (Mk 1:34; 3:11-12); rather, in view of the fact that Jesus is a suffering Messiah (Mk 8:31; 9:30-32; 10:32-34) and redemption comes through his death (Mk 10:45; 14:22-24), their knowledge must be one of ignorance. Therefore, the command that the demons be silent is for the protection of human beings (Mittmann-Richert, 493). In contrast, the command to silence for the disciples or those he healed is for another purpose: to prevent a false understanding of Jesus' messiahship developing in the light of Jewish messianic expectations.

A striking example of the ignorance concerning Jesus' person and work is found in the center of Mark's Gospel, in Jesus' rebuke to Peter: "Get behind me, Satan! For you are setting your mind not on divine things but on human things" (Mk 8:33 NRSV). Peter's ignorance anticipates the scorn poured upon Jesus (Mk 15:18, 32); these scorners, in calling on Jesus to save himself, are, like Peter, blinded by demonic powers (Mittmann-Richert, 490).

Satan, in separating Jesus from his father, achieves a Pyrrhic victory. For in Christ's death the blindness that has fallen upon human beings is lifted in a remarkable way. According to Mark 15:34, at the ninth hour Jesus cried out "with a loud cry" (phōnē megalē) the words of Psalm 22:1 in Aramaic ("My God, my God, why have you forsaken me"). In Mark 15:35-36 the bystanders misunderstand: they think that Jesus is calling for Elijah, and someone offers Jesus vinegar to drink. But the centurion does understand. In Mark 15:37, where Jesus "gave a loud cry [phōnēn megalēn] and breathed his last," the "cry" is not an unintelligible scream; rather, the content of the cry is that uttered in Mark 15:34, which is Psalm 22. In Mark 15:39 the centurion seeing that "in this way he breathed his last" (houtōs exepneusen), confesses, "Truly this man was the Son of God" (see Gese, 195-96). We do not know whether Jesus prayed just the opening line or the entire psalm, but it is highly significant that the end of the psalm points to the breaking in of the kingdom of God (Ps 22:28), to the deliverance of the righteous petitioner (Ps 22:20-23, 29b) and to the nations coming to God in repentance and adoration (e.g., "All the ends of the earth shall remember and turn to the LORD; and all the families of the nations shall worship before him" [Ps 22:27 NRSV]). According to Mark, then, the *blindness caused by the demons comes to an end as Jesus utters his final cry and looks to his deliverance from death, which is related to the breaking in of the kingdom of God.

11. Demons and the Resurrection of Jesus.

No explicit link is made in the Gospels between the *resurrection of Jesus and the defeat of the devil. However, if the death of Jesus is seen as a way of trapping the devil, Jesus' victory over death in his resurrection must be related to this defeat, if only implicitly. Further, there are some significant links made between resurrection and overcoming the demonic in Mark's fourth exorcism. Here we see a pattern of resurrection from death (Mk 9:26-27) and the faith-giving power of Jesus Christ (Mk 9:23-24) (Mittmann-Richert, 494). Significantly, this exorcism stands after the confession by Peter (Mk 8:27-33), which contains the themes of death, resurrection and faith and over against Jesus' rebuke to Peter that he understands virtually nothing about the Messiah's mission.

12. Questions of Interpretation.

Traditionally, the devil and demons have been viewed as "supernatural figures." But there are two possible problems with this. First, the distinction between nature and supernature is Aristotelian rather than biblical. Second, if God is also a "supernatural figure," then this categorization can lead to a God/devil dualism and can give the evil powers a dignity and status that they do not deserve.

An alternative approach is to view the devil and demons as mythological figures. This was the approach of R. Bultmann, but he went on to claim that modern persons no longer can believe in *angels or demonic beings (Bultmann, 5). However, we know that today many people do believe in angels and demons, and, conversely, there were those in the first century (e.g., *Sadducees) who did not believe in them. There is therefore no simple polarization between "primitive" ancient views and modern rationalistic views as Bultmann was trying to suggest.

Although Bultmann created some controversy regarding "myth," many still believe it is a helpful and indeed unavoidable term in coming to understand the theological significance of the devil and demons. The myth of the fall of humankind and the fall of angels (see Gen 3; 6:1-4; and also the development of these traditions in Hellenistic Judaism and Jewish apocalyptic) is a narrative that is inexchangeable. Myth is discovered, not invented, and its power lies in the way it can affect our human existence and access the deepest levels of the reality of the world.

But the myth of the devil and Jesus' victory over him can be received critically, and this can be seen in the various rationalistic understandings of the exorcisms of Jesus as simple psychosomatic cures (e.g., Dunn, 71). Alternatively, the myth of the devil bringing sin, illness and death into the world can be received positively. This is precisely what Jesus and the early Christians did, thereby enabling them to access levels of reality that are inaccessible to normal human reason and perception. Having accessed these deeper levels of reality, they were able by a word of command to effect a change in the world (exorcism, healing, stilling of the storm). Hence, there is a remarkable bridging of the world of "myth" and the world of "history."

Satan and demons can thereby be understood as "real" and "personal" but also as mythological figures; their reality depends on the fact that they are defeated by Jesus, the God-man, the most concrete of all realities, whose person spans the reality of the divine and the reality of the world in all its depths. Satan is defeated through Jesus' temptations, exorcisms, preaching and, ultimately, through his death and resurrection.

Understanding the devil in this way may help to make sense of the temptation narratives. Many interpreters have problems with these narratives because of the appearance of the devil and angels (Mk 1:13// Mt 4:11) and because of the physical implausibility of the second temptation (Jesus being taken to the "pinnacle" of the temple, even if "pinnacle" [pterygion] is understood as the "balcony" in the temple wall [Mt 4:5 // Lk 4:9]) or the impossibility of the third temptation (there is simply no mountain that can provide a view of the "kingdoms of the world" [Mt 4:8 // Lk 4:5]). One approach has been to understand this as a visionary experience that Jesus later narrated to his disciples (Origen, Theodore of Mopsuetia) or as a "legendary" or "mythological" story (Luz 1989, 191). Although there are "visionary" and "mythological" elements, neither view does full justice to the narrative or to the life of Jesus. Having fasted, Jesus was in a state of consciousness such that he was able to access deeper levels of reality where the usual categories of time and space no longer apply. Hence he is able to be taken to the "pinnacle" of the temple (according to rabbinic tradition, the highest point on the earth [b. Qidd. 69a]) or to be shown the "kingdoms of the world," even though in ordinary perception this is physically impossible.

In conclusion, a case can be made for demoting the devil from the realm of "supernature" to the realm of "the world." But the world in which we live is multi-layered, and it is in the deeper levels of the reality of the world that the spiritual battle takes place.

See also ANGELS; AUTHORITY AND POWER; DEATH OF JESUS; ESCHATOLOGY; GODS, GREEK AND ROMAN; HEALING; JUDGMENT; KINGDOM OF GOD/HEAVEN; LIGHT AND DARKNESS; MIRACLES AND MIRACLE STORIES; TEMPTATION OF JESUS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. E. H. Andrews, God, Science and Evolution (Welwyn: Evangelical Press, 1980); J. Barr, The Garden of Eden and the Hope of Immortality (London: SCM, 1992); C. K. Barrett, The Holy Spirit and the Gospel Tradition (2nd ed.; London: SPCK, 1966); R. H. Bell, Deliver Us from Evil: Interpreting the Redemption from the Power of Satan in New Testament Theology (WUNT 216; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2007); H.-D. Betz, ed., The

Greek Magical Papyri in Translation, Including the Demotic Spells (2nd ed.; Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1992); O. Böcher, Christus Exorcista: Dämonismus und Taufe im Neuen Testament (BWANT 5/16; Stuttgart: Kohlhammer, 1972); R. Bultmann, "New Testament and Mythology," in Kerygma and Myth: A Theological Debate, ed. H. W. Bartsch, trans. R. H. Fuller (2nd ed.; London: SPCK, 1964) 1-44; W. D. Davies and D. C. Allison, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Gospel according to Saint Matthew (ICC; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1988); R. Deines, "Josephus, Salomo und die von Gott verliehene τέχνη gegen die Dämonen," in Die Dämonen: Die Dämonologie der israelitisch-jüdischen und frühchristlichen Literatur im Kontext ihrer Umwelt, ed. A. Lange, H. Lichtenberger and D. Römheld (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2003) 365-94; J. D. G. Dunn, Jesus and the Spirit: A Study of the Religious and Charismatic Experience of Jesus and the First Christians as Reflected in the New Testament (London: SCM, 1975); H. Gese, "Psalm 22 und das Neue Testament: Der älteste Bericht vom Tode Jesu und die Entstehung des Herrenmahles," in Vom Sinai zum Zion: Alttestamentliche Beiträge zur biblischen Theologie (3rd ed.; BEvT 64; Munich: Kaiser, 1990) 180-201; J. B. Green, The Theology of the Gospel of Luke (NTT; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1995); idem, The Gospel of Luke (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1997); K. Heim, The Transformation of the Scientific World View, trans. W. A. Whitehouse (London: SCM, 1953); E. Jüngel, Paulus und Jesus: Eine Untersuchung zur Präzisierung der Frage nach dem Ursprung der Christologie (6th ed.; HUT 2; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1986); T. Klutz, The Exorcism Stories in Luke-Acts: A Socio-stylistic Reading (SNTSMS 129; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2004); U. Luz, Matthew 1-7: A Commentary, trans. W. C. Linss (CC; Minneapolis: Augsburg, 1989); idem, Matthew 8-20: A Commentary, ed. H. Koester, trans. J. E. Crouch (Hermeneia; Minneapolis: Fortress, 2001); U. Mittmann-Richert, "Die Dämonen und der Tod des Gottessohns im Markus-evangelium," in Die Dämonen: Die Dämonologie der israelitisch-jüdischen und frühchristlichen Literatur im Kontext ihrer Umwelt, ed. A. Lange, H. Lichtenberger and D. Römheld (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2003) 476-504; J. Nolland, Luke 1-9:20 (WBC 35A; Dallas: Word, 1989); J. C. Thomas, The Devil, Disease and Deliverance: Origins of Illness in New Testament Thought (JPTSUP 13; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1998); G. H. Twelftree, Jesus the Exorcist: A

Contribution to the Study of the Historical Jesus (WUNT 2/54; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1993); G. von Rad, “διάβολος, B. The OT View of Satan,” TDNT 2:73-75. R. H. Bell

DESTRUCTION OF JERUSALEM. See JERUSALEM.

DESTRUCTION OF THE TEMPLE. See TEMPLE; TEMPLE ACT.

DEVIL. See DEMON, DEVIL, SATAN.

DIALOGUES OF THE RISEN JESUS. See GOSPELS: APOCRYPHAL.

DIONYSUS. See GODS, GRECO-ROMAN.

DISCIPLES AND DISCIPLESHIP

The first-century world displayed a variety of religious, philosophical and political leaders, all of whom had followers who were committed to their cause, teaching and beliefs. While several different terms designated these followers, disciple was one of the most commonly used, and discipleship referred to the process of growth and development as a disciple. These terms also became the most commonly used to designate the followers of Jesus, to the extent that in Jesus' Great Commission (Mt 28:19-20) the objective of the worldwide mission was to “make disciples” of all the nations.

This article focuses first on the unique nature of Jesus' disciples in comparison to other forms of disciples and discipleship in the ancient world. Then it compares the four Gospel records of Jesus and his disciples in order to appreciate the unique perspective of discipleship intended by each evangelist for his community.

1. Terminology and Concepts
2. Disciples of Jesus
3. Jesus' Unique Form of Discipleship
4. The Emphases of the Gospel Writers
5. Conclusion

1. Terminology and Concepts.

The English word disciple normally designates a “follower,” “adherent” or “student” of a great master, religious leader or teacher. In the ancient Jewish and Greco-Roman world disciple is the word used most commonly to translate the Greek word mathētēs and the Hebrew words talmid and limmūd (Wilkins 1988, chaps. 1-3).

1.1. Old Testament Background. “Disciple” terminology is strikingly scarce in the OT, but other evidence points to master-disciple relationships within the national life of Israel. The single occurrence of talmid in the OT (mathētēs does not occur in the LXX) indicates a student or apprentice in musical instruction (1 Chron 25:8). The prophet Isaiah refers to the group gathered around him as “my disciples” (limmūdāy [Is 8:16]), and their relationship is characterized by an educational process accentuating speaking and listening (limmūdīm [Is 50:4]). The term limmūdīm was used to specify the “disciples” of Yahweh (Is 54:13), indicating that limmūdīm could be disciples of both Yahweh and a human master.

The existence of master-disciple relationships within the social structure of Israel is witnessed in and by the prophets associated with Samuel (1 Sam 19:20-24), the sons of the prophets associated with Elisha (2 Kings 4:1, 38; 9:1), the writing prophets Jeremiah and Baruch (Jer 36:32), Ezra and the scribal tradition (Ezra 7:6, 11) and the wise counselors within the wisdom tradition (Prov 22:17; 25:1; Jer 18:18). Each of these institutions was involved in the process of the communication of the revelation of Yahweh (prophecy, law, wisdom), and the suggested intimacy of the relationship indicates mutual support of master and disciple in the task of revealing the word of God to the nation.

However, a unique form of discipleship in the OT is most clearly seen as Israel is in relationship to God and as the people follow God: “I will walk among you and be your God, and you will be my people” (Lev 26:12). When the nation fulfills its commitment to the covenant, it is said to be following God (e.g., Deut 4:1-14; 1 Sam 12:14) and walking in his ways (e.g., Deut 10:12). The leaders of the people, such as Joshua (Num 32:12) and Caleb (Num 32:12; Josh 14:8, 9, 14), were evaluated by the criterion of whether or not they were following God and walking in his ways. David is the supreme example of the king whose life was characterized by following God: “my servant David, who kept my commands and followed me with all his heart, doing only what was right in my eyes” (1 Kings 14:8). The OT theme of God with his people prepares for Matthew's focus on Jesus as Emmanuel, “God with his people” (Mt 1:23), who would develop a following of disciples unique to his messianic status (Wilkins 1992, 51-69).

1.2. Greek-Speaking World. Discipleship was a common phenomenon in the ancient Mediterranean world. In the earliest classical Greek literature, mathētēs was used in three ways: (1) with a general sense of a “learner,” in morphological relation to the verb manthanō, “to learn” (e.g., Isocrates, Panath.

16.7); (2) with a technical sense of “adherent” to a great teacher, teaching or master (e.g., Xenophon, Mem. 1.6.3.4); (3) and with a more restricted sense of an “institutional pupil” of the Sophists (e.g., Demosthenes, Lacr. 35.41.7). Sophists such as Protagoras were among the first to establish an institutional relationship in which the master imparted virtue and knowledge to the disciple through a paid educational process.

Socrates and Plato objected to such a form of discipleship on epistemological grounds, instead advocating a relationship in which the master directs dialogue to draw out innate knowledge from his followers. Therefore, Plato records that Socrates (and those opposed to the Sophists) resisted using mathētēs for his followers in order to avoid Sophistic misassociations (Plato, Soph. 233.B.6-C.6). But he used the term freely to refer to “learners” (Plato, Crat. 428.B.4) and “adherents” (Plato, Symp. 197.B.1), where there was no danger of misunderstanding. Hippocrates likewise rejected charging fees for passing on medical knowledge, but he vowed in the famous Hippocratic oath that, in the same way his teachers and gods passed on the art of medicine to him, “By precept, lecture, and every other mode of instruction, I will impart a knowledge of the Art to my own sons, and those of my teachers, and to disciples.”

In the Hellenistic period at the time of Jesus, mathētēs continued to be used with general connotations of a “learner” (Diodorus Siculus, Bib. hist. 23.2.1.13, 26), but it was used more regularly to refer to an “adherent” (Dio Chrysostom, Regn. 1.38.6). The type of adherence was determined by the master, ranging from being the follower of a great thinker and master of the past like Socrates (Dio Chrysostom, Hom. 1.2), to being the pupil of a philosopher like Pythagoras (Diodorus Siculus, Bib. hist. 12.20.1.3), to being the devotee of a religious master like Epicurus (Plutarch, Suav. viv. 1100.A.6). The relationship assumed the development of a sustained commitment of the disciple to the master and to the master’s particular teaching or mission, and the relationship extended to imitation of the conduct of the master as it impacted the personal life of the disciple.

1.3. Judaism at the Time of Jesus. Within Judaism of the first century A.D. several different types of individuals were called “disciples,” using the essentially equivalent terms mathētēs and talmid (Wenthe). The terms designated adherents or followers who were committed to a recognized leader, teacher or movement. Relationships ran the spectrum from philosophical (Philo, Sacr. 7; 64; 79), to technical (rabbinical scribes [m. ’Abot 1:1; b. Šabb. 31a), to sectarian (*Pharisees in Josephus, Ant. 13.289; 15.3, 370), to *revolutionary (Zealot-like nationalists in Midr. Šir Haširim Zûta). Apart from the disciples of Jesus, the Gospels present us with “disciples of the Pharisees” (e.g., Mt 22:15-16; Mk 2:18), who possibly belonged to one of the schools (cf. Acts 5:34; 22:3); “disciples of John the Baptist” (Mk 2:18), the courageous men and women who had left the status quo of Jewish society to follow the eschatological *prophet *John the Baptist; and the “disciples of Moses” (Jn 9:24-29), Jews who focused on their privileged position as those to whom God had revealed himself through *Moses.

The Pharisaic master-disciple relationship is the forerunner of the later talmudic rabbinic master-disciple relationships that evolved into a formal educational system for training rabbis that especially involved passing on the oral law (e.g., Neusner, 22-23). This is heard in a saying attributed to the Great Synagogue, which became a standard of Israel: “Be patient in [the administration of] justice, rear many disciples, and make a fence around the Torah” (m. ’Abot 1:1).

Jesus took a commonly occurring phenomenon—a master with disciples—and used it as an expression of the kind of relationship that he would develop with his followers, but he would mold and shape it to form a unique form of discipleship, far different than others. Some press too far the similarities between Jesus and other forms of master-discipleship relationships. For example, later rabbinic master-disciple relationships are sometimes too closely read back into Jesus’ relationship with his disciples (e.g., Neudecker). Jesus held scribal-literate authority, but it was not derived from formal education within the scribal/rabbinic traditions (see Keith, 189-92). There was a wide spectrum of other types of master-disciple relationships in existence that may have more relevance for understanding Jesus’ form (Hengel, 42-57). John the Baptist and his disciples appear more closely related to Jesus and his disciples than to the Pharisaic or later rabbinic system. But even in comparison to John and his disciples, Jesus developed a relationship with his disciples that was unique to his status as the messianic *Son of God, whose disciples would ultimately *worship him, an action reserved solely for God with his people (Mt 28:16-17).

2. Disciples of Jesus.

2.1. First Followers. From the beginning of his public ministry Jesus had followers. His first followers, according to the Johannine tradition, were originally disciples of John the Baptist. Since the Baptist's ministry prepared the way for Jesus, it is natural that some of John's disciples would make the transition to following Jesus. The first disciples of John to become followers of Jesus were Andrew and another unnamed disciple (possibly the apostle John). Andrew, convinced that Jesus was the Messiah (see Christ), brought his brother, Simon Peter, to Jesus. Philip, another person from the same hometown as Andrew and Peter, was next called by Jesus, and he in turn brought Nathanael to Jesus (Jn 1:35-49). These first followers were likely the "disciples" (Jn 2:2) who next traveled with Jesus to the wedding celebration at Cana, experienced the first miraculous sign, and believed in Jesus (Jn 2:11).

This early movement to follow Jesus gained momentum as the news of Jesus traveled through social relationships in a relatively localized area. Since Jesus focused his ministry in the *Galilee region, the early disciples were drawn from an existing network of relatives (e.g., brothers: Andrew and Simon Peter, John and James), business partners (e.g., Peter and Andrew were partners in the fishing industry with James and John [Lk 5:10]) and neighbors or acquaintances (most of the twelve disciples were from Capernaum and Bethsaida).

The Jesus movement accelerated rapidly. In the early stages of his ministry a great company of disciples attached themselves to Jesus (Lk 6:17; 10:1; Jn 6:60). Jesus appealed to the multitude of people, and a groundswell of followers came after him to become his disciples. But the early company of disciples was apparently a mixed sort. In John's Gospel there is a unique record of disciples who had followed Jesus for some period of time, but after a discourse by Jesus that they found particularly hard to accept, they left and no longer followed him (Jn 6:60-66). Apparently, they had followed Jesus because he was an exciting new *miracle-worker and *teacher (cf. Jn 2:23-25). They made some kind of a commitment to Jesus, but when his teaching did not conform to their expectations, they left him. They were only loosely attached to the movement (Wilkins 1992, chap. 6; Meier, chap. 25).

2.2. The Disciples and the Crowds. Two groups were in attendance for much of Jesus' ministry: the disciples and the "crowds," or "multitudes" (hoi ochloi) (Wilkins 1992, chap. 6; Meier, chap. 24) (see People, Crowd). The disciples were those who obeyed Jesus' call to follow him. They believed in Jesus as their master (Mk 1:16-20; cf. Lk 5:1-11) and committed themselves to his mission of establishing the *kingdom of God and to the *salvation that he offered (Mt 19:16-29).

The crowds were those to whom Jesus continued to offer a call. The crowds were a neutral though curious group who were not attached in a serious way to Jesus. Although they followed Jesus (Mt 4:25), the crowds did not exhibit the twin prerequisites of discipleship: the cost of giving up their old lives and committing themselves to Jesus (e.g., Mk 8:34-38). They followed only in a physical sense, not in the true sense of devoting themselves to Jesus. They were the people of *Israel who were the object of Jesus' evangelistic ministry.

2.3. The Twelve. The four Gospels witness that in the ebb and flow of the popularity of the Jesus movement a core of twelve disciples were called by Jesus into a special relationship with him (McKnight; Wilkins 1992, chap. 8; Meier, chaps. 26-27) (see Apostle). Although the Twelve are disciples, examples of what it means to be a believer in Jesus, they also are designated as leaders among the disciples. Luke states that Jesus "called his disciples to him, and chose twelve of them" (Lk 6:13). The distinction between the general group of disciples and the specific group of the Twelve has to do with function or role, not status or worth. All disciples are equal with regard to their discipleship to Jesus, which speaks of their entrance into salvation and the kingdom of God. The role of the Twelve is also functionally oriented toward leadership. But this function did not elevate them to a higher status; calling to leadership is a calling to servanthood (Mk 10:45; Lk 22:24-30). The Twelve are examples of what Jesus accomplishes in believers, but they are also set apart as the leaders within this new movement (Nelson, 255-64).

2.4. The Twelve Disciples and Other Disciples. Mark gives evidence of disciples of Jesus outside the circle of the Twelve (Mk 3:13-15), and Matthew specifically speaks of them (Mt 8:19, 21) and alludes to a wider circle of disciples (Mt 10:24, 25, 42), even acknowledging through the verb mathēteuō that Joseph of Arimathea had "become a disciple of Jesus" (Mt 27:57). Luke indicates that Jesus chose the Twelve from among a much larger number of disciples (Lk 6:13-17), and John indicates that from the large group of disciples many abandoned their commitment to Jesus and left him (Jn 6:60-66).

"Following Jesus" is a technical expression for being his disciple. Some disciples physically followed Jesus around as disciples in his itinerant ministry (e.g., the Twelve), while a wider group of disciples followed Jesus in a more figurative sense. The latter was comprised of, among others, common masses of people (Lk 6:13), a variety of men and women (Lk 8:2-3; 23:49, 55; 24:13, 18, 33), tax collectors (Lk 19:1-10), *scribes (Mt 8:18-21) and religious leaders (Mt 27:57; Jn 19:38-42). The difference between the Twelve and the broader group of disciples is the role to which they were called. The Twelve were called to be coworkers with Jesus, and leaving all to follow Jesus was a necessary sacrifice in order to join with him in the proclamation of the kingdom (Mt 10:1-15) and as a training time for their future role as apostles in the church (Mt 19:23-30).

2.5. The Women Who Followed Jesus. The Gospels and Acts give prominence to various *women who were disciples of Jesus (Meier, 73-80). These women were part of the wider group of disciples around him, but some of them physically accompanied Jesus during his itinerancy. On a preaching tour through Galilee Jesus had “with him” the Twelve and several women who had been healed by Jesus and who were now contributing to the support of Jesus and the Twelve (Lk 8:1-3). While parallels can be found for women supporting synagogues, rabbis and their disciples out of their own money, property or foodstuffs (e.g., Josephus, Ant. 17.41-44; see Cohick, chaps. 5, 9), the wording indicates that these women were actual disciples of Jesus (Lk 8:19-21; cf. Mt 12:49-50). A great master with female disciples was an unusual occurrence in Palestine of the first century, yet these women exhibited the twin characteristics of Jesus’ disciples: they had given up their old lives and had committed themselves to Jesus (cf. Mk 8:34-38). This same group of women followed Jesus to *Jerusalem attended the crucifixion, and they were the first ones to arrive at the empty tomb (Mk 15:41, 47; 16:1; Lk 23:49, 55; 24:9).

Later, in the book of Acts, women had significant roles in the early church. Luke uses the feminine form of the word for disciple (mathētria [Acts 9:36]) in a casual way, indicating that women believers were commonly called “disciples.”

2.6. The Early Church. The term mathētēs is used regularly in Luke-Acts to designate persons who have placed their *faith in Jesus the Messiah. In Luke 6:13, 17 reference is made to a great multitude of disciples. These disciples of Jesus were convinced believers in Jesus’ messiahship and are set in contrast with the “great throng of people” (Lk 6:17), who were interested in Jesus but not committed to him. This can be compared with Luke’s usage of mathētēs in Acts, where he speaks of the multitude of “believers” (Acts 4:32) and the multitude of “disciples” (Acts 6:2). In Luke’s writings the expressions “those who believe” and “the disciples” signify the same group of people (Acts 6:7; 9:26; 11:26; 14:21-22). As Acts records, by the time of the early church the term disciple had become synonymous with the true believer—all those who confessed Jesus as the Messiah, or, as they were first called at Antioch, “Christians” (Christianoi [Acts 11:26]).

3. Jesus’ Unique Form of Discipleship.

Jesus’ ministry of calling, training and sending out disciples stands as a captivating historical phenomenon. There have been numerous attempts at classifying his ministry according to other types of social/religious movements of the first century A.D. (e.g., as a wandering charismatic, Zealot brigand, *Cynic philosopher, Qumran/*Essene separatist, Jewish rabbi, *apocalyptic scribe, Israelite *prophet figure), which probably have revealed some authentic, parallel characteristics (e.g., Wenthe). On the surface, Jesus’ disciples appeared to be similar to other forms of Jewish disciples because he took a commonly occurring phenomenon—a master-disciple relationship—and used it as an expression of his kind of relationship with his followers. However, Jesus’ particular form of discipleship still defies classification according to other existing first-century A.D. paradigms. In the following ways Jesus developed a unique form of discipleship that was inaugurated with his announcement of the arrival of the kingdom of God and summoning men and women to be his followers.

3.1. Called by Jesus.

3.1.1. Responding to the Call to Kingdom Life. Jesus had many of the characteristics of a Jewish rabbi. He taught in their *synagogues and on the *Sabbath, he taught in accordance with Jewish customs, he was given respect due a teacher of the *law, his disciples followed him around, and he is even called “rabbi” (Mt 26:49; Mk 9:5; Jn 1:49). The apparent normal pattern in Israel was for a prospective disciple to approach a rabbi and ask to study with him. Joshua ben Perahyah said, “Provide yourself with a teacher and get you a fellow disciple” (m. ’Abot 1:6), which Gamaliel echoed: “Provide yourself with a teacher and remove yourself from doubt” (m. ’Abot 1:16 [cf. Mt 8:19]). Later rabbinic disciples followed their master around, often physically imitating the master’s teaching of Torah because imitating the master is imitating Moses’ imitation of God (Neusner, 7).

But as Jesus’ ministry unfolds, he begins to establish a form of discipleship that is unlike the rabbis. With Jesus, the initiative lay with his call (Mt 4:19; 9:9; Mk 1:17; 2:14; cf. Lk 5:10-11, 27-28) and his choice (Jn 15:16) of those who would be his disciples. The response to the call involves recognition and belief in Jesus' identity (Jn 2:11; 6:68-69), obedience to his summons (Mk 1:18, 20), and counting the cost of full allegiance to him (Lk 14:25-28; Mt 19:23-30). His calling is the beginning of something new. It means losing one's old life (Mk 8:34-37; Lk 9:23-25) and finding new life in the family of God through obeying the will of the Father (Mt 12:46-50) (see Keener, 196-213).

3.1.2. Counting the Cost. In Jesus' lifetime the call to be a disciple meant counting the cost of allegiance to him; but this took various forms. The Twelve were called to leave all, including family, profession and property, and follow Jesus in his itinerant ministry. This was their training time for their future role in the early church (Mt 19:23-30). Apparently, others besides the Twelve were also called to this itinerancy (Lk 8:2-3; 23:49, 55; Jn 6:66). But while all disciples were called to count the cost of their allegiance (Mt 8:18-22; Lk 14:25-33), leaving everything and following Jesus around was not intended for all (e.g., Mk 5:18-19). Nicodemus and Joseph of Arimathea apparently became followers of Jesus sometime during his ministry (Jn 3:1-14; 19:38-42), yet presumably they remained within the religious establishment and retained their wealth. When demonstration of their faith and allegiance to Jesus was required, they came forward to claim the body of Jesus and provide for him a burial place (Mt 27:57-60).

3.1.3. Jesus Breaks Down Barriers of Status, Religion, Gender, Nationalism. Unlike some of the sectarians within Judaism, Jesus broke through the barriers that separated the *clean from the unclean, the obedient from the sinful. He summoned the fisherman as well as the tax collector and even a zealous revolutionary. He indicated that Jews and Gentiles would join him in the future kingdom banquet (Mt 8:10-12) (see Table Fellowship). Both men and women were his closest followers (e.g., Lk 8:1-3; 23:55). A decisive factor in his form of discipleship is that Jesus called to himself those who, in the eyes of sectarians, did not seem to enjoy the necessary qualifications for fellowship with him (Mt 9:9-13; Mk 2:13-17). In calling the despised to himself (Mt 9:9), in sitting down to a meal with tax collectors and *sinners (Mt 9:10), and in having women among his circle of disciples (Mt 12:49-50), Jesus demonstrates that they have been adopted into discipleship to him and fellowship with *God (Dunn, chap. 4).

3.2. Following Jesus. During Jesus' earthly ministry the disciple was to "follow" Jesus, an allegiance to his person that is regarded as the decisive act, whether it is a literal or figurative attachment.

3.2.1. Attachment to Jesus: A Disciple of Jesus Is Always a Disciple of Jesus. Jewish disciples followed their master around, often literally imitating him. The goal of Jewish disciples was someday to become masters, or rabbis, themselves and to have their own disciples who would follow them. But Jesus' disciples were to remain disciples of their master and teacher and to follow him only (Mt 23:1-12). For Jesus, discipleship was not simply an academic or religious program. Discipleship was a life that began in relationship with him as master and moved into all areas of their experience. Even though his disciples were to be taught to obey all that Jesus commanded (Mt 28:20), and it is probable that they memorized much of his teaching and passed it on as the tradition of the church, the disciples were committed more to his person than to his teaching (Rengstorf, 447). Following Jesus means togetherness with him and service to him in his *mission.

3.2.2. Continuing to Count the Cost. Even as initially committing oneself to Jesus required the would-be disciple to count the cost, so following Jesus requires disciples to continue to count the cost (Mk 8:34). The disciples must daily deny themselves, take up the cross, and follow Jesus (Lk 9:23). It is possible for one not to be a true disciple while externally traveling with Jesus (e.g., Judas Iscariot). Therefore, the challenge is directed not only to the crowd, but also to the disciples (Mt 10:37-39; 16:24-26; Mk 8:34-9:1; Lk 9:23-27).

3.2.3. Becoming Like Jesus. Jesus declared that to be a disciple is to become like the master (Mt 10:24-25; Lk 6:40). Becoming like Jesus includes going out with the same message, ministry and compassion (Mt 10:5-42), practicing the same religious and social traditions (Mt 12:1-8; Mk 2:18-22), belonging to the same family of obedience (Mt 12:46-49), exercising the same servanthood (Mt 20:26-28; Mk 10:42-45; Jn 13:12-17), and experiencing the same suffering (Mt 10:16-25; Mk 10:38-39). This aspect of discipleship to Jesus prepares the way for the "transformation" language found prominently in the Pauline Epistles, as believers are transformed into the image of Christ (Rom 8:29; 2 Cor 3:18; Gal 4:19).

3.2.4. Growing in Discipleship. The evangelists unanimously testify to the imperfections of the disciples, both of the larger group and of the Twelve. But at the same time, they testify to the growth of the disciples. The evangelists give a realistic portrayal of good and bad traits in the disciples, yet they also show how Jesus taught them (Mk 4:10-12), corrected them (Mt 16:5-12), admonished them (Mt 17:19-20), supported them (Lk 22:31-34), comforted them (Jn 20:19-22), and restored them (Jn 21:15-19). In turn, the disciples could become examples of what Jesus desires to do for the *church (Mt 28:19-20). All of those who truly believed were called “disciples” in Jesus’ day, and they are examples of how Christians today can and should grow in discipleship (Lunde).

3.3. Commissioned by Jesus. Jesus committed his earthly ministry to “making disciples” within Israel (Jn 4:1), and he commissioned his disciples to “make disciples” among the nations (Mt 28:16-20). The meaning of “making disciples” is to proclaim the gospel message among those who have not yet received forgiveness of sins, with the intent of them becoming Jesus’ disciple (cf. Lk 24:46-47; Jn 20:21). The command finds remarkable verbal fulfillment in the activities of the early church (e.g., Acts 14:21), where disciples went from Jerusalem to Judea, to Samaria, to the ends of the earth proclaiming the message of Jesus and making disciples (see Mission). In the early church, to believe in the gospel message was to become a disciple (cf. Acts 4:32 with Acts 6:2).

4. The Emphases of the Gospel Writers.

Each of the four Gospels presents the record of Jesus’ life from different perspectives. Each Gospel likewise offers different perspectives about his closest companions, his disciples. Each Gospel focuses on distinctive features that help us understand Jesus’ purpose in calling and training his disciples. Combined, the sketches of the disciples in each Gospel give us a well-rounded perspective of what Jesus intended discipleship to mean.

4.1. Matthew: Examples with a Commission.

Matthew views the disciples of Jesus from alternating perspectives that highlight his theological purposes. At times Matthew purposely projects a very positive picture of the disciples by including the term “disciples” when it is absent in the parallels (Mt 12:49), but at other times he includes the term in such a way that the disciples are singled out for negative associations not specified in the parallels (Mt 26:56). At times Matthew omits reference to the disciples sharing guilt with Peter (Mt 16:23), yet on other occasions they are singled out as sharing in his guilt (Mt 14:31). At times it appears that Matthew purposely carries forward the traditional association of the disciples with the apostolic title “the Twelve” (Mt 10:1), but on other occasions he implies a wider circle of disciples (Mt 8:21; 12:49-50; 27:55-57).

4.1.1. Understanding Jesus’ Teaching. Matthew has arranged his disciple material to accentuate Jesus as the teacher of his disciples. Each of the major discourses is primarily directed to the disciples (Mt 5:1; 10:1; 13:10, 36; 18:1; 23:1; 24:1-3), and teaching segments are often transformed into explicit discipleship-teaching pericopae by including the term “disciple” (Mt 8:21, 23; 9:27; 10:42; 12:49; 13:10; 15:23; 16:5; 17:6, 10; 18:1; 19:10; 21:20; 24:3; 26:8, 40, 45). On at least three occasions the teaching of Jesus leads to an explicit statement that the disciples understand (Mt 13:51; 16:12; 17:13), whereas Mark says that the disciples do not understand (Mk 6:52; 8:21; 9:10, 32). Some scholars take this contrast between the “understanding” of the disciples in Matthew and the “nonunderstanding” in Mark to mean that Matthew has idealized the disciples by omitting or toning down anything derogatory about them. On the contrary, although he does not focus on the disciples’ failure (e.g., Mt 8:25; 13:16; 14:23), Matthew explicitly tells of their deficient faith (Mt 14:31; 16:8, 22-23; 17:20) and does in fact present negative aspects of the disciples (e.g., Mt 26:8, 56). Jesus’ debriefings of the disciples highlight their continual nonunderstanding but also assure the reader that Jesus’ continual presence and teaching will be with the community to bring them into a more authentic discipleship (Brown; contra Luz, chap. 7).

4.1.2. Examples of Christian Existence. Matthew has not intended the disciples to be an idealistic paradigm. He shows both positive and negative traits. The positive aspect, which is especially present in the discipleship teachings, shows what will happen to true disciples who fully obey and follow Jesus. The negative traits show what can happen to disciples who do not identify with Jesus in his obedience to the will of the Father (e.g., they stumble [Mt 16:23], flee [Mt 26:56], fall asleep [Mt 26:40, 45], act in brash boldness [Mt 26:35]). Portrayed both positively and negatively (Mt 15:23; 16:5-12, 19; 17:6-7; 19:13-15), the disciples become examples of imperfect followers of Jesus who are taught to advance in their solidarity with Jesus. And, as an example for Matthew’s church, they become a very practical and realistic display of what it means to be called a “disciple” (Mt 28:16, 19).

4.1.3. With Jesus or Against Him. Three groups—Jesus’ disciples, the crowds, the Jewish leaders—provide a background for Matthew’s story of Jesus. The Jewish leaders are the antagonists, the ones who are against Jesus and who share responsibility with the Romans for Jesus’ crucifixion. The crowds are a basically neutral group who are the object of Jesus’ ministry of preaching, teaching and healing, but as a group they do not exercise faith in him. At first the crowds are amazed at Jesus’ teaching and miracles (Mt 7:28-29; 9:8), and they receive Jesus’ compassionate attention (Mt 9:35-38; 14:13-14), apparently siding with Jesus. They went to him for healing (Mt 15:29-31) and teaching (Mt 5:28-29). But they increasingly demonstrate obduracy (cf. Mt 13:2-3, 10-17, 34-36), until at the end the Jewish leaders persuade the crowds to ask for the death of Jesus (Mt 27:15-25).

The disciples are Jesus' true followers, true believers. Only the disciples are "with" Jesus as his followers after the resurrection, including the women who are the first witnesses (see Love, 186-219). After his *resurrection Jesus sends the disciples to the nations to make disciples of them (Mt 28:16-20).

4.1.4. Simon Peter. Since the disciples function in Matthew's Gospel as an example, both positive and negative, of what it means to be a disciple, the portrait of Simon Peter in Matthew's Gospel provides a personalized example of discipleship for Matthew's church. Most of the time Matthew presents the disciples as a nameless, faceless, collective unity. Peter stands out in sharp relief against this backdrop of anonymity, being the only named disciple to become the focus of special attention. He functions as an example much like the disciples do as a group. In his strengths and in his weaknesses he can be an example to Matthew's church; so Matthew accentuates the truly human element in Peter. The church would find much in common with Peter's typically human characteristics. In his likeness to ordinary believers, with their highs and lows, he provides a means for instructing the church in the path of discipleship.

Peter likewise serves this function for the leaders of Matthew's church. In his success and failure as a leader Peter provides an instructive case study for the leadership of Matthew's church. In several instances the questions and responses that Peter voices to Jesus on behalf of the disciples were issues that still spoke to the church of Matthew's day (e.g., Mt 15:15; 17:24-25; 18:21). As Jesus instructs Peter, instruction is provided for the church and its leaders. Peter will have a foundational role in establishing the church, but the focus is still on Jesus, who says, "I will build my church" (Mt 16:18). As Jesus had called Peter, corrected him and instructed him, so Jesus would with the church (Wilkins 1992, chap. 5; Meier, 221-45; more broadly on Peter, see Wiarda).

4.1.5. Commissioned to Make Disciples. Matthew concludes his Gospel with Jesus' commission to "make disciples" among the nations (Mt 28:18-20). The injunction is given at least to the eleven remaining disciples (Mt 28:16-17), and as he commands them to "make disciples of all the nations," Jesus is telling them to continue the disciple-making that he began with them.

The imperative "make disciples" (mathēteusate) implies both the call to discipleship and the process of growth in discipleship. Even as men and women are called from among the nations to start life as a disciple, they must in turn follow Jesus through baptism and through obedience to his teaching. The participles "baptizing" (baptizontes) and "teaching" (didaskontes) describe activities through which the new disciple grows in discipleship. Growth in discipleship includes both identification with Jesus' death and resurrection (baptism) and obedience to all that Jesus had commanded the disciples in his earthly ministry (teaching them to obey all Jesus commanded).

Jesus concludes the commission with the crucial element of discipleship: the presence of their master ("And behold I am with you always, to the end of the age" [Mt 28:20]). As the new disciple is baptized and taught to obey all that Jesus commanded, Jesus is present. Those obeying the command are comforted by the awareness that the risen Jesus will continue to transform all his disciples. Jesus, the master, is always present for his disciples to follow.

4.1.6. A Manual on Discipleship. Matthew's Gospel is, at least in part, a manual on discipleship. In the process of handing on his tradition concerning the disciples, Matthew exalts Jesus as the supreme *Lord and teacher of the historical disciples and the postresurrection community. Although the disciples are susceptible to incomprehension (as in Mark), Matthew emphasizes that Jesus' teaching could bring understanding if they would only obey. Several factors point to Matthew's intention to provide in his Gospel resources for discipleship: (1) the major discourses are directed at least in part to the disciples (Mt 5:1-2; 10:1-2; 13:10; 18:1; 23:1-3); (2) most of the sayings directed to the disciples are in fact teaching on discipleship; (3) the disciples are portrayed primarily in a positive yet realistic light; and (4) the disciples are called, trained and commissioned to carry out their climactic mandate to "make disciples" (Mt 28:19). The goal of the believer's life of faith is made clear, and the disciple is equipped to make more disciples.

4.2. Mark: Servants of the Redemptive Servant.

4.2.1. Conflicting Profiles. Mark reveals conflicting profiles of the disciples, which leads to his portrait of them being perhaps the most ambiguous among the Gospel accounts (see Henderson, 3-27; Wilkins 2004, 51-53). On the one hand, the disciples receive a positive portrayal when they are introduced as being specially selected and commissioned with *authority by Jesus (Mk 1:16-20; 3:13-19a) to hear the secrets of the kingdom (Mk 4:10-12) and to promote his ministry (Mk 3:14-15; 6:7-13, 35). Empowered by Jesus for ministry in Israel, the disciples do as Jesus does: they preach, they *heal, and they exorcise *demons.

On the other hand, the disciples are painted in unflattering colors when, despite their enlightenment and empowerment, they are shown to be uncomprehending. They do not understand Jesus' parabolic teaching (Mk 4:13; 7:17-18), do not grasp Jesus' true identity as the *Son of God who calms the seas (Mk 4:35-41; 6:45-52), and do not perceive Jesus' potential to feed the multitudes miraculously (Mk 6:34-44; 8:1-10). More critically, the disciples do not truly comprehend the nature of Jesus' ministry or teaching (Mk 8:14-21), which in essence involves the way to the cross (Mk 8:31-33; 9:30-32) through servanthood (Mk 10:32-45). This incomprehension eventually leads Judas to betray Jesus (Mk 14:43-46), the disciples to forsake him (Mk 14:50) and Peter to deny him (Mk 14:54, 66-72). At the empty tomb "only three women represent a scant minority of faithful followers" (Henderson, 248).

4.2.2. Thinking the Things of God. Although Mark has high regard for the disciples, he uses their failures to instruct his community (Best, 15-16). Thus, Mark deals with a fact of history: during Jesus' earthly life the disciples did not completely understand him. Mark uses the historical disciples to show his readers how difficult it is to grasp the mystery of Jesus and the cross. Through the development of his plot, Mark contrasts two fundamentally opposing points of view concerning his gospel message: "thinking the things of God" and "thinking the things of humankind" (cf. Mk 8:33). The disciples' response to Jesus is a major portion of the plot. They had been specially called to follow Jesus and respond to him as the one effectively proclaiming the "gospel of God" (Mk 1:14). They were given the mystery of the kingdom; they experienced in their own lives God's redeeming activity. Privy to special instruction, they were even empowered to act in Jesus' name to preach the *gospel, to heal, to exorcise, and to teach. Yet they misunderstood. They became confused and afraid. When adversity set in, the disciples reflected unbelief and hardness of heart. This confusion ate away at their fundamental perception of who Jesus was, as well as the implications of Jesus' identity for the life of discipleship (Guelich, 434). However, the resurrection scene provides fulfillment of Jesus' predictions (Mk 9:9; 14:28) and obligates the reader to project reconciliation of the disciples and Peter with Jesus, since they will see him in Galilee, just as he told them (Mk 16:7). The summons to Galilee provides the assurance that Peter and the disciples, in spite of denying and forsaking Jesus, have not been rejected by the risen Lord. They must continue to think the things of God (Hooker, 11-28).

4.2.3. Greatness of Servanthood. Although Jesus has come as God's promised, Spirit-anointed, royal Son to herald and inaugurate the kingdom, Mark writes to correct those who would look to the *glory of the final consummation of the kingdom instead of its vulnerable beginnings. The kingdom is here in hidden fashion, and Jesus the Messiah, the Son of God (Mk 1:1), must be understood in terms of suffering and the cross (Mk 8:31-33; 9:30-32; 10:32-34). The pivotal pronouncement of servanthood in Mark 10:45 declares the essence of Jesus' ministry (see Servant of Yahweh). By comprehending this, the disciples will grasp the essence of discipleship as servanthood, including their motivation, position, ambition, expectations and example (cf. Mk 9:33-37; 10:35-45 within the larger discipleship section of Mk 8:27-10:45). The disciple who is privileged to be a member of Jesus' kingdom is a servant, which means thinking God's thoughts (Mk 8:31-33), pursuing the life of the cross (Mk 8:34-38) through the message (Mk 9:1-8) and example of Jesus (Mk 9:9-32), and thus rejecting status (Mk 9:33-37), exclusivism (Mk 9:38-10:16) and the treasures of this world (Mk 10:17-31). The disciples in Mark's Gospel are privileged members of the kingdom of God, and their incomprehension comes from their worldly expectations. Discipleship instruction directs them to think God's way, the way of suffering and the cross through servanthood. As the unique master of his disciples, Jesus provides the true paradigm of discipleship. L. Hurtado says it well, "Mark makes Jesus the only adequate model of discipleship" (Hurtado, 25 [see also Danove]).

4.3. Luke: Followers on the Costly Way. Detecting the Lukan understanding of discipleship requires taking into consideration literary usage in both the Gospel and Acts, as well as comparing Luke's Gospel with the other Synoptics.

4.3.1. Lukan Distinctives. The use of the term "disciple" in Luke's Gospel foreshadows the use in Acts. The great multitude of disciples in Luke 6:13, 17 is distinguished from the "great throng of people" (Lk 6:17). In contrast to the crowds, who could be termed "the curious," the disciples are convinced believers in Jesus. In Acts "disciple" (Acts 6:1-2, 7; 9:10, 26; 11:26; 14:21-22; 15:10; 16:1) is used as a synonym for "believers" in Christ (cf. "believers" [Acts 4:32]; "disciples" [Acts 6:2]). Disciples are all those who confess Jesus as the Messiah. The term is employed as a synonym for “Christians” (Acts 11:26; 26:28), “saints” (Acts 9:13, 32, 41) and “Nazarenes” (Acts 24:5).

The picture of the disciples in Luke’s Gospel bears many similarities to those found in Matthew and Mark, but differences occur as well. The most notable differences are (1) the accounts of the calling of Jesus’ first followers (Lk 5:1-11; cf. Mt 4:18-22; Mk 2:16-18); (2) mention of a large number of disciples never encountered in Matthew or Mark (Lk 6:13, 17, 19; 19:37-39); (3) Jesus sending out not only the Twelve (Lk 9:1-6; cf. Mk 6:6b-13; Mt 10:1-15) but also seventy(-two) others (Lk 10:1-16); (4) a preaching tour through Galilee during which Jesus had “with him” not only the Twelve but also several women followers whom he had healed and who were now contributing to support him and the Twelve (Lk 8:1-3); (5) the scandal of Peter’s denials being somewhat tempered by Jesus’ *prayer for Peter and the hint of his future role of strengthening the other disciples (Lk 22:31-32); (6) omission of the devastating statement that all the disciples left Jesus and fled at the betrayal scene at *Gethsemane (Lk 22:53-54; cf. Mt 26:56; Mk 14:50); (7) his inclusion of a statement about a group of men who knew Jesus and were with the women from Galilee at the crucifixion (Lk 23:49; pantes hoi gnōstoi [masc. pl.]; cf. Mt 27:55-56; Mk 15:40-41) (see Fitzmyer, 117-45).

4.3.2. Followers on the Way. “Following Jesus” is a synonymous expression for discipleship, but Luke has a unique depiction of that phenomenon: the disciples of Jesus are followers on “the way.” For Luke, salvation itself is “the way” (hē hodos), a pattern of life revealed by God. This idea of salvation as “the way” leads in Acts to calling the Christian community “the Way” (Acts 9:2; 19:9, 23; 22:4; 24:14, 22), an early designation or title for the organized community of disciples, which eventually is known as “the church.” Thus, disciples must enter into and stride along that way in the footsteps of the master.

4.3.3. Entrance to the Way. Both in his Gospel and Acts, Luke emphasizes that entrance into the way of salvation and discipleship is found through faith (Lk 7:50; 8:48; 17:19; cf. Acts 10:43; 13:38-39; 16:31). More so than the other evangelists, Luke stresses that true faith is characterized by “counting the cost,” both positively and negatively, of what the life of discipleship entails. To count the cost negatively means to recognize that one enters into the life of discipleship through detachment from all other allegiances and through giving total allegiance to Jesus as master. A key passage is Luke 14:25-33, where Jesus addresses the crowds about the conditions of entrance into discipleship. The crowds have not yet begun to follow Jesus, and before they make a commitment, Jesus tells them that they must count the cost. Nothing else may preempt the disciple’s focus of allegiance on Jesus: not family (Lk 14:26), not one’s own life (Lk 14:27), not anything at all (Lk 14:33). Entrance into the way of discipleship means entering the narrow gate to salvation (Lk 13:22-30) to follow after Jesus alone (Lk 9:23; 14:27).

To count the cost positively means to recognize that *love for God—undivided loyalty to him—is at the center of faith. A key passage is Luke 10:25-37, where a lawyer came to Jesus asking about obtaining eternal life. The lawyer rightly understood that in order to obtain eternal life one’s heart, soul, mind and strength must be focused on loving God, and that the practical demonstration of love for God is to love one’s neighbor as oneself. Counting the cost in the positive sense means to recognize that love for God and neighbor is the evidence that one has made unqualified commitment to Jesus and his way.

4.3.4. Traveling along the Way. Discipleship begins with entering the way of salvation, and it advances as one travels along “the way.” Luke specifies that self-denial, taking up the cross, and following Jesus characterize not only entrance into the way but also life on the way. With the addition of “each day” to the cross-bearing proclamation, the Lukan Jesus calls for daily self-denial, daily bearing one’s cross and daily following in the footsteps of the master (Lk 9:23; cf. Mk 8:34). Life on the way involves being doers of the word (Lk 11:27-28), because not all who are walking on the way truly belong on the way. Public statements of commitment must be judged by the fruit of one’s life (Lk 6:43-49; 19:11-27). That fruit consists, at least in part, in loving and doing good to others (Lk 6:17-36), proper stewardship of material possessions (Lk 6:35; 8:3), servanthood (Lk 22:24-30), prayer (Lk 10:2; 11:1; 18:1-8) and testimony to the way (Lk 9:1-6; 10:1-12, 17-20; 12:8-12; 14:23-24; 24:44-49).

When understood within the context of the first-century A.D. social and religious setting, these demands allow us to see that Jesus was calling for a distinct form of discipleship. Becoming Jesus’ disciple was not a vocational change, or a political attachment, or even a new stirring of God; it was to face the eternal decision of whether one would follow Jesus as the way to eternal life. Any other attachment, whether familial or religious or economic, was the substitution of another master for Jesus.

4.4. John: Believers Marked by Jesus. Despite employing differing methodologies, there is a general agreement among scholars concerning three fundamental aspects of discipleship from the Johannine perspective (Segovia, 90-92; see also Chen-nattu, 1-22).

4.4.1. Recognition and Belief. Three points are to be made here. First, the central characteristic of the disciple is belief or acceptance of Jesus' claims vis-à-vis the Father. The disciples, particularly the Twelve (Jn 6:67, 70; 13:18; 15:16, 19; cf. Jn 6:64, 66), are characteristically those who from the beginning recognize, acclaim, and believe Jesus for who he is (Jn 1:41, 45, 49; 6:69; 13:13; 20:28-31; 21:7, 12b; cf. Jn 20:31). After the first of Jesus' signs and the manifestation of his glory, his disciples believed in him. This kind of belief differs in quality from the belief of others who observe his miraculous signs in Jerusalem. Jesus regards their belief as deficient and does not entrust himself to them (Jn 2:23-25).

Second, belief is portrayed as necessitating and undergoing a process of gradual understanding and perception. The disciples lack complete understanding of "the hour" of Jesus' ministry (Jn 2:21-22; 4:27, 33; 6:60; 9:2; 10:6; 11:8, 11-15; 12:16; 13:36; 14:5, 8, 22; 16:17-18), but through Jesus' ministry and teaching (Jn 6:67-71; 9:2-7; 11:5-45), the resurrection appearances (Jn 20:8-10, 17-18, 19-21) and the reception of the Spirit (Jn 20:19-23) the disciples finally comprehend Jesus' full status as "Lord and God" (Jn 20:28).

Third, a sustained and deliberate contrast is drawn between believers and unbelievers, between disciples and nondisciples. The nondisciple, the unbeliever, is a part of the unbelieving "world." Although by definition the category "world" includes anyone who rejects Jesus' claims, that category becomes practically synonymous with "the Jews" as people and leaders who oppose Jesus, which gives rise to a very specific contrast between the believing disciples and the unbelieving Jews (Jn 1:10-11; 3:19; 7:4, 7; 8:23; 12:31; 14:17, 19, 22, 27, 30, 31; 18:36).

4.4.2. Deficient Belief. After a discourse that many of his disciples find particularly hard to accept (Jn 6:60), Jesus condemns those disciples for their unbelief (Jn 6:64). These disciples apparently are following Jesus because he was an exciting new miracle-worker and teacher, and, as in John 2:23-25, Jesus recognizes the deficiency of their belief. They have made some kind of a commitment to Jesus, but when his teaching does not conform to their expectations, they leave him (Jn 6:66).

4.4.3. Marks of Belief. Once this group of Jesus' disciples turns away, Jesus inquires whether the Twelve also want to leave. Simon Peter steps forward to give a clear statement of what it means for the Twelve to follow Jesus: "Lord, to whom shall we go?

You have the words of eternal life. We believe and know that you are the Holy One of God" (Jn 6:68-69). To believe is to be convinced of Jesus' identity and the truth of his words. From this point on in John's Gospel the word "disciple" is used only of those who profess to believe on Jesus for eternal life. Further, John records three sayings of Jesus that test the reality of the belief of disciples. Inner belief will cause such a radical change that the external life will bear evidence of that belief.

The first mark of the true disciple is to "remain" (menō) in Jesus and in his words (e.g., Jn 6:56; 8:31; 15:4) (see Abiding). Although certain Jews believe in Jesus, the ensuing context indicates the nature of their belief: they need to be set free from sin (cf. Jn 8:32 with Jn 8:33-36), they are seeking to kill him (Jn 8:37), their Father is the devil (Jn 8:42-44), they are not of God (Jn 8:47), and they try to stone Jesus (Jn 8:59). These Jews have deficient faith, similar to those who believed deficiently in John 2:23-25. True discipleship, true belief, will be evidenced by remaining in Jesus' words. This means passing beyond mere curiosity and becoming convinced of the truth of Jesus' words for the meaning and purpose of life (cf. Jn 6:66-69). The evidence of true belief is seen in disciples who cling to Jesus' word as the truth for every area of life. True disciples are freed through Jesus' liberating word from bondage to sin.

Love for each other, as Jesus has loved them, is the second identifying mark of the true disciple-believer (Jn 13:34-35; cf. Jn 15:12-17). The love of disciples for each other shows that they are Jesus' disciples and do not belong the world of humanity. Since the contrast is between the world and disciples, all disciples are included. Love is not proof of superior commitment; love of other disciples is evidence that one is a believer.

The third mark of the disciple is a life that bears fruit (Jn 15:8). The true disciple-believer will bear fruit of new life and mission because true transformation of life is in the branch (see Köstenberger, 184-85). The unbeliever will not bear fruit, for branches that have no life cannot bear fruit. Eventually, branches that do not bear fruit will be broken off and cast into the fire (Jn 15:6)—a picture consistent with other portrayals of the final destiny of unbelievers.

5. Conclusion.

Jesus took a commonly occurring phenomenon in the ancient world—the master-disciple relationship—and in the course of his ministry refashioned it to express his kind of discipleship. For discipleship to be understood and practiced most clearly, the view of Jesus with his disciples from the Gospels must come first as we attempt to apprehend what it is like for discipleship today: living a fully human life in this world in union with Jesus Christ and growing in conformity to his image (Wilkins 1992, 41-42).

See also APOSTLE; BELOVED DISCIPLE; FAMILY; KINGDOM OF GOD/HEAVEN; MISSION; PEOPLE, CROWD; SLAVE, SERVANT; WOMEN.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. E. Best, Disciples and Discipleship: Studies in the Gospel According to Mark (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1986); J. K. Brown, The Disciples in Narrative Perspective: The Portrayal and Function of the Matthean Disciples (SBLAB 9; Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature, 2002); R. M. Chennattu, Johannine Discipleship as a Covenant Relationship (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 2006); L. H. Cohick, Women in the World of the Earliest Christians: Illuminating Ancient Ways of Life (Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2009); P. L. Danove, The Rhetoric of the Characterization of God, Jesus, and Jesus' Disciples in the Gospel of Mark (JSNTSup 290; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 2005); J. D. G. Dunn, Jesus' Call to Discipleship (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1992); J. A. Fitzmyer, Luke the Theologian: Aspects of His Teaching (New York: Paulist Press, 1989); R. A. Guelich, Mark 1—8:26 (WBC 34A; Dallas: Word, 1989); S. W. Henderson, Christology and Discipleship in the Gospel of Mark (SNTSMS 135; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2006); M. Hengel, The Charismatic Leader and His Followers, trans. J. C. G. Greig (New York: Crossroad, 1981); M. D. Hooker, Endings: Invitations to Discipleship (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 2003); L. W. Hurtado, "Following Jesus in the Gospel of Mark—and Beyond," in Patterns of Discipleship in the New Testament, ed. R. N. Longenecker (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1996) 9-29; C. S. Keener, The Historical Jesus of the Gospels (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2009); C. Keith, Jesus' Literacy: Scribal Culture and the Teacher from Galilee (LNTS 413; London: T & T Clark, 2011); A. J. Köstenberger, The Missions of Jesus and the Disciples according to the Fourth Gospel: With Implications for the Fourth Gospel's Purpose and the Mission of the Contemporary Church (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1998); S. L. Love, Jesus and Marginal Women: The Gospel of Matthew in Social-Scientific Perspective (Matrix: The Bible in Mediterranean Context 5; Eugene, OR: Cascade, 2009); J. Lunde, Following Jesus, the Servant King: A Biblical Theology of Covenantal Discipleship (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 2010); U. Luz, Studies in Matthew, trans. R. Selle (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2005);

S. McKnight, "Jesus and the Twelve," in Key Events in the Life of the Historical Jesus: A Collaborative Exploration of Context and Coherence, ed. D. L. Bock and R. L. Webb (WUNT 247; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2009) 181-214; J. P. Meier, A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus, 3: Companions and Competitors (New York: Doubleday, 2001); P. K. Nelson, Leadership and Discipleship: A Study of Luke 22:24-30 (SBLDS 138; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1994); R. Neudecker, "Master-Disciple/Disciple-Master Relationship in Rabbinic Judaism and in the Gospels," Greg 80 (1999) 245-61; J. Neusner, Invitation to the Talmud: A Teaching Book (New York: Harper & Row, 1973); H. Pattarumadathil, "Your Father in Heaven": Discipleship in Matthew as a Process of Becoming Children of God (AnBib 172; Rome: Pontificio Istituto Biblico, 2008); K. H. Rengstorf, "μαθητής," TDNT 4:415-61; F. Segovia, ed., Discipleship in the New Testament (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985); M. J. Wilkins, The Concept of Disciple in Matthew's Gospel: As Reflected in the Use of the Term μαθητής (NovTSup 59; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1988); idem, Following the Master: A Biblical Theology of Discipleship (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1992); idem, "Unique Followers of a Unique Master: Discipleship in the Gospel According to Mark," SBJT 8, no. 3 (2004) 50-68; D. O. Wenthe, "The Social Configuration of the Rabbi-Disciple Relationship: Evidence and Implications for First Century Palestine," in Studies in the Hebrew Bible, Qumran, and the Septuagint: Presented to Eugene Ulrich, ed. P. W. Flint, E. Tov and J. C. Vanderkam (VTSup 101; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2006) 143-74; T. Wiarda, Peter in the Gospels: Pattern, Personality and Relationship (WUNT 2/127; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2000).

M. J. Wilkins

DISEASE. See HEALING.

DIVINE MAN. See MIRACLES AND MIRACLE STORIES.

DIVINE SONSHIP. See SON OF GOD.

DIVORCE

The teaching on divorce in the Gospels has been subject to a wide range of interpretations because of difficulties with terminology, abbreviation, apparent contradictions with Pauline traditions, and changing pastoral realities. Recent scholarship has only partly resolved these issues. Various interpretations exist, with varying degrees of acceptance in church and scholarly communities. The Jewish context has recently been better understood and has given support to some of these interpretations.

Each of the Synoptic Gospels has a different presentation of material that is clearly related. Mark 10:2-12; Matthew 19:3-9 record a debate with Pharisees, to which Matthew adds a discussion with the disciples (Mt 19:10-12), and a summary of Jesus' conclusion is presented in Matthew 5:32; Luke 16:18. Much of the difficulty with these passages centers on the additional phrases found in Matthew but not in Mark or Luke. In Matthew, Jesus is asked about divorce "for any cause" (kata pasan aitian) (Mt 19:3), and he replies concerning divorce "except for sexual immorality [porneia]" (Mt 5:32; 19:9). Another difficult phrase occurs, with small variations, in all the accounts: "whoever divorces and marries another commits adultery [moicheia]."

1. Context of the Debate
2. Jesus' Debate with the Pharisees
3. The Exception Clause
4. Jesus' Saying about Consequent Adultery

1. Context of the Debate.

1.1. Exodus 21:10. Jewish divorce law was based on Deuteronomy 24:1; Exodus 21:10-11. There was very little debate concerning the Exodus passage, which was understood as marriage obligations to provide "food, clothing and love." It is cited in early marriage certificates (e.g., "I owe you . . . the due amount of your food and your clothes and your bed" [5/6Hev 10 (A.D. 126)]). First-century A.D. rabbis agreed that neglect of these constituted grounds for a divorce, but they debated how much food and clothing was enough, and how often conjugal activity had to occur before divorce proceedings started (m. Ketub. 5:5-8). Both men and women could get a divorce on these grounds. In theory, women had to ask a court to compel their husbands to divorce them (m. 'Arak. 5:6), but in practice, some women wrote out the divorce certificate (one has survived: XHev/Se 13).

1.2. Deuteronomy 24:1. The divorce law of Deuteronomy 24:1 was debated in great detail, with regard to giving a divorce certificate, the wording of a divorce certificate, and the ground(s) for divorce in this passage. There was general agreement that this passage mandated the giving of a divorce certificate by the man to the woman, and that the ground(s) for divorce in this passage could only be used by men. There was also general agreement that "indecency" ('erwâ [lit., "nakedness"]) referred to "adultery"; this is never stated, but it is the assumption underlying all rabbinic discussions of the text (e.g., m. Soṭah

6:3). However, during the first half of the first century A.D. there was considerable debate among Pharisees concerning what else could be included within the phrase "a cause of indecency."

1.3. Hillelites and Shammaites. Since about 1850, every academic commentary has acknowledged that behind Jesus' debate with the Pharisees lies this internal Pharisaic debate that is recorded in various collections of *rabbinic traditions. The Hillelite school argued that the phrase "a cause of indecency" (Deut 24:1) referred to two grounds for divorce: "indecency" (i.e., adultery) and "a cause," which they interpreted as "any cause." The Shammaite school (who disagreed with the Hillelites on hundreds of other issues) said that "a cause of indecency" was a single phrase with a single meaning: it referred to "nothing except indecency" (i.e., adultery).

Both the earliest halakic (legal) record of this dispute and the earliest record in a haggadic (homiletic) collection contain features that are mirrored in Jesus' debate as recorded in Matthew's account (see 1.4 below). Both accounts quote Deuteronomy 24:1 with the two opposing interpretations, but they record a different pair of slogans (underlined below) by which the two schools summarized their positions: "The School of Shammai says: A man should not divorce his wife unless he found in her a cause of indecency [debar 'erwâ], as it is said: For he finds in her indecency of a cause ['erwat dabar]. And the School of Hillel says: Even if she spoiled his dish, since it says For he finds in her indecency of a cause ['erwat dabar]" (m. Giṭ 9:10). "The School of Shammai says: A man should not divorce his wife except if he found indecency ['aḥa 'im . . . 'erwâ] in her, since it says For he found in her indecency of a cause. And the School of Hillel says: Even if she spoiled his dish, since it says [a] cause [debar]" (Sipre Deut. 269).

In Mishnah's record of this debate the Shammaites reverse the order of the Hebrew words to make it clearer that the phrase refers to a single thing ("a cause of indecency"), and in the Sipre they add that this phrase does not include any divorce "except for indecency." The Hillelites' response to the second is a single word of Scripture, "a cause," and the accompanying example shows that they interpret this to mean "any cause."

1.4. Additional Phrases in Matthew. The two additional phrases in Matthew, "for any cause" and "except for indecency," appear to be Greek translations of the summary slogans for the schools of Hillel and Shammai respectively, as recorded in the Sipre. The Shammaite summary in Mishnah is perhaps also found in Matthew 5, where the addition of logos mirrors the wording of the Shammaite phrase “except for a cause of indecency” (parektos logou porneias).

The new Hillelite ground for divorce that Hillelites called “any cause” is also referred to by both Philo and Josephus, though there was no standard Greek translation for this legal term: “Another commandment is that if a woman after parting from her husband for any cause whatever [kath’ hēn an tychē prophasin] marries another and then again becomes a widow, whether this second husband is alive or dead, she must not return to her first husband [Deut 24:1]” (Philo, Spec. 3.30); “He who desires to be divorced from the wife who is living with him, for whatsoever cause [kath’ hasdēpotoun aitias] (and with mortals many such may arise), must certify in writing” (Josephus, Ant. 4.253).

The Hillelite divorce for “any cause” gained popularity very quickly, and the debate about whether or not it was legal was soon over. It probably ended even before the demise of the Shammaites at A.D. 70. By the mid-second century A.D., the Shammaite opinion was so archaic that it was already misunderstood. Some rabbis thought that Shammaites allowed divorce only for adultery (y. Soṭah 1:1 [1a]), because divorces for the other grounds (neglect of food, clothing and conjugal rights in Ex 21:10) had become disused, having been replaced by divorce for “any cause.” The “any cause” divorce gained popularity probably because it did not require a court appearance or proof for the grounds for divorce, which was embarrassing for both parties. Even though the “any cause” divorce could be used only by men (because Deut 24:1 concerns only men), women might be in favor of it because it allowed them to keep their ketubah dowry.

2. Jesus’ Debate with the Pharisees.

The reason for the absence of these key phrases from the accounts in Mark and Luke is debatable. Perhaps Matthew added them in order to make Jesus’ teaching fit into a Jewish milieu, or perhaps Mark and Luke omitted them to fit into a Gentile setting. It is simpler to assume that Matthew added them, perhaps to change the meaning of the debate, or perhaps to help his readers, because he was writing after the public debate had finished, and his readers may have forgotten the terms of this debate. Such questions are complicated by some uncertainty regarding the order and interdependence of the Gospels (see Synoptic Problem). The following analysis will assume that the Matthew account relied on Mark.

2.1. Matthew Defines the Question. It is likely that the phrases added by Matthew were missing from the original summary of this debate in Mark.

But this does not mean that Matthew’s additions obscured Jesus’ original meaning. The question, as it stands in Mark, makes little sense, because the only logical response to “Is it lawful for a man to divorce his wife?” is to say, “Yes, the law allows him to divorce.” However, because the “any cause” divorce was being debated at the time, the question makes better sense if “for any cause” is implicitly understood. A modern-day equivalent is the question “Is it lawful for sixteen-year-olds to drink?” The only logical answer is “Yes, or else they will die of thirst.” But anyone asked this question today would mentally add the words “alcoholic beverages” because that is the question in current debate.

2.2. Matthew Changes the Order. Matthew also adds (or restores) a logical progression to the debate by changing the order of events. The debate opens in both Matthew and Mark with Jesus being asked about divorce. Mark inserts here the matter of “hard-heartedness,” but Matthew delays it. Jesus replied, in both, with a digression about marriage in which he emphasized that it should be monogamous and lifelong (Mt 19:4-6 // Mk 10:6-9). Jesus argued for monogamy by using a standard set of proof texts (the same introduction, reasoning and proof texts are used in CD-A IV, 20—V, 6) and by adding to Genesis 2:24 the word “two” (which is found in all ancient translations, but in no Hebrew manuscripts). Jesus then adds, on the basis of these same proof texts, that God joins people in marriage, so no one should break up that marriage.

2.3. Mark’s Emphasis on “Hard-heartedness.” The Pharisees bring Jesus back to their question by reminding him that Moses commanded divorce for adultery, and Jesus replies that Moses did not command it but rather allowed it, and only because of hard-heartedness (see Hardness of Heart) (Mt 19:7-8 // Mk 10:3-5). Mark’s version reverses “command” and “allow” and places this interaction nearer the start of the debate, where it gives more prominence to “hard-heartedness.”

“Hard-heartedness” (sklērokardia) is a neologism invented by the LXX translators and used in the context of divorce only at Jeremiah 4:4: “circumcise your hardness of heart.” Jesus presumably is alluding to this, as it is part of Jeremiah’s response to Deuteronomy 24:1-4 (summarized at Jer 3:1) with regard to God’s divorce of Israel (Jer 3:8). Israel stubbornly (i.e., “hard-heartedly”) committed adultery (Jer 3:3, 13, 17, 20), and Jeremiah warned Judah about being similarly stubborn because this would result in Judah being divorced too (Jer 3:8).

2.4. Matthew’s Emphasis on “Allow.” Matthew’s version is more concerned with the Pharisaic demand for divorce after even a single act of adultery, so he records them saying, "Moses commanded divorce." This was because the death penalty, which was prescribed by law (Lev 20:10), could no longer be practiced (see Jn 18:31 [except by mob rule, as in Jn 8:1-9]). Jesus denies this teaching by saying that Moses merely "allowed" divorce, and only when the adultery had reached the stage described as "hard-hearted."

Before A.D. 70, when the Pharisees took over the judiciary, divorce was not compulsory for adultery, though it was a pious response. Matthew records that Joseph wanted to end his betrothal to Mary when she was suspected of adultery because he was "righteous," and that he chose to do this "quietly"; that is, he decided to use the "any cause" divorce, which did not require a public trial (Mt 1:19).

3. The Exception Clause.

The clause "... for indecency" is found in two slightly different versions in Matthew: "But I say to you that everyone divorcing his wife except [parektos] for a cause of immorality . . ." (Mt 5:32); "And I say to you that whoever has divorced his wife not for [mē epi] for immorality . . ." (Mt 19:9). These differences may be due to different original wording on two separate occasions or may be due to different translations from the same original. The difficult Greek of 19:9 is usually understood as "except" in harmony with 5:32. This has occasionally been made explicit by changing the text to ei mē epi (Basil, Regulae Morales 31.852.23 and Erasmus's NT) or ean mē epi (Origen, Comm. Matt. 14.24.44) or parektos (B, 33 and other texts of the Western tradition).

The clause in Matthew 19:9 could indicate either an exception or an exclusion. If it is an exclusion, it means "Anyone who divorced his wife, even for immorality [which is not a permissible ground for divorce], and . . ." If it is an exception, it means "Anyone who divorced his wife, except for immorality [which is a permissible ground for divorce], and . . ." Virtually all translations assume that it means the latter, because Matthew 5:32 is unambiguous: parektos indicates an exception.

The reason for using the unusual phrase mē epi porneia ("not for indecency" [Mt 19:9]) may be a conscious effort to mimic the wording of the Shammaite slogan 'al'a 'im . . . 'erwâ (lit., "not if indecency"), because the construction 'al'a 'im is the normal way to express "except for" in mishnaic Hebrew.

The term porneia in this phrase is also an unexpected choice. We might expect Jesus to use moicheia, which is the specific term for "adultery," but instead he used a term that has a much wider meaning. The term porneia and its cognates are used in the NT to refer to visiting a prostitute (1 Cor 6:13-15, 18), incest (1 Cor 5:1), general sexual sin by a married person (1 Cor 7:2), use of cultic prostitutes (Rev 2:20-21) and the sin of the "whore of Babylon" (Rev 17:2, 4; 18:3; 19:2). The most common meaning is general "sexual immorality" (e.g., Acts 15:20; Eph 5:3; Col 3:5). This family of words is used outside the NT with the same wide range of meanings.

More likely, porneia was the closest translation for a similarly general Hebrew or Aramaic word such as zânâ ("to be sexually immoral") or 'ervâ, as in the Shammaite slogan.

4. Jesus' Saying About Consequent Adultery.

In all the Synoptic accounts, Jesus says that remarriage results in "adultery." This consequence is specified for a variety of different individuals in the various versions: a divorcing husband (Mt 19:9; Lk 16:18), a divorced wife (Mt 5:32), a divorcing wife (Mk 10:12) and a new husband of a divorced wife (Mt 5:32; Lk 16:18). It is significant that all instances use the word moicheia, which specifically refers to "adultery," because adultery is a sexual offense committed against a married person. In Roman law adultery could be committed only against the husband, though in Jewish law adultery was committed when either a husband or a wife slept with someone other than their marriage partner. By saying that a "divorced" person was committing adultery, Jesus was declaring that they were still married to their original partner.

4.1. Questions About Interpretation. Did this mean that Jesus considered all divorces as invalid, including those based on neglect in Exodus 21:10 and adultery in Deuteronomy 24:1? Or did he only refer to divorces based on the ground called "any cause"? Was this a preacher's rhetoric, like "If your hand causes you to stumble, cut it off" (Mt 5:30), or did Jesus expect remarried people to separate and go back to their original partners? When Jesus said "whoever" (hos an) divorced (Mt 19:9 // Mk 10:11) and "all who" (pas ho) divorced (Mt 5:32 // Lk 16:18), did he mean "everyone" or "many" (as in Mk 1:5: "All in Judea went out to him, and all from Jerusalem were baptized by him")?

These unanswerable questions have inspired a wide variety of interpretations. If Jesus included all divorces, then he condemned all remarriage even after divorce for adultery, as taught by the early church and the Roman Catholic church. If Jesus condemned only the "any cause" divorces (which Philo and Josephus assume to be the only type of divorce being practiced), then his teaching allowed remarriage after other grounds, such as adultery and abandonment. Most Protestant churches allow remarriage after divorce for adultery (based on Matthew's exception) and for abandonment by a nonbeliever (based on Paul's exception).

4.2. Paul's Interpretation. Paul appears to allude specifically to the Synoptic teaching of Jesus concerning divorce when he refers to a command "from the Lord" that "a wife should not divorce [chōrizō] a husband" (1 Cor 7:10). If this is indeed an allusion, the closest Gospel tradition is Mark 10:12: "if she divorces [apolyō] her husband." Although the two verbs are different, both have the meaning of "separation," and both are used in legal documents to mean "divorce." There was, in any case, no distinction between "separation" and "divorce" in Roman law; anyone who separated with view to ending the marriage was considered fully divorced, without the need for any written deed or court appearance.

Paul appears to interpret Jesus' command as allowing divorce in some circumstances. He tells a believer who has left her husband that she must return or offer to return (1 Cor 7:10-11), and he tells other believers that they must not leave their nonbelieving spouses (1 Cor 7:12-14). However, if a nonbeliever separates from a believer, Paul does not expect the nonbeliever to obey Jesus' command, so he states that the believer is "no longer bound." Whether this means that such persons can consider themselves free from the marriage or free to remarry is disputed.

If Paul's interpretation is based on this Gospel tradition, he appears to use Jesus' teaching to condemn the Roman system of no-fault divorce. This may indicate that he regards the "any cause" divorce as equivalent to these Roman divorces. Or perhaps he interpreted Jesus, as did the early church fathers, as forbidding all divorces, and he decided to add an exception of his own.

See also ETHICS OF JESUS; FAMILY; HARDNESS OF HEART; RABBINIC TRADITIONS AND WRITINGS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. A. Cornes, Divorce and Remarriage: Biblical Principles and Pastoral Practice (London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1993); W. A. Heth and G. J. Wenham, Jesus and Divorce (London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1984); D. Instone-Brewer, Divorce and Remarriage in the Bible: The Social and Literary Context (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2002); G. J. Wenham, W. A. Heth and C. S. Keener, Remarriage after Divorce in Today's Church: Three Views (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 2006).

D. Instone-Brewer

DOUBLE DISSIMILARITY, CRITERIA OF. See CRITERIA OF AUTHENTICITY.

DOUBLE SIMILARITY. See CRITERIA OF AUTHENTICITY.

DOUBLE TRADITION. See Q; SYNOPTIC PROBLEM.

DREAMS AND VISIONS

Dreams and visions figure prominently in some NT texts, particularly in the infancy narratives of Matthew and Luke (see Birth of Jesus). In many cases, *God or some other divine agent (e.g., an *angel) is described as the source of these dreams and visions, thereby connecting such experiences to conceptions of revelation. In order to better understand these biblical passages and their theological implications, it is helpful to consider questions of historical, cultural and literary background as they relate to the understanding of dreams and visions in antiquity.

1. Terminology and Distinctions
2. Identifying Dream/Vision Scenes
3. Attitudes toward Dreams/Visions in Antiquity
4. Dreams/Visions in the Gospels

1. Terminology and Distinctions.

Although common English usage distinguishes "dreams" from "visions" (i.e., as sleeping and waking experiences, respectively), ancient conceptions of these phenomena were far more fluid. J. S. Hanson notes a dozen Greek words that were used to describe dreams and visions (apokalypsis, enypnion, epiphaneia, onar, oneiros, optasia, horama, horasis, opsis, phantasia, phantasma, phasma) and observes that ancient authors frequently used the same term to describe both sleeping and waking dream/vision encounters (Hanson, 1407-8). This observation obtains in the NT (e.g., Luke uses the term horama to describe Cornelius seeing an "angel of God" in the middle of the afternoon [Acts 10:3] and to describe "a certain Macedonian man" appearing to Paul in his dream at Troas [Acts 16:9]). Because ancient texts frequently lack a distinction between "dream" and "vision," a number of scholars prefer combinative expressions such as "dream-vision" or "dream/vision." It is also significant to note that "vision" terminology was used frequently in antiquity to describe experiences lacking any apparent "visual" element. Examples of strictly auditory dream/vision encounters in the NT include Acts 9:10; 18:9, in which the Lord "speaks" to Ananias and Paul "in a vision"

(horama), though neither text suggests any visual aspect of the experience. (See also the discussion of the *baptism and *transfiguration scenes in the Synoptic Gospels in 4 below.)

2. Identifying Dream/Vision Scenes.

Identifying dream/vision scenes in ancient literature is somewhat complicated. Some scholars, especially those adhering strictly to the tenets of *form criticism, require the presence of dream/vision terminology (as noted above) in the text. Others take a broader, contextual view and include scenes that describe a dream/vision encounter even if the author does not use explicit dream/vision terminology to do so. Support for the contextual view is found within the contours of the Gospel narratives. Zechariah's encounter with Gabriel (Lk 1:11-20) and the proclamation of the *resurrection to the women at the empty tomb (Lk 24:4-7), for example, do not include dream/vision terminology. Nevertheless, these scenes are described explicitly as dreams/visions later in the story (see the use of optasia in Lk 1:22; 24:23). Similarly, the transfiguration scene is described using dream/vision terminology in Matthew (horama [Mt 17:9]), while such an explicit reference is missing in Mark and Luke. For these reasons, passages featuring otherworldly encounters such as angelic appearances or a voice from heaven are included as dreams/visions in the present study.

3. Attitudes Toward Dreams/Visions in Antiquity.

References to dreams/visions in antiquity are both remarkable and varied. Many people believed dreams/visions brought messages from otherworldly sources (see Brelich; P. C. Miller). Thus, one finds extensive ancient evidence for professional dream interpreters, dream incubation (seeking a dream/vision by sleeping in the sanctuary or sacred place of a particular deity), and the inclusion of dreams among a vast array of divinatory practices. Such references have led a number of commentators to emphasize an almost universal belief in the revelatory power of dreams/visions in antiquity. Evidence to the contrary, however, urges caution. Careful analysis reveals that many in antiquity were skeptical about the revelatory nature of dreams/visions. In scientific and philosophical texts some ancient authors treat dreams as purely psychobiological phenomena (e.g., Aristotle, Dreams and Prophesying by Dreams; Cicero, Concerning Divination). The classic literary text illustrating a belief that some dreams reliably reveal the future while others are deceptive is found in Homer (Od. 19.560-569). Some OT texts uphold the revelatory power of dreams/visions (e.g., Gen 40:5-8; Num 12:6; 1 Kings 3:5-15; Job 33:14-18; Joel 2:28), but others seem to discount such an idea (e.g., Deut 13:1-5; Eccles 5:3, 7; Jer 23:25-32; Zech 10:2). That scholars have drawn sharply opposing conclusions about the extent to which dreams/visions were viewed as revelation is indicative of the diversity of the ancient evidence (compare, e.g., the positive assessments by J. S. Hanson and D. S. Dodson with the negative evaluation by W. V. Harris). Although it is important to be aware of the conflicting attitudes concerning dreams/visions in antiquity—indeed, these conflicting attitudes may elucidate dream/vision scenes in other NT texts—it is equally important to note that the Gospels present dreams/visions positively, usually as communication from a divine source.

4. Dreams/Visions in the Gospels.

Dreams/visions are found throughout the infancy narratives of Matthew (Mt 1:20-21; 2:12-13, 19-20, 22) and Luke (Lk 1:11-20, 26-38; 2:8-15), and they also occur sporadically in the remainder of those Gospels (Mt 3:16-17; 17:1-9; 27:19; 28:2-7; Lk 3:21-22; 9:28-36; 10:17-20; 22:41-44; 24:4-7). Even defined broadly, dreams/visions occur much less frequently in the Gospels of Mark (Mk 1:9-11; 9:2-9) and John (Jn 12:27-32; 20:11-13). Some scholars would also include the postresurrection appearances of Jesus among the Gospel dreams/visions (Mt 28:9-10, 16-20; Lk 24:15-31, 36-51; Jn 20:14-17, 19-23, 26-29; 21:4-22).

Form critics have stressed that ancient dream/vision reports exhibit a striking consistency in form over the course of several centuries. This is not to ignore, however, the unique functional nuances that dreams/visions bear in individual texts. The dreams/visions in Matthew's infancy narrative serve largely to warn Joseph and the magi about impending dangers. This warning function also applies to the peculiar dream had by Pilate's wife (Mt 27:19). The dreams/visions in Luke's infancy narrative, on the other hand, serve a more proclamatory function, announcing good news to Zechariah, Mary and the shepherds. From a broader perspective, however, one may note that the dreams/visions in both infancy narratives link Jesus to God even before his birth. Similarly, the Synoptic versions of the baptism and transfiguration feature a heavenly voice identifying Jesus as God's son. In the transfiguration, this connection between Jesus and God is highlighted further by the heavenly command for the disciples to "listen" to Jesus—a particularly important command, since the transfiguration comes between Jesus' first and second foretelling of the passion in those Gospels. Also proclamatory are the angelic announcements of the resurrection, offering comfort and guidance to the followers of Jesus in the wake of the passion.

In the Gospels, dreams/visions typically feature an irruption of the divine into human experience, offering some form of revelation to the recipient(s). They provide vivid imagery depicting God at work within the scenes of human history, and they evoke a broader sense of God at work behind the scenes of human history. The ways in which the Gospel writers employ dreams/visions, therefore, help us to understand the writers' theological perspectives. In a very important sense, they also help us to understand the writers' perspectives on human experiences of the divine. The characters in the Gospel stories respond to their visionary encounters in a variety of ways. Their response is sometimes an almost mechanical obedience (e.g., Mt 2:14-15; Lk 2:15). At other times, however, they respond with confusion (e.g., Mk 9:6) or even disbelief (e.g., Lk 1:18). Occasionally, these Gospel figures even attempt to interpret their visionary encounters (e.g., Mary's Magnificat [Lk 1:46-55] and Zechariah's Benedictus [Lk 1:67-79]). All of these reactions are important, as they illumine the attempt of God's people to come to terms with God's action in their midst.

See also ANGELS; BIRTH OF JESUS; RESURRECTION; TRANSFIGURATION.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. A. Brelich, "The Place of Dreams in the Religious World Concept of the Greeks," in The Dream and Human Societies, ed. G. E. Von Grunebaum and R. Caillois (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1966) 293-301; D. S. Dodson, Reading Dreams: An Audience-Critical Approach to the Dreams in the Gospel of Matthew (LNTS 397; London: T & T Clark International, 2009); F. Flannery-Dailey, Dreamers, Scribes, and Priests: Jewish Dreams in the Hellenistic and Roman Eras (JSJSup 90; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2004); R. K. Gnuse, Dreams and Dream Reports in the Writings of Josephus: A Traditio-Historical Analysis (AGJU 36; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1996); J. S. Hanson, "Dreams and Visions in the Graeco-Roman World and Early Christianity," ANRW II.23.2 (1980) 1395-1427; W. V. Harris, Dreams and Experience in Classical Antiquity (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2009); J.-M. Husser, Dreams and Dream Narratives in the Biblical World, trans. J. M. Munro (BibSem 63; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1999); J. B. F. Miller, Convinced That God Had Called Us: Dreams, Visions, and the Perception of God's Will in Luke-Acts (BIS 85; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2007); P. C. Miller, Dreams in Late Antiquity: Studies in the Imagination of a Culture (Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1994); A. L. Oppenheim, The Interpretation of Dreams in the Ancient Near East: With a Translation of an Assyrian Dream-Book (TAPS 46/3; Philadelphia: American Philosophical Society, 1956) 186-217. J. B. F. Miller

E

ECONOMICS

In modern parlance the word economy typically refers to a system for the production, distribution and consumption of scarce resources (i.e., goods and services), with the cognate word economics denoting the study of economies and economic activity. The English word economy derives from the Greek oikonomia, a term that in the ancient world typically designated household management or, more generally, the activity of “organization” or “administration” (cf. Lk 16:1-4). The ancient concept of oikonomia is thus far more expansive than the modern understanding of an economy, for ancient writers did not view economic activity as distinct from other aspects of estate and household management. Xenophon’s fourth-century B.C. work Oeconomicus, for example, is a Socratic dialogue that covers topics such as wealth, agriculture, household administration and marital relations. While individuals and communities in antiquity worked in agriculture, trade or manufacturing, and while taxes were collected and money was produced, the ancient worldview did not understand these activities in isolation from other forms of social interaction. Activities and discourses that moderns would classify as “economic” were, in the ancient world, embedded in other social structures.

1. The Economic Context of the Gospels
2. Jesus, the Gospels and Palestinian Economics
3. Economics and the Kingdom of God

1. The Economic Context of the Gospels.

1.1. The Economy of the Roman Empire. Any attempt to understand the economic context of Jesus and the Gospels should be rooted in the larger economic conditions of the Roman Empire. A significant debate has characterized the work of contemporary historians on the Greco-Roman economy, however. This dispute has largely centered on the extent to which, if at all, the structures and performance of the ancient economy resembled medieval, early modern or modern economies. On the one hand, “modernists” such as E. Meyer and M. Rostovtzeff emphasized trade and market activity in antiquity as keys to urbanization and the development of early capitalism, even while acknowledging that “archaic” economies did not reach levels of production similar to modern, industrialized economies. On the other hand, “primitivists” such as M. Finley, drawing particularly on the substantivist economic theory of K. Polanyi, argued that the structures of the ancient economy severely constrained its performance. In a traditionally agrarian context economic activity was limited by both social values that discouraged practices such as lending, trade and integrated market development (i.e., price equilibrium through shared commodities and information) and also by technological confines that made interregional trade cost-prohibitive, apart from some items such as wine, oil and luxury goods. Concentration of wealth in the hands of a small number of landowners stunted the growth of integrated markets, for the vast majority of the population lived at, near or below subsistence level and therefore did not possess the buying power to stimulate large-scale market expansion.

The Finleyan perspective on economic sociology remains influential. Many would concur that the economy of the Roman Empire was characterized by considerable disparities in wealth distribution, that significant economic growth was constrained by social values, that cities tended to be centers of consumption rather than production, and that financial and trade systems were relatively undeveloped (especially when compared with the growth of trade in early modern Europe, for example). Other scholars of Greco-Roman antiquity, however, have offered more positive assessments of economic performance and growth in the first two centuries A.D., with some suggestions of modest per capita economic growth between 200 B.C. and A.D. 200 (e.g., Mattingly and Salmon). More recent work on the economic conditions of the Roman Empire has also emphasized the need to move beyond a single model to explain “the ancient economy,” since factors such as the climate, geographical location, population, political context and redistributive mechanisms of various regional economies might indicate that Finley’s primitivist model is too static to account for the diversity of economic activity and conditions in Greco-Roman antiquity (Horden and Purcell). The theoretical model remains powerful, but it must also account for evidence that suggests higher levels of production, performance and trade than the model allows.

The question of wealth distribution, which has factored prominently in discussions of economic growth and performance in antiquity, offers an example of how a macroeconomic perspective can shape interpretation of specific evidence. Elite authors in antiquity tend to paint economic stratification in binary terms, often as a distinction between the few privileged honestiores (including senatorial, equestrian and curial orders) and the vast majority of the poor humiliores. Although modern authors have occasionally accepted this binary division, with elites comprising 1 percent (or less) and “the poor” comprising 99 percent (or more) of the population (so Meggitt), recent scholarship has generally moved away from this binary division toward more highly stratified models of wealth distribution. In an important article published in 2004, for example, S. Friesen offered a seven-tiered “poverty scale” of the Greco-Roman economy as a heuristic device for considering questions of wealth distribution in the early Christian movement (see Table 1).

More recently, Friesen and W. Scheidel have attempted to establish the gross domestic product of the Roman Empire in the mid-second century A.D., using this number as a means of outlining a model of income distribution and inequality. The numbers are slightly different, but the overall picture is quite similar: a “middling” group of between 6 and 12 percent of the population, with an income between 2.4 and 10 times the amount needed to sustain a “barebones” existence, stood between 1.5 percent of the population at the elite level and around 90 percent at or below subsistence level (Scheidel and Friesen, 84-85). Others have argued for a slightly larger middling group, perhaps as high as 15 percent of the urban population (so Longenecker), but the emerging picture moves beyond the binary division of ancient authors and earlier modern scholarship. Although these models are abstractions and do not account for regional and even slight chronological differences, they do shed light on the destitution experienced by the vast majority of inhabitants of the Greco-Roman world, who lived “at or near subsistence level, whose primary concern it [was] to obtain the minimum food, shelter, and clothing necessary to sustain life, whose lives [were] dominated by the struggle for physical survival” (Garnsey and

Table 1. Seven-Tiered Poverty Scale

PS1	Imperial elites	imperial dynasty, Roman senatorial families, a few retainers, local royalty, a few freedpersons	0.04%
PS2	Regional or provincial elites	equestrian families, provincial officials, some retainers, some decurial families, some freedpersons, some retired military officers	1.00%
PS3	Municipal elites	most decurial families, wealthy men and women who do not hold office, some freedpersons, some retainers, some veterans, some merchants	1.76%
PS4	Moderate surplus resources	some merchants, some traders, some freedpersons, some artisans (especially those who employ others), military veterans	7%?
PS5	Stable near subsistence level (with reasonable hope of remaining above the minimum level to sustain life)	many merchants and traders, regular wage earners, artisans, large shop owners, freedpersons, some farm families	22%?
PS6	At subsistence level (and often below minimum level to sustain life)	small farm families, laborers (skilled and unskilled), artisans (especially those employed by others), wage earners, most merchants and traders, small shop/tavern owners	40%
PS7	Below subsistence level	some farm families, unattached widows, orphans, beggars, disabled, unskilled day laborers, prisoners	28%

Woolf, 54). This picture forms an important background for discussing the social context of the early Christian movement, reminding readers of the Gospels that subsistence existence and poverty would have been the norm for the vast majority of contemporaries of Jesus and the Gospel writers.

1.2. The Economy of Roman Palestine. Although much research has been done on the structure of the Palestinian agrarian economy (see, e.g., Hanson and Oakman), a lack of primary sources before the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70 often forces scholars to rely on later archeological and literary evidence, along with comparative studies from other (allegedly) similar societies, to make judgments about economic performance in Palestine in the first century A.D.

1.2.1. An Agrarian Economy. It is generally agreed that the economy of Roman Palestine, like most of classical antiquity, was agrarian in nature. Particularly influential in discussion of the Palestinian economy has been the macrosociological perspective of G. Lenski, whose work has often been used by NT scholars to label Roman Palestine an “advanced agrarian society.” According to this perspective, advanced agrarian societies are characterized by “marked social inequality . . . [and] institutions of government are the primary source of social inequality” (Lenski, 210). Lenski offers eight levels of social stratification characteristic of advanced agrarian economies: (1) ruler; (2) governing class; (3) retainer class; (4) merchants; (5) priests; (6) peasants; (7) artisans; (8) unclean, degraded, expendables. Crucial to this model is the claim that political systems are central to social inequality. With regard to the Palestinian economy, the claim is made that wealth and power, including land ownership, were concentrated in the hands of urban elites (particularly in Jerusalem), whereas the vast majority of the peasant population in Judea and Galilee worked the land and paid taxes that supported the comfortable lifestyles of the wealthy. Often there is the following assumption that, beginning in the Herodian period, the political economy forced more land to come under the control of elites through high taxation and debt mechanisms, leaving most peasants landless and hopeful for tenancy agreements or, worse, occasional work as day laborers: “Thus, the powerful kept peasants and villages under a constant barrage of demands and obligations—perennially in debt, if possible” (Hanson and Oakman, 111).

There is no doubt that economic activity in Roman Palestine centered on agricultural production, with the harvest of grain for food, olives for oil, and grapes for wine the primary crops (Josephus, Ag. Ap. 1.60). What is debatable, however, is whether the theoretical model of an “advanced agrarian society,” and the political economy that such a model entails, adequately explains the available data. For example, there is little archeological and/or literary evidence for large-scale displacement of peasants through the aggregation of land ownership in the hands of private estates in Palestine in the first century A.D. Herod and his sons did own significant private lands (Josephus, J.W. 1.418; Ant. 17.147), but there is no justification for the claim that during the Herodian period “polycropping and self-sufficiency on family farms gave way to monocropping on estates and royal lands and to an asymmetrical exchange of goods” (Crossan and Reed, 100). Instead, most of the land in Judea and Galilee seems to have been owned and farmed by freeholding peasants (cf. Mt 19:29 // Mk 10:29).

1.2.2. A Trade Economy. The extent of trade in Palestine has also been a flashpoint of debate because it is a topic closely related to the issue of economic production. According to some pessimistic assessments, cities in Palestine’s “political economy” had a parasitic relationship with agrarian villages. Resources were funneled from rural to urban areas, and trade among nonelites was severely limited. As D. Edwards summarizes this view, “By bureaucratic, military, commercial, or fiduciary means, they became the centers of control, primarily over land use and raw materials, and thereby determined the conditions under which all other parts of the system operated” (Edwards, 362). This negative view of trade in Roman Palestine is often strengthened by appeal to Josephus’s statement that Jews do not inhabit “a maritime country; neither commerce nor the intercourse which it promotes with the outside world has any attraction for us. Our cities are built inland, remote from the sea; and we devote ourselves to the cultivation of the productive country with which we are blessed” (Ag. Ap. 160).

There is undoubtedly some truth to Josephus’s assertion. Yet by the time of Herod the Great the ports of Joppa, Anthedon/Agrippias and especially Caesarea Maritima facilitated international trade (Josephus, Ant. 15.333-340). Moreover, local and regional trade in Palestine in the Second Temple period, often without the engagement of the urban elite, is frequently underestimated. Archeological evidence in Galilee, for example, suggests regional trade in clay pottery, basalt, millstones and olive oil (so Edwards). Nonelite trade, therefore, was an important aspect of economic production in Roman Palestine, indicating that the economy was not merely controlled by elites (so also Horden and Purcell).

2. Jesus, the Gospels and Palestinian Economics.

Given the extent to which “economic” activity in the ancient world was embedded in other social institutions, it may be helpful to examine Jesus’ economic views, as preserved in the Gospel traditions, by focusing on several social structures related to the production, distribution and consumption of goods and services.

2.1. Household. As early as the work of nineteenth-century economist K. Bücher, it has been recognized that economic production and consumption in antiquity occurred primarily (though not exclusively) in the household, the basic social unit in Greco-Roman antiquity (see Saller). Particularly given the ancient connection between oikonomia and household administration, any rejection or critique of the household structure had significant economic implications.

As is well known, Jesus is portrayed in the Gospels as having an ambiguous, perhaps even hostile, relationship to conventional family structures. Jesus’ own family has difficulty with his “mission in the Gospel of Mark (Mk 3:21; cf. Jn 7:5), a Gospel in which Jesus redefines his family as “whoever does the will of God” (Mk 3:35; cf. Mt 12:46; Lk 8:19). The “fictive kinship” shared by the earliest followers of Jesus (Mt 5:22-24; 7:1-5; 18:15; 25:40) and members of the movement formed in his name (e.g., Rom 8:29; 1 Cor 1:10; Gal 1:2; Jas 1:2) would have had difficult consequences for economic production in households, particularly in terms of the destabilization of the families of those who left their possessions to follow Jesus (e.g., Mt 19:27 // Mk 10:28 // Lk 18:28).

2.2. Benefaction/Benefactor. Another important social institution through which material goods were distributed in the Greco-Roman world was benefaction or, as it is sometimes labeled, euergetism (from Gk. euergesiai, “gifts/benefactions”). Famously defined by P. Veyne as “private munificence for public benefit,” euergetism in Greco-Roman antiquity involved civic benefaction from wealthy donors in return for public honor. Benefactors (called euergetai) typically supplied cities and/or voluntary associations with gifts such as building projects (e.g., roads, stadia, temples, markets), grain during times of food shortage, subsidies for religious festivals, and public games. In return, these donors would receive tokens of high acclaim, such as the honorific title euergetēs, honorary decrees, and crowns and titles, with the euergetic acts frequently memorialized in public inscriptions.

To the extent that Jewish leaders in the Second Temple period were influenced by the conventions of Hellenistic euergetism, the practices of “benefaction” provided an important means of wealth distribution and honor accumulation in Palestine. Native Jewish leaders such as Onias (2 Macc 4:1-2), Simon Maccabee (1 Macc 14:25-49), John Hyrcanus (Josephus, Ant. 14.149-155) and Agrippa I (Josephus, Ant. 19.328-300, 335-337; IGLS 6.2759) engaged in Hellenistic euergetic practices, receiving public honors for benefactions such as the supervision of temple funds, military provisions and other gifts (see esp. Gardner). At the same time, there is a lack of epigraphical evidence for honorific inscriptions praising benefactors in Palestine, with the exception of a few euergetic inscriptions in Jerusalem (SEG 1277; CII II 14) and Caesarea Maritima (AE 1963 no. 104), perhaps suggesting reticence among Jews publicly and fully to endorse the values and practices of Greco-Roman euergetism.

Among the Gospel writers, the author of Luke-Acts evidences the most obvious appropriation and critique of the Greco-Roman benefaction tradition (see Marshall). Aside from several passages in which Jesus opposes conventions of reciprocity (Lk 6:17-38; 12:32-34; 14:1-24), in Luke 22:25 Jesus is explicitly critical of those in authority among the Gentiles who are called “benefactors” (euergetai), a means of procuring public honor that stands in contrast to the servant leadership advocated and demonstrated by Jesus (Lk 22:26-27). The language of euergetism is also found in Acts 10:38, where the euergetēs is redefined in the memory of Jesus who “went about doing benefactions [euergetōn] and healing all who were oppressed by the devil” (cf. Acts 4:9; 1 Tim 6:2). The author of Luke-Acts is not the only Gospel writer to indicate tension between Jesus’ vision for discipleship and the values of the Greco-Roman benefaction system, however. In Matthew’s narrative Jesus’ exhortation to give alms in secret may represent an implicit critique of the benefaction system (Mt 6:1-4): public munificence is shunned in favor of anonymous almsgiving that does not result in the accumulation of public honor.

2.3. Tithes, Tributes and Taxes, Tolls. A third social institution through which material goods were distributed in Roman Palestine was the complex system of economic redistribution, including tithes, tributes and taxes, and tolls.

2.3.1. Tithes. The practice of tithing—that is, giving one-tenth of one’s income or harvest to the state or temple—is frequently attested in ancient Near Eastern literature. Yet it does not appear that tithes were consistently set at one-tenth, nor is it evident that they were always compulsory. The OT evidence captures this ambiguity. The noun ma'āsēr (“one-tenth”) and its verbal cognate ʿāsar (“to give a tenth”) sometimes denote voluntary gifts (Gen 14:20; 28:22; Amos 4:4). At other times, however, this terminology suggests obligatory payments. In legal texts, for example, tithing is presented as a compulsory activity (e.g., Deut 14:22–29; 26:12; cf. Lev 27:30–33; Num 18:20–32; Neh 10:35–38), although the prophetic indictment in Malachi 3:8 (“How are we robbing [God]? In your tithes and offerings!”) suggests that this obligation was not always met.

Moreover, the OT offers a variety of tithe regulations: (1) the Deuteronomic tradition of a yearly tithe consumed in Jerusalem by the one who offers it (Deut 14:22–27); (2) a tithe offered every three years to provide for the Levites, resident aliens, orphans and widows (Deut 14:28–29); (3) a tithe designed to finance the sacrificial system in the sanctuary (Lev 27:30–33) and its attendants, the Levites (Num 18:21–32). Given this diversity, there were various attempts to harmonize these OT traditions in the literature of Second Temple Judaism. In the book of Tobit, for example, Tobit appears to offer a total of fourteen tithes in a six-year cycle. That is, each year he employs a tenth of his yearly agricultural produce in Jerusalem in accordance with Deuteronomy 14:22–27, and each year he offers a second tenth of his yearly agricultural produce to “to the sons of Levi who ministered at Jerusalem” (Tob 1:6–7). Additionally, every third and sixth year, in accordance with Deuteronomy 14:28–29, Tobit offers the “poor tithe” to “the orphans and widows and to the converts who had attached themselves to Israel” (Tob 1:8) (cf. Josephus, Ant. 4.68, 205, 240). Jubilees 32:1–15 advocates a twelve-tithe system similar to the one found in Tobit (i.e., a tenth to Jerusalem and a tenth to support the sacrificial system, each offered every year during a six-year cycle), although there is no mention of the “poor tithe” in Jubilees.

Tithing is explicitly mentioned in the Gospels on only three occasions. First, in the context of a discussion about washing before meals with a *Pharisee who had invited Jesus to eat with him, Jesus in Luke 11 pronounces a series of woes upon the Pharisees, including the first: “But woe to you Pharisees! For you tithe mint and rue and herbs of all kinds, and neglect justice and the love of God; it is these you ought to have practiced, without neglecting the others” (Lk 11:42 NRSV). In the Matthean parallel a similar series of woes upon scribes and Pharisees also includes an indictment of those who “have neglected the weightier matters of the law: justice and mercy and faith. It is these you ought to have practiced without neglecting the others” (Mt 23:23 NRSV). In both of these sayings, the phrase “without neglecting the others” likely indicates that tithing itself is not condemned by Jesus; rather, it is the adherence to the law without concomitant attention to justice and love to which Jesus objects. Finally, in the Lukan parable of the Pharisee and the tax collector (Lk 18:10–14) the Pharisee mentions in his prayer both *fasting and tithing as signs of his piety (Lk 18:12). Again, it is not these pious deeds that Jesus regards as objectionable; instead, it is the self-exultant attitude of the Pharisee, whose boasting in virtuous behavior is contrasted with the humility of the tax collector.

2.3.2. Tributes and Taxes. If tithing is generally voluntary, tributes and taxes are usually viewed as the conscription of private goods by the state. In the first century A.D. *Rome exerted its power and raised funds to support its military activities through levies on conquered peoples. A distinction between tributes and taxes can be made between payments to foreign powers (i.e., tributes) and to local authorities (i.e., taxes). Thus, Jewish leaders in Palestine were obligated to pay tribute to foreign powers, first the Ptolemies in Egypt, then the Seleucids in Syria, followed by Rome. Jewish authorities also collected taxes from inhabitants of Palestine and other Jews throughout the Mediterranean Diaspora.

The Roman tribute (phoros) was instituted in Judea when the region came under Roman control in 63 B.C. The Roman tribute was initially collected by publicani, who were contracted by the Senate for the right to gather these funds, although collection in this period was likely irregular and unsystematic (Cicero, Flac. 69; Prov. cons. 5.10; Dio Cassius, Hist. 39.56.6). According to Josephus, in response to their support during the Alexandrian War, Julius Caesar made a “treaty of friendship and alliance” with the Jews in 47 B.C., a pact that resulted in a reduction of the tribute and an exemption from the tribute during the Sabbatical Year (Ant. 14.190–195, 200–210).

It is sometimes claimed that taxation under Herod the Great was crippling for inhabitants of Palestine, since taxes raised for Herod’s own reign were combined with the Roman tribute, the Jerusalem temple tax, and tithes for priests and festivals—all of these conscriptions resulting in an extremely high tax burden for the Jewish peasantry. Such an oppressive situation is far from certain, however, and there are several indications that the tax burden under Herod and his sons was not inordinately high. There is no evidence in Josephus that Herod was compelled to pay annual tribute to Rome, nor is there any indication, as is sometimes claimed, that Herod's sons Archelaus, Antipas and Phillip were forced to render proceeds from taxes gathered in their territories to Rome as a tribute after their father's death (see Josephus, Ant. 18.108). In fact, as descendants of the Roman citizen Antipater (Josephus, Ant. 14.137), Herod, his heirs (Archelaus, Antipas, Phillip) and their territories would have been exempt from Roman tribute. It is likely that Herod's notable building projects were financed by his own significant personal wealth and by funds raised from tolls and duties on trade, not by a heavy tax burden on Jewish peasants (Udoh, 180-206).

When Herod's son Archelaus was deposed by Rome as ruler of Judea in A.D. 6, the territory became a Roman province ruled by imperial officials and subject once again to Roman tribute. The reorganization of Judea as a province was accompanied by a census in both Judea and Syria, overseen by Quirinius, governor of Syria (Josephus, Ant. 18.1-9; cf. Lk 2:1-5). Josephus implies that the goal of Quirinius's census was "the registration of property" (tēn epi tais apographais) instead of a counting of persons (Ant. 18.3); this aim of property registration for the purpose of accurate land tax collection was met with some Jewish resistance (Ant. 18.4-10).

Payment of the Roman tribute is an issue in the conversation between Jesus and a contingent of Pharisees and Herodians in Mark 12:13-17 (cf. the parallels, Mt 22:15-22; Lk 20:20-26). When asked, "Is it lawful to pay taxes to the emperor [exestin dounai kēnsōn Kaisari], or not? Should we pay them, or should we not?" (Mk 12:14-15 NRSV), Jesus asks for a denarius. There is some debate about whether reference to this tax should be counted as evidence for Jewish payment of a "poll tax" after the Roman census in A.D. 6, especially given Mark's use of the word kēnsos, which has been viewed as a loanword from the Latin census. In the parallel version in Luke's Gospel the author employs the word phoros in the question posted to Jesus, indicating more clearly that the debate centered on the Roman tribute. Either way, Jesus' response to the challenge is somewhat cryptic. After hearing from his antagonists that it is Caesar's head imaged on the denarius, Jesus answers, "Give to the emperor the things that are the emperor's, and to God the things that are God's," a response that produces amazement among his interlocutors (Mk 12:17 NRSV). On the one hand, Jesus' directive appears to defer to Rome's authority to demand tribute from its conquered territories (cf. the accusation in Lk 23:2); on the other hand, the subtext of Jesus' statement may be that since all things ultimately belong to God (cf. Ps 24:1), Rome's claim to supreme power, made tangible in this narrative by a coin that bears the image of the emperor, is in fact illusory.

2.3.3. Tolls. Tolls represent a tariff on the transportation of goods, and these levies constituted a significant source of funds for Jewish leaders in Roman Palestine. As mentioned earlier, Roman publicani had been involved in the collection of the Roman tribute in Palestine before these tax companies were abolished in Judea by Julius Caesar. Tolls on transit trade were a significant source of profit for both the Hasmoneans and Herod. Unlike most other forms of taxation, tolls and duties would mostly have been paid in cash rather than in kind.

With the resumption of the Roman tribute in Judea in A.D. 6, some Jewish officials, including village leaders and members of the *Sanhedrin (Josephus, J.W. 2.405-407), likely were involved in the collection of funds for the tribute and payment of these dues to the Roman governor. Other agents of tax collection included "toll collectors" (telōnai), individuals contracted to extract tolls at transit and trade points. It is generally agreed that these toll collectors were responsible for gathering local tolls (telē) levied by cities (CIS 3913), including duties on agricultural produce sold in Jerusalem (Josephus, Ant. 18.90), although they may also have played a part in the collection of tithes and the Roman tribute (Josephus, Ant. 20.181, 206-207).

In the Synoptic Gospels Jesus frequently encounters or mentions these telōnai (Mt 5:46; 9:10-11; 10:3; 11:19; 18:17; 21:31-32; Mk 2:15-16; Lk 3:12; 5:27-32; 7:29, 34; 15:1; 18:10-14). All three Synoptics record Jesus' commissioning of a disciple who is a toll collector at his tollbooth, although he is called "Levi" in both Mark (Mk 2:14) and Luke (Lk 5:27) and "Matthew" in Matthew (Mt 9:9; cf. Mt 10:3). The NT Gospels capture the disdain with which these toll collectors were viewed, likely because of their ability to exploit the duty system for their own profit: they are frequently grouped with "sinners"—that is, hamartōloi, violators of Jewish law (Mt 9:10-11; 11:19; Mk 2:15-16; Lk 5:30; 7:34; 15:1; cf. prostitutes in Mt 21:31-32); in Matthew 18:15-20 a sinful member of the ekklēsia who will not listen to the congregation is to be treated "as a pagan and a toll collector" (hōsper ho ethnikos kai ho telōnēs); and in the parable in Luke 18:10-14 the narrative turns on the status contrast between the pious Pharisee and the humble toll collector. In Luke's Gospel Zacchaeus, who is called a “chief toll collector” (architelōnēs) and who is notable for his wealth (Lk 19:2), is a marginalized “sinner” in part because his vocation leads him to cheat others (Lk 19:8). Jesus himself expresses a bias against toll collectors in Matthew’s narrative, contrasting his call to love one’s enemies with the practice of loving those who already demonstrate love, for “even the tax collectors do that” (Mt 5:44-46), and suggesting that the congregation’s reaction to an unrepentant brother or sister should mirror the treatment of outsiders and toll collectors (Mt 18:15-20). Yet Jesus is frequently associated with toll collectors, and some of his earliest followers came from their ranks, including Levi/Matthew (cf. Mk 2:15, which notes that other telōnai followed Jesus). This association with toll collectors is a sign of Jesus’ mission to the socially marginalized.

2.3.4. Temple Tax. Given the close relationship between civic and religious institutions throughout the ancient Mediterranean world, and in Palestine in particular, it is problematic to draw a sharp distinction between state and religious taxation. Nevertheless, the Jerusalem *temple can helpfully be discussed separately because its cultic apparatus was subsidized by the taxation of Jews in Palestine and throughout the Mediterranean Diaspora.

Most adult Jewish males in the early Roman period, whether they lived in Palestine or in the Diaspora, paid a yearly half-shekel tax to the Jerusalem temple. Although the origins of this postexilic practice are unclear, yearly contributions for the cultic apparatus and maintenance of the Jerusalem temple seem to have been rooted in interpretations of Exodus 30:11-16 (cf. the voluntary contributions to the temple in Neh 10:32-39). Roman policy allowed Jews to transport funds to Jerusalem without hindrance (Cicero, Flac. 28.67-69; Josephus, Ant. 14.225-227; 16:162-165; Philo, Spec. 1.77-78; Legat. 156-157, 216, 311-316). Since it received a consistently large influx of money, the temple in Jerusalem was regarded as one of the wealthiest institutions in the Greco-Roman world (Philo, Spec. 1.76). After the destruction of the temple in A.D. 70, the Roman emperor Vespasian required the yearly payment of the fiscus Judaicus, a poll tax of two drachmas, by Jewish males to the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus as a replacement for the temple tax (Josephus, J.W. 7.218).

In an exchange that may reflect later debates about the temple tax (or its successor, the fiscus Judaicus) between followers of Jesus and other Jews, in Matthew 17:24-27 Peter is asked by “the collectors of the temple tax” (hoi ta didrachma lambanontes) if Jesus pays the tariff. Peter answers affirmatively. In the ensuring conversation between Jesus and Peter, Jesus offers a rationale for his payment of this tax: “What do you think, Simon? From whom do kings of the earth take toll or tribute? From their children or from others?” When Peter said, ‘From others,’ Jesus said to him, ‘Then the children are free. However, so that we do not give offense to them, go to the sea and cast a hook; take the first fish that comes up; and when you open its mouth, you will find a coin; take that and give it to them for you and me’” (Mt 17:25-27 NRSV). Jesus may be employing the language of fictive kinship to indicate that those in the new family formed around him (i.e., “the children,” hoi huioi) are not obligated to pay the temple tax, but they do so anyway so as not to give offense.

3. Economics and the Kingdom of God.

The issue of economics and the Gospels must also address the extent to which economic values and practices contributed to the social formation of the Jesus movement. If “economics” refers to a system for the production, distribution and consumption of scarce resources, then the Jesus of the canonical Gospels offers a countercultural perspective on the exchange of resources among his followers. Although followers of Jesus may participate in the economy of the Roman Empire (Mk 12:13-17), their ultimate allegiance is to God and not to the power of wealth (Mt 6:24 // Lk 16:13). Wealth in the Gospels is often figured as a hindrance to following Jesus (Mt 19:16-22 // Mk 10:17-31 // Lk 18:18-23; Mk 4:18-19; cf. 1 Jn 2:15-17; Rev 3:14-22), while dispossession of goods sometimes signifies faithful *discipleship (Mk 10:28-31; cf. Mt 9:9; 13:44-46; Mk 1:16-20; Lk 19:1-10). Believers are called to give generously to those in need (Mt 5:42-48; 6:1-4; 10:8; 19:21; Mk 10:21; Lk 6:30; 11:41; 14:12-14) and not greedily to hoard possessions (Mt 6:19-20; Lk 12:13-21; cf. Mt 23:25 // Lk 11:39). Jesus’ proclamation of the *kingdom of God “crosses boundaries and challenges paradigms, and in so doing opens a space and a time for new (and renewed) ways of being human-in-relation, that is, for a new ordering of things and persons, a new economy” (Barton, 57).

See also FAMILY; RICH AND POOR; ROME.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. M. Atkins and R. Osborne, eds., Poverty in the Roman World (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2006); S. Barton, “Money Matters,” in Engaging Economics: New Testament Scenarios and Early Christian Reception, ed. B. W. Longenecker and K. D. Liebigood (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2009) 37-59; J. D. Crossan and J. Reed, Excavating Jesus: Beneath the Stones, Behind the Texts (New York: HarperSanFrancisco, 2001); D. R. Edwards, "Identity and Social Location in Roman Galilean Villages," in Religion, Ethnicity, and Identity in Ancient Galilee: A Region in Transition, ed. J. Zangenberg, H. A. Attridge and D. B. Martin (WUNT 210; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2007) 357-74; M. I. Finley, The Ancient Economy (rev. ed.; Berkeley: University of California Press, 1999); S. Friesen, "Poverty in Pauline Studies: Beyond the So-called New Consensus," JSNT 26 (2004) 323-61; G. Gardner, "Jewish Leadership and Hellenistic Civic Benefaction in the Second Century B.C.E.," JBL 126 (2007) 327-43; P. Garnsey and G. Woolf, "Patronage of the Rural Poor in the Roman World," in Patronage in Ancient Society, ed. A. Wallace-Hadrill (Routledge: London, 1990) 155-66; K. C. Hanson and D. E. Oakman, Palestine in the Time of Jesus: Social Structures and Social Conflicts (2nd ed.; Minneapolis: Fortress, 2008); P. A. Harland, "The Economy of First-Century Palestine: State of the Scholarly Discussion," in Handbook of Early Christianity: Social Science Approaches, ed. A. J. Blasi, J. Duhaime and P.-A. Turcotte (Walnut Creek, CA: AltaMira, 2002) 511-27; P. Horden and N. Purcell, The Corrupting Sea: A Study of Mediterranean History (London: Blackwell, 2000); G. Lenski, Power and Privilege: A Theory of Social Stratification (New York: McGraw-Hill, 1966); B. Longenecker, Remember the Poor: Paul, Poverty, and the Greco-Roman World (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2010); B. W. Longenecker and K. D. Liebengood, eds., Engaging Economics: New Testament Scenarios and Early Christian Reception (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2009); S. Mandell, "Who Paid the Temple Tax When the Jews Were under Roman Rule?" HTR 77 (1984) 223-32; J. Marshall, Jesus, Patrons, and Benefactors: Roman Palestine and the Gospel of Luke (WUNT 2/259; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2009); D. J. Mattingly and J. Salmon, eds., Economies beyond Agriculture in the Classical World (London: Routledge, 2001); J. Meggitt, Paul, Poverty and Survival (SNTW; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1998); R. Saller, "Household and Gender," in The Cambridge Economic History of the Greco-Roman World, ed. W. Scheidel, I. Morris and R. Saller (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2007) 87-112; W. Scheidel and S. Friesen, "The Size of the Economy and the Distribution of Income in the Roman Empire," JRS 99 (2009) 61-91; W. Scheidel, I. Morris and R. Saller, eds., The Cambridge Economic History of the Greco-Roman World (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2007); E. W. Stegemann and W. Stegemann, The Jesus Movement: A Social History of Its First Century, trans. O. C. Dean Jr. (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1999); F. E. Udoh, To Caesar What Is Caesar's: Tribute, Taxes, and Imperial Administration in Early Roman Palestine (63 B.C.E.-70 C.E.) (BJS 343; Providence: Brown Judaic Studies, 2005); P. Veyne, Bread and Circuses: Historical Sociology and Political Pluralism (London: Penguin, 1992). D. Downs

ELDERs

Originally, Hebrew zāqēn meant a "bearded one" or referred to an older member of a family, and the term is used frequently in the Bible for those who are older in years. However, the term elder most frequently refers to the ruling head of the family or clan. In Jesus' day these were predominantly the aristocratic leaders of the Jewish patrician families. They served in local village councils and alongside the *Pharisees and *Sadducees in the *Sanhedrin, the great council of the Jews in Jerusalem.

1. Old Testament Background
2. Postexilic and Intertestamental Developments
3. The Judaism of Jesus' Day
4. The Emphases of the Evangelists

1. Old Testament Background.

The institutional office of elder derived from the earliest history of the nation, when families and clans controlled the politics of the Hebrews. As heads of the major families, the elders naturally became the leaders of the clans and formed councils to lead the tribes. Yet there was no instance when they were the sole authority, for they always represented the people under the leadership of divinely appointed leaders such as *Moses (Ex 3:16, 18; 18:12). At Sinai "seventy of the elders of Israel" were convened to ratify the covenant (Ex 24:1, 9), an event celebrated by later Jews as constituting also the divine commission of the office of elder. In Numbers 11:16-17, 24-25, clearly indicating an anointing ceremony, we read of the Spirit being placed on them and their prophesying. Henceforth, they shared Moses' burdens and assisted him in his office.

Deuteronomy speaks of the legal responsibilities of the elders: the local administration of justice (Deut 19:11-13), functioning as civil judges at the city gates, which were the ancient courtrooms (Deut 22:15; 25:7), and adjudicating in family squabbles (Deut 21:18-21; 22:13-21). After the settlement in Canaan the elders became a ruling class, with not only judicial powers, but also political and military ones (1 Sam 4:3; 8:4-9). During the monarchy their authority was lessened by the creation of a centralized government, with its civil service. But the elders as local rulers still exercised considerable influence and acted as buffers against dictatorial tendencies on the part of the monarchy. Saul sought their favor (1 Sam 15:30), and both David (2 Sam 3:17; 5:3) and Rehoboam (1 Kings 12:6-8) turned to the elders when seeking the throne. There was always tension between the elders and the king, since their spheres of authority overlapped, but the elders still adjudicated both legal and religious matters among the people.

2. Postexilic and Intertestamental Developments.

During the exile both the monarchy and the tribal structure of Israel collapsed, and the elders gained even more authority than before. In exilic communities (Jer 29:1) and in Palestine (Ezek 8:1; 14:1) elders were quite prominent. Yet there was a difference, for now it was not clans or tribes, but rather individual families that had risen to leadership. During the postexilic period these families became an aristocracy, and their elders wielded great influence. In Ezra 5:9; 6:6-15 they were the primary instigators of the rebuilding of the temple, and both Darius and the Persian governor Tattenai worked with them. Town elders continued to exercise power (see Ezra 10:14; cf. the "family heads" in Ezra 10:16), and Nehemiah had many running battles with these "nobles and officials" (Neh 5:7; 7:5), but it was the aristocratic family that increasingly gained the upper hand.

During the intertestamental period these family heads and elders slowly took control of the apparatus of state and began meeting as a council to rule the nation, becoming the precursor of the Sanhedrin. It may be that the earliest form was the "company" of twelve chieftains mentioned in Ezra 2:2; Nehemiah 7:7, possibly representing symbolically the twelve tribes. Under Hellenistic rule this council, the Gerousia, had wide-ranging powers, since the Greeks allowed their subject peoples to govern their own internal affairs. At some point there came to be seventy (or seventy-one, if one counts the high priest) members (cf. m. Sanh. 1:6; Josephus, J.W. 2.482), and the council consisted of elders and aristocratic *priests, with the high priest at the head. During the reign of the Hasmoneans, however, the makeup of the Gerousia was altered again. Its powers were reduced due to the monarchic tendencies of the rulers, and there was a growing influx of scribal (Pharisaic) leaders, with the result that the power structure was divided into nobility (elders and priests) and lay (scribes) factions. This continued into the NT period.

Two further restrictions of the Sanhedrin's (and therefore the elder's) authority occurred in the fifty years prior to Jesus. Under the Roman governor Gabinius (57-55 B.C.) Palestine was divided into five synedria, and for ten years the Sanhedrin had jurisdiction over only the three in Judea, approximately one-third of its former territory. The old lines of authority were reinstated under Hyrcanus II (47 B.C.), but that too was short-lived, for *Herod the Great began his reign by executing forty-five members of the Sanhedrin who had supported Antigonus (Josephus, Ant. 15.1.2) and forcing the nobility to submit. During this time, however, the elders continued to serve as heads of influential families and as community leaders. Moreover, the "council of elders" represented the nation in its dealings with the Greeks and Romans and also performed judicial functions at home. At Qumran there was no apparent office, but elders as the heads of families were second in order to the priests in both judicial and halakic authority, and a council of twelve lay and three priestly members ruled the community (see Dead Sea Scrolls).

3. The Judaism of Jesus' Day.

In the first century A.D. the presbyteroi primarily served a community function. Their duties are described in the mishnaic tractate Sanhedrin, although the extent to which it depicts pre-A.D. 70 Judaism is greatly debated. Both in Judea and in Diaspora communities there appears to have been a council of seven elders that functioned primarily at the civic level, and an executive committee of three archontes ("rulers")—the head of the synagogue, the minister of the congregation and the collector of alms—that functioned mainly at the synagogue level (cf. Jdt 6:15-17; 7:9-10). However, there was no clear distinction between civic and religious life in Jewish communities, and the two groups together controlled the daily life of the Jewish people. In cosmopolitan cities, with a mixed population and special synagogues (e.g., Rome), there may have been separate councils of elders for synagogue and community, but in the average Jewish community the same group of elders ruled over both civic and synagogue affairs, and often the archontes were chosen from among the elders.

The presbyteroi exercised full jurisdiction over civic as well as religious life. They decided what type of disciplinary action was appropriate, whether flogging or, most serious of all, the ban or excommunication. Although the elders did not control synagogue worship (that was under the jurisdiction of the archontes), they did take the seats of honor and officially enforced the law. They also administered both village and synagogue affairs, making decisions in a wide variety of situations. Often the president of the synagogue was an elder, and the office went beyond the hereditary leaders of the noble families to encompass elected lay leaders of the community (probably chosen annually).

Corresponding to the local councils was the supreme Gerousia, or Sanhedrin, in Jerusalem. There the term "elder" was used generally to describe all the members (cf. the presbyterion, "council of the elders," in Lk 22:66; Acts 22:5) or specifically to refer to the lay leaders who constituted the third and least influential group (with the Sadducees and Pharisees) in the Sanhedrin, the lay nobility. A third use of the term denotes the scribes as interpreters of the law (cf. the "tradition of the elders" in Mk 7:3, 5 par.). This latter use became predominant in the post-A.D. 70 period, when it was used for the scribal scholars who developed the Tannaitic tradition.

4. The Emphases of the Evangelists.

Presbyteros as a title in the Gospels occurs only in the passion *predictions and in the *passion narratives themselves. It always (apart from Lk 7:3, in which the "elders" of a synagogue attest to the piety of a centurion) refers to the lay members of the Sanhedrin, and in every case except the first passion prediction (Mk 8:31 par., where it may stress their juridical function) it occurs after mention of the "chief priests." This probably is due to the greater influence of the priestly members in the Sanhedrin.

Mark retains the complete list of "chief priests, elders, scribes" that constituted the Sanhedrin, with this order in Mark 14:53; 15:1 (so linking the elders with the priestly faction, the normal political alignment), but with the "scribes" named before the elders in Mark 11:27; 14:43 (probably due to the greater political influence of the scribes in the first century A.D.).

Matthew shows a greater interest in the involvement of "the elders" in the passion events (eleven references in contrast with five in Mark, three in Luke, none in John), while omitting reference to "the scribes" except at Matthew 16:21; 26:57; 27:41. While this redaction does not indicate less interest in critiquing the scribes (see Mt 23:1-39), it may indicate that Matthew understands the elders to provide a better pairing with the chief priests for representing both the priestly and lay leadership of the Jewish people. The additional descriptor "of the people" (tou laou) is added to presbyteroi four times by Matthew (Mt 21:23; 26:3, 47; 27:1). The addition may be meant to depict the elders more generally as representatives of the nation as a whole (France, 798) (though see Mt 2:4 for its use with the chief priests and scribes). The same phrase occurs in the OT, and in LXX Isaiah 3:14 it describes God's judgment against "the elders of the people and their leaders" for treating unjustly God's people. It may be that Matthew uses the phrase to indicate the responsibility that the elders were to have over Israel and an indictment of their lack of true leadership (cf. Mt 9:36; 23:4, 15).

Luke retains the complete list in Luke 9:22 (// Mk 8:31); Luke 20:1 (// Mk 11:27), but in Luke 22:66 (// Mk 15:1) the list is replaced with "the council of the elders of the people" (cf. Acts 22:5). Luke's interest is not so much in the distinct groups as in the leaders of Israel as a whole.

John shows no interest in the elders and mentions only the "chief priests and Pharisees" (Jn 18:3; cf. "chief priests and officers" in Jn 19:6). Elsewhere he uses only the plural "they" for the Sanhedrin (cf. Jn 18:28-31) or refers even more generally to "the Jews" (Jn 18:38; 19:14).

See also PHARISEES; PRIESTS AND PRIESTHOOD; SADDUCEES; SANHEDRIN; SCRIBES.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. S. Crawford, "Mothers, Sisters, and Elders: Titles for Women in Second Temple Jewish and Early Christian Communities," Dead Sea Scrolls as Background to Postbiblical Judaism and Early Christianity: Papers from an International Conference at St. Andrews in 2001, ed. J. R. Davila (STDJ 46; Leiden: E. J. Brill; 2003) 177-91; E. Ferguson, Backgrounds of Early Christianity (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1987); R. T. France, The Gospel of Matthew (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2007); A. E. Harvey, "Elders," JTS 25 (1974) 318-32; B. Reicke, "The Constitution of the Primitive Church in the Light of Jewish Documents," in The Scrolls and the New Testament, ed. K. Stendahl (New York: Harper, 1957) 143-56; S. Safrai, "Jewish Self-Government," in The Jewish People in the First Century: Historical Geography, Political History, Social, Cultural, and Religious Life and Institutions, ed. S. Safrai and M. Stern (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1974) 377-419; E. Schürer, The History of the Jewish People in the Age of Jesus Christ (175 B.C.-A.D. 135), rev. and ed. G. Vermes and F. Millar (3 vols.; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1973-1979) 2, §§23, 27; E. Schweizer, Church Order in the New Testament, trans. F. Clarke (London: SCM, 1961).

G. R. Osborne and J. K. Brown

ELIJAH AND ELISHA

Elijah and Elisha, whose prophetic careers are narrated in 1-2 Kings, appear in the NT in a variety of ways. Although Elisha is referred to only once, there are many references to Elijah in all four Gospels. There are also numerous passages that allude to or resemble events in the careers of Elijah and Elisha. As in Second Temple Jewish literature, Elijah is far more prominent than Elisha for at least two reasons. First, Elijah did not die but ascended, and Malachi predicted that Elijah would return as the messenger going before Yahweh and bringing restoration. Second, Elijah was viewed as the prophet par excellence. Jesus identifies *John the Baptist with Elijah, while Jesus is depicted as being like Elijah and Elisha as a prophet who performs mighty deeds.

1. Elijah and Elisha in the Old Testament and Second Temple Literature
2. Matthew
3. Mark
4. Luke
5. John

1. Elijah and Elisha in the Old Testament and Second Temple Literature.

1.1. Elijah and Elisha in the Old Testament. The OT narrative of Elijah and Elisha begins in 1 Kings 19 and ends in 2 Kings 13. Elijah suddenly appears in the narrative, challenging King Ahab's behavior, while Elisha was selected by Elijah to be his successor (2 Kings 19:16-21). These two prophets are distinctive within the OT Historical Books because both preach and perform mighty deeds, such as healing and preventing or obtaining rain from God. Isaiah also appears in 2 Kings 19—20; 2 Chronicles 32, but his role is primarily to speak prophetically. As such, in the Gospels Elijah and Elisha provide models of prophets who preach and perform mighty deeds of God. Elijah also figures in the book of Malachi, where it is predicted that Elijah would come before the great and terrible day of Yahweh (Mal 4:5-6). Elijah will come and bring restoration. He is usually associated with the messenger in Malachi 3:1.

1.2. Elijah and Elisha in Second Temple Jewish Literature. The prediction about Elijah's coming before the day of Yahweh, and the fact that he is recorded in 2 Kings 2 as ascending to heaven without ever dying, led to much speculation during the Second Temple period. Sirach 48, in its description of the ministries of Elijah and Elisha, points to Elijah's role as the one who would turn away wrath before the day of Yahweh and bring restoration between father and son as well as the tribes of Jacob (Sir 48:10-11). Like the Greek translation of Malachi, Sirach expands the role of Elijah from only reconciling fathers and sons to a more general restoration within Israel (Bauckham, 441). Elijah was far more prominent in Second Temple literature than Elisha, but Josephus, in his Jewish Antiquities, downplayed Elijah, who was a popular hero and prototype of the zealots and made Elisha more prominent as a prophet whose deeds were "glorious" (Josephus, Ant. 9.46). Josephus omits gory events from Elisha's life and portrays him as a "gentler prophet" (Feldman, 26). Pseudo-Philo refers to Malachi 4:6 (MT 3:24) and speaks of the restoration that Elijah is to bring as happening through restoration of the dead to each other through resurrection (L.A.B. 23:13). The interpretation of Malachi in Pseudo-Philo "is likely the source of the tradition, found in later rabbinic literature, that 'the resurrection of the dead comes through Elijah' (b. Sot. 49b)" (Bauckham, 443).

2. Matthew.

The Gospels of Matthew and Mark have the same number of explicit references to Elijah (nine). Matthew's Gospel, however, has the highest number of explicit connections between John the Baptist and Elijah. Matthew's Gospel explicitly identifies John with Elijah. This can be seen in Jesus' discourse on John the Baptist in Matthew 11:7-19. Jesus identifies John with the messenger promised by Malachi 3:1, who almost certainly is the same individual as Elijah (Mal 4:5-6). This has the added significance of implicitly identifying Jesus with the Lord, who is preceded by the messenger. Then Jesus says of John the Baptist, "If you are willing to receive [this], he is Elijah who is going to come" (Mt 11:14). This serves to validate John the Baptist and his ministry, which, given John's claims about Jesus, in turn validates Jesus and his ministry. Elijah has prepared the way of the Lord. Jesus' identification of John with Elijah implies that the forerunner has come and fulfilled his task, implying the day of the Lord is now here. This has "startling Christological implications," since accepting that John the Baptist is Elijah is to "embrace a whole package of eschatological fulfillment in Jesus," for which most of those listening to Jesus were not ready (France, 432). All three Synoptic Gospels narrate Jesus' *transfiguration, but Matthew is the only evangelist who makes an explicit link at this point between John the Baptist and Elijah (Mt 17:13) in the conversation that Jesus had with the disciples on the way down the mountain, while Luke contains no details of this conversation (Lk 9:36).

3. Mark.

The connections between Elijah and John the Baptist are more implicit in Mark's Gospel. For example, in the opening verses, Mark combines Isaiah 40:3 and Malachi 3:1 as a way of explaining who John the Baptist is. John is both a messenger who proclaims the Isaianic new exodus through Jesus and the messenger of Malachi, who generally is identified with Elijah. This identification likely suggests that if John is the messenger of Malachi who precedes Yahweh, then Jesus should be identified with Yahweh. Furthermore, since Malachi asserts that those who refuse to turn to God in *repentance will be judged, Mark's quotation implies that John's message must be heeded. Otherwise, Yahweh (Jesus) will come to his temple and bring judgment. The connection between John the Baptist and Elijah is strengthened by Mark (Mk 1:6; cf. Mt 3:4), who makes reference to the clothing worn by John the Baptist, stating that it was made of camel's hair and that John wore a leather belt around his waist. It is quite likely that this piece of information is reported in order to show that John stands in continuity with the prophets of old, especially Elijah, as the description of Elijah's clothing is quite similar (2 Kings 1:8). This continuity provides validation for John's message and actions, including his message about Jesus.

Mark's account of the posttransfiguration discussion of Jesus and his disciples introduces exegetical questions. Mark 9:12 refers to Elijah as coming and restoring all things, which likely is a reference to the Jewish belief that Elijah would bring general eschatological restoration (Bauckham, 441). The order of Elijah and then the *Son of Man suffering and rising is interesting in that no extant Second Temple Jewish text states a chronological order to the coming of Elijah and the Davidic Messiah. The interpretation of "restoration" in Malachi 4:6 offered by Pseudo-Philo could also reflect the viewpoint of the disciples in expecting Elijah to come before the *resurrection of the Son of Man.

There is no significant literary evidence of a Jewish belief that Elijah would come before the Messiah, but the fact that this connection seems to be implied in the Gospels suggests that such a view was current among some Jews in the first century A.D. Since the Messiah was expected to reign a long time, and Elijah's work of restoration needed to be accomplished first, it may also be that this order—Elijah first, Messiah second—was a well-known idea. Jesus' statement about Elijah suffering "as it is written about him" suggests further that Jesus includes in his understanding of the eschatological Elijah the opposition and rejection that Elijah experienced during his own lifetime and the general experience of prophets in the Scriptures of Israel, rather than Mark 9:13 pointing to some prophecy that John the Baptist fulfilled.

Although there are no explicit references to Elisha in Mark, W. Roth has suggested that just as the figure of Elijah was the paradigm used by Mark to describe John the Baptist, so Mark presents John's "successor," Jesus, based upon the Elisha paradigm. The miracles performed by Jesus, evaluated in Mark 7:37, are "more powerful and beneficial" and more numerous than those of Elisha (Roth, 7).

4. Luke.

4.1. Explicit References to Elijah and Elisha.

Most of the references to Elijah in Luke's Gospel refer to Elijah himself or the belief that Jesus is Elijah. Luke connects John the Baptist with Elijah, beginning with the annunciation of John's birth. Malachi 3:1; 4:6 are used in Gabriel's describing of John in terms of Elijah (Lk 1:16-17). His words are not prophecies for John to fulfill but rather are characterizations that describe what his ministry will be like. They assert not that John is Elijah but rather that John will be Elijah-like, with a similar mission. Elsewhere in Luke's narrative Scripture is employed to identify John the Baptist with the messenger of Malachi, thus implicitly identifying him with Elijah. Zechariah (Lk 1:76) makes this connection at John's birth, and Jesus later makes this connection when extolling John the Baptist (Lk 7:27). This provides legitimization of John as a prophet who goes before the Lord (Jesus).

Jesus' sermon in the synagogue in Nazareth uses Elijah and Elisha as examples of prophets who aided Gentiles while not aiding Israelites. This may suggest that God has rejected *Israel and hints at a future ministry among the *Gentiles for Jesus' followers. Since the original focus of Elijah being sent to the widow in 1 Kings 17 was for her to feed him, thus showing an Israelite and Gentile eating together, it may be that Luke's interest here is in Jewish-Gentile relations, with correspondences between Elijah and the widow and Jews and Gentiles eating together in Acts 10—11 and between Elisha and Naaman and Peter and Cornelius in Acts 10. Thus, the examples of Elijah and Elisha point not to the rejection of Israel but rather to "Jewish-Gentile reconciliation" (Crockett, 183). C. A. Evans has suggested that Jesus' use of the Elijah/Elisha narrative here focuses on election (Evans, 74), challenging the common view that Gentiles and less pious Jews would be rejected by God, for Jesus taught that it was outsiders and outcasts who would experience *salvation, in light of Isaiah 61:1-2. These elements appear in pericopes that allude to the Elijah/Elisha narrative, such as Luke 7:1-10. The negative reaction of the crowd to Jesus' reference to Elijah and Elisha possibly stems from Jesus "implicitly comparing the Nazarenes with the apostatized public of Elijah's and Elisha's day" (Poirier, 362). While one or more of these views may reflect an aspect of Jesus' reference to Elijah and Elisha, given that Elijah is used to characterize John the Baptist's ministry in Luke 1:17, J. B. Green probably is correct that Luke is primarily concerned with the "characterization of Jesus' identity and mission" (Green, 218n54). Luke 4:27 contains the only NT reference to Elisha. He serves as a second example of a prophet being sent to a non-Israelite to help her.

Unlike Jesus' disciples, the crowds identified Jesus as possibly being Elijah (Lk 9:7-8, 19-20; cf. Mt 16:14-16; Mk 6:14-15; 8:27-29). The report of these ideas focuses on characterizing Jesus as a prophet like Elijah (and not Elijah redivivus [contra Fitzmyer]), and the mention of John the Baptist likely points to Jesus' future participation in the common fate of prophets, which when tied to Peter's confession, indicates that "Jesus' messiahship involves his suffering the fate of the prophets" (Yamasaki, 133).

4.2. Use of Imagery from the Elijah/Elisha Narratives. Luke, more so than the other evangelists, uses imagery from the stories of Elijah and Elisha to characterize Jesus as being like these great prophets of old. Luke 7:11-17 may be intended to reflect elements of Elisha's raising of a dead son (2 Kings 4:32-37). Luke 7:1-10, which tells of the healing of a centurion's servant, seems to be narrated in light of 1 Kings 17:8-16. Given the similarity in vocabulary and imagery between the LXX of 1 Kings 19:19-21, in which Elisha is symbolically "called" to his prophetic ministry, and Luke 9:61-62, the former story may have influenced Luke's narration of this encounter between Jesus and a would-be follower. After the refusal of a Samaritan village to welcome Jesus during his journey to Jerusalem, James and John ask Jesus if he would like them to call down fire from heaven to consume the villagers (Lk 9:54). This is an allusion to 2 Kings 1:10, 12, 14, in which Elijah caused fire to consume soldiers of the king who had come to seize him. Some Greek manuscripts even add to Luke 9:54 the statement "as also Elijah did" in order to make the allusion clearer, though this certainly is not part of the original text. Given the reference to Samaria in 2 Kings 1:3 and the town mentioned in Luke 9:52, this allusion is even more certain. The story of Eli-jah's ascension likely served as a model for describing Jesus' ascension in Luke 24:50-53.

According to T. Brodie, the Elijah/Elisha narrative served as a large-scale model for the Gospels as "prophetic biography." Brodie asserts that the Elijah/Elisha narrative provides the overall structure for Luke-Acts, seen in the presence of two balanced parts with an ascension to heaven at the center (Brodie, 83). Yet, although some of the incidents in Luke's Gospel do seem similar to those in the Elijah/Elisha narrative, and these likely influenced the way that Luke told his story, Brodie's view overlooks too many differences between Luke-Acts and 1-2 Kings to be convincing on the larger scale.

5. John.

Compared to the Synoptics, John's Gospel says comparatively little about John the Baptist or Elijah. In fact, the only references to Elijah (Jn 1:21, 25) are part of a discussion with John the Baptist in which he explicitly denies being Elijah. It has been suggested that this denial reflects the evangelist's desire to show the superiority of Jesus to John the Baptist (cf. Jn 1:8, 15), and connecting John the Baptist with Elijah would make John more prominent. Additionally, John's Gospel may be seeking to respond to the existence of a cult for John the Baptist (seen perhaps in Acts 19:1-5). This argument, however, is based on what the text does not say, and furthermore, there is no evidence that John the Baptist was held by his later followers to be Elijah. In any case, John's Gospel does not contain the pericopes in the Synoptics in which John is connected to Elijah (e.g., the transfiguration). John's Gospel and the Synoptics do agree in presenting John the Baptist as the voice crying in the wilderness from Isaiah 40:3 (Mt 3:3; Mk 1:3; Jn 1:23), however, though this may be nothing more than the Fourth Gospel's way of pointing to Jesus' identity, such that John the Baptist's identity does not matter or that the most important attribute of John is that he was a witness to Jesus. It is Jesus who connects Elijah and John the Baptist in the Synoptics, and John the Baptist's denial is consistent with his humble stance vis-à-vis Jesus (Jn 1:26-27; 3:25-30). John's Gospel need not be understood to be fighting against the view that John the Baptist was Elijah (Öhler 1999).

See also JOHN THE BAPTIST; TRANSFIGURATION.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. D. C. Allison, "Elijah Must Come First," JBL 103 (1984) 256-58; C. K. Barrett, The Gospel According to St. John: An Introduction with Commentary and Notes on the Greek Text (2nd ed.;

Philadelphia: Westminster, 1978); R. Bauckham, "The Restoration of Israel in Luke-Acts," in Restoration: Old Testament, Jewish, and Christian Perspectives, ed. J. M. Scott (JSJSup 72; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2001) 435-87; T. Brodie, The Crucial Bridge: The Elijah-Elisha Narrative as an Interpretive Synthesis of Genesis-Kings and a Literary Model for the Gospels (Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1999); L. C. Crockett, "Luke 4:25-27 and Jewish-Gentile Relations in Luke-Acts," JBL (1969) 177-83; M. de Jonge, "John the Baptist and Elijah in the Fourth Gospel," in The Conversation Continues: Studies in Paul and John in Honor of J. Louis Martyn, ed. R. T. Fortna and B. R. Gaventa (Nashville: Abingdon, 1990); C. A. Evans, "The Function of the Elijah/Elisha Narratives in Luke's Ethic of Election," in Luke and Scripture: The Function of Sacred Tradition in Luke-Acts (Eugene, OR: Wipf & Stock, 2001) 70-83; M. M. Faierstein, "Why Do the Scribes Say That Elijah Must Come First?" JBL 100 (1981) 75-86; L. Feldman, "Josephus' Portrait of Elijah," NovT 36 (1994) 1-28; J. A. Fitzmyer, The Gospel According to Luke I-IX: A New Translation with Introduction and Commentary (AB 28; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1981); idem, "More About Elijah Coming First," JBL 104 (1985) 295-96; R. T. France, The Gospel of Matthew (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2007); J. B. Green, The Gospel of Luke (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1997); R. Horsley, "Like One of the Prophets of Old: Two Types of Popular Prophets at the Time of Jesus," CBQ 42 (1985) 435-63; M. Öhler, Elia im Neuen Testament: Untersuchungen zur Bedeutung des alttestamentlichen Propheten im frühen Christentum (BZNW 88; Berlin: de Gruyter, 1997); idem, "The Expectation of Elijah and the Presence of the Kingdom of God," JBL 118 (1999) 461-76; J. C. Poirier, "Jesus as an Elijahic Figure in Luke 4:16-30," CBQ 69 (2007) 349-63; W. Roth, Hebrew Gospel: Cracking the Code of Mark (Oak Park, IL: Meyer Stone Books, 1988); W. Wink, John the Baptist in the Gospel Tradition (SNTSMS 7; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1968); G. Yamasaki, John the Baptist in Life and Death: Audience-Oriented Criticism of Matthew's Narrative (JSNTSup 167; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1998). K. Litwak

ELISHA. See ELIJAH AND ELISHA.

EMBARRASSMENT, CRITERIA OF. See CRITERIA OF AUTHENTICITY.

EMMAUS. See ARCHEOLOGY AND GEOGRAPHY.

EMPIRE, ROMAN. See ETHICS OF JESUS; ROME.

ESCHATOLOGY

The term eschatology derives from the two Greek words eschatos ("end") and logos ("word"); it refers, accordingly, to discourse that envisions the end of the present order. Early Jewish and Christian texts attest to the widespread belief that God was about to intervene decisively in human history, meting out judgment and salvation and bringing the present era of strife and evil to a close. Eschatological language and imagery pervade the Gospels, and, according to many scholars, eschatological expectation provides the backdrop against which Jesus' ministry must be viewed.

1. The Hebrew Bible and Second Temple Judaism
2. The Historical Jesus
3. The Synoptic Tradition
4. The Gospel of John
5. Conclusion

1. The Hebrew Bible and Second Temple Judaism.

Many human societies develop some notion of a coming new age, an age often conceived in utopian terms and often born out of deep crisis (Allison 1998). But it was Israel's particular experience of God's promises and their not-yet-complete fulfillment that provided the specific contours of the eschatological expectation of the early Jesus movement.

1.1. Prophetic Eschatology. The belief that God had acted and continued to act in history on Israel's behalf, a conception frequently referred to as Heilsgeschichte ("salvation history"), was foundational to Israelite Yahweh worship. The exodus event, in particular, often was interpreted as evidence that God had chosen Israel for a unique covenant relationship—that God had saved Israel in the past and would continue to save Israel, if only Israel remained faithful (Ex 13:3-22; Deut 4:37-40; 26:5-10; Ps 114).

Thus, the Babylonian exile precipitated a crisis of faith. God's people had lost possession of the land in which God had promised they would dwell forever (Gen 13:14-17; Josh 14:9). The Davidic monarchy, to which God had promised never-ending dominion (2 Sam 7:4-16), had been stripped of its rule. The very temple of God, which was supposed to have been inviolable (Pss 46; 48; cf. Jer 7:1-15), had been destroyed. Not coincidentally, it was these apparently unfulfilled divine promises that became the subjects of later eschatological speculation. God's promises had not been broken, later authors would insist; rather, their fulfillment had been deferred to the future (Mowinckel, 133-49).

The movement toward eschatological interpretation of God's covenant promises is first evident in the exilic prophets. Although Jeremiah, Ezekiel and Second Isaiah still imagine a concrete, political restoration of God's people, they describe this restoration in terms that emphasize its discontinuity with the present age. Second Isaiah (Is 40–55), in particular, uses highly symbolic language to describe Israel's eventual restoration (Is 40:3–5; 45:14; 51:3–6, 9–11), language so exalted that one wonders if any concrete return from exile could have satisfied the longings that it evoked. Such "prophetic eschatology" (Hanson, 11) provided a rich store of imagery that later writers would use to describe the birth of a new age.

When the return did occur, it certainly did not usher in the era of prosperity, piety and peace that Second Isaiah had described. Hence, the postexilic prophets continue to express hope for a more thorough re-creation and a more thorough fulfillment of God's promises (Hanson). Third Isaiah (Is 56–66) awaits a dramatic intrusion of the coming age into the disappointing present: "I am about to create new heavens and a new earth; the former things shall not be remembered or come to mind" (Is 65:17 NRSV). And Zechariah, in particular, begins to use such cosmic imagery and symbolism as would come to be associated with *apocalyptic literature.

1.2. Apocalyptic Eschatology. A considerable number of texts from the Hellenistic period attest to a new development in Jewish eschatological expectation: the birth of apocalyptic eschatology (Collins; Carey). Within the OT canon, the book of Daniel is the clearest representative of this new mode of thought and its primary literary manifestation, the "apocalypse" (cf., in the OT Pseudepigrapha, 1 Enoch; 4 Ezra; 2 Baruch; and in the NT, Revelation). Notably, it is this literature that begins to consider the eschatological fate of the individual, and it is in this period that we first encounter clear reference to *resurrection (Dan 12:1–3, 13; 2 Macc 7).

Although there is much diversity among these texts, a number of shared features characterize their eschatological perspective. Apocalyptic eschatology insists upon stark discontinuity between the present sinful age and the perfect world to come. God's beleaguered people are assured that God will act quickly to judge the wicked and provide for the salvation of the righteous and the restoration of Zion. Despite a cosmic catastrophe, God's people will be preserved, and God will usher in a new era of *peace. Israel's history often is presented as an orderly series of distinct periods, which appears to be a way of asserting God's continued sovereignty over its course:

God remains in control, and the "end" will come when the divinely appointed time is fulfilled.

1.3. The Roman Period. The Gospel narratives set the story of Jesus against a backdrop of widespread eschatological expectation (Mk 9:11; 12:35; Lk 2:25–26; Jn 1:45), and other sources confirm that at least some of Jesus' contemporaries expected God soon to bring judgment and restoration (1 En. 37–71; Pss. Sol. 17–18) (see Exile and Restoration). Just as Daniel's apocalypticism appears to constitute a response to the imposition of Hellenistic rule (Portier-Young), so the apocalypticism of this period is often viewed as symbolic resistance to Roman domination (Horsley).

The *Dead Sea Scrolls are a particularly important source for understanding the range of eschatological beliefs current in the late Second Temple period (Reitz; Hogeterp). Their authors envisage the coming of various messianic agents (Xeravits), a great tribulation described as "birth pangs" (1QH^a XI, 7–37), the divine judgment of the wicked and the salvation of the righteous (1QS IV, 4–19) and a final eschatological battle in which evil is defeated (1QM). Each of these motifs finds expression in the Gospels as well.

2. The Historical Jesus.

There is no question that the Jesus of the Gospels frequently uses apocalyptic language and imagery. There has been debate, however, regarding whether this material derives from Jesus himself or from the apocalypticism of the early church, as well as dispute regarding how such language should be interpreted. Indeed, questions surrounding Jesus' eschatology, intertwined as they are with the struggle to interpret Jesus' proclamation of the *kingdom of God, have long played a central role in the study of the historical Jesus.

2.1. Imminent Eschatology. A. Schweitzer concluded his classic The Quest of the Historical Jesus (German original, 1906) by posing a stark alternative. Repudiating portraits of Jesus as a moral teacher, Schweitzer argued that one had either to dismiss altogether the historicity of Jesus' messianic claim ("thoroughgoing skepticism") or to accept the fact that Jesus was proclaiming the imminent end of the world ("thoroughgoing eschatology"). Schweitzer himself, following J. Weiss, advocated the latter option: Jesus proclaimed his own imminent "parousia" as the Son of Man, expecting that he himself would be supernaturally transformed and revealed as the messianic agent who would bring history to its close (cf. Mk 8:38–9:1; 13:24–30; 14:26).

Schweitzer's insistence that apocalyptic eschatology provides the background and structure of Jesus' proclamation has been very influential. Hence, B. Ehrman claims to speak for a scholarly consensus: "Jesus thought that the history of the world would come to a screeching halt, that God would intervene in the affairs of this planet, overthrow the forces of evil in a cosmic act of judgment, and establish his utopian Kingdom here on earth. And this was to happen within Jesus' own generation" (Ehrman, 3).

Perhaps the most significant articulation of this viewpoint in recent decades is that of D. C. Allison, who has used crosscultural study of millenarian groups to provide perspective on the apocalypticism of the early Jesus movement (Allison 1998). Like many millenarian prophets, Allison argues, Jesus proclaimed the reversal of the present social and political order. His movement was at once nativistic and innovative, returning to but reinterpreting Israel's traditions. Further, Allison asserts that such declining eschatological fervor as was evident already by the end of the first century A.D. is typical of aging millenarian movements.

E. P. Sanders also interprets Jesus' eschatological language as describing an imminent expectation, but he insists that what Jesus proclaimed was not the coming of a cosmic catastrophe followed by the appearance of a heavenly kingdom, but rather the miraculous yet earthly restoration and vindication of the nation of *Israel by God. Such "restoration eschatology," Sanders argues, is in keeping with the hopes of his contemporaries, who, like Jesus, anticipated the destruction and renewal of the temple (cf. Mk 14:58) and the restoration of the twelve tribes of Israel (cf. Mt 19:28).

2.2. Realized Eschatology. Schweitzer's interpretive model has been challenged on two main fronts. The first is the question of timing: Not all are convinced that Jesus' eschatological sayings—at least, those that can confidently be considered authentic—describe an imminent event. The second concerns the meaning of apocalyptic discourse: Does this language intend to describe the literal "end of the world," or, instead, transformation within the bounds of history (see Caird, 243-71; Miller)? And, if the latter, precisely what sort of transformation is anticipated?

C. H. Dodd famously opposed the "imminent eschatology" model on both these fronts, offering an alternative interpretation of Jesus' teaching as "realized eschatology." For Dodd, Jesus proclaimed the "eschatological" kingdom of God as a present fact—"God exercising His kingly rule among men" (Dodd, 56). With Jesus himself God's reign had come, and Jesus' ministry of healing and deliverance bore witness to the fact that the power of Satan had been broken (cf. Mt 11:2-11 // Lk 7:18-30; Mt 12:28 // Lk 11:20). According to Dodd, whereas Jesus' contemporaries expected the kingdom to come only when Israel had repented, Jesus announced that its coming had not waited for but rather served as a summons to *repentance (Dodd, 30).

Like Dodd, R. Bultmann argued that the center of gravity in Jesus' eschatological teaching was the present, not the future. For Bultmann, though, this was not because the kingdom had already been realized; rather, he insisted that it was precisely as a future power that the kingdom determined the present (Bultmann 1958, 51). The purpose of Jesus' teaching was not to orient his followers toward the future, but rather to highlight the significance of the eschatological "now." For each person who hears Jesus' call, Bultmann emphasized, the present becomes the time of decision, the eschatological moment at which each person must choose either for or against the demand of God. Bultmann describes this as a choice between two existential modes, one concerned with oneself, the other with God as the ground of existence. Eschatology, then, describes not a historical but an individual existential reality (Bultmann 1958, 51-52).

Although Bultmann's existential mode of interpretation has generally been discarded, he is not alone in finding the referent of Jesus' eschatological language not in time and history but in religious experience. M. Borg, for example, has suggested that Jesus' eschatological language was in fact mystical, not future-oriented, with the phrase "kingdom of God" functioning as "a symbol for the presence and power of God as known in mystical experience" (Borg, 254).

In a similar vein, but informed by his reading of ancient *Cynicism, J. D. Crossan has countered apocalyptic portraits of Jesus with a wisdom-oriented interpretation of Jesus' eschatological language. According to Crossan, Jesus proclaimed a "sapiential eschatology" that sought to articulate God's present reign. His ministry should be considered eschatological not because of an orientation toward the future, but because it is "world-negating"—that is, it refuses to accept the legitimacy of the present order—and both imagines and enacts an alternative reality.

2.3. Inaugurated Eschatology. One reason why scholars have given such contradictory accounts of Jesus' eschatology is that there is a fundamental tension built into the sources themselves. The Gospels clearly depict Jesus proclaiming a future eschatological event, and just as clearly they portray him using eschatological language to describe a present reality (Perrin, 74-89). Of course, this apparent contradiction can be resolved if one deems only one stream of tradition authentic. A majority of members of the Jesus Seminar, for example, consider many of Jesus' future-eschatological sayings later accretions, and Crossan has argued that while the generic "son of man" sayings (e.g., Mk 2:28; Mt 8:20 // Lk 9:58) originated with Jesus, predictions of an apocalyptic *Son of Man (e.g., Mk 13:26) did not (Crossan, 238-64).

Others, though, have argued for the authenticity of both streams of tradition (though not necessarily each particular saying), insisting that what the Gospels preserve is not a contradiction but rather a conception of the eschaton as a dynamic process—something already inaugurated, but not yet consummated. Thus, J. Jeremias, an early proponent of this interpretation, modified Dodd's position by speaking of eschatology "in process of realization" (Jeremias, 159).

W. Kümmel sought to specify the nature of this process, focusing in particular on Jesus' sayings regarding the "coming" of the kingdom. According to Kümmel, Jesus considered the eschaton already effective in his own person and messianic ministry, though its consummation remained in the near future. Acceptance or rejection of Jesus in the present was an act of eschatological significance, decisive for one's status at the imminent judgment of Jesus as Son of Man. For Kümmel, then, "the essential content of Jesus' preaching about the Kingdom of God is the news of the divine authority of Jesus, who has appeared on earth and is awaited in the last days as the one who effects the divine purpose of mercy" (Kümmel, 155).

G. E. Ladd shared Kümmel's emphasis on the "already but not yet" tension in Jesus' proclamation, but he stressed that Jesus conceived of the eschaton not as a temporal process but as a paradox. The present is not the duration between the beginning of the kingdom's coming and its completion, but rather is a time in which "the eschatological kingdom has itself invaded history in advance, bringing men in the old age of sin and death the blessings of God's rule" (Ladd, 322).

N. T. Wright follows in this tradition. Wright stresses that Jesus' eschatological language is not about the end of the world as such; rather, it refers to "the climax of Israel's history, involving events for which end-of-the-world language is the only set of metaphors adequate to express the significance of what will happen, but resulting in a new and quite different phase within space-time history" (Wright 1996, 208). According to Wright, Jesus considered his own arrival in Jerusalem to be the enactment and embodiment of God's promised return to Zion and believed that he, by his own death and vindication, would bring an end to Israel's ongoing experience of exile (cf. Pitre), not by conquering the power of *Rome, but by defeating the rule of evil itself. With such an interpretation, Wright, unlike Schweitzer or Sanders, intends to leave open the possibility that the victory Jesus promised was in fact accomplished, even if its full "implementation" remained in the future (Wright 1996, 659-60).

3. The Synoptic Tradition.

Since the rise of redaction criticism, the Synoptic Gospels have been viewed not only as sources for uncovering the eschatology of Jesus but also as theological works in their own right that attest to the various forms of eschatological expectation current in early Christian communities.

3.1. The Sayings Source Q. There has been considerable debate concerning the eschatology of the sayings material shared only by Matthew and Luke, material generally attributed to the hypothetical sayings source *Q. There is no doubt that Q, in its reconstructed final form, situates its readers in a present time of crisis that derives its meaning from eschatological realities (Tuckett, 107-63). This tone is set from the outset by the preaching of *John the Baptist, who announces the imminent judgment of the "coming one" (Mt 3:7-12 // Lk 3:7-17). Judgment remains a prominent theme throughout (Lk 10:13-15; 11:31-32; 22:28-30 and par.) and is repeatedly associated with the coming of the Son of Man (Lk 3:16-17; 12:39-40; 17:26-30 and par.), an event that will be as spectacularly disruptive as it is unexpected (Mt 24:26-28 // Lk 17:23-24, 37). Indeed, in Q the threat of judgment is far more pervasive than the promise of eschatological redemption (Kloppenborg 1987b).

Further, Q imbues both Jesus' ministry and the present missionary activity of his followers with eschatological significance: Jesus' exorcisms, which occur by "the finger of God," are explicitly connected with the coming of God's kingdom (Mt 12:27-28 // Lk 11:19-20). And Q's readers are invited to go out into the eschatological harvest (Mt 9:37-38 // Lk 10:2), curing the sick and announcing the presence of God's reign (Mt 10:7 // Lk 10:9). Q's message, then, is that God's kingdom has come, and that fiery judgment will soon fall on those who reject it.

Behind Q's reconstructed final form, however, a number of scholars see a formative compositional layer in which apocalyptic motifs are largely absent. Most influential has been the proposal of J. Kloppenborg, who, on the basis of formal and literary analysis, sought to distinguish multiple compositional strata (Kloppenborg 1987a). Kloppenborg identified a formative layer consisting of six "wisdom speeches" (Q¹) that later was redacted as well as supplemented with additional sayings of Jesus and John (Q²). He assigned the bulk of Q's apocalyptically oriented material to this latter redactional stratum. Although Kloppenborg insisted that his literary-historical study did not provide evidence for relative dating of the various traditions in Q (Kloppenborg 1987a, 244-45), both proponents (Mack) and detractors (Wright 1992, 435-43) have often taken his work to imply that Q¹ essentially preserves Jesus' own sapiential proclamation and Q² the apocalyptic perspective of later followers.

Kloppenborg himself does not deny the presence of futurist eschatology in Q, including Q¹, but he questions whether it is best described as apocalyptic eschatology (Kloppenborg 1987b). Apocalypticism, Kloppenborg argues, typically derives from a sense of dissatisfaction with the present state of the world, a sense of cosmic dislocation or anomie. Q's eschatology does not express such anomie; rather, "instead of the spectre of a topsy-turvy cosmos, Q appeals to the normalcy of biological and social processes" (Kloppenborg 1987b, 297): ordinary agricultural growth (Lk 6:43-45; 13:18-19 and par.) and pedestrian household life (Lk 6:47-49; 11:11-13 and par.). What Q's eschatology effects, argues Kloppenborg, is the subversion of conventional kinship structures and societal norms (e.g., Lk 9:57-60; 10:13-15; 12:51-53 and par.). In other words, eschatology remains in the service of Q's sapiential emphases.

M. Sato is among those who remain unpersuaded by stratigraphic hypotheses. Moreover, he posits precisely the inverse relationship between *wisdom sayings and announcements of coming judgment as that suggested by Kloppenborg. Sapiential observations regarding creation, Sato argues, function to reinforce Q's prophetic proclamation of coming doom. For Sato, then, the wisdom material in Q is integrated into its prophetic-eschatological stance and thus is compatible with its expectation of a future eschaton that has already begun.

3.2. The Gospel of Mark. Mark's Gospel begins with a scriptural citation applied to the work of John the Baptist—"Prepare the way of the Lord" (Mk 1:2-3)—a good indication that Mark understands the events that he narrates as God's eschatological visitation. Indeed, when Mark's Jesus first emerges from the wilderness, he announces, "The time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of God has drawn near" (Mk 1:15). The parables of Mark 4 use agricultural metaphors to describe the mysterious but unstoppable growth of this kingdom, the seeds of which have already been planted. But only those with ears to hear, those who have been given the secret of the kingdom, are able to discern the kingdom's presence.

In the narrative time of Mark's Gospel, then, the sowing of the kingdom has already occurred. But what about its "coming in power" (Mk 9:1)? Mark 9:1 has long been read as a prediction, evidently erroneous, that the parousia (cf. Mk 8:38) would occur within a generation of Jesus—that is, before "some standing here . . . taste death" (cf. Mk 13:30). Others argue, however, that this prediction is fulfilled within the Gospel narrative itself—for example, in the *transfiguration of Jesus by which it is immediately followed (Mk 9:2-8) (Rowe, 134-45)—or that it refers not to a single event but to the more general reality of the "divine government" experienced by those of Mark's readers who are able to perceive God's rule (France).

Mark's appropriation of eschatological symbolism to provide an interpretative context for Jesus' ministry is particularly evident in the apocalyptic discourse of Mark 13. Scholars have long postulated that much of this material derives from a preexisting source (see Beasley-Murray 1993, 1-109). Nevertheless, Mark integrates it into his narrative by constructing numerous parallels between Jesus' apocalyptic discourse and the *passion narrative (e.g., Mk 13:24; 15:33), thereby imbuing Jesus' *death with eschatological significance (Allison 1985, 36-39). But many suggest another function for the symbolism in Mark 13 as well: it provides Mark's readers with an eschatological interpretation of the political upheaval in contemporary Judea (Balabanski, 55-100), an upheaval that is described in the language of the final tribulation: these are the "birth pangs" (Mk 13:8) of the end of the age.

If Mark could correlate the apocalyptic imagery of Mark 13 with both the death of Jesus and with the turmoil of first-century A.D. Judean politics, this suggests that he viewed both as aspects of the great tribulation that was to precipitate the final coming of the Son of Man. For Mark, then, the final days of suffering are already under way. However, Mark refuses to speculate regarding when, precisely, God will bring this tribulation to its end (Mk 13:32); instead, he urges his audience to "keep watch"—that is, to be alert and faithful until the end (Mk 13:34-37; 14:34, 37-38) (Geddert).

3.3. The Gospel of Matthew. Matthew's eschatological perspective retains the basic contours of Mark's, but a few distinctive characteristics are worthy of note. First, Matthew's prophetic fulfillment formula (e.g., Mt 1:22; 2:17) emphasizes that the events of Jesus' life have taken place according to the pre-ordained plan of God. Second, the theme of final judgment is more pronounced in Matthew than in Mark (Sim, 110-28). In part this is due to incorporation of Q sayings (Mt 3:7-12; 7:19; 10:14-15; 11:20-24), but the motif occurs often in Matthew's special material as well (Mt 5:27-30; 22:11-14; 25:31-46). Notably, throughout Matthew's Gospel it is one's deeds that constitute the criterion for judgment (Mt 12:33-37; 25:31-46; cf. Mt 11:19). Third, Matthew's report of the saints' opened graves (Mt 27:52-53) interprets Jesus' resurrection as an eschatological event associated with the widely expected general resurrection (Sim, 110-14).

Finally, Matthew provides a more systematic account than either Mark or Q of "the parousia of the Son of Man," and he, indeed, is the only evangelist to use this phrase (Mt 24:3, 27, 37, 39). A consistent schema occurs throughout the Gospel, both in the extended apocalyptic discourse of Matthew 24-25 and elsewhere in Matthew's narrative (Mt 16:27-28; cf. Mt 19:28). What Matthew envisages is particularly clear from the interpretation that he provides of the parable of the wheat and the tares (Mt 13:36-43) (see Sim, 75-87). By means of his earthly ministry, Jesus the Son of Man sowed the "children of the kingdom"; meanwhile, the evil one has sown his own wicked children. For now, the wicked and the righteous dwell together on earth, but the harvest, the "end of the age," is coming, and then the Son of Man will send his angels to judge the wicked and reward the righteous. The wicked will be punished with fire, and the righteous will be made to "shine like the sun in the kingdom of their Father" (cf. Mt 25:41, 46).

In keeping with an increasing focus in current scholarship on apocalypticism as a mode of resistance, a number of recent interpreters have argued that what Matthew's eschatological imagery in fact envisages is the ultimate defeat of the Roman Empire and the vindication of God's oppressed people (Carter; Riches and Sim). It is Rome, these scholars assert, that is the chief earthly manifestation of Satan's dominion (Mt 4:8-10), and Rome's armies that will be defeated in the final eschatological battle (Mt 24:15-31).

3.4. Luke and Acts. The role of eschatology in Luke and Acts has been the subject of considerable discussion since the publication in 1954 of H. Conzelmann's Die Mitte der Zeit ("The Middle of Time"; ET, The Theology of St. Luke), in which he argued that Luke muted the urgent eschatological expectation of his predecessors by transferring the end of history to the distant future. According to Conzelmann, Luke conceived of Jesus' ministry not as the end of time, but as the middle, preceded by the epoch of Israel and the prophets and followed by the age of church (cf. Lk 16:16). By attributing a positive significance to the church's historical existence—by making it part of God's plan of "salvation history"—Luke was able to deal with the crisis of faith caused by the "delay of the parousia" (see Acts 1:6-8).

It is now generally agreed that Conzelmann's schematization is overly rigid, and that his opposition of eschatological fervor and salvation history is exaggerated (Bovon, 1-85, 520-24). Nevertheless, there are numerous indications that Luke sought to refute the notion that since the expected eschaton had been delayed, it would not appear at all. To a man who mistakenly expected that "the kingdom of God was about to appear immediately" (Lk 19:11), Luke's Jesus tells a parable about a nobleman who spent an interval in a distant country before returning as king (Lk 19:12-27). Jesus' death, Luke's parable implies, does not inaugurate the end; instead, it initiates a time of waiting during which faithful discipleship is required. Likewise, Luke assures his readers that Jesus did not predict that the end would immediately follow the destruction of the temple (Lk 21:5-9).

Still, eschatological expectation remains an important part of Luke's narrative. The coming of the Son of Man is certain (Lk 9:26-27; 17:20-37; Acts 3:19-21), and the disciples are invited to attend to the signs of his arrival (Lk 12:54-56; 21:28-36). Hence J. Carroll has suggested that Luke's concern with the delay of the parousia does not serve as evidence of waning interest in eschatology, but, on the contrary, attests to Luke's effort to preserve the credibility of imminent expectation in a new historical situation.

Characteristic of Luke is the use of eschatological language to provide an ethical mandate—that is, to highlight the importance of faithfulness in the present age (Lk 12:35-48; 13:23-30; 21:34-36). Resurrection too is presented as an eschatological reward and thus is used to motivate Luke's hearers to do good deeds (Lk 14:14; 20:35).

Finally, Luke, like the other evangelists, uses the language of biblical prophecy to emphasize the decisive significance of Jesus' present ministry (Lk 1:51-55, 68-79; 2:25-32, 38; 4:16-21; 24:44-48). And, in Acts, the coming of the Spirit likewise is presented as the present-eschatological fulfillment of the ancient promises of God (Acts 2:1-21).

4. The Gospel of John.

As one might expect, the Fourth Gospel inhabits a world of eschatological discourse quite separate from that of the Synoptics. Much more than the other evangelists, John emphasizes that eschatological reality is already present in the person of Jesus and in the experience of the Spirit. "Eternal life" in John refers not to a future expectation (cf. Mt 25:46; Mk 10:30; Lk 18:30) but rather to a present reality made available by Jesus: "Truly I say to you, those who hear my teaching and put their faith in the one who sent me have eternal life; they do not come into judgment, but have departed from death into life" (Jn 5:24; cf. Jn 3:15-16, 36; 6:47; 10:28; 17:2-3). Jesus provides the end-time stream of living water (Jn 4:14; 7:37-39; cf. Ezek 47:1-12; Joel 3:18; Zech 13:1; 14:8; Rev 22:1-2); Jesus is the expected bread from heaven (Jn 6:25-40; cf. 2 Bar. 29:8; Rev 2:17); Jesus is the resurrection and the life (Jn 11:25) (see Life, Eternal Life).

This association of the person of Jesus with the eschaton is also evident from John's depiction of Jesus as authoritative judge already in the present (Jn 5:22-24, 27; 9:39) and from his portrayal of Jesus' crucifixion as the judgment of the world (Jn 12:31-33). Moreover, in John the glorification and exaltation of the Son of Man are already accomplished when Jesus is "lifted up" (hypsōō) on the cross (Jn 3:14; 8:28; 12:32, 34; cf. Jn 7:39).

But despite the preponderance of "realized eschatology" in John, there remains an element of future expectation. The "last day," on which Jesus will "raise up" (anistēmi) his followers, still looms (Jn 6:39-40, 44, 54; 11:24). Both doers of good and doers of evil will be raised, the righteous to "the resurrection of life," the wicked to "the resurrection of judgment" (Jn 5:28-29; cf. Jn 12:48). And Jesus promises that he will return having prepared a heavenly place for his followers (Jn 14:3).

These realized and future aspects of John's eschatology appear to be contradictory (see esp. Jn 5:24-29). In short, if Jesus' followers already have eternal life, why must they be raised up on the last day? Bultmann resolved the problem by attributing the Gospel's futurist-eschatological material to a later redactor who sought to reconcile John's perspective with "traditional eschatology" (Bultmann 1971, 261), but his approach, though influential for a time, has generally been discarded (see esp. Frey).

More recently, interpreters have sought, in various ways, to hold in tension both dimensions of John's eschatology. For G. R. Beasley-Murray, the apparent contradiction is resolved when one realizes that in the Fourth Gospel "eschatology is Christology": "To the Son is committed the carrying out of the eternal purpose of the Father; this he has achieved, he is achieving, and he shall achieve eis telos [to the end]" (Beasley-Murray 1999, lxxxvii). Others suggest that the coherence of Johannine eschatology lies in the experience of his readers, who live the "eternal life" of the Spirit in the present, yet know also that believers among them have met with physical death (O'Donnell; Culpepper).

5. Conclusion.

The canonical Gospels display considerable diversity in their eschatological perspectives and provide nothing that resembles systematic teaching concerning the nature or the chronology of God's final intervention. All, however, use eschatological language and imagery to emphasize the transformative nature of Jesus' ministry; all assure their readers of ultimate redemption; and all speak of coming reward and punishment in order to call their readers to faithfulness in the present.

See also APOCALYPTICISM AND APOCALYPTIC TEACHING; EXILE AND RESTORATION; JUDGMENT; KINGDOM OF GOD/HEAVEN; RESURRECTION; SON OF MAN.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. D. C. Allison, The End of the Ages Has Come: An Early Interpretation of the Passion and Resurrection of Jesus (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985); idem, Jesus of Nazareth: Millenarian Prophet (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1998); V. Balabanski, Eschatology in the Making: Mark, Matthew and the Didache (SNTSMS 97; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1997); G. R. Beasley-Murray, Jesus and the Last Days: The Interpretation of the Olivet Discourse (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1993); idem, John (2nd ed.; WBC 36; Nashville: Nelson, 1999); M. J. Borg, Conflict, Holiness and Politics in the Teachings of Jesus (SBEC 5; Lewiston, NY: Mellen, 1984); F. Bovon, Luke the Theologian: Fifty-Five Years of Research (1950-2005) (2nd ed.; Waco, TX: Baylor University Press, 2006); R. Bultmann, Jesus and the Word, trans. L. P. Smith and E. H. Lantero (New York: Scribner, 1958); idem, The Gospel of John: A Commentary (Oxford: Blackwell, 1971); G. B. Caird, The Language and Imagery of the Bible (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1980); G. Carey, Ultimate Things: An Introduction to Jewish and Christian Apocalyptic Literature (St. Louis: Chalice, 2005); J. T. Carroll, Response to the End of History: Eschatology and Situa- tion in Luke-Acts (SBLDS 92; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1988); W. Carter, "Are There Imperial Texts in the Class? Intertextual Eagles and Matthean Eschatology as 'Lights Out' Time for Imperial Rome (Matthew 24:27-31)," JBL 122 (2003) 467-87; J. J. Collins, The Apocalyptic Imagination: An Introduction to Jewish Apocalyptic Literature (2nd ed.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1998); H. Conzelmann, The Theology of St. Luke, trans. G. Buswell (New York: Harper, 1960); J. D. Crossan, The Historical Jesus: The Life of a Mediterranean Jewish Peasant (San Francisco: HarperSan Francisco, 1991); R. A. Culpepper, "Realized Eschatology in the Experience of the Johannine Community," in The Resurrection of Jesus in the Gospel of John, ed. C. R. Koester and R. Bieringer (WUNT 222; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2008); C. H. Dodd, The Parables of the Kingdom (rev. ed.; New York: Scribner, 1961); B. D. Ehrman, Jesus: Apocalyptic Prophet of the New Millennium (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1999); R. T. France, Divine Government: God's Kingship in the Gospel of Mark (London: SPCK, 1990); J. Frey, Die johanneische Eschatologie (3 vols.; WUNT 96, 100, 117; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1997-2000); T. J. Gedder, Watchwords: Mark 13 in Markan Eschatology (JSNTSup 26; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1989); P. D. Hanson, The Dawn of Apocalyptic: The Historical and Sociological Roots of Jewish Apocalyptic Eschatology (rev. ed.; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1979); A. L. A. Hogeterp, Expectations of the End: A Comparative Traditio-Historical Study of Eschatological, Apocalyptic and Messianic Ideas in the Dead Sea Scrolls and the New Testament (STDJ 83; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2009); R. A. Horsley, Revolt of the Scribes: Resistance and Apocalyptic Origins (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2010); J. Jeremias, The Parables of Jesus, trans. S. H. Hooke (London: SCM, 1954); J. S. Kloppenborg, The Formation of Q: Trajectories in Ancient Wisdom Collections (SAC; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1987a); idem, "Symbolic Eschatology and the Apocalypticism of Q," HTR 80 (1987b) 287-306; W. G. Kümmel, Promise and Fulfillment: The Eschatological Message of Jesus, trans. D. M. Barton (SBT 23; London: SCM, 1961); G. E. Ladd, Jesus and the Kingdom: The Eschatology of Biblical Realism (London: SPCK, 1966); B. L. Mack, The Lost Gospel: The Book of Q and Christian Origins (San Francisco: HarperSan Francisco, 1993); R. J. Miller, ed., The Apocalyptic Jesus: A Debate (Santa Rosa, CA: Polebridge, 2001); S. Mowinkel, He That Cometh: The Messiah Concept in the Old Testament and Later Judaism, trans. G. W. Anderson (Oxford: Blackwell, 1959); T. O'Donnell, "Complementary Eschatologies in John 5:19-30," CBQ 70 (2008) 750-65; N. Perrin, The Kingdom of God in the Teaching of Jesus (NTL; London: SCM, 1963); B. Pitre, Jesus, the Tribulation, and the End of Exile: Restoration Eschatology and the Origin of the Atonement (WUNT 2/204; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2005); A. Portier-Young, Apocalypse Against Empire: Theologies of Resistance in Early Judaism (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2011); H. W. M. Reitz, "Reflections on Jesus' Eschatology in Light of Qumran," in Jesus and Archaeology, ed. J. H. Charlesworth (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2006); J. Riches and D. C. Sim, eds., The Gospel of Matthew in Its Roman Imperial Context (JSNTSup 276; London: T & T Clark, 2005); R. D. Rowe, God's Kingdom and God's Son: The Background to Mark's Christology from Concepts of Kingship in the Psalms (AGJU 50; Boston: E. J. Brill, 2002); E. P. Sanders, Jesus and Judaism (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985); M. Sato, "Wisdom Statements in the Sphere of Prophecy," in The Gospel Behind the Gospels: Current Studies in Q, ed. R. A. Piper (NovTSup 75; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1995); A. Schweitzer, The Quest of the Historical Jesus (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2001); D. C. Sim, Apocalyptic Eschatology in the Gospel of Matthew (SNTSMS 88; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1996); C. M. Tuckett, Q and the History of Early Christianity: Studies on Q (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1996); J. G. van der Watt, Eschatology of the New Testament and Some Related Documents (WUNT 2/315; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2011); J. Weiss, Jesus' Proclamation of the Kingdom of God, trans. and ed. R. H. Hiers and D. L. Holland (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1971); N. T. Wright, The New Testament and the People of God (COQG 1; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1992); idem, Jesus and the Victory of God (COQG 2; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1996); G. G. Xeravits, King, Priest, Prophet: Positive Eschatological Protagonists of the Qumran Library (STDJ 47; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2003).

R. S. Schellenberg

ESSENES

The Essenes were a Jewish movement living in various settlements throughout Palestine between the second century B.C. and A.D. 66-70. They are not named in the NT, but it is possible that *John the Baptist was acquainted with some of them living in the Judean wilderness. The Essenes are known from ancient Greek and Latin sources and likely also from the Hebrew and Aramaic *Dead Sea Scrolls. These sources reveal overlapping but distinct practices and beliefs within the Essene movement and significant points of contact with the emerging Jesus movement.

1. Sources from Antiquity
2. Communities of Essenes
3. Essene Practices and Beliefs

1. Sources from Antiquity.

References to sources in this article are conflated for convenience but with the understanding that the Essenes are portrayed and nuanced differently in the various texts, which in turn were influenced by the particular locations and interests of both authors and audiences (Jewish or Roman) and their acquaintanceship with different kinds of Essenes (cf. selective emphases in the four Gospel accounts). The external, Greek and Latin sources are more focused in the external distinctives such as celibacy and the community of goods while revealing little or no knowledge of calendar, messianism and apocalypticism—issues addressed in the DSS. The external sources also betray an intrigue in the more mundane details of body and dress—for example, the wearing of white robes, the avoidance of spitting, and specific procedures for toileting (Josephus, J.W. 2.123, 129, 147-149).

1.1. External, Classical Sources: Philo, Pliny, Josephus. In addition to being mentioned in Hippolytus, Dio Chrysostom, Hegesippus, Hippolytus, Porphyry, Solinun and Epiphanius, the Essenes are treated by a handful of first-century A.D. writers. Philo, an Alexandrian Jewish philosopher, wrote the oldest extant descriptions of the Essenes in That Every Good Person Is Free (Prob. 75-91), Hypothetica (Hypoth. 11.1-18) and On the Contemplative Life, portraying the Essenes in light of his own philosophic and ethical ideals.

For the Roman Pliny, the Essenes were a curiosity, a “throng of refugees” located near Engedi and the “lake of Asphalt” and remarkable for having only palm trees for company and for having “no women” and “no money” (Nat. 5.15.73).

A Jewish historian writing for a Roman audience, *Josephus effectively conformed the Essenes to a Hellenistic ideal in his selective descriptions found mainly in Jewish War (J.W. 2.119-161), Jewish Antiquities (Ant. 18.18-22) and Life (Life 9-12).

1.2. Internal, Sectarian Sources: Dead Sea Scrolls. Although aspects of the Yahad (“community”) in the sectarian DSS have variously been identified with the *Sadducees, Zealots, *Pharisees and even Judeo-Christians, the Yahad most resembles the “Essenes” known from the classical sources.

Some, but not all, from the Yahad settled at Qumran. For example, the Damascus Document (CD) refers to “camps” composed of married people and children, while the descriptions of community life in the Rule of the Community (1QS) suggest a male, celibate community.

2. Communities of Essenes.

2.1. Multiple Groups and Locations. Numbered at more than four thousand (Philo, Prob. 75; Josephus, Ant. 18.20), Essenes were variously reported as living near the Dead Sea (Pliny, Nat. 5.15.73), avoiding cities but living in villages (Philo, Prob. 76), living in many cities and towns (Josephus, J.W. 2.124), and living in “camps” with a minimum of ten members (CD-A XII, 22—XIII, 2; cf. 1QS VI, 1-8). Josephus knew of Jerusalem’s “Gate of the Essenes” (J.W. 5.145).

2.2. Essenes and the Early Jesus Movement. G. Brooke has noted that the branch of educated, urban Qumran Essenes originally from *Jerusalem insisted on priestly purity, protected sacred space and practiced a “hardline” legal interpretation. In contrast, Jesus and his followers were lower middle class, from small towns, and practiced an open *table fellowship. Yet, similar conversational tensions may be found (see 3.2 below). For example, the sectarians were in dispute with a group that they called the “Flattery-Seekers,” “Shoddy-Wall-Builders” or “White-Washers” (CD-A I, 18-19; VIII, 12-13; CD-B XIX, 24-25), most likely the Pharisees (cf. Mt 23:27-28).

2.3. Essenes and Outsiders. In Matthew, “I have not come to bring peace, but a sword” (Mt 10:34) is in tension with “All who take the sword will perish by the sword” (Mt 26:52; cf. Mk 14:43-52; Lk 22:47-53; Jn 18:2-12). The classical sources present the Essenes as “servants of peace” (Josephus, J.W. 2.135), not making weapons of war (Philo, Prob. 78), attending to strangers, and providing them with clothing and other essentials (Josephus, J.W. 2.132). During initiation they swore both to “do no harm to anyone” and to “hate the wicked” (Josephus, J.W. 2.139, 142). Yet, Essenes were said to carry arms for protection against brigands (Josephus, J.W. 2.125), and a certain “John the Essene” presumably carried arms in his role as commander (Josephus, J.W. 2.567; 3.11).

Jesus’ followers were told to love their enemies, blessing instead of cursing them (Mt 5:43-48; Lk 6:27-36). In the Rule of the Community of the Yahad the “children of light” were to hate the “children of darkness” (1QS I, 9-10), cursing those “foreordained to Belial” (1QS II, 4-9), while concealing their hatred for the “Men of the Pit” until the day of vengeance (1QS IX, 17-23). In the meantime, while they awaited the divinely initiated eschatological *judgment (1QM; 1QpHab V, 3-5), they were not to return evil for evil, but instead were to pursue others only for good (1QS X, 17-20). The Aramaic Genesis Apocryphon, on the other hand, was more cautiously optimistic about the potential for mutually beneficial relationships with Gentiles; Abram as an idealized archetype for *Israel is presented as laying hands on the Egyptian king for healing and as teaching Egyptians the knowledge of “goodness, wisdom, and righteousness” (1QapGen ar XIX, 23-25; XX, 21-29; cf. Jesus healing Israel’s enemies in Mt 8:5-13; 15:21-28).

3. Essene Practices and Beliefs.

3.1. Initiation, Table Fellowship, Swearing of Oaths. The probationary period for entry into the sect lasted between two and three years; initiation involved testing of character and, at the end of various stages, the transfer of property, the taking of oaths and participation in pure meals and pure drink (Josephus, J.W. 2.137-138; cf. 1QS VI, 13-23). The Essenes practiced a closed table fellowship; presumably visitors or new probationers ate separately (cf. table fellowship in Mk 2:16-17; 14:12-26). Swearing of oaths was prohibited except upon admission to sect (Josephus, J.W. 2.135, 139; Philo, Prob. 84; CD-A XV, 5-12; 1QS V, 8-11; cf. Mt 5:33-37; 23:16-22).

3.2. Alternative Ways of Living as Priestly, Torah-abiding Jews. Some have suggested that the Aramaicizing of the Hebrew “doers” (ʿosim) of the interpretation of the Torah (CD-A IV, 8) may plausibly be the origin of the term “Essenes.”

This group believed itself to be true Israel, a true priesthood and acceptable sacrifice, inheritors of the language of “planting,” “temple,” “remnant,” “cornerstone” and the “chosen” (1QS VIII, 1-10a; cf. Jesus as cornerstone in Mk 12:1-11 and discussion about true children of Abraham in Jn 8:39-42).

The Damascus Document (CD-A X, 14—XI, 18) records Sabbath restrictions against work in the field, carrying medicine or a baby, assisting an animal giving birth, and helping an animal fallen into a well. Humans fallen into a well could not be helped with ladder, rope or tool (cf. Mt 12:11-12; Mk 2:23-28). Sabbath rules recorded by Josephus pertained to food and fire preparation and not defecating on the Sabbath (J.W. 2.147-149; cf. 1QM VII, 5-7). The Essene court, not the high priest’s court, decided verdicts, including the death sentence for blasphemy (Josephus, J.W. 2.143-145; cf. Mt 26:57-66; Mk 14:53-64). Essenes were known for interpreting dreams (Josephus, J.W. 2.112-113; Ant. 17.345-348) and reliably exercising prophetic gifts (Josephus, J.W. 2.159; cf. Mt 11:8-10; Lk 1:76; 2:36; 7:26-28).

Judas the Essene is in the temple when he prophesies the death of Antigonus (Josephus, J.W. 1.78-80; Ant. 13.310-314; cf. Lk 2:36-37). However, like Jesus, at least some Essenes were openly critical of the *temple as it was currently run and its priesthood (CD-B XX, 22-23; 1QpHab I, 13; cf. Mk 11:15-18). Although some sent offerings to the temple, they offered up some type of sacrifice among themselves with special practices for purification (Josephus, Ant. 18:18-19). Alternatively, they may not have offered animal sacrifices at all (Philo, Prob. 75; cf. 1QS VIII, 9-10; IX, 4-5); the DSS attest morning and evening prayers as an alternative to sacrifices (4Q503; cf. Philo, Contempl.).

The Hebrew Scriptures commanded washings for ritual impurities (Lev 14-17), and John’s *baptism required confession and *repentance for moral impurities (Mt 3:7-11). Essenes preceded their pure meal with cold-water immersion and *prayers (Josephus, J.W. 2.129-131). These immersions remedied ritual and moral impurity and were accompanied by repentance (1QS V, 13-18; cf. Josephus, Ant. 18.19).

3.3. Marrying, Nonmarrying and Widower Essenes. A practice of leaving one’s wife, brothers, parents or children for the sake of the *kingdom of God was known in Luke’s Gospel (Lk 18:29-30; cf. Mt 19:29-30; Mk 10:29-30). According to Josephus, one order of Essenes disdained marriage but adopted children (J.W. 2.120), while another order permitted marriage for the purpose of procreation of children only, abstaining from intercourse during pregnancy (J.W. 2.160-161; cf. Lk 14:25-26). Philo notes that “no Essene takes a wife”; however, the phrase “even if the older men, however, happen to be childless” implies that some had children (Hypoth. 11.13). There is no legislation on celibacy or marriage in the Rule of the Community; however, the Damascus Document has rules for women and children (CD-A VII, 6-9; CD-B XIX, 3-5), and some communities had both “mothers” and “fathers” (4Q270 7 I, 13-15). Definition of fornication included approaching a wife “not according to the regulation” (4Q270 7 I, 12-13) and the taking of more than one wife in a lifetime (CD-A IV, 20—V, 1). It is possible that a celibate, male Essene community may have attracted widowers, who, according to this regulation, could not remarry.

3.4. Wealth, Livelihood, Social Justice. Deliberate lifestyle choices resulted from observed social injustices. *Slavery was rejected, and each served the other as brothers (Philo, Prob. 79; Josephus, Ant. 18.21). Essenes avoided the practice of commerce (Philo, Prob. 78), devoting themselves to manual or agricultural work and craftsmanship (Philo, Prob. 76; Hypoth. 11.8-9; Josephus, Ant. 18.19). They were known not to hoard “gold or silver” or acquire large pieces of land, living without excess of riches but not in poverty (Philo, Prob. 76-77; Josephus, J.W. 2.122). In comparison, Jesus’ teaching on treasures on earth and in heaven is nuanced eschatologically (Mt 6:19-21; Lk 12:33-34) (see Rich and Poor). Essenes vowed to keep themselves from theft and “unlawful gain” (Josephus, J.W. 2.139-141); priests were not to rob the poor and the widow or kill the orphan (CD-A VI, 16-17; cf. Lk 18:3-5). Various, Essenes enjoyed a community of goods with no private property (Pliny, Nat. 5.15-73; Josephus, J.W. 2.122; Ant. 18.20; Philo, Prob. 85-86; Hypoth. 11.4-5, 10-12) or had some private means (CD-A XIV, 12-16; Josephus, J.W. 2.124; cf. Acts 4:32-5:11). The “riches” of initiates into the Yahad were to be mingled with the community’s property only after two years (1QS I, 11-12; VI, 18-23). Essenes were known to care for their own sick and elderly (Philo, Prob. 87; Hypoth. 11.13); the Qumran Essenes were meant to support the poor, needy, alien, elderly, diseased, captive and fatherless until the messiahs of Aaron and Israel arrived (CD-A VI, 21; XIV, 13-19).

3.5. Fate and Immortality. “Fate is mistress of all things” (Josephus, Ant. 13.171-173), a predeterministic theology echoed in 1QS III, 15-16. Josephus attributed a belief in the immortality of soul to the Essenes (J.W. 2.154-155; Ant. 18.18). Yet, while Josephus reports that the Pharisees believed in a bodily *resurrection and that the Essenes did not (J.W. 2.163; cf. Mt 22:23-33), some of the DSS hint that some of the people of these scrolls did. For example, the anticipated messiah was expected to cause the dead to live (4Q521 2 II, 12; cf. Jub. 23:30-31; Hippolytus, Haer. 9.27).

See also DEAD SEA SCROLLS; PHARISEES; PRIESTS AND PRIESTHOOD; SADDUCEES.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. G. J. Brooke, The Dead Sea Scrolls and the New Testament (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2005); J. H. Charlesworth, “John the Baptizer and the Dead Sea Scrolls,” in The Bible and the Dead Sea Scrolls, 3: The Scrolls and Christian Origins, ed. J. H. Charlesworth (Waco, TX: Baylor University Press) 1-35; J. J. Collins, Beyond the Qumran Community: The Sectarian Movement of the Dead Sea Scrolls (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2010); idem, “Sectarian Communities in the Dead Sea Scrolls,” in The Oxford Handbook of the Dead Sea Scrolls, ed. T. H. Lim and J. J. Collins (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2010) 151-72; E. Regev, Sectarianism in Qumran: A Cross-Cultural Perspective (RelSoc 45; Berlin: de Gruyter, 2007); L. H. Schiffman, Reclaiming the Dead Sea Scrolls: The History of Judaism, the Background of Christianity, the Lost Library of Qumran (Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1994); J. E. Taylor, “The Classical Sources on the Essenes and the Scrolls Communities,” in The Oxford Handbook of the Dead Sea Scrolls, ed. T. H. Lim and J. J. Collins (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2010)

173-99; J. C. VanderKam, The Dead Sea Scrolls Today (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1994); G. Vermes and M. Goodman, eds., The Essenes According to the Classical Sources (OCT 1; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1989). D. M. Peters

ETERNAL LIFE. See LIFE, ETERNAL LIFE.

ETHICS OF JESUS

The “ethics” of Jesus concerns how Jews (and later Gentiles) follow Jesus in his own praxis of Torah observance, his own articulation of the premier revelation of *God’s will in Israel’s Torah, and how to embody his moral teachings in ways that manifest the *kingdom of God. In particular, the *Sermon on the Mount has become the locus classicus in interpreting the ethics of Jesus. Jesus’ ethics, or ethical theory, can also be fruitfully compared with classical ethical theories. While the ethics of Jesus need to be comprehended through the lens of each of the evangelists (Longenecker, 9-97; Hays, 73-168), the historical task of distinguishing the sayings of Jesus from the later redactional reshapings in Matthew, Mark, Luke and John will not be the orientation of this article.

1. Christian Reinterpretations of Jesus’ Ethics
2. Ethical Theories and Jesus
3. Jesus’ Ethics

1. Christian Reinterpretations of Jesus’ Ethics.

P. Lapide, an Orthodox Jew, describes the history of Christian discussions of Jesus’ ethics, and in particular the Sermon on the Mount as the representative ethical statement of Jesus, this way: “In fact, the history of the impact of the Sermon on the Mount can largely be described in terms of an attempt to domesticate everything in it that is shocking, demanding, and uncompromising, and render it harmless” (Lapide, 3). He quotes Karl Barth’s famous words: “It would be sheer folly to interpret the imperatives of the Sermon on the Mount as if we should bestir ourselves to actualize these pictures” (Lapide, 4).

So what do these (re)interpretations of Jesus’ ethics look like (see Greenman et al.)? Four notable attempts can be briefly summed up. First, some have said the Sermon on the Mount is really Moses taken to the highest level, and that Jesus’ intent is not to summon his followers to do these things but rather to show how wretchedly sinful they are. A second attempt is to assign the sayings of Jesus to the private, personal level, sometimes as little more than disposition or intention or striving, with no application to how Christians live publicly. Third, some assign his ethics, apart from the general teachings, to only the most radically committed of disciples. Fourth, there is a tendency to see the Sermon on the Mount as preceded by something—often grace or justification—which means Jesus’ teachings are for Christians, but only those who have been transformed by grace and live by the Spirit (Quarles, 20-34). Or, from a completely different angle, they are known as “interim ethics,” a term established by A. Schweitzer: the belief that the world was about to end and the kingdom about to arrive should frame any discussion of Jesus’ ethics. Indeed, quite often it renders the so-called ethics of Jesus as dismissible (Sanders, 1-29; Schrage, 13-40). Theology has tended to colonize Jesus’ ethics; ethical theory offers another angle.

Other theories of Jesus’ ethics have come to the surface more recently, and these proposals are adaptations of the above points but go beyond them by reforming classical ethical theories (see 2 below). “Narrative ethics” refers to theories of ethics that contend that we are part of a story, that such a story formed our ethics and is designed to shape us yet further. S. Hauerwas’s casting of ethics into an ecclesial narrative is perhaps the best known example of a narrative-shaped ethic (Hauerwas 1981; 1983). But our point here is *Israel’s story and that Jesus steps into that story to express his ethics. This story is a divine revelation through Torah, the tradition and Israel. In other words, Jesus’ ethics emerge from an ethic from above that has already formed Israel’s story, a story that Jesus wants to reform through his own version of that ethic from above. The famous “You have heard . . . but I say to you” of Matthew 5:17-48 both assumes Israel’s ethic-from-above story and shifts it at the same time.

Theologians and ethicists have routinely recontextualized and reexpressed the ethical demand of Jesus, but in this process the rhetorical force of Jesus’ ethics is often, or at least sometimes, depleted. But Jesus’ ethics are not simply to be squared with Christian soteriology. Instead, they are to be seen as a personal demand to surrender to Jesus. This is the point of Jesus’ *parables of the hidden treasure and of the pearl (Mt 13:44-46), where we are to discern not so much a soteriology as a call to embrace Jesus and his kingdom vision, surrendering everything we have to him. Jesus’ ethical demands, then, are not simple moral teachings (though some of them can be read that way), but far more often are confrontational claims on his hearers. What would have struck the Jewish listener of the first century A.D. was not a soteriological question but a christological one.

This is not to say that Jesus’ ethics have no sote-riological implications. For Jesus, those who took up his offer to follow him were the ones who would enter the kingdom, which by definition is the age to come, wherein *salvation would be fully discovered. But Jesus’ demands are not soteriological orderings as would eventually be found in the ordo salutis; instead, they are signs of what happens when the kingdom of God truly invades a community and a person in that community. Time and again we find in Jesus an ethic from above, the claim of God upon Israel and those who will enter on the kingdom path of Jesus.

2. Ethical Theories and Jesus.

From Moses to Plato and Aristotle, to Augustine and Aquinas, to Luther and Calvin, and then into the modern world of thinkers such as Immanuel Kant and John Stuart Mill, all the way to contemporary moral theorists such as Richard Niebuhr, Reinhold Niebuhr, John Howard Yoder, Stanley Hauerwas, Oliver O’Donovan and Alasdair MacIntyre, some of the finest thinkers have applied their energies to articulating the essence of morality. How does Jesus fit into that history?

Professional ethicists often break discussion about moral theory into three dimensions. (1) Metaethics probes the deepest question: What is goodness itself? (2) Normative ethics probes action: What is the good act? (3) Applied ethics probes how to apply the action question in a concrete setting: How do I do this good act in this situation at work? Or, how do I apply Jesus’ teaching on peace to war? Or, how do I apply Jesus’ call to forgive to my abusive husband? Each of these probings can be used in comparing Jesus to other great moral theorists. Although both metaethics (the Golden Rule) and applied ethics (loving enemies applies the Golden Rule) will emerge at times as we proceed here (see Hauerwas 1983; O’Donovan; Wells; Mouw; Reuschling), our focus will be on normative ethics.

2.1. Virtue Ethics. Virtue ethics is often associated with Aristotle, and his theory has been influential both in the church and the wider culture. Extolling the “ideals” of temperance, courage, wisdom and justice, Plato had focused on bringing the appetites and the human spirit under the control of the highest faculty, reason, so that the ethical person was the rational person. Extending Plato thought, Aristotle’s ethics are intellectual and even contemplative, but he moved ethics away from the ideal and closer to earth and to the mean between two vices. Thus, Aristotle’s ethics were shaped differently. First, the goal of life was human flourishing (Gk. eudai- monia) (see Wright, 33-36). Second, a person could become a virtuous person only in the context of friendship (Aristotle, Eth. nic. 2.4; 8.3.1-6, 8; Cicero, Amic. 6.20; 9.32). Third, the ethical person was to practice the habits that made virtue the core of one's character. The word virtue, then, is tied to the word character. The good person (character) does what is good (virtues), and doing good (virtues, habits) over time produces good character. The aim of ethical development is to become a virtuous person because virtuous persons do virtuous deeds, and these lead toward flourishing. The question then is not so much "What should I do?" but "Who should I be?"

Was Jesus a virtue ethicist? Modern ethicists can read Jesus as a virtue ethicist, but such categories must be imposed in order to find virtue ethics in Jesus. It cannot be successfully argued that Aristotle's view of flourishing is represented in Jesus' beatitudes, nor that Jesus framed his ethics in terms of habit-forming character. Virtue ethics is Greco-Roman, and we need to ask, "What does Jesus have to do with Athens or Rome?"

2.2. Categorical Imperative (Deontological Ethics). Immanuel Kant sought to establish ethics on the basis of reason alone, and his normative theory, often called "deontological ethics" (the Gk. deon referring to "ought" or "duty" or "obligation"), landed on the "categorical imperative." Kant framed the categorical imperative in a number of ways, reducible to universality, humanist and individualist (Reuschling, 31-41): (1) "act only in accordance with that maxim through which you can at the same time will that it become a universal law"; (2) "so act that you use humanity, whether in your person or in the person of any other, always at the same time as an end, never merely as a means"; (3) "the idea of the will of every rational being as a will giving universal law." That is, what is true for one must be true for all, and if we treat others as an end and therefore value humanity inherently, we will act in such a way as to live rationally and ethically. In addition, with respect to intention and practice, intention has more weight; further, what "I" ought to do becomes a right for everyone else as well as my duty to other people.

It could be argued that Kant's categorical imperative is a variant of Jesus' Golden Rule (Mt 7:12) or double *love command (Mk 12:18-32), but this would not be entirely accurate. Kant's ethic is dependent not on God or on the *incarnation of God in Christ, but solely and squarely on reason, and reason alone. It might be better to argue, especially if one thinks that Kant's imperative moves in the direction of the Golden Rule, that Kant's categorical imperative had already been (spiritually, intellectually, etc.) formed by a culture shaped broadly by a Christian ethic, and that his reasonable ethical theory only found a way to confirm what he had absorbed in primarily socializing forces. We ask, "What does Jesus have to do with the Enlightenment?"

2.3. Utilitarian Ethics. Two English thinkers, first Jeremy Bentham (1748-1832) and then John Stuart Mill (1806-1873), reformulated a cultural Christian ethic and rejected the adequacy of Kant's deontological ethics. Classic utilitarianism can be said to have three leading features: it is consequentialist, universalist and (in some cases) hedonist. It is consequentialist in that what makes an action right is the consequences of that action. It is universalist in that a utilitarian ethicist judges the consequences for everyone affected by the action. It is hedonist in that the classic utilitarian (and here we are thinking of Bentham, not Mill) identifies "good" with "pleasure," and "bad" with "pain." So an action is right if, and only if, it produces (consequentialist) the greatest good (hedonism) for the greatest number (universalist); or, as the classic maxim puts it, "The end justifies the means." Mill thought that the Golden Rule was Jesus' version of utilitarianism, thus making Mill's ethical theory the most religious of all ethical theories. In addition, one has to begin to think of Christian eschatology, including the final judgment as well as the new heavens and the new earth, as final consequences toward which all ethics need to be shaped. Although Jesus' ethic is indeed framed by *eschatology, that eschatology is shaped by a theology of revelation that makes us ask, "What does Jesus have to do with England?"

3. Jesus' Ethics.

Jesus does not fit neatly into any of these theories, but each of these ethical theories—virtue, deontological, utilitarian—does say something true about how Jesus "did" ethics. We need to ask what Jesus sounded like—morally, that is—in a first-century A.D. Galilean Jewish world. What perhaps strikes the ethicist about Jesus is that his ethics are nonphilosophical, because Jesus did not use the philosophical language of his day. In the reception history of ancient philosophical and ethical discourse, probably the preeminent philosopher in the ancient world was Aristotle (or Plato and Aristotle), but Aristotle's philosophical approach to virtue ethics is not the way Jesus operated. As Hauerwas put it, "Christians are not called to be virtuous. We are called to be disciples" (Hauerwas 2007, 75). Furthermore, Jesus' ethics are universal: he calls ordinary Galilean Jews, Judeans, women, Samaritans, the poor and the marginalized (Dunn, 489-541). Jesus' ethical theory is eclectic in that a number of elements are at work whenever Jesus "does" ethics, sometimes with one element playing an important element while in another context another element will come into play, and each of the philosophical approaches to ethics comes into play. Jesus "did" ethics from two angles: the sources or orientation of Jesus' ethics as an ethic from above, from beyond and from below, and then the character of Jesus' ethic as both messianic ethics and ecclesial ethics.

3.1. The Sources/Orientation of Jesus' Ethics.

3.1.1. Ethics from Above: Torah. Jesus emerges out of Israel's history, in which God speaks from on high to humans, the prominent element of God's speaking being Torah—the law of Moses. The paradigmatic story is in Exodus 19–24, with the Ten Commandments found in Exodus 20, all of them rehearsed in a new form in Deuteronomy. God had spoken with Adam and Eve and Abraham and Joseph well before *Moses, and this same God kept on speaking to Israel through the prophets and priests. The singular expression of the prophet was "Thus says the Lord." Everything about Jesus' ethics emerges from this history of God having spoken directly to Israel. His ethics function, then, as "commentary" on the history of that divine voice and can be classified under what is often called "divine command theory" (Mouw). The most astounding feature of Jesus' ethics is that while Jesus clearly speaks for God and thus clearly fits the profile of a *prophet, he never proclaims, "Thus says the Lord." Instead, he speaks for God directly. His words are no less than an ethics from above. The Sermon on the Mount, the classic summary of Jesus' ethics, ends with words to this effect: "When Jesus had finished saying these things, the crowds were amazed at his teaching, because he taught as one who had authority, and not as their teachers of the law" (Mt 7:28-29). And we think of the robust, self-conscious ego ("I") of Matthew 5:17-48 as well as his Nazareth claim (Lk 4:21), his calling of *disciples (Mk 1:16-20), his teachings on loving God and others (Mk 12:28-32), the Golden Rule (Mt 7:12), what he says about *fasting (Mk 2:18-22) and *Sabbath (Mk 6:1-6), and in general his authoritative status among his followers. Jesus' ethic is an ethic from above in that he speaks directly for God.

At the core of Jesus' moral teachings, or his ethics, is *love (Schnackenburg, 88-97; Stuhlmacher, 98-107; Dunn, 583-89): his followers were to love God with heart, soul, mind and strength, and they were to love others as they loved themselves (Mk 12:28-32 par.). Dramatically, Jesus turned "enemies" into neighbors (Mt 5:43-48; Lk 10:25-29, 30-37). Although this can be softened into modernity's notion of tolerance, Jesus' teaching here is more radical: he both reduced the Torah to love of God and love of others, and provided a hermeneutical grid through which his followers can now discern how to live as the kingdom of God expands its reach. Whether we take the Matthean version (all laws hang from these two commands [Mt 22:40]) or the Markan version (the two greatest commands), each evinces a moral hermeneutic, and this works itself out in any number of incidents recorded in the Gospels, including the parable of the good Samaritan (Lk 10:25-38), the Golden Rule (Mt 7:12), the weightier matters of the Torah (Mt 23:23-24) and Jesus' *table fellowship with *sinners (Mk 2:13-17), including *women (Lk 10:38-42). This command to love God and others became fundamental as the earliest Christians found their way in the Roman world (cf. Rom 12:19; 13:9; Gal 5:14; Jas 2:8).

But narrowing how Jesus "did" ethics to a divine-command posture or to a Torah posture does not adequately capture how Jesus' ethics operated. Jesus' eclectic ethics requires that we explore another dimension of how Jesus extended another element of God's speaking in Israel's story.

3.1.2. Ethics from Beyond: Prophets. The genius of Israel's prophets was that they spoke to the people on behalf of God in light of what God would or could do in the future. In other words, the prophets' burden was to bring God's future to bear on the present. This can be called an "ethics from beyond," and it takes us one step beyond an ethics from above and one step closer to how Jesus "did" ethics. There is very little corresponding ethic in modern ethical theory, but Jesus' ethical posture toward the present was robustly shaped by his view of God's future. His ethics from beyond was perhaps the most significant element of his ethics. In this, Jesus stands alongside Israel's prophets because his ethics flowed directly from his vision of God's kingdom. We encounter the sheer force of Jesus' kingdom language through more than a hundred occurrences in the Synoptic Gospels, which is then advanced to some degree by John's conceptualization of the kingdom in his expression "eternal life." It is then crystallized in several Pauline observations (e.g., 1 Cor 15:20-28; Phil 2:6-11) and graphically sketched in Revelation 20–22. All this places the hearer of Jesus' ethic up against an eschatological ethic, a set of norms grounded in his belief of what is to come.

What do we mean by “kingdom”? For years biblical scholars have been preoccupied with the time of the kingdom (see Kingdom of God/Heaven): is it present, is it future, or is it both (inaugurated)? Interpreters cannot surrender Jesus’ clear sayings about the imminency of the kingdom (Mt 10:23; Mk 9:1; 13:30), but neither can they ignore Jesus’ more distant and future vision of the kingdom, as one finds more often in Luke. Hence, the idea of an inaugurated eschatology has attracted many interpreters. Yet, discerning the time of the kingdom is a prolegomenon to defining kingdom, and here scholarship has not been as active but instead has been happy to settle for looser formulations. Whereas B. Chilton contends that it refers to God acting in strength, many have taken it in the direction of a “dynamic reign” (rather than “rule”), and this has been translated into both social justice endeavors and the soteriology of justification. Again, neither is definitive enough. It would have been impossible for a Galilean or Judean at the time of Jesus to hear him make the startling claim that the kingdom had dawned (arrived or was about to arrive) and not ask what we might call “the David question.” In other words, the word kingdom in the Jewish world always bore the sense of God as king through a Davidade (see Son of David), Israel as kingdom citizens, the land as the sacred space for that Davidic kingdom and the realization of Torah observance in a fulsome way (as in Jer 31:31-34). In addition, it was accompanied by an eschatological salvific power working to bring victory over cosmic powers and systemic evil, as well as to heal, liberate, save and transform kingdom citizens into the people of God’s own possession. This eschatological power is an internal grace that transforms; that is, it is the kind of tree that produces the right kind of fruit (Mt 7:16-20). In contemporary scholarship kingdom has been not only “de-Israelized” but also “de-ecclesiological”; in turn it has been spiritualized or socialized, and at times it amounts to little more than social acts of benevolence or powers at work in this world instead of the formation of a community. For Jesus, kingdom would have been immediately associated with Israel as the saved remnant who has experienced the saving power of God in the new age (see Exile and Restoration). Although the connection needs to be stated carefully and with nuance, kingdom and *church are far more connected than is often recognized.

The most notable element of Jesus’ ethics from beyond was that the future had already begun to take effect in the present. This is the point of Matthew 4:17, words that butt up against the Sermon on the Mount and every ethical statement of Jesus:

“From that time on Jesus began to preach, ‘Repent, for the kingdom of heaven has come near.’” Over and over again in Jesus’ teaching the future impinges on the present in such a way that a new day is already arriving in Jesus. Thus, “These are not ordinary ethics, nor are they merely an extension of intensification of Jewish ethics. . . . They are the ethics of the kingdom” (Hagner, 48 [cf. Manson, 43-57]). And the foundational call to *repent (Mk 1:14-15) emerges most directly from the prophetic tradition, while the foundational call to believe/trust orients the disciple toward the work that God is doing right now in Jesus in light of the coming kingdom (Schnackenburg, 42-58; Schrage, 40-43).

Ever since the groundbreaking works of J. Weiss and A. Schweitzer the eschatological shape of the ethics of Jesus has been both appreciated and overdrawn, but one cannot deny its force in texts such as Mark 1:16-20; 2:13-17; 3:31-35; 8:34—9:1; 9:42-49; 10:17-31, 35-45, as well as, for example, Matthew 10:34-36; Luke 6:20-26, 46-49; 9:57-62; 12:1-12. The entire Gospel tradition, not excluding John’s emphasis on the realization of eternal life in the now, frames the entire ethic of Jesus into an ethic from beyond. As has been argued for a century, the ethic of Jesus is an eschatological ethic; that is, it contends that what God had promised for the future was beginning to take shape in the here and now (see Eschatology). The following are major themes for that future kingdom and therefore for Jesus’ vision for his followers (J. Dunn labels similar themes as “hungering for what is right,” Dunn, 563-83).

3.1.2.1. Peace. Peace* (šālôm) refers in the OT and in the Jewish tradition to the flourishing of God’s people in this world as a result of God’s blessings on them. Hence, peace inevitably entails the absence of war. Yet the absence of war is not peace; for peace to exist, the people of God need to be liberated from oppression in order to *worship God in holiness, awe and love (Lk 1:67-79). Hence, peace is about dwelling in the land safely, obediently and abundantly. It follows from this that peace can become internal satisfaction and a consciousness of dwelling before God in truth and security. Jesus’ advocacy for peace is not simple wishful thinking, but rather is an eschatological vision now taking root among his followers (Mt 5:9; 10:34; Lk 10:5-6; 19:42) (Yoder).

3.1.2.2. Justice. Justice* refers in the Jewish tradition to a society and to individuals who conform to God’s will for this world, and hence the term just is inherently relational: to God, to self, to others and to this world. The term is comprehensive; that is, a person is just who relates to God, to self, to others and to the world as God intends. The term cannot be relegated to the social world with spirituality and religion reserved for the private world of *prayer and worship. The prophets of Israel, and hence Jesus too, strongly criticized Israel and its leaders when the poor and widow and the orphan—those marginalized due to lack of power and resources—were neglected or oppressed. Hence, from Luke's opening scene in the Nazareth *synagogue (Lk 4:16-30) right through to Matthew's scene of Jesus caring for the sick in the *temple (Mt 21:14), Jesus seeks justice (Yoder).

3.1.2.3. Economic Compassion. From the time of the Deuteronomic legislation forward, and especially among the prophets, the Torah's explicit care for the poor became central to any notion of God's people living in the land. Hence, as the poor go, so goes Israel—in Yahweh's judgment (see Rich and Poor). We read such critiques in Micah, Hosea, Joel, Amos, Isaiah and Jeremiah. Hence, it is not surprising that Jesus demonstrates a preferential option for the poor when he speaks of the kingdom of God, and there is nothing more potent in the Jesus traditions than his mother's Magnificat (Lk 1:46-55), *John the Baptist's demands for economic distribution in Luke 3:10-14, and Jesus' opening sermon (Lk 4:16-30) and beatitudes (Lk 6:20-26). Time and again, and particularly emphasized in Luke's Gospel, we find Jesus' eye on the poor showing a radical compassion as the first step in kingdom realities.

3.1.2.4. Moral Integrity. The prophetic expectation for the day when God ransomed Israel and set it firmly in the land was a day when Israel would be obedient from the heart, in a new, more complete way (Jer 31:31-34). Hence, the radical teachings of Jesus in Matthew 5—on murder, lust, adultery, *divorce, *oaths, retaliation and love of enemies—are not just claims on disciples, but rather a sketch of what kingdom people look like when they are taken up by the salvific powers of the kingdom. Jesus' constant criticism of hypocrisy fits this eschatological, prophetic vision of moral integrity (Mt 6:1-18; 23:1-39).

3.1.2.5. Empire Critique. Some recent scholarship (e.g., Carter) contends that Jesus' world was not Jewish but involved an eye on the Romans, and his prophetic stance extends toward *Rome as well. That is, for Jesus to say "kingdom" was to imply "empire," to say "king" was to imply "emperor," and to say "God's kingdom" was to say "not Caesar's empire." Much scholarship in this vein reads in as much as it exegetes, but the imbalances of exaggeration are not to be met with an imbalanced rejection.

It is hard to read narration of the birth of Jesus in Luke 2:1-15 and hear words such as "good news," "savior" and "peace" (though not coming from the lips of Jesus) and not hear echoes of those very words in Caesar's countless proclamations in the Roman Empire. Surely there is some echo here of a critique of Caesar and empire. But Jesus appears to take issue with governmental power, whether Jewish or Roman or both. He is the one who called Antipas a "fox" (Lk 13:32), who promises to his disciples the "kingdom" (Lk 12:32), and who made the thoroughly provocative remarks about the temple tax, wherein he claimed that the "children of the kingdom were free" (Mt 17:24-27), and about Caesar's coin, wherein he instructed Pharisees and Herodians to give to Caesar what is Caesar's and to God what is God's (Mk 12:13-17). That on Jesus' cross it was written "king of the Jews" clearly shows that Jesus' kingdom vision was at cross purposes with Caesar's, whether throughout the Mediterranean or more particularly set up in Jerusalem. Jesus' comment on Caesar's coin is at least evasive, which is then quasi-political, but probably his statement is deliberately provocative and accusatory: if the Pharisees and *Herodians have coins from Caesar, they can pay him taxes, but Jesus insinuates that their higher calling is to God, which flattens Caesar's authority (Schrage, 107-15). All this is part of Jesus' prophetic posture toward this world as the emissary from God who reveals God's will for his followers. In addition to these texts one must take note from another angle the peace texts (see 3.1.2.1 above) of Jesus wherein he advocates a nonviolent, alternative approach to accomplishing God's will, a posture directly contrary to that of the Zealots.

3.1.2.6. Rewards. Jesus mentions rewards and punishments often enough to make adherents of both traditional Christian and modern altruistic ethical viewpoints thoroughly uncomfortable and grasping for explanations (Ladd, 131-32). Yet even if one traces hints of the intrinsic nature of moral excellence (Hurst, 214), the subject deserves more careful consideration. Some have made enough of the teachings of Jesus to fashion how Jesus ranked his disciples: some would be "great," while others would be "least" (Mt 5:19). A recent study by G. Anderson may have finally resolved the tension for altruists. His contention is that Second Temple Judaism saw a shift in "sin" language from burden to debt. As the resolution for burdens was "forgiveness" or the removal of the load, so the removal of indebtedness was credit or merits. Important, though, is that these are rhetorical frameworks and not ontological categories. To do good works and see them as “merit” does not envision God’s crediting to one’s moral account some merits so that then when the divine reckoning comes one’s merits—that is, works righteousness—add up in one’s favor. Rather, these are metaphorical worlds with rhetorical implications. “Reward” then becomes a way of speaking of the kingdom of God and those who will enter, not of a soteriological system of merit-based accumulation. Jesus routinely speaks of “rewards,” which is nearly synonymous with “merit,” and uses language typical for Second Temple Judaism’s linguistic, metaphorical and rhetorical world (Mt 5:12; 6:1; 10:41; 20:8; Jn 4:36). His provocative parable of the workers in the vineyard (Mt 20:1-16; see also Lk 17:7-10) upends any notion of merit while using the language of rewards.

This future orientation of Jesus’ moral vision indicts all moral theories that refuse to establish themselves on the basis of eschatology. The utilitarian ethic of Mill is a dry bone when compared to that of Israel’s prophets and Jesus: the latter’s “consequentialism” is not just a better world or even personal happiness; ultimately, it is the glory of God when God establishes his kingdom in this world. And a virtue ethics with no eschatology, which is what Aristotle offered to the world, cannot be compared to the virtue ethic that one finds described by N. T. Wright, O. O’Donovan, and G. Stassen and D. Gushee. An ethic unshaped by eschatology is neither Jesus’ nor Christian. What eschatology does to the ethic of Jesus, however, is to convert his summons from moral teachings into a summons to surrender one’s whole being to God in the person of Jesus (Ladd, 123-27). As G. Ladd pointed out a generation ago, to the degree the kingdom has been realized, to the same degree can its ethic be realized.

But once again there is a dimension of Jesus’ ethics that is covered neither by an ethics from above nor by an ethics from beyond. Nevertheless, it is an ethic that is inherent to Israel’s story and, in fact, often became the predominant form of ethical reflection.

3.1.3. Ethics from Below: Wisdom. This third dimension of Jesus’ ethic emerges from a dimension of the Bible and Jewish history too often ignored in contemporary ethical theory as well as in examinations of Jesus’ ethic (but see Schnackenburg, 86-88; Harvey, 140-68; Crossan; Borg). Those familiar with Israel’s wisdom tradition notice a striking absence, or at least a major de-emphasis, of a Torah-shaped ethic and a revelatory-based set of commands as well as an eschatological driver for morals. Wisdom was not an ethic from above nor, since it lacked an eschatological shaping, an ethic from beyond. Wisdom writings such as Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Job and Sirach, do not say, “God says do this.” Instead, the wisdom tradition anchors itself in inductive human observation. Wisdom, then, is discerning how to live in God’s world in God’s way, but this kind of wisdom can be acquired only by those who are receptive to formation, to the up-and-coming wise person receptive to the wisdom of their father and mother. A wisdom culture is inherently traditional, hierarchical, intellectual and intuitive. It trusts human observation and discerns God’s intentions for this world, and it passes this wisdom on to the next generation, which the latter is to do in turn. When Jesus took his place within the living wisdom tradition of Israel, living in God’s world made “God’s way” cruciform through his own suffering as well as through his use of the cross as the way of life (Mk 8:32—9:1; Lk 9:23).

Jesus frequently enough teaches his followers how to live, and he anchors his teachings in nothing less than inductive observation (Witherington, 147-208). In the Sermon on the Mount this is very clear in, for instance, Jesus’ imperative to go the second mile (Mt 5:38-42) or in his teaching a single-minded righteousness as a way of living in the here and now because the distraction of trying to live both for God and for money creates anxiety (Mt 6:19-34). His missionary instructions at times partake of a wisdom dimension (Mt 10:10, 16, 24-25 par.), as do other teachings (Mt 11:4-6, 16-19 par.; see also Mt 11:28-30). Central to the wisdom teachings of Jesus, but not limited to wisdom, are his parables, which turn ordinary reality into iconic displays of the ways of God in this world (e.g., Mt 13:1-52; Mk 4:1-34).

But again, we do not yet have a full sketch of the ethics of Jesus: his is an ethic from above, from beyond and from below. But there is more.

3.2. The Character of Jesus’ Ethics.

3.2.1. Messianic. Jesus’ ethic is a combination of an ethics from above, an ethics from beyond and an ethics from below, combining the revelatory-legal with the prophetic and the wisdom traditions in Israel, but in Jesus there is something singularly distinct. Jesus saw himself in nothing less than eschatological and messianic categories, and that means that his ethic is at its core a messianic ethic. Nothing makes sense about the ethics of Jesus, not the least of which expressions would be the Sermon on the Mount, until we understand his ethics as messianic vision. And once we understand it as messianic, we can understand it all, especially its radical elements. As E. Lohse put it, “Jesus’ word is not separable from the one who speaks it" (Lohse, 70 [see also Stuhlmacher, 102-3]).

At the core of Jesus' ethics, then, is a belief about himself, that he indeed was the one who brought the OT law and prophets (as well as wisdom) to their completion or defining point in who he was, what he did and what he taught (not just here, but esp. Mt 5:17-20). There is a Torah dimension, there is a wisdom dimension, and there is a prophet dimension—an ethic from above, beyond and below. But Jesus takes each of these to a new level where he himself is the Torah, wisdom and the prophet who was to come. In addition, he stands on the precipice of the ages, looks into the beyond of the new heavens and the new earth, and summons his followers to catch that vision and make it real, so far as they were able, in the here and now.

The opening summons of the Synoptic Gospels is that Jesus calls some fishermen to follow him (Mk 1:16-20; cf. Lk 5:1-11). The term "follow" (akoloutheō) resonates throughout the Gospels (e.g., Mt 4:25; 8:10, 19, 22, 23; 9:9, 19; 10:38; 16:24; 19:21, 27-28; 20:34; 21:9; 26:58; 27:55), a term that denotes cost and commitment but at times is more concrete in following behind Jesus in the ordinary accompaniment of him as rabbi or friend. Over and over this is applied to the followers of Jesus, such that his own life is a template for how they are to live: his suffering is their suffering (Mk 8:34—9:1; 10:35-45); what happens to him is what happens to them (Mt 10:24-25; 23:33-39). That the apostles will later capture the Christian ethic as a cruciform and resurrection ethic (Rom 6:1-14) is but an extension of the messianic ethic already at work in the lifetime of Jesus.

Yet Jesus is not one of the disciples; he is not one of the Twelve, but over the Twelve (Mt 10:1-4; 19:28). This translates into his Lordship as the one appointed by God to be the agent of redemption and the means of ushering in the kingdom, and the one who summons others into that kingdom. Put differently, his lordship over the Twelve can translate into his messianic status.

Even more importantly, the pattern of Jesus' life reshapes the ethic of Jesus: his life is one of self-sacrificing service for others (Mk 10:35-45) that finds its true realization in his *death on the cross, leading the entirety of "following" into a cruciform pattern (Hays, 73-85). But the cross is not the only pattern, for just as Jesus' own parables and verbal contests conclude on the note of victory over the powers, so his death on the cross is not the final word, neither from his own lips (Mk 8:31) nor from the depiction in the Gospels: the final word is *resurrection and life. Pervading both the cross and the resurrection patterns of the life of Jesus is the presence of the Spirit, who empowers both Jesus (Lk 4:14, 18) and his followers (Lk 11:13).

Only in association or relationship with Jesus does the Sermon on the Mount make sense. Jesus does not offer abstract principles or simply his version of the Torah for a new society. Time and time again the sermon draws attention to Jesus as the revealer, as the one who opens up to his followers a new way of life. His ethic from above and beyond translates into a witness to who he is—that is, into a messianic ethic. His moral teachings, then, result in an offer of himself to his disciples, or, put differently, he summons them to himself, and in participation with him and his vision the disciples are transformed into the fullness of a kingdom moral vision. Much discussion—flowing out of the Reformation's theology of grace in both its Lutheran and Reformed versions—has emerged from considering Jesus' summons to follow him. Protestants are careful to say that all is due to grace and the empowerment of the Spirit. This has led many to search for clues how to read the Sermon on the Mount on the basis of grace. One example is that Jesus preaches kingdom, kingdom means salvation, and this means that discipleship flows from having been saved. This is theologically reassuring, if only Jesus would talk like we do. But at the heart of biblical study is respecting the language of Jesus' approach to ethics. Jesus calls his followers to follow and obey him, and this means doing what he says. That Jesus' moral teachings can be explained through another theological grid than the one he provides illustrates the fluidity of ethical traditions but also the singularity of Jesus' own approach: it strikes the listener as an ethic from above that provokes the question "Who is this man?" That is, Jesus' ethic is messianic.

3.2.2. Ecclesial. Jesus' vision is not for isolated individuals, for Jesus creates a new *family (Dunn, 592-99). As Aristotle saw true flourishing occurring only through friendship, so Jesus saw true kingdom living only in the context of an "ecclesial" fellowship of kingdom citizens. The core hermeneutical word for Jesus, "kingdom," is a term that immediately creates the image of a society marked by shalom, justice, love and wisdom. But transcending what Aristotle meant in his discussions of friendship, and recapturing Israel's own sense of family identity, this ethic of Jesus was to be lived out in the context of a kingdom community, the ecclesia. While many would dispute that Jesus used a term directly translatable as "church" (Mt 16:17; 18:17), the notion surfaces often in the Gospel tradition when Jesus speaks of things such as the new family (Mk 3:31-35). This is hardly surprising, since sociological studies of Jesus and the early church often speak of the messianists as a sectarian movement shaped by a sectarian ethic (Meeks, 98-108).

In fact, this new family of Jesus creates division in the world of his disciples. Whether we take the softened or, the probably more original, harsher form, Jesus said that following him meant family division and even a need to "hate" one's natural family members (Mt 10:37-39; Lk 14:26-27). Examined more broadly, this divisive, family-dividing ethic of Jesus entails an adversarial relationship between Jesus and established sectarian groups at the time of Jesus: one by one, the Pharisees, Herodians, Zealots, Sadducees and perhaps even Essenes found something lacking, extreme or controversial in Jesus. Those who cut a vision for a new ecclesial community within Israel can expect to find opponents within Judaism. This is not Jesus against Judaism; this is Jesus within Judaism forming a new vision for Israel.

As the Messiah formed a community of followers, so the ethic of Jesus is a messianic community ethic. It is supremely and irreducibly ecclesial. Few have emphasized this theme as central to Christian ethics as has S. Hauerwas, who commented on the Sermon on the Mount: "The sermon, therefore, is not a list of requirements, but rather a description of the life of a people gathered by and around Jesus" (Hauerwas 2007, 61). Church, then, forms the context for the ethic of Jesus. We find this in one passage after another: Jesus' focus on love or the Golden Rule (Mt 7:12; Mk 12:28-32) evokes one person loving another and so forming a community. Jesus' radical statement that his followers drop even their sacrifices in order to pursue reconciliation reveals his concern for community life and fellowship (Mt 5:21-26). Even his mother and brothers and sisters would have to cross the threshold to sit around him and join the new community (Mk 3:31-35). His calling God "Father," seeing himself as God's "Son" and his followers as "brothers and sisters"—all of this speaks to the ecclesial nature of his vision and ethic.

See also COMMANDMENT; DISCIPLES AND DISCIPLESHIP; DIVORCE; JUSTICE, RIGHTEOUSNESS; KINGDOM OF GOD/HEAVEN; LAW; LOVE, LOVE COMMAND; OATHS AND SWEARING; REPENTANCE; RICH AND POOR; SERMON ON THE MOUNT/PLAIN.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. G. A. Anderson, Sin: A History (New Haven: Yale University Press, 2009); P. L. Berger and T. Luckmann, The Social Construc- tion of Reality: A Treatise in the Sociology of Knowledge (Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1966); D. Bonhoeffer, Discipleship, trans. B. Green and R. Krauss (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2001); M. Borg, Jesus, A New Vision (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1987); W. Carter, The Roman Empire and the New Testament: An Essential Guide (Nashville: Abingdon, 2006); B. D. Chilton, God in Strength: Jesus' Announcement of the Kingdom (SNTU B/1; Freistadt: Plöchl, 1979); J. D. Crossan, The Historical Jesus: The Life of a Mediterranean Jewish Peasant (San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1991); J. D. G. Dunn, Jesus Remembered (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2003); J. F. Fletcher, Situation Ethics: The New Morality (LTE; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1997); J. P. Greenman et al., The Sermon on the Mount Through the Centuries: From the Early Church to John Paul II (Grand Rapids: Brazos, 2007); D. A. Hagner, "Ethics and the Sermon on the Mount," ST 51 (1997) 48; A. E. Harvey, Strenuous Commands: The Ethic of Jesus (Philadelphia: Trinity Press International, 1990); S. Hauerwas, A Community of Character: Toward a Constructive Christian Social Ethic (Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press, 1981); idem, The Peaceable Kingdom: A Primer in Christian Ethics (Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press, 1983); idem, Matthew (BTCL; Grand Rapids: Brazos, 2007); S. Hauerwas and S. Wells, eds., The Blackwell Companion to Christian Ethics (Oxford: Blackwell, 2006); R. B. Hays, The Moral Vision of the New Testament: Community, Cross, New Creation; A Contemporary Introduction to New Testament Ethics (San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1996); T. Honderich, ed., The Oxford Companion to Philosophy (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2005); L. D. Hurst, "The Ethics of Jesus," DJG 210-22; G. E. Ladd, A Theology of the New Testament (rev. ed.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1993) 118-32; P. Lapide, The Sermon on the Mount: Utopia or Program for Action? trans. A. Swidler (New York: Orbis, 1986); E. Lohse, Theological Ethics of the New Testament, trans. M. E. Boring (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1991); R. N. Longenecker, ed., Patterns of Discipleship in the New Testament (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1996); T. W. Manson, Ethics and the Gospel (London: SCM, 1960); H. K. McArthur, Understanding the Sermon on the Mount (New York: Harper, 1960); W. A. Meeks, The Moral World of the First Christians (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1986); R. J. Mouw, The God Who Commands (Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press, 1990); O. O'Donovan, Resurrection and Moral Order: An Outline for Evangelical Ethics (2nd ed.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1994); J. Piper, Desiring God: Meditations of a Christian Hedonist (rev. ed.; Colorado Springs, CO: Multnomah, 2011); C. Quarles, Sermon on the Mount: Restoring Christ's Message to the Modern Church (Nashville: B & H Academic, 2011); W. C. Reuschling, Reviving Evangelical Ethics: The Promises and Pitfalls of Classic Models of Morality (Grand Rapids: Brazos, 2008); J. T. Sanders, Ethics in the New Testament: Change and Development (London: SCM, 1986); R. Schnackenburg, Die sittliche Botschaft des Neuen Testaments, 1: Von Jesus zur Urkirche (HTKNTSup 1; Freiburg: Herder, 1986); W. Schrage, The Ethics of the New Testament, trans. D. E. Green (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1988); G. H. Stassen and D. P. Gushee, Kingdom Ethics: Following Jesus in Contemporary Context (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2003); P. Stuhlmacher, Biblischen Theologie des Neuen Testaments, 1: Grundlegung von Jesus zu Paulus (2nd ed.; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1997); W. J. Webb, Slaves, Women and Homosexuals: Exploring the Hermeneutics of Cultural Analysis (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2001); idem, Corporal Punishment in the Bible: A Redemptive-Movement Hermeneutic for Troubling Texts (Downers Grove, IL: IVP Academic, 2011); S. Wells, Improvisation: The Drama of Christian Ethics (Grand Rapids: Brazos, 2004); S. Wilkens, Beyond Bumper Sticker Ethics: An Introduction to Theories of Right and Wrong (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2011); D. Willard, Renovation of the Heart: Putting on the Character of Christ (Colorado Springs, CO: NavPress, 2002); B. Witherington III, Jesus the Sage: The Pilgrimage of Wisdom (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1994); J. P. Wogaman, Christian Ethics: A Historical Introduction (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1993); N. T. Wright, After You Believe: Why Christian Character Matters (New York: HarperOne, 2010); J. H. Yoder, The Politics of Jesus: vicit Agnus noster (2nd ed.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1994).

S. McKnight

EXILE AND RESTORATION

Widely regarded as the first Gospel to have been written, the Gospel of Mark introduces Jesus in terms of Isaianic prophecies about the end of exile and the restoration of Israel (Mk 1:1-15). In this way, Mark integrates Jesus within the story of *Israel's plight due to *sin and the ultimate solution to that plight. Thus, Mark 1:3 cites Isaiah 40:3 ("The voice of one crying out in the wilderness, 'Prepare the way of the Lord, make his paths straight'"), which in its own context stands at the beginning of the Book of Comfort (Is 40—55), announcing the end of exile, the beginning of the return to the land of Israel, and the restoration of the nation and its institutions to their former condition (albeit on an even greater scale and level of perfection). After his baptism in the Jordan, where he emerges as the Spirit-anointed messenger of Isaiah 66:1-2 (Mk 1:11; cf. Lk 4:16-30, esp. vv. 18-19), Jesus begins his public ministry in *Galilee, and, according to Mark 1:15, the essence of his message is this: "The time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of God has drawn near; repent, and believe the good news." For those who could appreciate the scriptural echo, Jesus evidently was alluding to Isaiah 52:7, which promises a messenger who would herald the "good news" of "salvation"—the end of exile, the restoration of Israel, and the coming of God as king in Zion. Taken as a whole, then, the introduction to Mark's Gospel provides a mutually reinforcing, prophetic picture of the focus and intent of Jesus' appearance on the scene: he will be the divinely appointed messenger of a *gospel that, through his words and deeds, inaugurates the long-expected end of exile and restoration of Israel.

The introduction to Mark's Gospel adumbrates an explanatory framework in which to understand much of what Jesus says and does as presented in the Gospels. That is to say, if we follow Mark's lead, we begin to appreciate that OT and early Jewish traditions of exile and restoration provide a matrix for comprehending a large part of Jesus' agenda. To entertain this possibility, we must set aside preconceived notions of what is meant by "salvation," "gospel" and the like, why Jesus performed works of *healing and exorcism, and how Jesus' teaching relates to us today. Instead, we must open our minds to the rarefied, first-century A.D. Jewish world of Jesus and the Gospels and seek to engage sympathetically with a mindset that may at first seem irrelevant from a modern standpoint. We must also be willing to entertain a fair amount of cognitive dissonance, since the study of Jesus in terms of exile and restoration is fairly controversial.

1. A Vexed Subject
2. Ancient and Modern Horizons of the Concepts of "Exile" and "Restoration"
3. Old Testament Stories and Expectations
4. Ongoing Exile? Restoration Already and/or Not Yet?
5. The Twelve and Jesus' Ministry to All Israel

1. A Vexed Subject.

The story of Israel is often conceived of as the biblical account of the nation's plight ("exile") due to sin and the ultimate solution to that plight ("restoration," in whatever form that might take). Hence, Israel's exile and restoration have been prominent themes in recent studies of Jesus and the Gospels (e.g., Newman; Bryan; Pitre; Dennis), including the double work of Luke-Acts (Fuller). Some scholars have sought to contextualize the words and deeds of Jesus within the Judaism(s) of his day by reconstructing a Jesus who would have understood his own public ministry as taking place within the theological framework of exile and restoration, possibly even regarding his own ministry as the culmination of a restored Israel.

For several reasons, however, the modern discussion of these themes is extremely vexed. First, exile and restoration usually have been considered separately rather than together. This has led to a lack of integration and holistic perspective on the complex and variegated issues involved in both. For example, the important work of E. P. Sanders work on "restoration eschatology" in the Jesus tradition (Sanders 1985) has virtually nothing on exile. By the same token, the volumes edited by J. M. Scott on these two subjects (Scott 1997; 2001) are complementary but not integrative enough.

Second, those who discuss exile almost always mean the Babylonian exile (often called "the exile"), giving very short shrift to the Assyrian exile or failing to mention it altogether. This omission has led not only to an eclipse of potentially fruitful lines of inquiry on exile, but also to a limitation and even distortion of what restoration of the status quo ante entails. It is evident that the modern discussion of exile and restoration is beset by some unwarranted or unreflected assumptions, and we will see more on this below.

Third, starting already in the OT and continuing on into early Jewish literature of the Second Temple period, including the NT writings, various perspectives on exile and restoration are reflected in the primary sources. In the Gospels alone—where distinctions have been drawn between (1) the words and deeds of the Jesus of history, (2) the oral and written sources that collected and transmitted what Jesus said and did, and (3) the ultimate incorporation and redaction of those sources into the Gospels as we now have them—perspectives on exile and restoration could have been modified or understood differently at each stage of transmission. D. C. Allison now holds that it may be impossible to disentangle the historical Jesus from the later reflections of the church, arguing instead that the very fact that the Jesus tradition is saturated with certain concepts (including especially restoration eschatology) in manifold sources and forms attributed to Jesus seems to indicate that Jesus himself is the seminal impulse for them, whether or not any particular pericope conveying those concepts is deemed historical (Allison 2009). In any case, the great variety of perspectives on the subjects at hand in the preceding OT and Jewish tradition adds significantly to the challenge of interpreting the Jesus tradition.

Fourth, the terms exile, diaspora and restoration themselves have proven difficult for modern readers. Are the ancient terms exile and diaspora, for instance, to be understood as coterminous, or is the former a negative term and the latter a neutral one? Moreover, if the word exile means "enforced removal from one's land," is it possible to be "in exile" in the land, as N. T. Wright argues? For the most part, answers to such questions have been based not on comprehensive and thoroughgoing investigation of the relevant primary source material, but rather on oversimplifications and prevailing assumptions. Similarly, as a modern term of convenience, restoration has similar issues of stipulative definition all its own (i.e., does the term refer to any or all of the following: Israel's return to God in repentance; the cleansing of Israel and the outpouring of God's Spirit on his people; the liberation of Israel from pagan rule and the overthrow of Israel's enemies; Israel's repossession of the land of Israel; the return of the Diaspora to the land of Israel, whether that includes a remnant of some sort or "all Israel" in whatever sense; the rebuilding of Jerusalem and the temple in splendor; the conversion of the nations to the worship of the God of Israel and their eschatological pilgrimage to Zion; the reconstitution of Israel as an independent theocracy under the rule of a legitimate king of the line of David and/or a legitimate high priest of the line of Zadok; the resurrection of the dead; the supremacy of Israel in the world; and, finally, the recapitulation of all things to their originally intended creative order, on earth as in heaven?).

It is impossible in this short article to sort out these complex problems and to bring any definitive clarity to them. The best that can be done here is to provide some sense of the issues involved and a small sampling of their implications for interpreting the Jesus tradition.

2. Ancient and Modern Horizons of the Concepts of "Exile" and "Restoration."

The concepts of "exile" and "restoration" are complicated by their respective ancient and modern horizons. On the one hand, by the first century A.D., the ancient horizon of exile and restoration includes a mélange of Greco-Roman traditions that were available for Gospel writers to draw upon and combine with biblical traditions, just as was being done by other Jewish writers at around the same time (e.g., see, on exile in Philo of Alexandria, Runia 2009). Although exile could still be portrayed as a tragic situation resulting from forced geographical relocation during this period, new possibilities also opened up, including “exile as a condition that provokes a profound change of perspective and offers knowledge and greater insight, and exile as a political, social, even metaphysical metaphor” (Gaertner, 10) (see also Goldhill; and Whitmarsh, discussing the Second Sophistic, which used exile as a trope, a strategy of ethical self-representation over against the dominant Roman culture by articulating a new sociocultural positionality through rewriting the past). Studies on either early Judaism or Jesus and the Gospels have hardly begun to consider this extensive Greco-Roman material and its possible ramifications for their fields of inquiry.

On the other hand, the very success of the concepts of exile and restoration in modern literary and philosophical circles further complicates the interpretation of ancient texts on these subjects. For example, as T. Whitmarsh observes, “The motif of exile has been used throughout history to express cultural problems and to explore identity politics. . . . Indeed, writers over the last century have pursued the theme with unprecedented vigour: in modernism and postmodernism, the alienation and solitude of the individual is frequently articulated through the typology of exile. . . . Modernist exile, especially under the influence of Sartrian notions of alienation, is now, as Bruce Robbins wittily puts it, ‘at home in the academy.’ Exile is also frequently cited as a metaphor for ‘the postmodern condition’: in an introduction to a recent collection entitled Literature and Exile, David Bevan claims that exile stands for all forms of estrangement: ‘exile, viscerally, is otherness.’ Exile has become one of the fundamental tropes for recent writers on culture and identity” (Whitmarsh, 269). Under these circumstances, it is necessary to be vigilant that modern and postmodern intellectual agendas are not allowed to obscure the historical interpretation of ancient texts, which is an ever-present danger (see Scott 2005).

Finally, terminological confusion impedes our understanding of ancient texts. For example, transferring the modern concept of exile to Greco-Roman antiquity proves to be problematic, not least because, as J. F. Gaertner points out, the English word exile is too univocal to cover the range of usage in the corresponding Greek and Latin terms:

Whereas the modern derivatives of the Latin word exilium imply an involuntary departure, sanctioned by political or juridical authorities, the ancient usage of the corresponding terms φυγή, fuga, exilium, and their derivatives is less strict. φυγή and φεύγειν cover both the expulsion of groups or individuals and their voluntary departure. Possibly influenced by this Greek usage, Latin authors since Plautus often do not distinguish too rigorously between fuga (‘flight’) and exilium (‘exile’). . . . Moreover, ancient authors often do not distinguish between exile and other forms of displacement: ancient consolatory treatises on exile, for example, often mix mythical and historical exiles with characters that today would be called fugitives (such as Patroclus) or voluntary exiles (such as Metellus Numidicus), and Seneca compares the loss of his patria in exile to the condition of the many immigrants in the Rome of his day (Helv. 6.2-3) (Gaertner, 2-3).

Does this not suggest, therefore, that even a voluntary Jewish Diaspora could be seen as a condition of “exile,” at least in an ancient sense of the term? In that case, when set within the wider Greco-Roman context being suggested here, Y. H. Yerushalmi’s more nuanced, “dialectical” approach to Jewish Diaspora as both “exile” and “domicile”—that is, “the simultaneous awareness of being in exile, yet the profound sense of attachment to the land or place in which one lives, the sentiment in exile of feeling at home” (Yerushalmi, 6)—surely points the way forward for future investigations of the matter, even with respect to the pre-A.D. 70 situation (including, I would argue, Philo [see Scott 1995]).

3. Old Testament Stories and Expectations.

The most familiar story of exile is found in the Deuteronomistic History (the name commonly given corporately to the books of Deuteronomy, Joshua, Judges, 1-2 Samuel, 1-2 Kings). This composition accounts for the fall of the northern kingdom primarily by its comments on Jeroboam and the dynasty of Omri, and by its concluding summary in 2 Kings 17:7-23. Jeroboam’s sins consisted of erecting sanctuaries at Bethel and Dan (1 Kings 12:30; 13:34), which were viewed as violations of the law of the single sanctuary (e.g., Deut 12:1-28) and as centers of idolatry (1 Kings 12:28-33; 14:15-16). The summary in 2 Kings 17:21-23 reads, “When [the LORD] had torn Israel from the house of David, they made Jeroboam son of Nebat king. Jeroboam drove Israel from following the LORD and made them commit great sin.

The people of Israel continued in all the sins that Jeroboam committed; they did not depart from them until the LORD removed Israel out of his sight, as he had foretold through all his servants the prophets. So Israel was exiled from their own land to Assyria until this day.”

In a very similar way, the Deuteronomistic History describes the fall of the southern kingdom as stemming from the sins of Rehoboam and his successors, frequently comparing Judah's kings with the northern kings in this regard (e.g., 2 Kings 8:18, 27; 16:3; 21:3). In the end, the fate of the southern kingdom was the same as that of Israel: “So Judah went into exile out of its land” (2 Kings 25:21).

Although, according to the conventional story, the inhabitants of the northern kingdom were believed to have remained in Assyrian exile “until this day” (2 Kings 17:23 [cf. Josephus, Ant. 11.133]), the exile of Judah to Babylon is understood to have been brought to an end by the decree of Cyrus permitting the rebuilding of the temple (Ezra 6:3-5) and the return of the exiles to Jerusalem (2 Chron 36:23; Ezra 1:2-4).

As familiar as this story may be, it is not the only version of events. We may cite, for example, Chronicles' apparently divergent perspective that the exile of northern Israel was limited to the Transjordan tribes, with no mention of the conquests of Tiglath-pileser in Galilee or the final destruction of and deportation from Samaria (see Japhet). Of course, differences in the perspective on the nature and extent of exile directly affect reports on and expectations of return and restoration (see Gowan). For a convenient assembly and examination of the OT texts relating to exile (both Assyrian and Babylonian), including extensive philological analysis of the Hebrew and Greek vocabularies of exile, see J. Kiefer's comprehensive study (Kiefer, 25-229, 437-695), which has not yet received the attention it deserves (on the Babylonian exile, see also Grabbe; Albertz).

In view of the problematic assumptions often made about the basic storyline of the OT relating to exile and restoration, the commonly held division of history and literature into “preexilic” and “postexilic” should be regarded as a highly problematic watershed. This is all the more true in light of subsequent Jewish tradition, to which we now turn.

4. Ongoing Exile? Restoration Already and/or Not Yet?

In later Jewish tradition the entire period after the fall of Jerusalem and the destruction of the temple in A.D. 70 up to modern times was conceived of as one long period of “exile” (see Yerushalmi). Is the concept of an ongoing exile also represented in early Jewish literature of the Second Temple period?

First, a highly schematic answer to this question has been given in effect by J. Neusner (Neusner 1987), who actually defines Judaism(s) in terms of the recurrent theme of exile and return/restoration, which acts as a kind of self-fulfilling prophecy. According to Neusner, the historical events of 586 B.C. (the exile to Babylon) and 450 B.C. (the return from Babylonian exile) are transformed in the Pentateuch's retrojected picture of the history and destiny of Israel into that generative myth of exile and return that characterizes every Judaism, then to now. In other words, even though only relatively few Jews were exiled to Babylon in the first place (most Jews remained in the land all along) and many exiled Jews never returned to the land from Babylonia, the “Judaic system,” as Neusner calls it, regards the historic events of 586 B.C. and 450 B.C. as normative for all subsequent “Judaisms,” because in a situation in which a vast number of Jews continued to live outside the land in foreign countries, the ongoing reading of the Pentateuch perpetuated the need for right living that would create the preconditions for restoration. Judaism, then, took shape as the system that accounted for the death and resurrection of Israel, the Jewish people, and pointed for the source of renewed life toward sanctification now and salvation at the end of time.

There are problems with this definition of Judaism. First, the omission of any reference to the northern tribes of Israel seems unwarranted in view of the evidence (see further below). Second, as a description of Second Temple Judaism(s), Neusner's definition would be more convincing if he had argued for it on the basis of actual early Jewish texts instead of theorizing in a generalizing and schematic way. For example, as M. A. Knibb has shown in much more specific detail (Knibb 1976; 2000), a number of Jewish texts in this period (e.g., Dan 9:24-27; CD-A I, 1—II, 1; 1 En. 93:8-10; Jub. 1:13-18) “present the exilic and postexilic periods as a unity, a state of exile, which was only brought to an end long after the return in the sixth century—in Daniel 9 in the events of the time of Antiochus IV Epiphanies; in the Damascus Document, 1 Enoch, and Jubilees, which are probably all concerned with the origins of the same group, by God's bringing into existence a chosen group, the Essenes or their immediate predecessors” (Knibb 2000, 276). The idea that such a Jewish group could emerge long after the historic return and see itself as bringing exile to an end (or at least inaugurating the beginning of the end) is, of course, highly suggestive for an understanding of the Jesus of the Gospels within a Jewish matrix. For example, the Matthean genealogy of Jesus (Mt 1:2-17), which repeatedly emphasizes the “exile to Babylon” as a major turning point in its tripartite, fourteen-generation structure (Mt 1:11, 12, 17), suggests apparently that the entirety of the final fourteen generations “from the exile to Babylon to the Messiah” is characterized as a period of “exile” in some sense.

This brings us to a second prominent answer to the question of whether Jews in the Second Temple period regarded the exile as ongoing. In his reconstructions of the Jewish context of Jesus and of Jesus’ own intentions, Wright (e.g., Wright, xvii-xviii, 126-29) has been roundly criticized for arguing that Jews, even those already living in the traditional land of Israel, regarded themselves as “still in exile” and awaited the “end of exile” or the “return from exile.” These criticisms have not considered the issues being raised in the present article, including, for instance, the aforementioned flexible use of the term exile in the ancient world, even for voluntary expatriation, and the metaphorical uses of the concept by the time of the first century, particularly those involved in asserting a sociocultural self-positioning with respect to the Roman Empire. Moreover, these criticisms are valid only on the assumption of the aforementioned conventional view that we are dealing exclusively with the exile of Judah to Babylon, and that “the exile” was brought to an end by the decree of Cyrus. If either of these assumptions proves unfounded, as indeed the evidence in the preceding paragraph would already indicate, then some Jews may well have thought of themselves as still in exile, even if they were already back in the land. The massive Jewish material from the Second Temple period and beyond, which Kiefer (Kiefer, 230-436, appendices) has collected and analyzed, while certainly variegated, demonstrates the existence of numerous texts containing the notion of an ongoing exile (see also Steck, who is still helpful on this front).

Another issue that has been largely ignored in all of this debate over the possibility of an ongoing exile is that “Israel” traditionally comprises all twelve tribes (e.g., Let. Arist. 39, 47-51; cf. Eupolemus [according to Eusebius, Praep. ev. 9.34.2], who, reflecting Hasmonean expansionism to the north, refers to “the twelve tribes of the Jews”). Hence, as long as all the northern tribes—and most of the population of even the southern tribes—remained outside the land (cf. Josephus, Ant. 11.131-133), the status of the whole people of Israel could be conceived as one of “exile” (see Goldenberg, esp. 87-88; cf. Ezek 39:28). This is not to deny that definitions of who was included in (true) “Israel” varied widely during the Second Temple period, but rather to recall that the idea of “all Israel” in the sense of all twelve tribes was never completely eclipsed (for a preliminary study, see Scott 2001, 496-515). The notion of the solidarity of all Israel is a subject that requires further investigation based on the relevant sources, especially since it is probably a key to understanding the Jesus tradition. Note, for example, that already in Deuteronomy the second-person singular address of Israel is suited to the book’s concept of Israel as a corporate entity, even across the generations (cf., similarly, Dan 9:4-19) and is a key component of its covenantal theology (see McConville).

5. The Twelve and Jesus’ Ministry to All Israel.

There is no more important indication of the theme of exile and restoration in the Jesus tradition than that of the Twelve and Jesus’ ministry to all Israel. According to the Gospels, Jesus surrounded himself with an inner circle of twelve followers (see Disciples and Discipleship). Although there have been persistent questions about the actual existence of this group and its composition (see Meier), here these complex issues will be bracketed and the focus instead will be on the apparent function of Jesus’ inner circle in the Gospels.

In the context of his proclamation of the coming of the *kingdom of God, Jesus’ gathering around himself of a cadre of twelve men symbolically evokes the expectation of the regathering of the twelve tribes of Israel, which is amply represented in OT and Jewish tradition (see Sanders 1985, 95-106; 1992, 289-98; Allison 1998, 101-2, 141-45). Hence, in line with this expectation, Jesus, according to *Q tradition, promised the Twelve, “You will sit on twelve thrones judging/ruling the twelve tribes of Israel [i.e., at the consummation of the kingdom of God, when all twelve tribes of Israel will have been regathered]” (Mt 19:28 // Lk 22:30) (see Horbury; Allison 1998, 141-45). Are we dealing here with a conception of the restoration of the status quo ante based on Deuteronomic legislation, which envisions “the ‘distribution of powers’ in Israel among a number of classes of officials in [Deut] 16.18-18.22, all subordinate to the ‘thou’ [i.e., corporate Israel] in 16.18” (McConville, 34)?

The Synoptic portrayal of the geographical trajectory of Jesus’ ministry further underscores the focus on the return and restoration of all Israel. Beginning in Galilee, located in the traditional territory of the northern tribes, and ending in Jerusalem, the object of eschatological expectations about a restored cultic and/or political center for the regathered tribes of Israel, Jesus' gathering of the Twelve and leading them on a circuitous route from north to south constitutes a veritable prophetic demonstration that symbolically reconstitutes the whole people of Israel at its common center (see Freyne).

It is in this context that we begin to comprehend Luke's spotlight on an elderly widow, Anna, who was continually praying and fasting in the temple, and who, upon seeing the infant Jesus there, began "to speak about the child to all who were looking for the redemption of Jerusalem" (Lk 2:36-38), using the language of restoration. The text emphasizes her patronymic and her tribal affiliation: "There was also a prophet, Anna the daughter of Phanuel, of the tribe of Asher" (Lk 2:36). As R. Bauckham details, the names of both Anna and her father, Phanuel, have strong associations, through the book of Tobit, with the northern tribes of Israel that had gone into Assyrian exile (Bauckham 2002). Asher is, of course, one of the tribes of the northern kingdom of Israel, whose original territory lay in the western highlands of Galilee (note that Luke's narrative has Jesus' family return to Galilee directly after this pericope [Lk 2:39]). Bauckham also argues that the book of Tobit was actually written by an Assyrian exile in Media (Bauckham 2006). In any case, the portrayal of members of the northern kingdom who, like Anna, look forward to the end of exile and the restoration of *Jerusalem is a theme in Jewish tradition (e.g., Tob 13—14; 4Q372 1 [see Kugler; Thiessen]; interpretation of these two texts in light of one another is an urgent desideratum). Bauckham's seminal work on traditions relating the northern tribes of Israel (see also Allison 1998, 141; Pitre) perhaps will encourage other scholars to investigate the possible implications of this relatively neglected subject for the interpretation of Jesus and the Gospels (once again, there is abundant material in Kiefer, 230-436). According to many of these texts, the northern tribes were not "lost" (except perhaps in the sense of the term as used in Is 27:13), and certainly they had not simply "disappeared."

The mention of the northern tribes of Israel immediately raises the question of the identity and status of the *Samaritans, who figure prominently in the Jesus tradition at various points (see Meier, 532-49). The issue is extremely complex in both the Gospels themselves and other ancient literature. We have already noted 4Q372 1, which gives voice to the anguished exiles of the northern kingdom (collectively called "Joseph") who regard the contemporary Samaritans as usurpers of their territory and call upon God as "Father" to remedy the situation. Similarly, Josephus handles the Samaritans very antagonistically, emphasizing, for example, their foreign "Cuthean" origins and their political opportunism: "But they [the Samaritans] alter their attitude according to circumstances and, when they see the Jews prospering, call them their kinsmen [syngeneis], on the ground that they are descended from Joseph and are related to them through their origin from him, but, when they see the Jews in trouble, they say that they have nothing whatever in common with them nor do these have any claim of friendship or race, and they declare themselves to be aliens of another race" (Josephus, Ant. 9.290-291). Despite these hostile contemporary portrayals, the Samaritans were Yahwists who saw themselves, and were seen by others, as "Israel." Some, if not most, of them likely were descendants of those who lived in the northern kingdom of Israel, and in any case, they identified themselves with the traditions of Israel. At the same time, the claim that "Israel" consisted only of Jews/Judeans and those who accepted the authority of Jerusalem-centered divine traditions was a long-standing point of contention between Samaritans/Israelites and Jews/Judeans (see, e.g., Jn 4:20-21). Thus, between these two Yahwistic neighbors, contradictory claims were held about who was Israel and what the divine teachings of Yahweh that defined Israel consisted of. The Samaritans had a diaspora in the Mediterranean world that extended as far as Rome. In an inscription dating between 150 B.C. and 50 B.C. (and another very similar one dating to an even earlier period), the diaspora Samaritan population on the small island in the central Aegean referred to themselves as "The Israelites on Delos [hoi en Dēlō Israēleitai] who make offerings to sacred Argarizein [= hr grzym], i.e., the Samaritan temple on Mount Gerizim, which had been constructed in the late fourth century B.C.]" (see Levine, 110). During the same period, the name "Jeroboam" appears on coins from Samaria (Meshorer, 1:31, 160). In both cases, the implication is that the Samaritans are the descendants of the northern kingdom of Israel.

In view of the Samaritans' claim to be the true Israel, how, according to the Gospels, did Jesus respond to them, especially if, as I have suggested, Jesus' mission was to inaugurate the restoration of all Israel? The Gospels present a varied picture. On the one hand, Matthew's Gospel refers to the Samaritans only in the negative command that Jesus gives the Twelve at the beginning of the missionary discourse:

“Do not go to the Gentiles, and do not enter a city of Samaritans; go rather to the lost sheep of the house of Israel” (Mt 10:5-6). On this view, Jesus purposely excluded the Samaritans from his mission and seems to place them as in a category separate from both “Gentiles” and “Israel.” On the other hand, Luke-Acts portrays the Samaritans in a much more positive light (although not exclusively so [see Lk 9:52-53]) and explicitly includes them in Jesus’ missionary agenda. For example, in the story of Jesus’ healing of the ten lepers (Lk 17:11-19), the only one of them who returns to thank Jesus is identified as a Samaritan (Lk 17:16). Although Jesus refers to him as “this foreigner” (ho allogenēs houtos), in contrast to the other nine lepers, who presumably are Jews (Lk 17:17-18), this contemptuous label reflects popular Jewish opinion about the Samaritans and probably is meant as a rhetorical device to emphasize the irony of the situation rather than being an indication of Jesus’ own perspective. This interpretation is bolstered by the preceding parable of the Good Samaritan (Luke 10:29-37 [on the numerous interpretive issues in this parable, see Snodgrass, 338-62]). When a lawyer asks Jesus what he must do to inherit eternal life, Jesus asks him in turn what is written in the law, to which the lawyer answers in terms of citations from Deuteronomy 6:5 (love of God) and Leviticus 19:18 (love of neighbor). When Jesus approves of the lawyer’s answer, exhorting the man to act accordingly and he will live, the lawyer asks a follow-up question: “And who is my neighbor?” (Lk 10:29; cf. Lk 10:36). Instead of giving a straightforward answer, Jesus tells the parable of the good Samaritan, once again putting the interpretive burden on the lawyer. In the story, it is a Samaritan who comes to aid of the half-dead man on the road, whereas the priest and the Levite (both Jews) simply pass by on the other side. The fact that this parable occurs within the broader context of Luke’s central section (Lk 9:51–19:27), which narrates Jesus’ journey from Galilee to Jerusalem via Samaria, suggests that the Samaritan’s connection with the traditional land of Israel is part of the point of the story, for the land of Israel is the place where the entire Deuteronomic law, including love of God and of one’s neighbor, must be carried out as the condition for long life in the land (cf. Deut 4:25-26, 40; 5:16, 33; 6:1-3; 11:8-9, 18-21; 22:6-7; 25:15; 30:15-20; 32:46-47) (see Talmon, 150; on very long life in the land as a Deuteronomic blessing in the time of Israel’s restoration, see Scott 2005, 103-43). Moreover, if, according to Deuteronomy, “You shall not see your neighbor’s [lit., ‘brother’s’] donkey or ox fallen on the road and ignore it; you shall help to lift it up” (Deut 22:4), then so much more Israelites must not ignore, but rather help to lift up, their neighbor who has fallen on the road. The Samaritan in Jesus’ story fulfills this covenantal responsibility in an exemplary way and thereby models the brotherly unity between north and south that issues in the divine blessing of life everlasting (cf. Ps 133). Further corroboration that Luke-Acts regards the Samaritans as part of Israel is found in Acts 1:8, where the resurrected Jesus gives instructions about the Spirit-impelled *mission that is expected to radiate out from Jerusalem: the Greek grammar of the text (en te Ierousalēm kai [en] pasē tē Ioudaia kai Samareia) subtly expresses an inner unity between Jerusalem, Judea and Samaria (note the particle te, which connects concepts of the same kind, and the single article tē governing the compound object of the preposition, which shows that Judea and Samaria are regarded as amalgamated [cf., e.g., Ezek 37:15-28]). Thus, for Luke-Acts, the particular restoration of all Israel is seen as the foundation for a universal mission “to the end of the earth.”

See also GOSPEL: GOOD NEWS; ISRAEL; JUDAISM, COMMON; KINGDOM OF GOD/HEAVEN; SALVATION.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R. Albertz, Israel in Exile: The History and Literature of the Sixth Century B.C.E., trans. D. Green (SBL SBL 3; Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature, 2003); D. C. Allison Jr., Jesus of Nazareth: Millenarian Prophet (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1998); idem, The Historical Christ and the Theological Jesus (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2009); R. Bauckham, “Anna of the Tribe of Asher [Luke 2:36-37],” in Gospel Women: Studies in Named Women in the Gospels (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2002) 77-107; idem, “Tobit as a Parable for the Exiles of Northern Israel,” in Studies in the Book of Tobit: A Multidisciplinary Approach, ed. M. Bredin (LSTS 55; London: T & T Clark, 2006) 140-64; S. M. Bryan, Jesus and Israel’s Traditions of Judgement and Restoration (SNTSMS 117; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2002); J. A. Dennis, Jesus’ Death and the Gathering of True Israel: The Johannine Appropriation of Restoration Theology in the Light of John 11:47-52 (WUNT 2/217; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2006); S. Freyne, “The Geography of Restoration: Galilee-Jerusalem Relations in Early Jewish and Christian Experience,” in Restoration: Old Testament, Jewish, and Christian Perspectives, ed. J. M. Scott (JSJSup 72; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2001) 405-33; M. E. Fuller, The Restoration of Israel: Israel’s Re-gathering and the Fate of the Nations in Early Jewish Literature and Luke-Acts (BZNW 138; Berlin: de Gruyter, 2006); J. F. Gaertner, “The Discourse of Displacement in Greco-Roman Antiquity,”

- in Writing Exile: The Discourse of Displacement in Greco-Roman Antiquity and Beyond, ed. J. F. Gaertner (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2007) 1-21; D. Goldenberg, "Scythian-Barbarian: The Permutations of a Classical Topos in Jewish and Christian Texts of Late Antiquity," JJS 49 (1998) 87-102; S. Goldhill, "Whose Antiquity? Whose Modernity? The 'Rainbow Bridges' of Exile," Antike und Abendland 46 (2000) 1-20; D. E. Gowan, Eschatology in the Old Testament (2nd ed.; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 2000); L. L. Grabbe, ed., Leading Captivity Captive: "The Exile" as History and Ideology (JSOTSup 278; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1998); W. Horbury, "The Twelve and the Phylarchs," NTS 32 (1986) 503-27; S. Japhet, "Exile and Restoration in the Book of Chronicles," in The Crisis of Israelite Religion: Transformation of Religious Tradition in Exile and Post-Exilic Times, ed. B. Becking and M. C. A. Korpel (OtSt 42; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1999) 33-44; J. Kiefer, Exil und Diaspora: Begrifflichkeit und Deutungen im antiken Judentum und in der hebräischen Bibel (ABG 19; Leipzig: Evangelische Verlagsanstalt, 2005); M. A. Knibb, "The Exile in the Literature of the Intertestamental Period," HeyJ 17 (1976) 253-72; idem, "Exile," in Encyclopedia of the Dead Sea Scrolls, ed. L. H. Schiffman and J. C. VanderKam (2 vols.; Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2000) 1:276-77; R. A. Kugler, "Joseph at Qumran: The Importance of 4Q372 Frg. 1 in Extending a Tradition," in Studies in the Hebrew Bible, Qumran, and the Septuagint: Presented to Eugene Ulrich, ed. P. W. Flint, E. Tov and J. C. VanderKam (VTSup 101; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2006) 261-78; J. D. Levenson, Resurrection and Restoration of Israel: The Ultimate Victory of the God of Life (New Haven: Yale University Press, 2006); L. I. Levine, The Ancient Synagogue: The First Thousand Years (New Haven: Yale University Press, 2000); J. G. McConville, "Singular Address in the Deuteronomical Law and the Politics of Legal Administration," JSOT 97 (2002) 19-36; J. P. Meier, "Jesus in Relation to His Followers: The Existence and Nature of the Twelve," in A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus, 3: Companions and Competitors (ABRL; New York: Doubleday, 2001) 125-97; Y. Meshorer, Ancient Jewish Coinage (2 vols.; Dix Hills, NY: Amphora Books, 1982); J. Neusner, Self-Fulfilling Prophecy: Exile and Return in the History of Judaism (Boston: Beacon, 1987); C. C. Newman, ed., Jesus and the Restoration of Israel: A Critical Assessment of N. T. Wright's "Jesus and the Victory of God" (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1999); B. J. Pitre, Jesus, the Tribulation, and the End of the Exile: Restoration Eschatology and the Origin of the Atonement (WUNT 2/204; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck; Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2005); D. T. Runia, "The Theme of Flight and Exile in the Allegorical Thought-World of Philo of Alexandria," SPhilo 21 (2009) 1-24; E. P. Sanders, Jesus and Judaism (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985); idem, "Common Judaism: Hopes for the Future," in Judaism: Practice and Belief, 63 BCE-66 CE (London: SCM; Philadelphia: Trinity Press International, 1992) 279-303; J. M. Scott, "Philo and the Restoration of Israel," SBLSP 34 (1995) 553-75; idem, ed., Exile: Old Testament, Jewish, and Christian Conceptions (JSJSup 56; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1997); idem, ed., Restoration: Old Testament, Jewish, and Christian Perspectives (JSJSup 72; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2001); idem, "And Then All Israel Will Be Saved' (Rom 11:26)" in Restoration: Old Testament, Jewish, and Christian Perspectives, ed. J. M. Scott (JSJSup 72; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2001) 489-528; idem, On Earth as in Heaven: The Restoration of Sacred Space and Sacred Time in the Book of Jubilees (JSJSup 91; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2004); idem, review of D. L. Smith-Christopher, A Biblical Theology of Exile, JSS 50 (2005) 218-22; K. Snodgrass, Stories with Intent: A Comprehensive Guide to the Parables of Jesus (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2008); O. H. Steck, Israel und das gewaltsame Geschick der Propheten: Untersuchungen zur Überlieferung des deuteronomistischen Geschichtsbildes im Alten Testament, Spätjudentum und Urchristentum (WMANT 23; Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1967); S. Talmon, "Der 'barmherzige Samariter'—Ein 'guter Israelit'?" KI 16 (2001) 149-60; M. Thiessen, "4Q372 1 and the Continuation of Joseph's Exile," DSD 15 (2008) 380-95; T. Whitmarsh, "Greece Is the World: Exile and Identity in the Second Sophistic," in Being Greek Under Rome: Cultural Identity, the Second Sophistic and the Development of Empire, ed. S. Goldhill (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001) 269-305; N. T. Wright, Jesus and the Victory of God (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1996); Y. H. Yerushalmi, "Exile and Expulsion in Jewish History," in Crisis and Creativity in the Sephardic World, 1391-1648, ed. B. R. Gampel (New York: Columbia University Press, 1997) 3-22.

J. M. Scott

EXORCISM. See DEMON, DEVIL, SATAN; MIRACLES AND MIRACLE STORIES.

EYEWITNESS. See HISTORICISMS AND HISTORIOGRAPHY; WITNESS.

F

FAITH

Faith is one of the most important concepts in the Gospels. It is not surprising that pistis (“faith, faithfulness”) and pisteuō (“believe, trust”) have subsequently become the central theological terms for the Christian religion. These terms occur 243 times in the NT, more frequently than “kingdom” (162x), “grace” (156x), “church” (114x), “save” (107x) and “righteousness” (92x). The concept also is found in passages that deal with trust in *God. In the Gospels “faith” refers to belief in God’s words, trust in his Son Jesus Christ (see Son of God), and faithfulness in living out his demands.

1. Historical Developments
2. Faith in the Gospels
3. Summary

1. Historical Developments.

Contrary to the claims of R. Bultmann (TDNT 6:181) and the history-of-religions school, pistis/pisteuō as a central Christian term has no parallels or precedents in Greek religions. Rather, the term and the concept are rooted in the Jewish biblical tradition. In the OT the basic demand of God from humans is ’emûnâ (“faith/faithfulness”)—that is, faith in his words and, accordingly, faithfulness in carrying out his commandments. Faith therefore is theocentric. As an exemplar of faith, *Abraham trusts in God’s promise (Gen 15:6) and diligently obeys his commands (Gen 22:18; 26:5).

In the Second Temple period faith is expressed in variegated forms. While the element of trust in God is maintained in most literature (e.g., Philo, Sacr. 70-71; 1QH^a XVI, 17), there is a tendency in some Jewish sectors to equate faithfulness in carrying out God’s commandments with works-righteousness (e.g., 1 Macc 2:50-52; 4QMMT) (see Yeung, 241-52). When taken to the extreme, faithfulness to God’s *law can become the kind of self-righteousness that Jesus strongly denounces (Mt 23).

The OT understanding of faith is sustained in Jesus. What is new about Jesus is that, with his coming, faith in God becomes faith in his special emissary Jesus, who faithfully accomplishes God’s will in bringing *salvation to his people.

In the Synoptic Gospels the noun pistis is used almost exclusively in relation to *miracles, except in Luke 18:8; 22:32, where it refers to the fidelity of *disciples. Faith precipitates many of Jesus’ miracles (e.g., Mk 2:5; 5:34). Conversely, the lack of faith is seen as a hindrance to Jesus’ miracles (Mt 13:58 // Mk 6:5-6).

These texts have been seen by some scholars as compositions reflecting the development of belief in the early church that the earthly Jesus was to be the object of faith in the same way as the risen Lord. According to scholars such as Bultmann, the historical Jesus did not claim to be the Messiah (see Christ), and the Synoptic Jesus, unlike the Johannine Jesus, does not demand faith in his own person (Bultmann, 1:9). Jesus was at most a miracle worker. It is only the post-Easter church that turns Jesus into the center of faith. The phrase “who believes in me” (Mt 18:6) is thus a Matthean addition rather than an actual phrase used by Jesus (cf. Mk 9:42). In this way, a wedge is driven between the “miracle faith” of Jesus and the “salvation/kerygma” faith of Paul.

To the contrary, however, there is good evidence that the Jesus of the Gospels consistently demands faith in his own person. His proclamation of the imminent coming of the *kingdom of God calls for faith not only in the truth of the message but also in himself as the one who brings the kingdom (Mk 1:14-15). He is not only God’s *prophet who can perform healings (Mk 9:23), but also the “Son of Man,” who has authority to judge and to forgive sins on behalf of God (Mk 2:5; cf. Dan. 7:13-14). Above all, he demands faith in himself as the Messiah (Mk 8:29; Mk 10:47 [“Son of David”* = Messiah]).

Moreover, the alleged “miracle faith” of Jesus is actually “saving faith” by nature. This is illustrated by the formula “your faith has healed/saved [sōzō] you” which appears seven times in four distinct episodes in the Synoptic Gospels ([1] Mt 9:22 // Mk 5:34 // Lk 8:48; [2] Mk 10:52 // Lk 18:42; [3] Lk 7:50; [4] Lk 17:19). By the time of Jesus, the Greek word sōzō had become a comprehensive term to communicate the Jewish concept of healing as well as salvation, and this development offers the best background for Jesus’ use of the formula. In the Jewish healing tradition people are understood to be single entities. A person’s physical well-being is an indication of that person’s harmonious relationship with God. Since God is the ultimate author of illness (cf. Ex 15:26), illness is perceived as an unfavorable plight from which a person (whether innocent sufferer or sinning suppliant) can be saved by turning to God in faith. Seen in this light, in the four episodes mentioned above, the bleeding woman, Bartimaeus and the Samaritan leper receive salvation as much as the sinful woman in that all are restored to a harmonious relationship with God. Thus, it is totally unfounded to posit an artificial dichotomy between the “miracle faith” of Jesus and the “salvation/kerygma faith” of Paul.

2. Faith in the Gospels.

The theme of faith is intricately woven into the fabric of the theology of the four Gospels. Although each Gospel has its own emphasis, the four perspectives complement one another in producing a portrayal of faith along the same line as ’emūnā in the OT.

2.1. Faith in Mark. Faith is a dominant theme in Mark. Its pervasiveness far exceeds the eighteen occurrences of the pisteuō group of words (the noun pistis [5x], the verb pisteuō [10x] and some related words, not including the heavy density of pisteuō words in the longer ending of Mark [Mk 16:9-20]). Since the identity of the earthly Jesus is open to those who have faith in him, the tendency among scholars to interpret this Gospel using the filter of the “messianic secret,” according to which the historical Jesus does not think that he is the Messiah, is to be rejected (see C. Marshall, 240). The fact that Jesus admonishes his disciples not to disclose his identity at the early phase of his ministry is better explained by his own timing in revealing his identity as the Messiah rather than as a later cover-up by his disciples to explain away why Jesus does not openly declare his messiahship.

Faith in Mark is theocentric (Mk 11:22). It is required to embrace the *gospel from God (Mk 1:15) and to accept Jesus as the Messiah of God (Mk 8:29). Faith also, paradoxically, is related to the theme of revelation. On the one hand, the secrets of the kingdom of God are revealed by Jesus only to his believing disciples (Mk 4:11). When Mark poignantly remarks that Jesus “could not do any mighty work” in his hometown, the stress is on Jesus’ sovereignty not to reveal to those who refuse to believe (double negative in Mk 6:5; compare the softer tone in Mt 13:58: “he did not do many mighty works there,” where the emphasis is on human responsibility). On the other hand, the faith that the disciples exhibit is not something inherent in humans, but can only be granted by God. Thus, the believing disciples are continuously found to be lacking in faith and understanding (Mk 4:40; 6:50-52; 8:17-19; 9:19; 16:8). They need to grow in faith as Jesus Christ reveals greater truths to them. The process of revelation and growth in faith is symbolized by Jesus’ two-stage healing of the *blind man at Bethsaida (Mk 8:22-25), which is unique to Mark’s narrative.

This paradox of faith is well represented by the cry of the father of the epileptic boy: “I do believe [pisteuō], help my unbelief [apistia]!” (Mk 9:24). The plea is no contradiction in terms, but rather a deep recognition of one’s helplessness as well as a strong conviction that only God and his special agent Jesus can help. Faith therefore is closely tied to *prayer as one turns to God for help and thereby experiences the power of answered prayers (Mk 9:29; 11:22-24).

In regard to the debate about whether the faith of Jesus refers to Jesus’ faith in God or to Jesus as the object of faith, there is evidence of both in Mark. Jesus’ faith serves as an exemplar to his disciples as he carries out God’s will faithfully in pronouncing judgment on the unbelieving *Israel as symbolized by the fruitless fig tree (Mk 11:12-21). The disciples are expected to work wonders through such faith (Mk 11:23; cf. the removal of the Mount of Olives in the last days foretold in Zech 14:4). However, the bulk of the faith theme in Mark relates to Jesus as the center of faith. Jesus is the Messiah and, even more, the suffering and resurrected Messiah. Those who follow him in faith must follow him in radical discipleship “on the way” (en tē hodō) to the cross and resurrection (Mk 8:27; 10:33, 52).

2.2. Faith in Matthew. The pisteuō group of words appear over thirty times in Matthew, including the noun pistis (8x), the verb pisteuō (11x), the adjective pistos (5x) and some related words. A favorite expression of Matthew is “of small faith” (5x; oligopistos in Mt 6:30; 8:26; 14:31; 16:8; cf. the noun oligopistia in Mt 17:20), which appears outside Matthew only in Luke 12:28 (// Mt 6:30).

Faith in Matthew inherits the OT emphasis on faith expressed as faithfulness. It is closely tied to obedience and “righteousness,” the latter being a key term in Matthew referring to the kind of life and attitudes conforming to God’s standards (see Justice, Righteousness). As the ultimate exemplar of faith, Jesus is obedient to God unto death. A taunt from the disbelieving Jewish leaders, “he trusted [pepoithen] in God” (Mt 27:32), ironically fulfills the OT description of a true man of faith (cf. Ps 22:8). Jesus exhibits such righteousness at every juncture of his life (e.g., Mt 3:15; 26:39, 42).

However, Jesus is not merely an exemplar. By virtue of his obedience to God on the cross, he is able to save his people from sins (cf. Mt 1:21; 27:51). Therefore, not only does he call his disciples to imitate his faith, but also he demands recognition of himself as the Son of the living God, leading to consequent trust and obedience. On the basis of this recognition the Messiah builds “the church” (Mt 16:16–18)—the new *Israel of God—which is made up of both believing Jews and Gentiles (cf. Mt 8:10–11) (see Church).

Such believing acceptance of Jesus as the Christ is articulated by Peter, the typical disciple (Mt 16:16). However, this faith needs to grow if a disciple is to live out a “righteousness” that surpasses that of the *Pharisees (Mt 5:6, 10, 20). One must learn to trust God completely for daily provisions in order to be able to serve God with single-mindedness (Mt 6:24–34). To fall short of this is the mark of “little faith,” which is tainted with fears and anxieties (Mt 6:30). “Little faith” (oligopistia) is not the same as “no faith/unbelief” (apistia) in Matthew. The latter rejects Jesus the person and thus cannot experience Jesus’ miraculous power (Mt 13:58). “Little faith,” on the other hand, is a faith that sets out to follow Jesus but is tangled by doubts and worries along the way. It is nevertheless an initial faith in Jesus that has potential to grow. The resurrected Jesus urges his disciples to discard the “little faith,” as typified by Peter’s walking on the sea (cf. Mt 14:28–33; 28:17), so that they can capitalize on his living presence and become his effective witnesses among the nations (Mt 28:18–20).

2.3. Faith in Luke. As in Matthew, the pisteuō group of words occurs over thirty times in Luke, including the noun pistis (11x), the verb pisteuō (9x), the adjective pistos (6x) and some related words.

Faith in Luke is closely related to salvation and *repentance (e.g., Lk 7:50; 8:12; 17:19; 24:47). As symbolized by the parable of the sower, the kind of faith that leads to salvation accepts God’s word and produces fruit of repentance through perseverance (Lk 8:12). Genuine faith is accompanied by love for God and Christ (Lk 7:50) and produces radical discipleship (e.g., Lk 19:8–10). In this connection, Luke shifts the emphasis from the imminent return of Christ to “today” (note the profuse use of “today” [e.g., Lk 4:21; 13:32, 33; 19:9; 23:43] and “daily” [Lk 11:3]). Faith(fulness) is required “today” as disciples are preparing for the return of their master. Not only are the disciples encouraged to wait in faith for the ultimate vindication of God’s people (Lk 18:1–8), but also they are admonished to be faithful stewards as they face temptations in this world.

Luke lays special stress on the sharing of material wealth as a sign of faith and repentance (Lk 19:1–10). Money is not evil in itself, but it can become a temptation to greed and false security apart from God (Lk 12:13–21; 18:22–25). Not only should faithful disciples trust in God’s provision and not amass wealth for themselves, but also they should love their neighbors by sharing material possessions with those in need (Lk 12:22–34; 16:1–13; cf. Lk 16:19–31) (see Rich and Poor). Jesus Christ is seen particularly as God’s representative coming to aid the poor and the needy (e.g., Lk 4:18–21; 7:11–15, 36–50). Those who follow Christ must follow suit. Because discipleship is costly, Luke stresses that whoever wants to follow Christ must count the cost before the journey (Lk 14:25–33).

2.4. Faith in John. John’s Gospel differs from the Synoptic Gospels in the high occurrence of the verb pisteuō (98x) and the absence of the noun pistis. Other than the verb, the adjectives apistos (“disbelieving”) and pistos (“believing”) each occur once, in John 20:27. Despite earlier views to the contrary, the unique Johannine construction pisteuō eis (“believe in”) followed by the accusative object (no less than thirty-six cases) does not signify a deeper faith than that referred to by the construction pisteuō followed by the dative object. The latter can denote a faith as strong as the former (e.g., Jn 5:38, 46). The two constructions are merely stylistic variations.

The dominant use of the verb pisteuō contributes to a dynamic portrayal of faith. Faith in John is not creedal consent but essentially relationship. The purpose of this Gospel, as stated in John 20:31, is to help readers, both believers and nonbelievers, to build a trusting relationship with Jesus Christ. There the present subjunctive pisteuēte (“continue to believe” [NRSV footnote]) is a more probable reading than the aorist pisteusēte (“come to believe” [NRSV text]). Faith is a continuous activity of trust in Jesus Christ the living Word of God. While Jesus knows who truly believe in him (Jn 2:23-25), from a human perspective one must continue to believe (Jn 2:11), otherwise faith may end in shipwreck. The one who starts out to believe may either prove to be a genuine persevering believer (Jn 6:68-69) or turn out to be a hostile enemy of Jesus (cf. Jn 8:31, 59).

The relationship between faith and miracles in John's Gospel is paradoxical. In the Synoptic Gospels faith provides the platform for Jesus to perform his miracles (cf. Mt 13:58 // Mk 6:5-6). In John's Gospel, however, Jesus' miracles (called sēmeia, "signs") induce and promote faith as they serve as signs to direct people's understanding toward Jesus' identity and power (Jn 2:11). Therefore, to "come" and "see" Jesus provides a possibility for one to know Jesus better and enables one to "see" greater works of Jesus (Jn 1:46-51). Paradoxically, however, "seeing" Jesus' miracles does not necessarily guarantee faith. If seeing is not accompanied by spiritual insight, seeing may actually become a stumbling block to faith (Jn 6:26). Ultimately what is crucial is faith in Jesus' person and his words. Thus, to be able to believe the words of life without seeing miracles is most desirable, especially for John's readers, who will not be able to see the earthly Jesus themselves (Jn 20:29).

The dynamic nature of faith is expressed through the association of faith with sensory metaphors: faith "receives" (Jn 1:12), "eats and drinks" (Jn 6:35, 54), "abides" (Jn 15:7), "obeys" (Jn 14:21), "knows" (Jn 17:3, 8) and so forth. Faith leads to salvation as one partakes the life of the Father and the Son (Jn 17:3). John's Gospel relates faith with salvation more strongly than do the Synoptic Gospels.

3. Summary.

The four portrayals of faith in the four Gospels converge to highlight Jesus Christ as the object of faith. He is the Son sent by God the Father to bring salvation to people on earth. Faith in God in the end time must express itself in faith in Jesus as the Messiah. Such faith has to prove its genuineness in faithfulness in the form of radical discipleship. This is the natural development of OT ʾēmūnā and is also the basis of faith in the other NT writings.

See also BLINDNESS AND DEAFNESS; DISCIPLES AND DISCIPLESHIP; HARDNESS OF HEART; HEALING; JUSTICE, RIGHTEOUSNESS; MIRACLES AND MIRACLE STORIES; PRAYER; SALVATION.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. P. G. Bolt, "The Faith of Jesus Christ in the Synoptic Gospels and Acts," in The Faith of Jesus Christ: Exegetical, Biblical, and Theological Studies, ed. M. Bird and P. M. Sprinkle (Milton Keynes: Paternoster, 2009) 209-37; R. Bultmann, Theology of the New Testament, trans. K. Grobel (2 vols. in 1; repr., Waco, TX: Baylor University Press, 2007 [1951-1955]); N. Farely, The Disciples in the Fourth Gospel: A Narrative Analysis of Their Faith and Understanding (Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2008); J. B. Green, The Theology of the Gospel of Luke (NTT; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1995); C. R. Koester, The Word of Life: A Theology of John's Gospel (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2008); D. Lee, "The Gospel of John and the Five Senses," JBL 129, no. 1 (2010): 115-27; D. Lührmann, "Faith," ABD 2:749-58; U. Luz, The Theology of the Gospel of Matthew, trans. J. B. Robinson (NTT; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1995); C. D. Marshall, Faith as a Theme in Mark's Narrative (SNTSMS 64; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1989); I. H. Marshall, New Testament Theology: Many Witnesses, One Gospel (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2004); T. R. Schreiner, New Testament Theology: Magnifying God in Christ (Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2008); M. Yeung, Faith in Jesus and Paul: A Comparison with Special Reference to "Faith That Can Remove Mountains" and "Your Faith Has Healed/Saved You" (WUNT 147; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2002).

M. W. Yeung

FAMILY

In the worlds of Jesus and the Gospels, the family was a social, economic, political and theological cornerstone of life. In line with the centrality of family in antiquity, family language and imagery permeate the Gospels. Jesus visits houses, eats meals in houses, teaches in houses and heals in houses. Family relationships connect individuals to wider society. Jesus addresses and draws on family life in his teaching. The family as social reality, theological agent, and community is a key component in the life of Jesus and the stories of the Gospels.

1. The Family in Social Perspective
2. The Family in Theological Perspective
3. The Family in Gospel Perspective

1. The Family in Social Perspective.

The Gospels give glimpses of household life in Roman Palestine. Jairus appears with his wife and daughter (Mk 5:40-43). Peter's household includes his brother, wife and mother-in-law (Mk 1:30), and Martha lives with her siblings (Lk 10:40; Jn 11:1-3). A family in Nain is composed of a widow and her son (Lk 7:12). A Samaritan woman who has been married five times cohabits with a sixth man (Jn 4:16-18).

The large, wealthy households of Herod Antipas and the high priest incorporate slaves and soldiers (Mk 6:17-29; 14:47, 53-72). Family connections remain important even after death (Mt 8:21; Mk 12:18-23; Lk 16:27-28; Jn 11:17-44). Few people in the Gospels appear without reference to their families (exceptions include Mk 5:1-20, 25-34; Lk 13:11-13).

1.1. Family Composition. In general, in Jesus' world the family was a patrilocal household unit: women married into their husband's household, and the inheritance followed the male line. Blood and marriage were important factors in determining kinship, but so too were living and working together. In fact, oikia and oikos, both meaning "house," can indicate family (e.g., Mk 6:4; Lk 12:52; Jn 4:53). What an individual family looked like depended on wealth, the life cycle of a household, and the needs of the household, community and kin. Depending on their circumstances, households could include three or more generations, from a husband with his wife (or wives, as suggested in P. Yadin 26; P. Yadin 34) and unmarried siblings to their unmarried *children, married sons, and grandchildren. *Slaves, apprentices and workers in the family business were part of the household. Wealthier households might also include poor relations, friends or disconnected members of the community, such as widows. Households were flexible, extendable and always changing.

1.2. Authority in the Household. According to tradition and reinforced by political rhetoric, the family in Jesus' world was hierarchical in *authority. The eldest male of the household was the patriarch, possessing all the power that patriarchy entails. Husbands held power over their wives (see Sir 25:26; 4Q418 10, 3-10), and mothers and fathers were in authority over their children, including their adult children (Ex 20:12; Tob 4:3-4; Sir 3:1-16; 4Q418 9, 17-18). Jesus supports the power of parents (Mk 7:9-13; 10:19; cf. Lk 2:51), and his *parables reflect patriarchal hierarchy (Mt 18:23-34; 21:28-31; Lk 15:11-32). The challenge of these expectations makes stories like the parable of the prodigal son and Jesus' call of *disciples away from their homes quite surprising (Mt 8:21-22; 10:34-38; Lk 9:59-62; 15:11-32).

1.3. Household Life. Patriarchal power was the ideal in antiquity. In reality, however, this hierarchy was tempered by the needs of the household. The majority of families in Roman Palestine probably were relatively poor. Daily life revolved around the work of providing for the family. Fathers and mothers, adults and young children, slaves and others in the household had responsibilities in the house, the fields or businesses based in the home (see Mt 21:28-31; Mk 1:16-20; Lk 10:40; 15:25-32). Family members' contributions to the common life of the household gave women, children of all ages and even to some extent slaves their own power.

1.4. Households in Community. Households were strongly connected to the larger community. Like ancient Israelites, the Jews of Jesus' day saw themselves as family (see Mt 10:6; Lk 3:8; Jn 8:37-44). Households in a local community might treat each other as family, as in Luke 11:5-8; 15:3-10. Because of the public nature of private life in antiquity, furthermore, very little happened in a family without it being known and judged in the wider community. Nothing less than the public face of the household is at stake in Matthew 1:18-19; Mark 6:3-4; Luke 15:11-32.

2. The Family in Theological Perspective.

In Deuteronomy, a book of great importance in Second Temple Judaism, the family is the agent of the covenant. The story of *Israel and the ways of the covenant are lived and taught in houses marked with the words of the law. The family also provides a model for (or is modeled on) God's parental relationship with Israel (see, e.g., Deut 5:14; 6:1-9; 12:12; 14:26). The theological significance of the family in teaching and embodying Israel's identity remained strong through the Second Temple period. Jesus, his disciples and his audiences learned to keep the covenant and worship God in their family households.

2.1. Family Religion. Religion was a family affair in the Greco-Roman world. Families worshiped the household gods, honored the ancestors, and kept various cultic celebrations together at home as well as in temples. Likewise in Second Temple Judaism, children learned the laws of the covenant and the stories of the ancestors in their homes (see Deut 6:20-25; Sus 3; 4 Macc 18:10-19; Philo, Spec. 2.225-236; Josephus, Ag. Ap. 2.204-206; Ant. 4.260-264). Families celebrated the *Sabbath weekly and kept numerous *feasts and sacrifices throughout the Jewish year, worshiping at home as well as in public spaces like the *temple (see, e.g., Ex 20:8-11; Deut 16:9-15; Esther 9:26-28; Tob 2:1-2; m. Pesah 10:2-8).

The Gospels rarely picture families keeping the covenant together (though see Lk 2:21-24, 2:41-51), but Jesus teaches in homes (e.g., Mk 1:32-33; 2:1-2; 3:19-20), and the disciples on their mission take the message to houses (Mt 10:11-13; Mk 6:10), where surely families were present. Parents bring children to Jesus to be healed or blessed (e.g., Mk 5:21-43; 9:14-29; 10:13-16). Mothers, fathers and children are present when Jesus teaches and miraculously feeds the crowds (Mt 14:21; 15:38). Families are present and important in Jesus' ministry.

Families and local communities in the Gospels also guard the covenant. In Deuteronomy families are given responsibility for punishing certain infractions of the covenant (Deut 13:6-11; 21:18-21; 22:13-21; cf. Ex 32:25-29; 1 Macc 2:42-48; 4 Macc 2:10-13). In the Second Temple period both Philo and Josephus reinforce the use of these laws (Philo, Spec. 1.316-318; 2.232-234; Josephus, Ag. Ap. 2.206; Ant. 4.246-248, 260-264; 16.356-369). When the people of Nazareth attempt to kill Jesus (Lk 4:29), they may be seeking to follow Deuteronomy 21:18-21. Deuteronomy 13:6-11 likely lies behind the warning that families would turn the disciples over to be killed for preaching the gospel (Mt 10:21-22; Mk 13:12-13). From the perspective of Jews who did not follow Jesus, Jesus and his disciples taught disobedience to the covenant (see esp. Acts 6:13-14; Acts 21:20-21), and their families had a serious responsibility to protect the covenant against this threat.

2.2. God and Israel. According to biblical tradition, Israel is the family of *God. The metaphor of God as parent and Israel as child pervades the OT and Second Temple Judaism. God gives birth to, nurses, and raises Israel (e.g., Deut 32:6, 10-14; Is 46:3; Hos 11:1-4). Israel should obey God as parent, but all too frequently, like the disobedient son in Deuteronomy 21:18-21, Israel rebels against God (Deut 8:1-6; 32:4-20; Jer 2:27-29; cf. Prov 3:11-12). This metaphor provides a framework for understanding God's relationship with Israel and also gives significance to human families: parents become like God in the household, and children's obedience or disobedience reflects the state of the nation (see esp. Sir 3:6; L.A.B. 44:7; Philo, Spec. 2.225-226; Josephus, Ag. Ap. 2.206).

In the Gospels Jesus prays to God as Father and teaches his followers to do the same (Mt 6:5-15; Mk 11:25; 14:36; Lk 10:21; 11:1-4). Jesus and his followers do the will of God the Father, even to the point of death (Mk 3:35; 14:36). For Matthew, God alone is Father (see esp. Mt 23:9). The Father provides for his children (Mt 6:25-33; 7:7-11), and the children, Jesus' followers, are to do the will of their Father (e.g., Mt 6:10; 7:21; 12:50). In John's Gospel Jesus is emphatically the Son of God the Father (e.g., Jn 1:14; 3:16; 5:17-18), and the invitation to become God's children is extended to the audience (e.g., Jn 1:11-13; 3:1-8; 4:23-24). The metaphor of God as Father is particularly important for the Gospels' conception of the identity of Jesus and his followers.

3. The Family in Gospel Perspective.

According to the Gospels, Jesus had two families: one composed of *Mary, Joseph and various brothers and sisters, and one composed of his disciples and other followers. The stories of the disciples reflect a similar experience. Some of the strongest, most shocking statements in the Gospels develop from the tension and even competition between the two types of families.

3.1. Jesus' Birth Family. Matthew 1:18-25; Luke 1:26-38; 2:1-7 tell of Jesus' birth to a virgin, Mary. Her husband, Joseph, who was emphatically not the father of her child, was a carpenter (Mt 13:55; Mk 6:3), and, given his later absence from the Gospels, he may have died in Jesus' youth. Jesus grew up in Nazareth (Mt 2:23; Mk 1:9; 6:1; Lk 2:39-40; Jn 1:45). He had several brothers and sisters (possibly children from a prior marriage of Joseph, but most probably born to Mary and Joseph [Mk 3:31; 6:3; Jn 7:3-10]). These are the people with whom Jesus played, worked and learned as he grew up.

According to the Synoptic Gospels, Jesus' relationship with his birth family was difficult. Luke's Gospel shows that tensions were present in the household when Jesus was as young as twelve (though, it is quickly added, Jesus was obedient to his earthly parents [Lk 2:48-51]). Jesus' public ministry took him away from the family home in Nazareth; he traveled throughout *Galilee from a new home base in Capernaum (Mk 2:1; 3:19). The few subsequent appearances of Jesus' birth family and the people of Nazareth suggest that this move was not well regarded. In Mark 3:20-21 Jesus' own people ("the ones from him" [hoi par' autou]), most likely his family, attempt to take control over him because it is said (or they themselves think) that he is out of his mind. Later in the same chapter Jesus apparently rejects his mother and brothers in favor of his followers (Mk 3:31-35), and in Mark 6:1-6 the people of Nazareth, among whom Jesus grew up, reject his teaching. Like his disciples (see 3.2 below), in the Synoptic Gospels Jesus experiences conflict with his birth family (Mt 12:46-50; 13:54-58; Lk 4:22-30; 8:19-21).

The Gospel of John presents a slightly different picture of Jesus' relationship with his family. Mary is instrumental in Jesus' first public sign, the turning of water into wine in Cana (Jn 2:1-11). She is present at the crucifixion (as she may be as well in the Synoptics), and some of Jesus' last words on the cross are concerned with her future (Jn 19:26-27). This loving, caring relationship contrasts with the picture developed in the Synoptics, and yet in John 7:1-9 Jesus is still in tension with his brothers, who do not believe in him.

The tension between Jesus and his birth family in the Gospels, especially in Mark, is likely indicative of historical reality. If Jesus were identified as theologically or socially deviant, his family and local community would have rejected him. The tension between Jesus and his family carries over to the disciples and their families. Jesus and his message divide members of households (see Mt 10:34-36).

3.2. Jesus' Redefined Family. In Mark 3:31-35 Jesus redefines his family: his mother, brothers and sisters are not his family; rather, those who do the will of God are. Jesus associates nearly entirely with this new family in the Gospels, living with them, eating with them, teaching them and traveling with them. The creative power of Matthew 12:49-50; Mark 3:34-35; Luke 8:21 should not be overlooked. In the Synoptic Gospels the *disciples are family.

In Mark 1:16-20 Jesus calls his first disciples away from their families and jobs to follow him. Although the disciples continue to associate with their families throughout the Gospel (see Mk 1:29), the fundamental separation from the family demanded by Jesus remains a key element of discipleship (see Mk 10:21). In Matthew 8:22; Luke 9:59-62 Jesus demands that potential followers not bury their parents or even say goodbye to their families. He also baldly states that his followers must love him more than they do their families (or hate their families); Jesus has come to divide family members from one another (Mt 10:34-39; Lk 12:49-53; 14:25-27). Leaving home is a serious cost of discipleship. This radical call to discipleship is not unknown in Jewish tradition (or Greco-Roman, for that matter). Elijah asked the same of Elisha (1 Kings 19:20); Abraham left his home in obedience to God (Gen 12:1); proselytes to Judaism left their families to join God's people (e.g., Philo, Virt. 214-225; Spec. 1.51-52). Jesus' demands would not have been incomprehensible to his audience, but the strong words of Matthew 10:34-39; Luke 12:49-53 are still surprising and even shocking.

In return for leaving everything to follow Jesus, the disciples receive a new family, with houses, siblings, mothers, children, fields and persecution (but not fathers [Mk 10:28-31]). For Mark, this new family is dedicated to doing the will of God (Mk 3:35). It is a group of equals modeled on Jesus as servant of all (Mk 10:42-45), and it is a group that forgives (Mk 11:25). Matthew emphasizes Jesus' disciples as siblings who are called to love and forgive each other in imitation of their Father in heaven (e.g., Mt 5:21-26; 7:1-5; 18:15-22). As followers of Jesus, the disciples are members of his household (and thus subject to the same accusations that he faces [Mt 10:24-25]). They are also warned that in addition to the violence from their families of origin mentioned above (Mt 10:21-22; Mk 13:12-13), members of this new family will betray each other under persecution (Mt 24:9-12). Being part of Jesus' family is costly.

John's use of family language centers on God as Father, Jesus as Son, and the resultant invitation to become children of God. The demand in the Synoptics that disciples be separated from their households is absent from John's story, which instead focuses on the families of Jesus, his followers and others in the community (e.g., Jn 1:40-41; 2:12; 4:53; 11:1-3). The disciples are to love each other (e.g., Jn 13:33-35), but love is an expression of their unity with God and Jesus rather than their identity as family.

The family is a pervasive reality and image in the Gospels. Households provide the setting for many stories, and Jesus' teachings often relate to family life. While the radical nature of discipleship demands putting Jesus ahead of family obligations, Jesus gives the disciples a new family with God as Father. It is difficult to underestimate the significance of family for Jesus, his disciples and the narrative worlds of the Gospels.

See also CHILD, CHILDREN; DISCIPLES AND DISCIPLESHIP; DIVORCE; WOMEN.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. D. L. Balch and C. Osiek, eds., Early Christian Families in Context: An Interdisciplinary Dialogue (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2003); S. C. Barton, Discipleship and Family Ties in Mark and Matthew (SNTSMS 80; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1994); idem, ed., The Family in Theological Perspective (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1996); P. J. J. Botha, "Houses in the World of Jesus," Neot 32 (1998) 37-74; S. J. D. Cohen, ed., The Jewish Family in Antiquity (BJS 289; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1993); D. A. deSilva, Honor, Patronage, Kinship and Purity: Unlocking New Testament Culture (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2000); S. Dixon, The Roman Family (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1992); H. Moxnes, ed., Constructing Early Christian Families: Family as Social Reality and Metaphor (London: Routledge, 1997); C. Osiek and D. L. Balch, Families in the New Testament World: Households and House Churches (FRC; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1997); M. M. Thompson, The Promise of the Father: Jesus and God in the New Testament (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2000).

C. Reeder

FAREWELL DISCOURSE

The ancients found great interest in the last words of a prominent person. The scene is so prevalent that “farewell discourse” (“farewell address,” “final discourse,” or “testament”) has become a recognized genre of ancient literature. It features the last words of a dying figure to those intimately associated with the speaker (with a decidedly forward-looking agenda). The Gospels include two scenes of this type regarding Jesus (Lk 22:14-38 and Jn 13-17). This article explores their interpretation in light of the genre.

1. The Genre
2. The Lukan Farewell Discourse
3. The Johannine Farewell Discourse

1. The Genre.

1.1. Description. The genre of the farewell scene varies in its component parts and complexities. Thus, it is better to describe a series of conventions that might be employed rather than a monolithic fixed form (Kurz 2000, 71). These features include announcement of death, parenetic sayings or exhortations, prophecies or predictions, retrospective accounts of the individual’s life, the determination of a successor, a prayer, final instructions and instructions for burial (Segovia, 12).

Greco-Roman examples of the farewell scene include Plato, Phaedo; Plutarch, Cato Minor 66; Otho 15-17; Diogenes Laertius, Epicurus 10.16-18. Examples in extrabiblical Jewish literature include Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs; 1 Maccabees 2:49-70; Tobit 14:3-11; Philo, Life of Moses 2.288-292; Josephus, Jewish Antiquities 4.309-331; 12.279-284. Biblical examples include Deuteronomy 31-33; Joshua 23-24; 1 Samuel 12:1-25; 1 Chronicles 28-29; Luke 22:21-38; John 13-17; Acts 20:17-38 (Kurz 1985, 262-63). It is also possible to consider both 2 Peter and 2 Timothy as testamental in nature. In the canonical Gospels only Luke 22:14-38 and John 13-17 are viable candidates.

1.2 Literary Issues. The two scenes in the Gospels more closely resemble the Jewish testamentary literature than their Greco-Roman counterparts. Jewish testamentary literature differs from Greco-Roman examples at important points. First, they emphasize predictions or prophecies regarding the future from a monotheistic theological perspective (e.g., Tob. 14:4-7, understandably not common in pagan sources). Second, examples of Jewish testamentary literature are longer. Greco-Roman farewell addresses tended to be short, with only a few having any significant length (note, e.g., thirty-two words in Plutarch’s Cato Minor) (see Kurz 1985, 255). Third, many of the deaths in the pagan literature are suicides that provide an example of how to die nobly (again, e.g., Cato Minor). In the Jewish world testamentary literature (derived from the biblical examples, especially Gen 48-49) commonly focuses on the man of God who leaves words of instruction for his followers who carry on after his death (e.g., Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, leaving ethical instructions drawn from the examples of the patriarchs’ lives).

Nevertheless, the Gospel accounts also deviate from the Jewish testaments at certain key points (for nine points of departure, see Bammel, 111-19). This argues against the idea that genres are unbending forms. Rather than proposing new genres and sub-genres, R. Sheridan suggests reading the scene in light of the use of genre in ancient literature. For Sheridan, following the literary theorist M. Bakhtin, literary genres are not rigid forms that require one to seek another genre classification when a form deviates from the expected form (a taxonomic approach). Instead, each text “employs” a genre rather than “belongs to” a given genre. Genres are open-ended and can be modified by the writer within the general parameters that influence the possible interpretation (Sheridan, 295). Thus, divergences from the form can indicate specific theological emphases of the individual writers.

Typically, the literary purpose of the farewell form in the Gospels focuses attention on the importance of Jesus’ teaching (Green, 750). More specifically, both Luke and John employ the genre to orient the reader to the meaning of Jesus’ death and the proper response of the disciples.

2. The Lukan Farewell Discourse.

The Lukan farewell occurs immediately after the Olivet discourse and before the passion of Jesus. As in Matthew and Mark, it encompasses the institution of the Lord’s Supper (see Last Supper), but it contains teaching material not found in the other Synoptic Gospels. It is interesting to note that Luke’s account is similar to the Johannine sequence of events but differs in specific content (see Soards, 55). The included material shapes the scene to be most reflective of a farewell address, although the meal setting also brings to mind, to a lesser extent, the Greco-Roman symposium.

2.1. The Message of Luke’s Farewell Discourse. A farewell scene, since it is filled with drama and emotion, tends to stand out to the reader. Luke’s employment of the form interprets, in dramatic fashion, Jesus’ death as he sets the stage for the final act

(Johnson, 335). Furthermore, it defines authentic *discipleship for his followers in the midst of a cosmic struggle.

2.1.1. The Meaning of the Lord's Death (Lk 22:14-23). The address begins with the institution of the Lord's Supper. Jesus' transformation of the Passover ultimately defines the meaning of his forthcoming death. He will give his body and blood "for you," referring to his disciples (Lk 22:19-20), to establish the new covenant. The stimulus for this announcement is not simply that Jesus will die, but that his death fulfills the plan of God (Lk 22:22). The announcement of Jesus' betrayer is woven into the account without a grammatical marker for a break. The link seems to be the unfolding of the plan of God. While the treachery is shocking, it is by no means unknown to Jesus, and it is necessary in order to fulfill God's plan that has been set in motion. However, Jesus notes the personal responsibility of the betrayer within divine sovereignty.

2.1.2. Greatness in the Kingdom (Lk 22:24-30). The next unit defines the nature of the coming *kingdom. Jesus has twice mentioned the coming kingdom in the discourse (Lk 22:16, 18). Unlike in the present world, the great ones in the kingdom serve as Jesus has done (Lk 22:25-27). Thus, Luke's common theme of reversal for following Jesus is articulated here. Although the message of humble service is not unique to Luke (see, e.g., Mt 20:20-28; Mk 9:33-37; 10:35-45), its inclusion at Jesus' farewell highlights its importance for authentic discipleship.

2.1.3. Prediction of Immediate Trials (Lk 22:31-38). The discourse concludes with a dire warning. Humble service takes place in the midst of an eschatological battle. Predictions of cosmic struggles are common in Jewish farewell addresses, and Luke's account is no exception (Neyrey, 35). The preceding narrative had already mentioned Satan's part in the struggle (Lk 22:3), signaling an *apocalyptic battle. The *devil is again mentioned at Luke 22:31, where the use of the plural pronoun in the Greek text ("Satan has demanded to sift all of you as wheat") indicates that each of the disciples will battle individually with the devil. The discourse concludes with an exhortation for all the disciples to be prepared for their journey. Jesus compares this journey to the sending of the seventy (Lk 10:4), but this time he encourages bringing along a money belt and a bag and, ominously, obtaining a sword (Lk 22:36). The sword most likely indicates facing hostility rather than advocating violence (Green, 775). All of these expressions of the cosmic struggle are the result of the plan of God unfolding. As Jesus cites Isaiah 53:12 (the Suffering *Servant), Luke brings the reader full-circle back to the purpose for Jesus' death.

2.2. Conclusion. By employing the farewell form, Luke highlights three major points as the cross is looming. First, he shows Jesus as the master of his fate. He is not simply a victim of tragedy; he actively participates in unfolding God's plan. He is fully aware of both earthly and spiritual dimensions and is fully committed to completing the plan. Second, Luke highlights the meaning of Jesus' death, guiding the reader to view Jesus' passion from the perspective of its necessity in establishing the new covenant. Finally, Luke charts the path of true discipleship in the kingdom as humble service in the midst of an eschatological struggle. The use of the farewell form enables the writer to highlight the importance of these points, which are major themes throughout the Gospel of Luke.

3. The Johannine Farewell Discourse.

The Johannine farewell is clearly reminiscent of the genre of the farewell scene (Parsenios, 4), but some divergences are quite pronounced. Although some previous studies have emphasized a complex history of composition behind the discourse (e.g., Beutler; Detwiler), there is good evidence supporting a unified composition (see Kellum). As such, the sheer length of John 13:31-17:26 (almost 15 percent of this Gospel), marks a departure from most farewell forms, whether Greco-Roman or Jewish. Furthermore, the Johannine farewell includes no strict rehearsals of the past, extended prophecies, funeral preparations; and it contains an extended analogy. Thus, the Johannine farewell discourse is both familiar and somewhat unique in relation to known forms.

The Johannine farewell discourse shares some points of similarity with Deuteronomy and the Mosaic farewell (Deut 31-33) (see Moses). Jesus' entreaty "Let not your heart be troubled" (Jn 14:1), immediately following his statement of departure, is similar to Moses' "Be strong and courageous" (Deut 31:7) (Keener, 931). Furthermore, the final *prayer of Jesus (Jn 17) perhaps is reminiscent of the final blessing of Moses (Deut 33). Additionally, A. Lacomara suggests a number of compelling conceptual links with Deuteronomy (e.g., faith/love/obedience as the expression of love for Father/Christ, mutual love among believers, blessings for believers, provision for propagating the covenant). This set of allusions strongly suggests that the Johannine farewell flows out of the *typology of Jesus as the new Moses (well established in Johannine scholarship) and the constitution and life of the people of God under the new covenant.

3.1. The Message of the Johannine Farewell Discourse. The discourse proper is divided into three major units with an introduction (Jn 13:31-38) and a short conclusion (Jn 16:33). John 17, the final prayer, functions as a summary and transitions to Jesus' arrest and passion. The discourse occurs on the night before Jesus' crucifixion, and so it stands at a strategic point in the literary plan of John's Gospel. Even though Jesus has presented himself to Israel, they have, by and large, rejected him (cf. Jn 1:11; 12:37). From John 13 forward, Jesus is concerned with the establishment and the life of the messianic community (cf. Jn 20:30-31). The Johannine farewell discourse is the main substance of that teaching.

3.1.1. Consolation and Continuing Presence (Jn 14:1-31). John 14:1-15 features two basic appeals: to believe and to *love/obey. The immediate intent is to console the disciples in light of Jesus' impending absence. However, believing *God and loving God and his servant are familiar covenantal themes (Deut 6:5; Ex 14:31). These covenantal overtones are important for understanding the substance of the Johannine farewell discourse.

Nevertheless, the points of discontinuity between covenants are enlightening. First, the object of faith in the new covenant is both God and Jesus (Jn 14:1-6), and Jesus is the way to and the substance of the Father's presence (Jn 14:6, 21). Second, in the Mosaic farewell only Joshua enjoys the presence of the Spirit of wisdom (Deut 33:9), whereas in John the true followers of Jesus will receive the Paraclete and enjoy several benefits (see Holy Spirit). These include the continued presence of Jesus (Jn 14:18, 21), a permanent indwelling teacher (Jn 14:16, 26) and the promise of greater works (Jn 14:12-14). Finally, under the Mosaic covenant the blessings are followed by curses for breaking the covenant (e.g., Deut 31:16-18), but such provision is made here in John.

3.1.2. The Life of the New Community (Jn 15:1-16:4a). The analogy of the vine and the branches is a major departure from both the Second Temple testament genre and the biblical examples of farewell scenes. Its uniqueness, among other factors, marks it as the climax of the discourse, highlighting the life of the new messianic community as a unifying theme through the second major unit (Jn 15:1-16:4a). In this analogy Jesus identifies himself as the "true vine" in contrast to Israel (Jn 15:1; cf. Is 5:7). The implication is not that the new community replaces Israel; rather, it is Jesus himself who stands in for Israel. And it is the relationship to Jesus that defines membership in Israel.

Jesus previously promised that he and the Father would make their "abode" (monē) in his disciples (Jn 14:23). This, as the basis of the new community, is expressed through the cognate "abide" (menō) in the analogy. *Abiding is the disciple's duty, the essence of which is to love Jesus (Jn 14:21; 15:10). As branches are in vital connection with the vine, so likewise a unity is produced through loving/obeying Jesus. Within this unity believers are also commanded to love one another (Jn 15:17). In the new community individuals are to unite together through their love for Jesus and each other.

The command to abide is followed by a warning regarding impending persecution. Identification with Jesus brings with it the same hatred that he has received from the world (Jn 15:18-19). The world will hate, expel, persecute and kill his disciples. Yet, the task of disciples, who are empowered by the Paraclete, is to bear witness to the world in the midst of this hostility on behalf of Jesus (Jn 15:26-27).

3.1.3. Advantages of Jesus' Departure (Jn 16:4b-33). The final section (Jn 16:4b-33) returns to the topic of Jesus' departure and spells out three specific advantages of it: the giving of the Paraclete, the promise of joy in Jesus' presence, direct access to the Father. The ministry of the Paraclete is two-sided: he prosecutes the world (Jn 16:8-11) but will also glorify Christ by guiding the disciples (Jn 16:12-15). After Jesus' resurrection the disciples will have an abiding *joy (although they grieve now), and they will enjoy new privileges in prayer marking a new age. The farewell concludes with a return to the specific covenantal language that those who follow Jesus' instructions to believe, obey, abide and love will have *peace (Jn 16:33; cf. 14:28).

3.1.4. The Final Prayer (Jn 17:1-26). Two characteristic features of biblical and Second Temple testamentary literature appear at the final prayer of Jesus, though with adaptations (as earlier). First, it is common for biblical testaments to conclude with blessings (Gen 49; Deut 31-33), but here the blessing is actually an intercession on behalf of the disciples. Second, John 17:1-6 could be construed as a rehearsal of Jesus' life, but it is actually a statement of the completion of his mission. John, then, continues to "bend" the farewell form. Jesus prays for the protection of the current disciples and that future disciples would have unity, both reflecting God's *glory for the sake of the *mission.

3.2. Conclusion. The Johannine farewell discourse follows a long line of testamentary literature, but it cannot be characterized by a strict dependence on the form. It also exhibits strong conceptual ties to Deuteronomy and the Mosaic farewell. Yet, this too is not a slavish imitation. Christ is the new Moses with a new commandment, but he is also the way to the Father, the new Israel, and the object of the worshippers' affections. These differences may in fact constitute a conscious bending of the form (so Attridge, 17). Given that the subject (Jesus) and the subject matter (salvation history) fall outside conventional stereotypes, we should not be surprised if Jesus' farewell to his followers does so as well.

See also ABIDING; DEATH OF JESUS; DISCIPLES AND DISCIPLESHIP; LAST SUPPER; PASSION NARRATIVE.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. H. Attridge, "Genre Bending in the Fourth Gospel," JBL 121 (2002) 3-21; E. Bammel, "The Farewell Discourse of the Evangelist John and Its Jewish Heritage," TynBul 44 (1993) 103-16; J. Beutler, Habt keine Angst: Die erste johanneische Abschiedsrede (Joh 14) (SBS 116; Stuttgart: Katholisches Bibelwerk, 1984); A. Detwiler, Die Gegenwart des Erhöhten: Eine exegetische Studie zu den johanneischen Abschiedsreden (Joh 13,31-16,33) unter besonderer Berücksichtigung ihres Relecture-Charakters (FRLANT 169; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1995); J. B. Green, The Gospel of Luke (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1997); L. T. Johnson, The Gospel of Luke (SP 3; Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1991); C. S. Keener, The Gospel of John: A Commentary (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 2003); L. S. Kellum, The Unity of the Farewell Discourse: The Literary Integrity of John 13:31-16:33 (JSNTSup 256; London: T & T Clark, 2005); W. S. Kurz, "Luke 22:14-38 and Greco-Roman and Biblical Farewell Addresses," JBL 104 (1985) 251-68; idem, "Biblical Farewell Addresses," TBT 38 (2000) 69-73; A. Lacomara, "Deuteronomy and the Farewell Discourse (Jn 13:31-16:33)," CBQ 36 (1974) 65-84; J. Neyrey, The Passion According to Luke: A Redaction Study of Luke's Soteriology (New York: Paulist Press, 1985); G. L. Parsenios, Departure and Consolation: The Johannine Farewell Discourses in Light of Greco-Roman Literature (NovTSup 117; Boston: E. J. Brill, 2005); F. Segovia, The Farewell of the Word: The Johannine Call to Abide (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1992); R. Sheridan, "John's Gospel and Modern Genre Theory: The Farewell Discourse (John 13-17) as a Test Case," ITQ 75 (2010) 287-99; M. L. Soards, The Passion According to Luke: The Special Material of Luke 22 (JSNTSup 14; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1987).

L. S. Kellum

FASTING

In the Synoptic Gospels fasting appears in both teaching discourses (Mt 6:16-18; 9:14-17 // Mk 2:18-22 // Lk 5:33-39) and in practice (Mt 4:2; Lk 2:37). The topic of fasting is not raised in the Gospel of John. Jews traditionally fasted by abstaining from the consumption of food and drink for a period of time (Esther 4:16).

1. Fasting in the Old Testament and Second Temple Judaism
2. Fasting in the Gospels
3. Conclusion

1. Fasting in the Old Testament and Second Temple Judaism.

On the Day of Atonement Israel was required to observe a fast (Lev 23:27; Acts 27:9), but individuals and groups also chose to fast spontaneously. This ritual was regularly practiced under four circumstances: mourning (1 Sam 31:13), petitions for aid (2 Sam 12:16; Ezra 8:21), repentance/acts of piety (Neh 9:1-3; Joel 1:14; cf. Lk 2:37) and the pursuit of wisdom (2 Chron 20:3). Such situations often were interconnected. When Daniel learned that Jerusalem would lay desolate for seventy years, he fasted and prayed, confessing his sins and petitioning for mercy on Jerusalem and guidance for his people (Dan 9:1-19).

The rationale for fasting is not worked out explicitly in the OT, but on a number of occasions it is associated with humility (Ezra 8:21; Ps 35:13; Is 58:3, 5; cf. Sir 34:26; Pss. Sol. 3:8 [LXX: tapeinoō]). This religious posture had two apparent purposes. First, fasting was an admittance and actualization of the reality of human dependence on God, a concept captured aptly in Deuteronomy 8:3: "He humbled you by letting you go hungry, then feeding you with manna . . . in order to make you understand that one does not live by bread alone, but by every word that comes from the mouth of the Lord" (NRSV). Second, fasting placed the individual in a heightened state of divine receptivity. Philo, for example, argues that when the outward (bodily) senses are feasting, the mind suffers from a famine, but when a physical fast is observed, the mind can consume more heartily (see Philo, Migr. 204).

In the prophetic tradition fasting was criticized not as a practice per se (see Joel 2:12) but rather when performed without a devoted heart (Zech 7:5), with deep-seated pride (Is 58:4-6), or while injustice was done to the weak and needy (Is 1:13-17; 53:3-6). The concern was never with the validity of fasting as an expression of worship and submission to the Lord but rather with hypocrisy and arrogance.

2. Fasting in the Gospels.

2.1. Jesus' Fast in the Wilderness (Mt 4:2; cf. Lk 4:2). Matthew does not explain why Jesus fasted for forty days and nights in the wilderness (see Temptation of Jesus). Given his interest in comparing Jesus to *Moses, who also fasted for forty days and nights on Mount Sinai (Ex 34:28), the point may be that Jesus was placing himself in a position of intensified communion with God, as the great patriarch did in the receiving of the law. It is also possible that the author had in mind Israel's forty years of hunger (Deut 8:1-3); after all, both Matthew and Luke note that Jesus was famished after his fast. In that case, Jesus was demonstrating the teaching and vision of Deuteronomy 8:3 (see 1 above), a text that he quotes to the tempter two verses later (Mt 4:4).

2.2. Jesus' Teaching on Fasting (Mt 6:16-18). In the *Sermon on the Mount Jesus addressed in succession the pious acts of almsgiving, *prayer and fasting. He presumed that his audience would fast ("And when you fast" [Mt 6:16]), but he spurned the disposition of "hypocrites" who make a show of it. By encouraging secret fasting, Jesus was focusing not on hiding the practice from others, but on performing the rite exclusively for the audience of the Father (Mt 6:18).

2.3. The Question about Fasting (Mt 9:14-17 // Mk 2:18-22 // Lk 5:33-39). This Synoptic episode revolves around the fact that *John the Baptist's disciples fasted, but Jesus' disciples did not. It would have appeared odd to some that Jesus, a prophet-like figure who ostensibly approved of John the Baptist's ministry, did not encourage his followers to perform such a time-honored act of zeal. What made this matter all the more pressing was the general importance of food matters as a social distinctive that set Israel apart from the other nations, especially as aliens and foreigners (see, e.g., Dan 1:8). Alongside the practice of circumcision and the observance of the *Sabbath rest, dietary restrictions functioned as key boundary markers that were clearly recognized by Israel's neighbors (e.g., Tacitus, Hist. 5.4.3-4; Suetonius, Aug. 76.2).

Jesus did not respond to this question directly, but instead offered a series of similitudes. He likened the situation to a wedding, where the attendants do not fast while the *bridegroom is present. Instead, they feast and celebrate. Clearly, Jesus is the "bridegroom" in this scenario, and the logic behind this parable is that his disciples did not fast because his presence with them was an occasion for jubilation, not austerity. The subsequent illustrations regarding the patch and the wine have a common concern over the ultimate futility of not recognizing the "new" of Jesus' presence and arrival, which cannot be combined with the "old" of John's fasting.

Traditionally, scholars have concluded that Jesus was referring here to the incompatibility of the old ways of *Judaism and the new ways of Jesus/Christianity. However, Jesus went on to affirm that the disciples would fast when he was "taken away" (Mk 2:20). The point of this fasting episode is not about the general legitimacy of the ritual of fasting; it is the particular disruption that Jesus brought to the life and destiny of God's people.

3. Conclusion.

In the Synoptic Gospels Jesus encouraged the ongoing practice of fasting, especially as it exemplifies a posture of humility and conscious dependence on God. The early church continued to value fasting (Acts 13:2-3; 14:23; Did. 8:1; Pol. Phil. 7:2). Some criticism carried on regarding the problem of empty ritual observance (Herm. 54). The practice itself, though, often was praised when accompanied by a spirit of devotion. In fact, in 2 Clement 16:4 it is hailed as greater than prayer.

See also BRIDE, BRIDEGROOM; PRAYER.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. H. A. Brongers, "Fasting in Israel in Biblical and Post-Biblical Times," OTS 20 (1977) 1-21; J. Goldingay, Old Testament Theology: Israel's Life (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2009) 629-31; D. Lambert, "Fasting as a Penitential Rite: A Biblical Phenomenon?" HTR 96 (2003) 477-512; C. C. Mitchell, "The Practice of Fasting in the New Testament," BSac 147 (1990) 455-69; J. Muddimann, "Jesus and Fasting," in Jésus aux origines de la christologie, by J. Dupont et al. (BETL 40; Leuven: Leuven University Press, 1975) 271-81; J. H. Neyrey, Honor and Shame in the Gospel of Matthew (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1998) 121-23; L. Vaage and V. L. Wimbush, eds., Asceticism and the New Testament (New York: Routledge, 1999).

N. K. Gupta

FATHER, GOD AS. See GOD.

FEASTS

Festive holidays celebrating the seasons and special events through honoring the gods were important aspects of private and social life in the ancient world (Cicero, Nat. d. 2.3; Josephus, Ant. 16.35). The Jews in Jerusalem and in the Diaspora (Philo, Mos. 2.41-42) were especially renowned for their strict adherence to their feasts (Plutarch, Superst. 169C), which provided a precise and regular pattern to the days, weeks, months and years. The Gospels mention the Feasts of Unleavened Bread, Passover, Weeks, Tabernacles and Dedication. Though not mentioned, Purim and New Moon were also celebrated and part of the social world of Jesus and the Gospels.

There were also occasional feasts associated with, for example, a royal birth and birthdays (Josephus, Ant. 19.321), a king's accession (Josephus, Ant. 11.189), military victories (Josephus, Ant. 6.82), unexpected deliverance (3 Macc 6:30-40; 7:17-20), completion of the temple (Josephus, Ant. 15.421-423) and buildings (Josephus, Ant. 16.136-142), weddings (Mt 25:1-13; Josephus, Ant. 11.202-203) and sheep shearing (2 Sam 13:23-27). Not only did the festivals change over time and from one place to another, but also different branches or sects of the Jews followed slightly different regulations (Josephus, Ant. 18.19). The particular concern of this article is not the daily (Mk 14:3; Lk 7:36; 11:37) and *Sabbath meals, but rather the feasts or banquets and pilgrim festivals that took place in the period and help us understand Jesus and the Gospel writers.

1. Terminology
2. The Greco-Roman World
3. Second Temple Judaism
4. Jesus
5. The Gospels

1. Terminology.

The Greek noun heortē ("feast" or "festival"), first known in Homer referring to a public festival, free of work, honoring a deity (Od. 21.258), also came to refer to holiday making or amusement (Plato, Phaedr. 276b) and celebration (Josephus, J.W. 1.660). The LXX uses heortē to translate the Hebrew hāg, which referred to a procession, round dance or festival (1 Kings 12:32-33; Neh 8:18). A broader term, mōēd, denoting appointed time (Ps 102:13) or place (Ps 74:4) or feast (Lam 2:7), especially the great annual festivals (Lev 23:2), could also be translated using heortē (e.g., Ex 23:15; Deut 31:10; Is 1:14). The association between mōēd (as season) and new moon (e.g., Num 10:10; 1 Chron 23:31) indicates that the times of festivals were taken to be fixed by Yahweh through the heavenly bodies (Gen 1:14; Ps 104:19; 1QS X, 1-4).

From its early use, up to and beyond the NT period, the verb heortazō meant "to celebrate" or "to feast" (Herodotus, Hist. 2.60; Plutarch, Cam. 42.5; Philo, Flacc. 118; Clement, Protr. 2). In the LXX the verb translates hāgag, which meant "to leap like a drunk" (Ps 107:27) or "to celebrate a day or festival" (Ex 5:1; 12:14).

In the Gospels heortē (also Col 2:16; and Lk 23:17 in, e.g., D, W, Q, Y, f^{1.13}) is often used alone (Mt 26:5; 27:15; Mk 14:2; 15:6; Lk 2:42), especially in the Fourth Gospel (Jn 4:45; 7:8, 10, 11, 14, 37; 11:56; 12:12, 20; 13:29), the context identifying the feast. Without the article, heortē could refer to any feast, as in the phrase a "festival of the Jews" (Jn 5:1). Other times the feast is specified: "to the feast of the Passover" (Lk 2:41; Jn 13:1); "the feast of Unleavened Bread called Passover" (Lk 22:1); "in the Passover in the festival" (Jn 2:23); "the Passover, the festival of the Jews" (Jn 6:4); and "the festival of the Jews, the Tabernacles" (7:2). The feast can also be identified by the name alone: "Passover" (Mt 26:2; Mk 14:14; Lk 22:15; Jn 12:1), "Unleavened Bread" (Mt 26:17; Mk 14:1; Lk 22:7), "Dedication" (Jn 10:22). The Synoptic Gospel writers can use the term "Unleavened Bread" to include Passover (Mk 14:1 // Lk 22:1; Mt 26:17 // Mk 14:12 // Lk 22:7).

The noun deipnon ("dinner") could be used for an everyday meal (Lk 14:12; P.Oxy. 110) or for formal dinners or banquets (P.Oxy. 111), when guests reclined (e.g., Mk 12:39; Jn 12:2), and also for cultic meals (Josephus, Ant. 18.73) for which invitations were sent (P.Fouad 76; P.Oxy. 523; 1485), and in which a shared union between the deity and the diners was assumed (1 Cor 11:20-22; P.Colon. inv. 2555; P.Oxy. 1485). In the Fourth Gospel the term "dinner" is used for the *Last Supper (Jn 13:2, 4; 21:20). Following an OT (e.g., LXX Is 25:6; Ezek 39:17-20) and well-known metaphor (2 Esd 2:38; 1 En. 60:7-8; 62:14; 1Q28a II, 11-23; Rev 19:9, 17), Luke uses the term to refer to the eschatological banquet (Lk 14:16) and thus to *salvation (14:17, 24). The Gospels also use gamos for a "wedding feast" (e.g., Mt 22:2; Lk 12:36; Jn 2:1-2).

2. The Greco-Roman World.

The feast or banquet (symposion), well known since Plato (The Symposium), remained socially and politically important (Plutarch, Lyc. 10-12). On an Athenian model, as well as annual sacrifices (notably for the New Year), cities across the Hellenic world held agonistic festivals involving a procession, a sacrifice, a contest (agōn)—for example, boxing, animal racing, drama—and a banquet (Burkert, 99-109, 225-46) (see Philo, Cher. 92). Under Roman influence, the games (ludi) aspect of the festivals increased in importance; and across Palestine (Josephus, J.W. 1.422-423; Ant. 15.341), including Jerusalem, theaters, amphitheaters and gymnasia were built by *Herod the Great (Josephus, Ant. 15.268-269).

3. Second Temple Judaism.

The Jews were known for their shared meals or banquets (syndeipna) (Josephus, Ant. 14.214-215, 261). Common to the feasts or festivals were joy and gladness (Ex 32:6; Is 58:13; Jub. 49:2), wine (Jub. 49:6; Josephus, Ant. 11.189) and feasting, though not to excess (Philo, Spec. 2.42, 193-194); the cessation (Josephus, Ant. 11.189) or prohibition of work, for at least some of the festival (Lev 23:7-8; 11Q19 IX, 10; XVII, 10-16); liturgy and ceremonies; large crowds (Josephus, J.W. 6.420-421); and the inclusion of non-Jews (Deut 16:11, 14; Neh 8:10-12; Tob 2:1-2; Jn 12:20; Philo, Mos. 2.20, 41-44). Reflecting an established view (e.g., Ps 51:17), Philo says that true worship or a feast depended on a person's devotion, not the sacrifice (Philo, Mos. 2.108; Det. 20-21).

Although the Torah required all Israelite males to attend all three pilgrimage festivals (Ex 23:17; 34:23; Deut 16:16), and *Jerusalem retained a central place for Diaspora Jews (2 Macc 1:7, 12; Wis 12:3; Philo, Flacc. 46), those under the age of twenty (Jub. 49:17; 11Q19 XVII, 8-9) and the disabled and aged were exempt (m. Hag. 1:1). Also, given the expense and time involved, it is not surprising that it was mostly those who lived closer to Jerusalem who attended and outnumbered those from the Diaspora (Josephus, J.W. 2.43), who, selected by their townspeople (Tob 1:6; Philo, Legat. 312-313; Spec. 1.78), may have attended only once in a lifetime. In any case, the festivals were celebrated across the Diaspora (Josephus, Ant. 14.213-216, 240-246, 256-258; 16.27; Philo, Legat. 213).

Philo argues that Passover should be celebrated outside Palestine (Mos. 2.232-233), and there is evidence the Jews celebrated Passover in Alexandria (Wis 18:9) and Rome (t. Yom Tov. 2:15). At Elephantine the Jews were celebrating Passover and Unleavened Bread (TAD A4.1; A4.7.20-21). At Hierapolis the Jews were celebrating Passover as well as Weeks (CIJ 777). Further, we know of Jewish temples in Hellenistic times at Elephantine (TAD A4.7), Leontopolis (Josephus, Ant. 13.62-73), Shechem and a partially built one at 'Arâq el-Emîr in the Transjordan (Campbell), as well as at Syrian Antioch (Josephus, J.W. 7.43-45) and "other places" where the Jews had settled, as Josephus put it (Ant. 13.66), and would offer sacrifices.

The *synagogue, found across the Diaspora, was seen by the society at large as the focus of Jewish life, and as meals were part of synagogue activities (Runesson, 181) it is probable they were used for the feasts. Also, the synagogues were treated like temples, including by Gentiles (Ant. 16.168), Josephus appearing to use the term "temple" (hieron) for the synagogue at Syrian Antioch (J.W. 7.45). It is probable, then, that sacrifices were offered in or near synagogues in the Diaspora (cf. Josephus, Ant. 14.260-261; CPJ 467).

Further, Philo describes Passover as being celebrated in homes (Philo, Spec. 2.145-149; QE 1.10). At Qumran, although bone deposits and the scrolls (4Q320 iv.III-IV; 11Q19 XVII, 6-9) do not make it clear whether Passover was practiced within the community (de Vaux 1973, 12-16), Josephus appears to suggest that the *Essenes performed their own sacrifices (Ant. 18.19).

At least by the Maccabean period Tabernacles was widely celebrated (Josephus, Ant. 3.244-245)—for example, in Greece (Plutarch, Quaest. conv. 4.6.2), Egypt (2 Macc 1:9, 18; Philo, Flacc. 116-118; CPJ 452a) and at Qumran (4Q320; 4Q321; 11Q19 XLII, 11-17). Tobit is portrayed as celebrating Weeks in his home (Tob 2:1-3). Hanukkah was celebrated in Jerusalem, but also more widely (2 Macc 1:18). With such widespread celebration of the festivals, including in homes, they could be expected to have been well known and to have provided the early readers of the Gospels with powerful interpretive images.

3.1. Pilgrim Festivals. For an agrarian society the three annual Jewish pilgrim festivals marked the seasons: Passover and Unleavened Bread at the beginning of the barley harvest in the spring (Lev 23:1-14); Weeks at the end of the barley harvest and the height of the wheat harvest in the summer (Ex 34:22; Lev 23:15-21); and Booths or Tabernacles at the late harvest gathering of crops in the autumn (Lev 23:33-36).

"Countless multitudes" (Philo, Spec. 1.69) from all over the Diaspora (Acts 2:9-11), including women and children (Lk 2:41-43; Josephus, Ant. 11.109), as well as animals for sacrifice (m. Bik. 3:3), came to the festivals in Jerusalem (cf. b. Pesah. 64b), so that whole towns in the region would be deserted (Josephus, J.W. 2.515). For personal safety and the protection of the accompanying temple tax (Josephus, Ant. 18.313), pilgrims traveled in large groups (Josephus, J.W. 2.232), either by road (Josephus, Ant. 20.118) or by sea (Philo, Spec. 1.69). Festivities invariably began along the way with music and singing (e.g., Ps 43:3-4; 84:1-2; Is 30:29). Taking the requirements of Numbers 18:21-24 and Deuteronomy 14:22-29 to be complementary (m. Ter. 1:5), a second tithe in cash could be spent on anything in Jerusalem (Deut 14:26; t. Ma'as. Š.), underlining the commercial significance of the festivals for the city (Tob 1:7-8).

Pilgrims arrived a week early (Josephus, J.W. 6.290), some for purification from corpse impurity (Num 19:1-22; Philo, Spec. 1.261-266). The visitors stayed in neighboring villages (Mk 11:11), in rooms associated with synagogues (CII 2.1404), in homes and inns (t. Ma'as. Š. 1:11-13) or in tents brought with them (Josephus, Ant. 17.217). At one Passover (A.D. 65), Josephus says, there were three million visitors (J.W. 2.280; cf. 6.420-427). More reasonably, there may have been around two hundred thousand pilgrims in Jerusalem for a festival (Jeremias 1969, 77-84).

The volatility of jubilant crowds at the festivals in Jerusalem (Josephus, J.W. 1.88), and the active presence of bandits (Josephus, Ant. 20.165, 186-187) or the urban assassins known as the sicarii (Josephus, J.W. 2.254-256), for example, caused the Roman governor to be on hand to bring in extra troops, and for guards to be posted on roofs of the temple porticoes (Josephus, J.W. 5.244; Ant. 20.192), sometimes resulting in deadly clashes (Josephus, J.W. 2.10-13, 224; Ant. 13.372-373). Self-styled prophets also took advantage of large audiences at the festivals (Josephus, J.W. 6.300-309) (see Revolutionary Movements).

3.1.1. Passover (Heb. pesaḥ). Although probably not as well attended as Tabernacles, for Jesus and the Gospel writers, Passover appears to have been the most significant feast. The earliest biblical witnesses to feasts (one cultic calendar from a Yahwist perspective [Ex 34:18-26], and another Elohist [23:14-17]), include the pilgrimages, probably to local shrines (Deut 16:5, 16), of Unleavened Bread, Harvest or Weeks, and Tabernacles. The Passover is not mentioned.

Passover may have originated as a pilgrim festival before the exodus (Ex 5:1-3) or in a sacrificial rite among nomadic shepherds (de Vaux 1997, 489), and it involved the slaughter of a sheep or goat (Ex 12:21; cf. Ex 12:5; Deut 16:2; 2 Chron 35:7) in the first month, Abib (Ex 13:4) (after the exile called "Nisan" [Esther 3:7]), on the evening of the 14th—that is, at full moon, perhaps because there was the most light for the feast. The rite of sprinkling blood on the doorposts to identify Israelite homes was early connected with the Egyptian killing of the firstborn (Ex 12:23) and gave it the association with the exodus (Ex 23:15; 34:18). This association continued (m. Pesaḥ. 10:5), and Nisan became the month in which future redemption was expected (b. Roš Haš. 11a). The sacrifice was roasted whole (Ex 12:8-9) (later broiled [LXX Deut 16:7; m. Pesaḥ. 5:10]), and then, with the people dressed for travel (Ex 12:11), it was completely eaten that night in family groups (Ex 12:21, 43-49; Deut 16:1-8). Though not mentioned in the early texts (Ex 12:1-28; Deut 16:1-8), singing eventually became part of the celebrations in Jerusalem (2 Chron 35:15; Jub. 49:6) and in, for example, Alexandria (Wis 18:9; Philo, Spec. 2.148). Resident aliens who wished to do so could also keep Passover (Ex 12:48-49; Num 9:14).

It probably was Hezekiah and the reforms of Josiah and the Deuteronomists that, for many, transformed this family feast into an annual pilgrimage to Jerusalem (Ex 12:21-23; Deut 16:1-5; 2 Kings 23:21-23). From this cultic centralization (Deut 16:2, 7; 2 Kings 23:21-23) the slaughter, cooking and eating the animals was expected to take place in the temple forecourt (2 Chron 30:1-5; 35:13-14; Jub. 49:16-21), the blood being poured on the base of the altar (2 Chron 30:16; 35:11). According to Numbers 9:10-11, those on a journey, or unclean, could celebrate Passover a month later. Large numbers of pilgrims gathered around each sacrifice in groups of not less than ten persons (Josephus, J.W. 6.423). Perhaps because of increasing crowds in Jerusalem, by NT times the slaughter, probably conducted by the people not the priests (Ex 12:6; cf. Philo, Mos. 2.224; m. Pesaḥ. 5:5), took place at the temple (before the evening Tamid [11Q19 XVII, 6-9; Jub. 49:10]), but many of the animals probably were cooked and eaten in homes (Mk 14:12-25; m. Pesaḥ. 5:10; 7:12; 8:13).

3.1.2. The Feast of Unleavened Bread (Heb. ḥag hammaṣṣôt). In the early festival lists this festival is a period of seven days in the first month during which no leavened bread was eaten (Ex 23:15; 34:18). Each day sacrifices and grain offerings were to be made. Also, the first and the last days of the feast were for assembling, not work (Lev 23:7-8; Num 28:18-25). The festival, perhaps at first independent of Passover (Lev 23:4-8, 11-16; Num 28—29; Deut 16:7b), was celebrated not the day after but rather, according to a disputed phrase, on the "day after the Sabbath" (Lev 23:11) (Hartley, 385-86). The shared connection with the escape from Egypt (Ex 12:12-13, 17), being in the same month (Ex 23:15; Deut 16:1-3), and after the exile the fixing of the date of Unleavened Bread between 14 and 21 Nisan (Ex 12:18), brought the two festivals together as consecutive celebrations (Lev 23:4-8; Num 28:16-25; Deut 16:1-8; Josephus, Ant. 3.249) and eventually as one (Ezra 6:19-22; Lk 22:1; Josephus, Ant. 14.21; 17.213; 18.29).

3.1.3. Feast of Weeks (Heb. ḥag šābū'ôt). This feast is also called "the day of the first fruits" (Ex 34:22; Num 28:26) or "the feast of the harvest" (Ex 23:16). Being celebrated "fifty" (LXX: pentēkonta) days after the raising of the sheaf of the first fruits at the end of Passover and Unleavened Bread (Lev 23:9-16) gave it the name "Pentecost" (Tob 2:1; 2 Macc 12:31-32), used in the NT at Acts 2:1; 20:16; 1 Corinthians 16:8. Connected with the exodus in Deuteronomy 16:10-12 (and perhaps 2 Chron 15:10-14), by the second century B.C. the daylong feast, free of work (Lev 23:21; Num 28:26), was associated with the giving of the law (especially at Qumran [1QS I, 16—II, 25]) and the covenants of Moses (Jub. 1:1-26; 14:1-20), Noah (Jub. 6:1-31) and Abraham (Jub. 15:1-6). Pilgrims were expected to bring two leavened loaves from their settlements (Lev 23:17) and also grain and drink offerings; animal sacrifices also were to be offered (Lev 23:18-20; Num 28:27-31).

3.1.4. Feast of Booths or Tabernacles (Heb. ḥag has-sukôt). Mentioned in all the biblical festival calendars (Ex 23:16; 34:22; Lev 23:39-43; Num 29:12-38; Deut 16:1-17), this feast was also called “feast of ingathering” (Ex 23:16; 34:22), or “feast of Yahweh” (Lev 23:39; Judg 21:19; Hos 9:5), or “feast to Yahweh” (Lev 23:34, 41; Num 29:12), or simply “the feast” (1 Kings 8:2, 65; 12:32; 2 Chron 5:3; Neh 8:14; Ezek 45:25; Josephus, Ant. 8.100; Jn 7:2), indicating its popularity and importance, including in NT times. Coming immediately after gathering the grain and pressing the wine (Deut 16:13), it was, not surprisingly, the most joyous of the three pilgrim feasts (Lev 23:40; Deut 16:14; Neh 8:17; Jub. 16:27) and the one during which the greatest number of sacrifices were offered (Num 29:12-38; Josephus, Ant. 3.246-247).

Originally a seven-day feast (Deut 16:15), perhaps taken up from the Canaanites (Judg 9:27; 21:19-21), after the exile the feast was fixed to begin at the autumnal equinox (15 to 21 Tishri [Philo, Spec. 2.204]), and a day of assembly without work was required on the first day and on an additional eighth day (Lev 23:34-36). Also added to the feast was the requirement to live in booths (Lev 23:42; Neh 8:14-17) or temporary huts (Gen 33:17; Jon 4:5) or tents (Josephus, Ant. 3.244), and a connection was made with the exodus (Lev 23:43).

In this instance, broadly reflecting traditions known in NT times, the Mishnah says that at the end of the first day, along with dancing and singing, candlesticks in the court of women were lit that shed light across Jerusalem (m. Sukkah 5:1-3). Each morning a procession involving singing the Hallel psalms (Pss 113—118) and the carrying of tree branches and fruit (Lev 23:40; Josephus, Ant. 3.245; 13.372; m. Sukkah 3:9; 4:1) went down to the Pool of Siloam, and a golden flask of water (of about one and a half pints) was drawn. When the procession reached the Water Gate on the return journey, the shofar was blown (m. Sukkah 4:5; m. Roš Haš. 4:9); near the altar the water was poured into a bowl, and wine into another (m. Sukkah 4:9). These libations, offered before the rainy season, were widely associated with calling for rain (Zech 14:17; m. Ta'an. 1:1; t. Sukkah 3:18).

Each day the procession went around the altar (seven times on the last day) amid music and singing (m. Sukkah 4:5). Deuteronomy 31:9-13 says that every seven years the law was to be read publicly. Notably, in Deutero-Zechariah the festival is associated with the hope of Yahweh one day coming as king (Zech 14:16-21), a point picked up by the messianic pretender Bar Kokhba, using symbols from the feast on his coins.

3.2. Other Feasts.

3.2.1. Hanukkah (Heb. ḥănukkâ). This is the feast of “dedication” (LXX: enkainismos, “consecration” or “dedication” [Num 7:10, 11, 84; 2 Chron 7:9]; enkainōsis, “consecration” or “dedication” [Num 7:88]; enkainia, “feast of consecration” [Neh 12:27]). Judas Maccabeus arranged for the derelict and profaned Jerusalem temple to be cleansed and refurbished, including building a new altar (1 Macc 4:36-51; 2 Macc 2:19; 10:1-8). Following the initial dedication and eight-day celebration (from 25 Kislev [mid-December] 164 B.C. [1 Macc 4:52-58; Jn 10:22 says that it was winter]), “Judas and his brothers and all the assembly of Israel determined that every year the days of dedication [egkainismos] should be observed with joy and gladness” (1 Macc 4:59). Not surprisingly, in 2 Maccabees Hanukkah is modeled on, though not identified with (Rankin, 91-104), Tabernacles (2 Macc 10:6-8), the feast at which the temple had been dedicated by Solomon (1 Kings 8:2, 65). The festival involved each home lighting a lamp (2 Macc 1:8-9; m. B. Qam. 6:6). However, Josephus says that the festival (heortē), still observed in his time, was called the festival of “Lights” (phōta) because of the unexpected right to worship (Ant. 12.325). There is no mention of Hanukkah in Qumran literature, perhaps because that community honored Mosaic, not civic, festivals (11Q19) or because the festival was not being celebrated at the time (Solis-Cohen, 41-42). There is no evidence that the feast was connected with the birthday of the sun (except by calendrical coincidence) or with Dionysius or with the king’s birthday (2 Macc 6:7).

3.2.2. Purim (Heb. pûrîm). The Hebrew term (Esther 3:7; 9:24-32; m. Meg. 3:4, 6) derives from the Akkadian pûrû, “lots” (LXX: phourai, “lots” [Esther 3:7; 9:24-28]; Josephus, Ant. 11.291-296). This feast, of uncertain origins, is also called the “Day of Mordecai” (2 Macc 15:36). It is said to have been instituted by Mordecai, celebrating deliverance from Haman, who had cast a “lot” to determine that the slaughter of the Jews would take place on 13 (or 14 [LXX and Old Latin]) Adar (Esther 3:7; Josephus, Ant. 11.291). The festival involved feasting, joy, sending gifts of food to one another and to the poor, and reading the scroll of Esther (Esther 9:17-32; m. Meg. 1:1).

3.2.3. New Moon (Heb. rōš hōdeš). The Hebrew term means, literally, “head of the month.” According to Numbers 28:11-15, the start of each lunar month was to be marked with sacrifices, offerings and libations (Is 1:13-14; Hos 2:11). The OT mentions visitation to a prophet (2 Kings 4:23) and abstention from work (Amos 8:5), and in 1 Samuel 20 feasting takes place over two days (1 Sam 20:5, 18-19, 26-27). Although celebrated through the OT period (Ezra 3:5; Neh 10:34) and into the time of Jesus and the Gospels (Col 2:16), only the seventh new moon maintained its importance (Lev 23:24-25; Num 29:1-6).

4. Jesus.

It is no surprise that the Gospels tell us little about Jesus and the feasts. As a Torah-observant Jew, he could be expected to have taken part in the feasts, which he had a reputation of enjoying (Lk 7:34), including the pilgrimages to Jerusalem. The Fourth Gospel says that Jesus’ brothers urged him to go to Tabernacles to take advantage of the crowd to make his work known (Jn 7:2-4). It is said that eventually he went and, in the middle of the feast, taught in the *temple (Jn 7:10, 14).

Coming to Jerusalem for Passover (Mk 14:12) with his followers, among crowds of pilgrims (Mk 10:46; 11:8), Jesus does not approach on foot, as expected (m. Hag. 1:1), but instead enacts the prophecy of Zechariah 9:9 by riding on a donkey (see Triumphant Entry). In this, Jesus uses the backdrop of Passover, commemorating and anticipating salvation, to make an implicit claim to messianic kingship (cf. Gen 49:10-11; 1 Kings 1:38-40). He is likely to have arrived in Jerusalem on 8 Nisan, a week before Passover (Josephus, J.W. 6.290), perhaps taking part in the purifications (Jn 11:55; cf. Num 19:1-19). During this period, when Jerusalem was crowded, Jesus entered the temple and overturned “the tables of the money changers and the seats of those who sold doves” (Mk 11:15). Acting as a *prophet, as others sometimes did in the festivals (Josephus, J.W. 6.300-309), at a time of year when the temple was seen in its greatest glory, Jesus most probably was predicting its destruction, and a new temple built by God (cf. Is 60:13; 1 En. 90:28-29) (see Temple Act).

Although the Gospels do not say, the disciples’ preparation for Passover (Mk 14:12) could be expected to involve the customary buying a lamb and slaughtering it at the temple before bringing it to the home for cooking and eating. As was the convention at a dinner (Jn 12:2), feast or banquet (Mk 2:15; Lk 13:29; 14:8), including the Passover meal, as a symbol of freedom (y. Pesah. 10:1 [III 37b]; t. Pesah. 10:1), Jesus and his followers reclined (Mk 14:18; Jn 13:23; cf. m. Pesah. 10:1) rather than sat at table (y. Ber. 8:4a; b. Sanh. 38a).

As was also expected at Passover, during the meal Jesus broke bread (Mk 14:22; cf. m. Pesah. 10:3), and he interpreted the act. In Mark, what is probably the oldest form of Jesus’ words at the Passover meal (see Last Supper), Jesus, as was customary, interpreted the elements of the meal (Ex 12:26-27; 13:8; m. Pesah. 10:4-5; Philo, Spec. 2.158-161) in contemporary (m. Pesah. 10:5) and eschatological terms (y. Pesah. 10:1 [VI]). The bread of affliction (Deut 16:3; Philo, Congr. 161-167) he interpreted as his body in relation to his impending death (Mk 14:22). Drunk only at family celebrations, and festivals and feasts (b. Pesah. 109a) (Jeremias 1966, 50), including Passover (m. Pesah. 10:1), the wine, probably red (cf. Mk 14:24) (Jeremias 1966, 53), is interpreted to point to the future kingdom understood as a feast (Mt 22:1-22). The custom of giving something to the poor on Passover night probably also was followed by Jesus (Jn 13:29; cf. Josephus, Ant. 18.29-30; m. Pesah. 9:11), as was the singing of a hymn at the end of the meal (Mk 14:26; cf. Philo, Spec. 2.148; m. Pesah. 10:7).

5. The Gospels.

It is only in the passion narrative of the Synoptic Gospels that a pilgrim feast, Passover, features significantly. There are hints earlier, however, of an assumed knowledge of the feasts, and Jesus often is portrayed as involved in meals and banquets. In the Fourth Gospel the feasts, particularly Passover, function as interpretive lenses for much of the narrative.

5.1. Mark. In the earliest Gospel Jesus is portrayed at formal banquets with tax collectors and sinners, those he had come to call (Mk 2:15, 17) (see Table Fellowship). Herod’s birthday banquet (Mk 6:17-30) is used, in part, to show the incomprehension about Jesus (Mk 6:14-16) by the social elite (those able to recline at a feast [Mk 6:26]), for whom the head of John, a forerunner of Jesus, is served on a platter. In contrast to this feast bringing the death of John and foreshadowing the *death of Jesus (Mk 6:29; 15:46), the following feast provided by Jesus for a crowd of five thousand (Mk 6:30-44) seated like common people (Mk 6:39; cf. Amos 6:4; Sir 41:19) more than satisfies (Mk 6:42-43), as it foreshadows the Last Supper (Mk 6:41; 14:22). Using two different words, Mark says that Jesus asks the people to be seated in “groups” (symposia [Mk 6:39]) as at a banquet in which conversation was valued (Plutarch, Mor. 157d; 704d; Philo, Opif. 78), and that they sat in “groups” (prasiai [Mk 6:40]), or rows (Sir 24:31), as the people of God had been organized during the exodus (Ex 18:21; Deut 1:15) and would be in the eschatological battle (1QM IV, 1-5). The second feeding story reinforces these themes, but for *Gentiles (Mk 7:31; 8:10), and with mention of the three days (Mk 8:2) it calls to mind the expected passion (Mk 8:31; 9:30-32; 10:34; 14:58; 15:29) and becomes a foretaste of the eschatological banquet (cf. Is 25:6). Mark proposes that, as the host of these feasts, the identity of Jesus as the Messiah can be discerned (Mk 8:11-21).

Tabernacles is echoed in the story of the *transfiguration (also in Mt 17:1-9 // Lk 9:28-36), with Peter offering to make three booths (skēnē [Mk 9:5]). In that God was expected to live with his people in tents in the messianic era (1 En. 39:4-8; 41:2; 71:16; 2 En. 61:2), perhaps Mark, as well as Matthew and Luke, who followed him, are affirming that, in the tradition and hope of *Elijah and *Moses, Jesus the Son (Mk 9:7 // Mt 17:5 // Lk 9:35) was already offering that salvation, to be fully understood in light of the *resurrection (Mk 9:9 // Mt 17:9; cf. Lk 9:36).

Approaching Jerusalem, Jesus is accompanied by a crowd of Passover pilgrims (Mk 11:1-4; 14:2-16) singing the customary psalms (Pss 113–118), Mark giving the impression that Jesus was the subject of the praise as a king (Mk 11:9-11; cf. Ps 118:26). Passover is reestablished (Mk 14:1) as the backdrop for the royal anointing of Jesus’ head (cf. Ex 29:7; 1 Sam 10:1; 2 Kings 9:3), so that his death (Mk 14:1) becomes his enthronement. In the Last Supper, a Passover meal (Mk 14:12), Jesus interprets his death as for others (Mk 14:24; cf. Mk 10:45) and the meal in relation to his death as marking the promise of the coming kingdom (Mk 14:25).

The practice of releasing a prisoner during a festival (Mk 15:6; Jn 18:39), otherwise unknown (though see Josephus, J.W. 2.4, 28; Ant. 20.208-210, 215; m. Pesah. 8:6; PFlor. 61.59-62), in Mark’s narrative emphasizes the widespread, sustained and deliberate condemnation of Jesus.

5.2. Matthew. Since the guests are described as reclining, Jesus’ first meal in Matthew is a feast or banquet with “tax collectors and sinners,” with Jesus as the host (Mt 9:10), making the point that he has “come to call not the righteous but sinners” (Mt 9:13) (see Sin, Sinner). In turn, the feast is a foretaste of the eschatological banquet (cf. Is 25:6-8) to which the good and bad are invited (Mt 21:31; 22:10) from all over the Diaspora (Mt 8:11; cf. Zech 8:7; Bar 5:5; Pss. Sol. 11:2).

As for Mark, the Last Supper is a Passover meal

(Mt 26:17), but Matthew strengthens the salvific theme provided by the exodus. The disciples’ preparation echoes those following Moses’ instruction (Mt 26:19; cf. Ex 12:28), and Matthew adds the phrase, “for the forgiveness of sins” (Mt 26:28 [cf. Tg. Onq. 24:8]) to Jesus’ words interpreting the cup. Moreover, the feeding of the five thousand “when it was evening” (Mt 14:15; 26:20), and the reclining (Mt 14:19; 26:20), and the taking, blessing, breaking and giving the bread (Mt 14:19; 26:26) anticipate and interpret Passover, itself foreshadowing the messianic banquet hosted by the compassionate Messiah abundantly meeting the needs of the multitudes, including the Gentiles (cf. Mt 15:29-39).

5.3. Luke. From the initial theme of God feeding the hungry (Lk 1:53), developed through the meal scenes and banquets, in Luke’s Gospel *table fellowship and feasts are particularly important in understanding Jesus, salvation (Lk 15:11-32) and his teaching (Lk 11:37-41). Since women and children were not obligated to attend the festivals (m. Hag. 1:1), Jesus’ faithfulness to Jewish traditions is established early in portraying the boy Jesus and his mother each year accompanying his father as pilgrims to Passover (Lk 2:41-52).

Levi the tax collector, not Jesus (Lk 5:29 // Mt 9:10), is the host of the first meal, making the point that salvation is inclusive (Lk 15:1-2) and is to be reflected by Jesus’ followers (Lk 7:44-46). The meal that Jesus hosts, in which five thousand are more than satisfied (Lk 9:10-17), identifies him as the Messiah (Lk 9:18-20), who does what God and his prophets (2 Kings 4:42-44) in the OT did for his people (Ex 16; Num 11), and looks forward to both the Last Supper (Lk 9:16; 22:19) and the Messianic banquet (Lk 14:15-24; 16:19-31). The meal that Mary and Martha host draws attention to the need for service (Lk 10:29-37), but more importantly, to listen to Jesus (Lk 10:38-42). The meal that Zacchaeus hosts (Lk 19:5 [on menō, “remain,” involving a meal, see Lk 10:7]) is an expression of salvation (Lk 19:9) and a challenge to those who refuse it (Lk 15:1; 19:1).

For the *Last Supper, which, Luke emphasizes, is a Passover meal (Lk 22:1, 7, 8, 11, 13, 15), Jesus is not powerless; as host (Lk 22:11, 14) and head of the group (cf. Ex 12:3-4), he takes the initiative and knows where the feast is to take place (Lk 22:7-8 // Mk 14:12-13). The eschatological significance of Passover is signaled in “when the hour came” (Lk 22:14; cf. Lk 12:40, 46; 14:17; 22:53). Calling those with him *apostles” (Lk 22:14 // Mk 14:17) connects Passover with the life of the church (Lk 6:12-13; Acts 1:2). Although all his feasts have anticipated the eschatological banquet (Lk 12:35-37; 13:28-29), Jesus is particularly eager to celebrate this Passover meal because it will be the last one before the Passover is fulfilled in the kingdom of God (Lk 22:15-16). Jesus interprets the broken bread as his body "given for you" (Lk 22:19 [on the state of the text, see Jeremias 1966, 139-59]), giving it not simply martyrological (cf. Is 53:10), but a strong sacrificial (cf. Ex 30:14; Lev 22:14; Lk 2:24) and redemptive significance (cf. Lev 5:7; Ezek 43:21; Gal 1:4; 3:13). Jesus says that his followers are to repeat the meal "in remembrance" of him (Lk 22:19), suggesting that they are to eat or live together in a way that recalls the significance of his life and death for others. The emphasis on the church is brought out in Jesus saying the cup is poured out for "you" (Lk 22:20), the apostles (Lk 22:14). The final meal, after the resurrection, in echoing the Last Supper, is said to reveal Jesus's identity to his followers (Lk 24:30-31).

5.4. John. Set "on the third day," Jesus' first miracle or sign at a wedding banquet (gamos [Jn 2:1]) may be intended to evoke the resurrection (Jn 2:19-20). Also, the association of this feast (Jn 2:13) and the feeding of the multitude (Jn 6:4), as well as the Last Supper (Jn 13:1), with Passover draws them into the symbolism available for interpreting the Eucharist.

The last day of Tabernacles (Jn 7:37), during which rain was eagerly anticipated, provides the setting for Jesus to say that the thirsty believer can drink from him (rather than Moses [Ex 17:6]), and that the Spirit will be the source of rivers of living water (Jn 7:37-39). This festival, combining the images of water and light, as in the exodus narrative (Ex 13:21; Zech 14:6-8), is also the setting for Jesus to say that he is the light not simply of Jerusalem but of the whole world (Jn 8:12), as illustrated in bringing "light to the "blind (Jn 9:5-7) or those in darkness (Jn 12:46). Consistent with Johannine irony, Jesus the new temple (Jn 2:19-21; 4:20-24) is rejected by the Jews (Jn 10:31-39) at the festival of Dedication of the temple (Jn 10:22) (see 3.2.1 above).

From early in the narrative (Jn 1:29, 36) the Fourth Gospel uses Passover and its interpretive significance as an ongoing backdrop for the story of Jesus, mentioning three separate Passovers. (1) Early in his ministry Jesus goes up to Jerusalem and drives out the merchants and money changers from the temple (Jn 2:13, 23). The next feast, an unidentified one ("feast," heortē without the article [P⁶⁶, P⁷⁵], may be intended to be Weeks [Chrysostom, Hom. Jo. 36.1]), is used to account for Jesus being in Jerusalem on another occasion (Jn 5:1). (2) Jesus, though remaining in Galilee, feeds a crowd of five thousand Passover pilgrims (Jn 6:4), in which readers would see eucharistic allusions (Jn 6:11, 24-34). In the following story of Jesus walking on the sea, with its exodus theme, an echo of Passover may also be intended (Jn 6:19; cf. Ps 77:19), as it is in the mention of "manna in the wilderness" (Jn 6:31) in the ensuing discussion of the feeding establishing that Jesus is the "bread from heaven" (Jn 6:35-51), and that those who eat his flesh and drink his blood live in him, and he in them (Jn 6:52-60). (3) Jesus' entry into Jerusalem probably is connected not with Tabernacles (Jn 12:12), but with Passover, the context for the Passion (Jn 11:55; 12:1; 13:1; 18:28, 39; 19:14).

However, the Last Supper in the Fourth Gospel (Jn 13:1-38) is not a Passover meal, as it takes place before Passover (Jn 13:1). Instead, it is the trial that takes place on the eve of Passover (Jn 18:28) at noon (Jn 19:14), and Jesus' crucifixion is a little later, at the time when the slaughtering of the lambs at the temple began (m. Pesah. 5:1). Jesus becomes the Paschal lamb with unbroken bones (Jn 19:33, 36; cf. Ex 12:46; Jn 1:29), and hyssop is used to offer him wine (Jn 19:29), as it was used in the Passover to apply blood to the doorposts (Ex 12:22).

That the Synoptic Gospels equate the Last Supper with the Passover meal, while the Fourth Gospel dates the death of Jesus at Passover, is more likely to be due to Johannine theological preferences (Jn 1:29; 19:36) (shared by Paul [1 Cor 5:7]) than a difference in calendars (Jeremias 1966, 89-105; *HJP*² 1.587-601). As in Luke, so too in the final scene of the Fourth Gospel, an epilogue, Jesus is host at a meal with eucharistic overtones (Jn 21:13; cf. Jn 6:11) in which he reveals himself as the Lord (Jn 21:1, 13-14) and as still nourishing and abundantly (cf. Jn 2:1-11) supplying the needs of his followers.

See also JUDAISM, COMMON; LAST SUPPER; SABBATH; SYNAGOGUE; TABLE FELLOWSHIP; TEMPLE.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. W. Burkert, Greek Religion, trans. J. Raffan (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1985); idem, "Oriental Symposia: Contrasts and Parallels," in Dining in a Classical Context, ed. W. J. Slater (Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1991), 7-24; E. F. Campbell, "Jewish Shrines of the Hellenistic and Persian Periods," in Symposia: Celebrating the Seventy-Fifth Anniversary of the Founding of the American Schools of Oriental Research (1900-1975), ed. F. M. Cross (Cambridge, MA: American Schools of Oriental Research, 1979) 159-67; R. de Vaux, Archeology and the Dead Sea Scrolls (London: Oxford University Press, 1973); idem, Ancient Israel (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1997); J. H. Greenstone, Jewish Feasts and Fasts (Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1945); J. E. Hartley and S. Wilkens, "Excursus: Calendars in the OT and Israel's Pilgrim Festivals," in J. E. Hartley, Leviticus (WBC 4; Dallas: Word, 1992), 376-83; J. Jeremias, The Eucharistic Words of Jesus, trans. N. Perrin (London: SCM, 1966); idem, Jerusalem in the Time of Jesus: An Investigation into Economic and Social Conditions During the New Testament Period, trans. F. H. Cave and C. H. Cave (London: SCM, 1969); H.-J. Kraus, Worship in Israel: A Cultic History of the Old Testament (Richmond: John Knox, 1966); I. H. Marshall, Last Supper and Lord's Supper (Exeter: Paternoster, 1980); N. Martola, "Eating the Passover Lamb in House-Temples at Alexandria: Some Notes on Passover in Philo," Jewish Studies in a New Europe: Proceedings of the Fifth Congress of Jewish Studies in Copenhagen 1994 Under the Auspices of the European Association for Jewish Studies, ed. U. Haxen, H. Trautner-Kromann and K. L. Goldschmidt Salamon (Copenhagen: Reitzel, 1998) 521-31; O. S. Rankin, The Origins of the Festival of Hanukkah: The Jewish New-Age Festival (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1930); H. H. Scullard, Festivals and Ceremonies of the Roman Republic (Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1981); J. B. Segal, The Hebrew Passover (London: Oxford University Press, 1963); E. Solis-Cohen, ed., Hanukkah: The Feast of Lights (Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society of America, 1965); J. Tabory, "Jewish Festivals in Late Antiquity," in The Cambridge History of Judaism, 4: The Late Roman-Rabbinic Period, ed. S. T. Katz (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2006) 556-72; H. Ulfsgard, The Story of Sukkot: The Setting, Shaping, and Sequel of the Biblical Feast of Tabernacles (BGBE 34; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1998).

G. H. Twelftree

FEMINIST AND WOMANIST CRITICISMS

Feminist and womanist criticisms derive from women's historical struggles for freedom from slavery and gender oppression and in pursuit of equal rights and privileges long denied women. Although rooted in the abolitionist and women's suffrage movements, both have become critical academic disciplines that take seriously women's historical and contemporary lived experiences. Women's experiences and cultural artifacts are affirmed as legitimate lenses or frameworks for engaging in liberative theoretical, theological, ethical, and interpretative reflection about the Bible, Jesus, Women, and interpretations. Feminist and womanist criticisms strive to maintain a political edge intent on dismantling or transforming oppressive systems and ideologies while remaining critically self-reflective.

1. Definitions and History
2. (Re)Sources and Methods/Lenses of Interpretation
3. Contexts, Critical Consciousness and Language Matter
4. Reading Women, Jesus and the Gospels
5. Moving Forward

1. Definitions and History.

Feminism is a movement consisting of women and men who maintain that women deserve the full rights and privileges that their humanity demands. B. hooks, E. Schüssler Fiorenza and other feminists have expressed feminism's mantra simply as "Women are people too." Historically, women's subordination and disenfranchisement have been theologically, effectively and legislatively rationalized. Whereas the historical subordination of women casts a long shadow in contemporary societies, feminism engages in a continual consciousness raising regarding the social construction of gender bias and the oppression of women and others. Feminism is anti-sexism, but it is not anti-male. Not every male is sexist and oppressive; not every female is a feminist. Feminism as a political movement strives to expose, deconstruct, transform and obliterate exploitation, hegemonic dominations, systemic oppressions and other manifestations of injustice. Feminist and womanist critics such as K. Cannon, E. Schüssler Fiorenza, B. hooks and A.-J. Levine contend that feminism cannot dismantle institutionalized oppressions until it recognizes and accepts its complicit involvement and consciously transforms and replaces oppressive ideas and actions with liberating theories and practices. Feminism never perfectly incarnates its theoretical or political agenda, but it is reflective, self-critical and continually evolving.

The formal women's suffrage movement began with the Seneca Falls Convention in Seneca Falls, New York, in 1848, when white women insisted on the right to work outside of their homes and to vote. Enslaved and free black women, already working outside of their "homes," were invited to support (with their presence but not their voices) the women's rights movement in lieu of the abolition of American slavery; black women refused to choose between the two. Slavery, segregation and racism plagued black people's lives in America regardless of their gender. Black women struggled simultaneously against racism and sexism. Modern feminists concede that poor women and women of color experience interlocking oppressions, as opposed to hierarchically ordered subordinations. Today feminism is a global phenomenon of diverse women and men speaking, theorizing and actualizing liberative transformation in and through their particular contexts.

The term womanist first appeared in the 1979 short story "Coming Apart," by author/poet Alice Walker. In Walker's narrative she describes the black wife as a womanist or "a feminist, only more common," acting and resisting in the context of black folks' everyday lives. In Walker's 1983 book In Search of Our Mothers' Garden she further defines a womanist as a black woman engaged in grown folks' talk, audacious, loving women and men sexually and non-sexually, serious and in charge, concerned for the health of the whole community, and who periodically distances herself from family, community and others in order to safeguard, regain and/or maintain her (and the community's) physical, emotional and spiritual health. Womanism as a political movement strives for and promotes survival and an improved quality of life for black women, their communities and other oppressed persons. Some womanists, such as D. Williams, K. Cannon and E. Townes, appropriate the term womanism to describe black women's theological and ethical reflections.

Feminism and womanism are not mutually exclusive categories. Some black women, such as hooks, self-identify as black feminists. Many black women religious and nonreligious scholars and nonacademics self-identify as womanists. As a movement by and for black women, womanism declares that black women's experience matters. They resist and reject efforts to subsume their lived experiences and knowledge under that of white men and women and black men as normative and universal. Black women's lived experience, past and present, is a legitimate starting point and lens for biblical interpretation, constructing theories and doctrines, mundane practice, and for doing theological and ethical reflection.

Feminists and womanists variously and to different degrees acknowledge and seek to address multidimensional, interlocking oppressions that women and men experience, including sexism, gender dualism, racism, (neo)colonialism, imperialism, classism, ageism, heterosexism, anti-Semitism, anti-Judaism, poverty, religious exclusivism and other oppressions. Womanists, like feminists, are not a monolithic group; each recognizes their collective identity and the significance of individual perspectives and experiences. Feminists and womanists claim the right to author and act as subjects of their own narratives and theological reflection, to expose and name their own oppressions, and to decide what practices are relevant and liberative for themselves and their communities. They prioritize the construction of liberative theories and practices and understand the interconnectedness of theory and practice. Feminists and womanists value both intragroup and intergroup dialogue and collaboration (table talk and banquet talk) with other feminists and womanists globally.

2. (Re)Sources and Methods/Lenses of Interpretation.

Feminist and womanist sources for biblical interpretation and for theological and ethical reflection include the biblical canon (whether Protestant, Catholic or Orthodox) as well as extrabiblical and/or noncanonical texts (written and oral). They mine the Synoptic Gospels, John's Gospel and the hypothetical *Q sayings source as well as Hellenistic Jewish texts (e.g., Judith, Tobit, Susanna) and noncanonical apocryphal texts (e.g., Gospel of Mary, Protevangelium of James, Gospel of Thomas). Archaeological inscriptions and artifacts aid in reconstructing and recovering women's historical participation and agency in the Gospels. Epistemological resources for doing feminist and womanist hermeneutics include women's remembrances of lived experiences located in survival and liberation traditions and in cultural artifacts (ancient texts, the Bible, folk literature, slave songs and narratives, the black church[es], visual art, music, literature [fiction and nonfiction]). Sources of knowledge and wisdom also include early or proto-feminist and proto-womanist interpreters, preachers and prophetic voices such as Sojourner Truth, Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Anna Julia Cooper and Christina Rosetti (see Taylor and Choi). Many feminist and womanists, including B. hooks, K. Cannon, E. Townes and E. Schüssler Fiorenza, understand knowledge as "embodied-mediated." They argue that since all knowing is embodied, all knowledge is infallible. According to M. Aquino and A. Isasi-Díaz, the embodied daily life (lo cotidiano) of Latinas or mujeristas constitutes mundane conscious material and cultural experiences and/or struggles—action and reflection occurring daily in spaces of theological discourse. Many reject the strict dichotomy between biblical interpretation and theological reflection.

Feminists and womanists employ a variety of interpretive and cross-disciplinary methods or lenses. Some employ literary criticisms—*narrative criticism (e.g., Anderson; Dewey with Rhoads; Tolbert), rhetorical criticism (e.g., Schüssler Fiorenza 2000; Matthews), reader-response criticism (e.g., Anderson; Fehribach; Kinukawa 2000; Wainwright 1998a)—and “postcolonial and/or liberationist criticisms (e.g., Aquino; Dube 2004; Kinukawa 2004; Kwok; Tamez 2002b). Others also pursue historical reconstruction (e.g., Kraemer and D’Angelo; Schüssler Fiorenza 1984). Many use a combination of methods or lenses. Even while employing to various degrees historical-critical methods (searching behind the text for original meaning, sources, audience, etc.), feminists such as E. Schüssler Fiorenza and J. Schaberg disavow its objectivist and/or positivist claims (value-neutral, ideologically free, scientific, free from subjectivity). Further, they reject the notion that by using historical-critical and social-science methodologies, biblical scholars can produce the original and unbiased truth about Jesus and the early Jesus movement. But in fact many mainstream biblical scholars deny and obscure the fact that all knowledge production is contextual and embodied.

3. Contexts, Critical Consciousness and Language Matter.

Not all Jewish, black, white, Latina/mujerista, Asian, Muslim or Native American feminists or womanists will read texts and contexts the same by virtue of identification with an ethnic or socially constructed racial group, despite shared cultural and historical experiences. Likewise, feminists and womanists vary in the authority that they attribute to the Bible. Some, such as “radical feminist” M. Daly, totally reject the Bible and biblical authority. But most agree that the Gospels and Jesus (and the Bible) can be interpreted in liberative ways when read with a critical consciousness. According to feminists and womanists, reading critically means becoming intentionally aware of the presence and function of androcentric (male-centered), misogynistic (demonstrating dislike for or bias against women and their agency) and patriarchal (father- or male-dominated) language and contexts including the perspectives of the Gospel writers and of the first-century Eastern Mediterranean world. In other words, many read with a “hermeneutics of suspicion,” conscious of male bias and viewpoints imposed upon or inscribed in the biblical text. E. Schüssler Fiorenza coined the term kyriarchy (from the Greek noun kyrios, referring to “lord, master, husband, father”) as inclusive of patriarchy and other oppressions, such as classism. Feminists and womanists employ various methods to expose, name and challenge such biases and to offer alternative readings so that oppressive contexts, frameworks, images and rhetoric are not (re)inscribed onto women’s lives and ministry.

J. Grant, E. Schüssler Fiorenza, J. Glancy and M. Smith argue that biblical interpreters should critique the reinscription of “master/slave” language and images in parables and other texts that identify Jesus and/or God with the slave master who expects and exacts profits and servitude from slaves and cruelly punishes them for noncompliance. They question the theological and practical implications of a God or Savior who behaves like a slave master. Feminists and womanists generally believe that when language functions oppressively to stereotype, circumscribe, prescribe and/or proscribe women and others, it must be exposed, deconstructed, reconstructed and sometimes abandoned.

4. Reading Women, Jesus and the Gospels.

Liberative interpretation often requires the reconstruction of historical memory, or “re-membering,” based on available sources and historical imagination, or what E. Schüssler Fiorenza calls “emancipatory historiography.” Thus, feminists and womanists’ re-presentations of women and the Jesus movement often engage a critical re-membering.

Protofeminists and womanists (e.g., Elizabeth Cady Stanton and Sojourner Truth) apologetically re-membered or highlighted biblical images of women as teachers, preachers, apostles and prophets in order to affirm women’s presence and significance in the Jesus movement and consequently in contemporary life. Since Luke’s Gospel contains the largest representation of women, many feminists and womanists, past and present, consider it the most liberating of the four canonical Gospels. Others, such as R. D’Angelo, T. Seim, I. Reimer and M. Smith, argue that although Luke contains more images of women, most women in Luke (and Acts) are muted or characterized as “auxiliary” to the Jesus movement.

Since Elizabeth Cady Stanton’s 1895 Woman’s Bible, feminists have produced commentaries employing multiple methods for critically reading texts concerning women. These include the pioneering one-volume Women’s Bible Commentary (Newsom and Ringe [being revised with J. Lapsley in 2012]), the two-volume Searching the Scriptures (Schüssler Fiorenza 1994), The IVP Women’s Bible Commentary (Kroeger and Evans) and other one-volume commentaries, such as those in the Feminist Companion to the New Testament and Early Christian Writings series (e.g., Levine and Blickenstaff 2001; 2002).

In addition to commentaries and articles covering women in the Gospels (and Acts) and apocryphal texts, feminist and womanist scholars have engaged in historical and literary (re)constructions and/or critical readings of women, named and unnamed, including Mary the mother of Jesus, Anna, the woman who anointed Jesus at Bethany, the bent-over woman, the bleeding woman, the Syrophoenician/Canaanite woman and Mary Magdalene (e.g., Schaberg 2002; Pippin 2004; Thurston; Brock; Gaventa 1995, 2005; Kraemer and D'Angelo; Matthews; Dube 2004; Kinukawa 1994, 2000; Levine and Blickenstaff 2002), as well as other texts (with or without women) that have theological, ecclesiological, christological and ethical implications for women and other oppressed peoples (e.g., Aquino; Tamez 2002a, 2005; Ringe 1985).

Critical remembering and analysis of the Gospels is not limited to representations of women; it also includes interpretations of Jesus. Feminist and womanist scholars such as D. Williams, E. Schüssler Fiorenza, J. Terrell and R. St. Clair emphasize Jesus' life and ministry, arguing that his masculine gender is of no necessary significance for salvation or ecclesiology. They further argue that Jesus, like John the Baptist before him, preached a sociopolitical message about the basileia (domain) of God, which is a tensive symbol representing a realized, imminent and future reality. Other feminists and womanists argue that Jesus is found in typically feminine settings and is accused of characteristically feminine offenses. Jesus shaped women, and women shaped Jesus, as the story of the Syrophoenician woman demonstrates.

Some feminist/womanist scholars carefully maintain Jesus' Jewishness and the Jewish beginnings of the Jesus movement and critique the anti-Semitic and/or anti-Jewish rhetoric of the Gospels. A. Reinhartz, E. Wainwright, A.-J. Levine and others have critiqued anti-Judaism in feminist and other scholarship that, for example, effectively divorces Jesus from *Judaism as the singular, paradigmatic rogue Jew who grants equality to women, dismisses Torah, and lived and ministered as a Galilean (versus a Judean). Feminist and womanists generally affirm Jesus' Jewishness, that he respected Jewish practices, and that he advocated for social justice in step with the tradition of the prophets. Jewish and other feminists and womanists agree that Jesus must be understood within his historical Jewish context and not constructed so as to condemn Judaism and Jews. Likewise, Jesus' early forerunners and his disciples were Jewish; Jewish *women belonged to and shaped the Jesus reform movement.

B. Gaventa has protested the Jesus Seminar's portrayal of Jesus as non-Jewish; the entire canon is relevant for constructing Jesus' identity. According to Schüssler Fiorenza, research on the historical Jesus, with its claims to scientific positivistic methodologies that purport to construct the real historical Jesus, requires critical exploration into the rhetorical politics of meaning-making. Schüssler Fiorenza further argues that mainstream research on the historical Jesus harmonizes the multiple perspectives and representations of Jesus in Christian Scripture and traditions to create a definite monolithic discourse that fashions the historical Jesus in the likeness of elite white males; any literary or rhetorical reconstruction of Jesus is a re-presentation. Cannon notes that the quest for the historical Jesus reached its zenith in the West during colonialism and the confiscation of land and resources for Western expansionism. Thus, Cannon coined the phrases "missiologic of imminent Parousia" and "theologic of racialized normativity," which reflect how Christian missionary expansionists employed the Great Commission and the eschatological imminent return of Jesus as a motivation and rationalization for the Christianizing and enslaving of Africans.

K. Douglas, H. Chung, M. Aquino and other feminists and womanists emphasize that God in Jesus unites concretely with black, Asian and Latina women, and with all oppressed peoples. Douglas also asserts that an understanding of Christ as symbolically black affirms that Christ is with the black community in its struggle for survival, liberation and wholeness, and that black men and women can see themselves in the image of Christ. Thus, feminists and womanists assert that Jesus' crucifixion is a reminder of God's "with-us-ness," and that Christ, as *prophet, challenges oppressions inside and outside of community.

Some feminists and womanists reject a hermeneutics of sacrifice and/or are concerned with how interpretations of Jesus' crucifixion impact women's everyday lives (e.g., Reid; Terrell; St. Clair). They argue that the crucifixion should not be interpreted in a way that glorifies violence and women's oppressions. Terrell asserts that God does not glory in suffering or blood loss by one person for the sake of another, promoting a hermeneutic of sacrificial violence, particularly against the weak in society. But Jesus' sacrificial act resulted from his confrontation with evil. Williams, St. Clair, R. Weems and others identify agony, shame and surrogacy as critical aspects of women's lived experiences. They argue that Jesus calls his disciples to partner with him in his ministry and not in his pain. Thus, agony (pain and suffering) is not prerequisite for discipleship or ministry. Pain as recognized, named and transformed agony is a consequence of discipleship. Postcolonial feminist M. Dube argues that women must name Jesus for themselves. According to Dube and others, Jesus is the liberator who frees the people from oppressive political and economic systems, repressive religious institutions and spirituality, and gender injustices. According to Dube, S. Ringe, E. Tamez and others, a liberator Jesus sends women to proclaim and embody a gospel of grace and liberation.

5. Moving Forward.

Critics such as S. Yang, A. Smith, Cannon, Levine and Wainwright hope that feminism and womanism will remain a political movement dedicated to (1) consciousness raising and theories that translate into social justice activities that transform communities; (2) the promotion of international, intergenerational, multicultural, cross-disciplinary dialogues, agendas and advocacy services; (3) engagement of emerging voices such as those of Muslim and Native feminist scholars; (4) critique of internalized oppressions, such as the use of binary assumptions (e.g., secular versus religious, religion versus politics, Christian versus secular), of identity politics that disavow ethnic cultures while tacitly reinscribing white privilege, and of the relationship between empire and Christian hegemony and its partnership with imperialism and expansionism; and (5) continual rethinking of feminist and womanist biblical interpretations, theologies and ethics.

See also LATINO/LATINA CRITICISM; POSTCOLONIAL CRITICISM; WOMEN.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. C. Anderson, "Matthew: Gender and Reading," Semeia 28 (1983) 3-27; J. C. Anderson and S. D. Moore, eds., Mark and Method: New Approaches to Biblical Studies (2nd ed.; Minneapolis: Fortress, 2008); M. P. Aquino, D. L. Machado and J. Rodríguez, eds., A Reader in Latina Feminist Theology: Religion and Justice (Austin: University of Texas Press, 2002); A. G. Brock, Mary Magdalene, the First Apostle: The Struggle for Authority (HTS 51; Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2003); K. Cannon, Katie's Canon: Womanist and the Soul of the Black Community (New York: Continuum, 1995); idem, "Cutting Edge: Christian Imperialism and the Transatlantic Slave Trade," JFSR 24.1 (2008) 127-34; K. Cannon, E. Townes and A. D. Sims, Womanist Theological Ethics: A Reader (Louisville, KY: Westminster John Knox, 2011); M. Daly, Gyn/Ecology (Boston: Beacon, 1978); idem, Beyond God the Father: Toward a Philosophy of Women's Liberation (Boston: Beacon, 1993); R. D'Angelo, "The ANHR Question in Luke-Acts: Imperial Masculinity and the Deployment of Women in the Early Second Century," in A Feminist Companion to Luke, ed. A.-J. Levine and M. Blickenstaff (FCNTECW 3; London: Sheffield Academic Press, 2002) 44-69; K. B. Douglas, The Black Christ (Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1993); M. W. Dube, "Talitha Cum! A Postcolonial Feminist and HIV/AIDS Reading of Mark 5:21-43," in Grant Me Justice! HIV/AIDS and Gender Readings of the Bible, ed. M. W. Dube and M. R. A. Kanyoro (Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 2004) 115-40; idem, "Twenty-Two Years of Bleeding and Still the Princess Sings!" in Grant Me Justice! HIV/AIDS and Gender Readings of the Bible, ed. M. W. Dube and M. R. A. Kanyoro (Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 2004) 186-99; A. Fehribach, The Women in the Life of the Bridegroom: A Feminist Historical-Literary Analysis of the Gospel of John (Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1998); B. R. Gaventa, Mary: Glimpses of the Mother of Jesus (SPNT; Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1995); idem, "All Generations Will Call Me Blessed': Mary in Biblical and Ecumenical Perspective," in A Feminist Companion to Mariology, ed. A.-J. Levine with M. M. Robbins (London: T & T Clark, 2005) 121-29; B. R. Gaventa and R. B. Hays, "Which Jesus? The Search for a Scholarly Consensus," ChrCent 125 (2008) 27-32; idem, "Seeking the Identity of Jesus," JSNT 32 (2010) 363-70; J. A. Glancy, "Slaves and Slavery in the Matthean Parables," JBL 119 (2000) 67-90; J. Grant, White Women's Christ and Black Women's Jesus: Feminist Christology and Womanist Response (AARAS 64; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1989); B. hooks, Feminism Is for Everybody: Passionate Politics (Cambridge, MA: South End Press, 2000); A. M. Isasi-Díaz, En la Lucha/In the Struggle: Elaborating a Mujerista Theology (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1993); H. Kinukawa, "The Story of the Hemorrhaging Woman (Mark 5:25-34) Read from a Japanese Feminist Context," BibInt 2 (1994) 283-93; idem, "The Miracle Story of the Bent-over Woman (Luke 13:10-17): In Interaction-Centered Interpretation," in Transformative Encounters: Jesus and Women Re-Viewed, ed. R. Kitzberger (BIS 43; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2000) 292-314; idem, "De-colonizing Ourselves as Readers: The Story of the Syro-Phoenician Woman as Text," in Distant Voices Drawing Near: Essays in Honor of Antoinette Clark Wire, ed. H. E. Hearon (Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 2004) 131-44; R. S. Kraemer and R. D'Angelo, eds., Women and

- Christian Origins* (New York: Oxford University Press, 1999); C. C. Kroeger and M. J. Evans, The IVP Women's Bible Commentary (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2002); P.-L. Kwok, "On Color-Coding Jesus," in The Postcolonial Bible, ed. R. S. Sugirtharajah (BibPost 1; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1998); A.-J. Levine, "Multiculturalism, Women's Studies, and Anti-Judaism," JFSR 19 (2003) 119-28; idem, "How the Church Divorces Jesus from Judaism: Misusing Jesus," ChrCent 123 (2006) 20-25; A.-J. Levine and M. Blickenstaff, eds., A Feminist Companion to Mark (FCNTECW 2; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2001); idem, A Feminist Companion to Luke (FCNTECW 3; London: Sheffield Academic Press, 2002); S. Matthews, First Converts: Rich Pagan Women and the Rhetoric of Mission in Early Judaism and Christianity (Palo Alto, CA: Stanford University Press, 2001); C. A. Newsom and S. H. Ringe, eds., The Women's Bible Commentary (London: SPCK; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1992); L. Phillips, The Womanist Reader (New York: Routledge, 2006); T. Pippin, "The Politics of Meeting: Women and Power in the New Testament," in That They Might Live: Power, Empowerment, and Leadership in the Church, ed. M. Downey (New York: Crossroad, 1991) 13-34; idem, "For Fear of the Jews: Lying and Truth-Telling in Translating the Gospel of John," Semeia 76 (1996) 81-97; idem, "Wisdom's Deviant Ways," in On the Cutting Edge: The Study of Women in Biblical Worlds; Essays in Honor of Elisabeth Schüssler Fiorenza, ed. J. Schaberg, A. Bach and E. Fuchs (London: Continuum, 2004) 143-53; B. E. Reid, Taking Up the Cross: New Testament Interpretations Through Latina and Feminist Eyes (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2007); I. R. Reimer, Women in the Acts of the Apostles: A Feminist Liberation Perspective (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1995); D. Rhoads, J. Dewey and D. Michie, Mark as Story: An Introduction to the Narrative of a Gospel (2nd ed.; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1999); S. H. Ringe, Jesus, Liberation, and the Biblical Jubilee (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985); idem, Wisdom's Friends: Community and Christology in the Fourth Gospel (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1999); J. Schaberg, The Resurrection of Mary Magdalene: Legends, Apocrypha, and the Christian Testament (London: Continuum, 2002); idem, The Illegitimacy of Jesus: A Feminist Theological Interpretation of the New Testament Infancy Narratives (repr., Phoenix: Sheffield Phoenix Press, 2006); J. Schaberg with M. J. Debaufre, Mary Magdalene Understood (New York: Continuum, 2006); E. Schüssler Fiorenza, In Memory of Her: A Feminist Theological Reconstruction of Christian Origins (New York: Crossroad, 1984); idem, ed., Searching the Scriptures (2 vols.; London: SCM, 1994); idem, Sharing Her Word: Feminist Biblical Interpretation in Context (Boston: Beacon, 1999); idem, Jesus and the Politics of Interpretation (New York: Continuum, 2000); T. K. Seim, The Double Message: Patterns of Gender in Luke-Acts (Nashville: Abingdon, 1994); A. Smith, "Envisioning the Future of Feminist Studies in Religion: Elisabeth Schüssler Fiorenza and the Future of Native Feminist Theology," JFSR 25.1 (2009) 143-49; M. J. Smith, "Slavery in the Early Church," in True to Our Native Land: An African American New Testament Commentary, ed. B. Blount (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2007); R. A. St. Clair, Call and Consequences: A Womanist Reading of Mark (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2008); E. Tamez, "The Quality of Mercy," Other Side 38 (2002a) 41-43; idem, "A Star Illuminates the Darkness," in The Bible in a World Context: An Experiment in Contextual Hermeneutics, ed. W. Dietrich and U. Luz (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2002b) 53-58; idem, "God's Grace and Humanity Dignity," EcRev 57 (2005) 267-77; idem, "A Rereading of Luke 16:19-31," in Translating the New Testament: Text, Translation, Theology, ed. S. E. Porter and M. J. Boda (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2009) 319-23; M. A. Taylor and A. Choi, Handbook of Women Biblical Interpreters (Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2012); J. M. Terrell, Power in the Blood? The Cross in the African American Experience (Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1998); B. Thurston, "Who Was Anna? Luke 2:36-38," PRSt 28 (2001) 47-55; M. A. Tolbert, Sowing the Gospel: Mary's Mark in Literary-Historical Perspective (Minneapolis: Augsburg Fortress, 1996); E. M. Wainwright, Shall We Look for Another? A Feminist Rereading of the Matthean Jesus (Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1998a); idem, "Tradition Makers/Tradition Shapers: Women of the Matthean Tradition," WW 28 (1998b) 380-88; idem, "Roundtable Response to: The Disease of Postcolonial New Testament Studies and the Hermeneutics of Healing," JFSR 20.1 (2004) 119-25; R. J. Weems, Showing Mary: How Women Can Share Prayers, Wisdom, and the Blessings of God (New York: Warner, 2002); idem, Just a Sister Away: Understanding the Timeless Connection Between Women Today and Women of the Bible (West Bloomfield, MI: Walk Worthy, 2005); D. S. Williams, Sisters in the Wilderness: The Challenge of Womanist God-Talk (Maryknoll, NY: Orbis, 1995); S. A. Yang, "Challenges and Opportunities in Current Feminist Biblical Studies—Roundtable Response to: Feminist Biblical Studies," JFSR 25.2 (2009) 107-12. M. J. Smith
- FESTIVALS, JEWISH. See FEASTS.

FINAL DISCOURSE. See FAREWELL DISCOURSE.

FOOD LAWS. See JUDAISM, COMMON.

FOOTWASHING. See SLAVE, SERVANT.

FORGIVENESS OF SINS

Rendering terms closely associated with “freedom, release, letting go” (aphiēmi, aphesis, apolyō), “forgiveness” in the Gospels represents less a static, juridical concept of expunging a record of transgression than a dynamic, social-psychological experience of being released from the deleterious effects of guilt and sinful behavior and restoring broken relations between human beings and God and among themselves. Forgiveness thus most closely aligns with liberation, *salvation, reconciliation and restoration. Because of humankind’s deeply flawed nature, forgiveness ultimately depends on the gracious love of God mediated through Jesus Christ. But far from being passive recipients, people respond to God’s reconciling *mercy in various ways, especially repentance, *baptism, confession, *prayer and forgiveness of others. But these practices appear intermittently in Gospel accounts and more as correlates than strict prerequisites of forgiveness.

1. The Triple Tradition
2. Matthew
3. Luke
4. John

1. The Triple Tradition.

1.1. The Mission of John the Baptist (Mt 3:1-6; Mk 1:1-6; Lk 3:1-6). Preparing God’s people for the climactic coming of the Lord in salvation and judgment, the prophet John proclaims and practices “a baptism of repentance for the forgiveness [aphesis] of sins.” No particular efficacy is tied to John’s baptism as an atoning or cleansing ritual; rather, it functions as an act of renewal, a recrossing of the Jordan River, as it were, anticipating the final establishment of God’s rule in the land. Accompanied by repentance and confession of *sins, the forgiveness envisioned by John fits the people to welcome and walk with their soon-coming Lord along “straight paths” (cf. Is 40:3-4) (see John the Baptist).

1.2. The Healing of the Paralytic and Eating with “Sinners” (Mt 9:1-13; Mk 2:1-17; Lk 5:17-32). In restoring a paralyzed man brought by supportive friends, Jesus jolts some religious teachers (scribes) by juxtaposing statements of forgiveness and *healing (“Your sins are forgiven [aphiēmi]. . . . Stand up, take your bed/mat and walk”). Although not insinuating any direct, causative link between this man’s iniquity and disability, as if the latter were somehow a merited punishment, Jesus does imply a broad connection between forgiveness and wholeness. His main point, however, stresses his “authority on earth to forgive sins” as “the Son of Man,” God’s supreme agent of *judgment and deliverance for his suffering people (cf. Dan 7:13-27). This represents nothing less than Jesus’ claim to divine authority, since only God can forgive sins. Accordingly, because certain scribes resist granting such exclusive power to Jesus, or any other human being, they accuse him of committing *blasphemy.

In the next scene, Jesus calls a tax collector (Matthew/Levi) to follow him and then dines in this man’s home with a large group of other “tax collectors and sinners.” Again, Jesus shocks some religious experts, but not for pronouncing forgiveness. Here the conflict concerns Jesus’ *table fellowship with sinners, which involves a certain welcoming and reconciling relationship with them. Saying nothing about forgiveness, Jesus defends his conduct as integral to his physician-like vocation of helping the weak and wayward. In Matthew and Mark, such therapeutic ministry remains open-ended; only Luke pinpoints the reformative goal of Jesus’ outreach: “I have come to call . . . sinners to repentance” (Lk 5:32 [cf. Mt 9:13; Mk 2:17]).

1.3. The Unpardonable Sin (Mt 12:31-32; Mk 3:28-30; Lk 12:10). The blasphemy question related to forgiveness arises again, initiated this time by Jesus regarding the one transgression that “will not be forgiven.” Affirming the accessibility of forgiveness for a wide range of “sins and blasphemies,” including calumnies against the *Son of Man, the sole exception concerns blasphemy against the *Holy Spirit. Never defining the precise content of such a heinous utterance, Jesus likely has in view more of a hardened disposition than random declaration against God’s Spirit. The context in Matthew and Mark suggests a perverse, irrational partnering of the Holy Spirit with evil spirits, of God with Satan (Mt 12:22-30; Mk 3:21-27) (see Demon, Devil, Satan); such a distorted view of God’s work effectively denies the need for and means of forgiveness. In Luke’s version the context implies a scenario of persecution prompting public renunciation of Christian faith, thus evidencing tragic alienation from the Holy Spirit, who provides the will and words to confirm true allegiance to God (Lk 12:11-12).

1.4. Prayer (Mt 6:12-15; Mk 11:25; Lk 11:4). Jesus advocates *praying to God the Father as a prime means of asking and receiving forgiveness. Though inviting everyone to approach God directly without intermediaries, Jesus assumes a deeply communal and mutual experience of prayer and forgiveness. In the Lord's Prayer we should plead collectively, "Forgive us our debts/sins," as we commit ourselves to forgive all who have offended us (Mt 6:11-15; Lk 11:4). Mark 11:25 reverses the order, placing priority on forgiving others: "Whenever you (all) stand praying, forgive"—first of all—"anything against anyone, in order that [hina] your heavenly Father might also forgive you (all)." Forgiveness by God motivates forgiveness of others; and in turn, forgiveness of others authenticates alliance with God. Three different terms denote sinful objects of forgiveness in these texts: opheilēma (Mt 6:12), hamartia (Lk 11:4), paraptōma (Mt 6:14-15; Mk 11:25). The first is the most distinctive, referring to "debts" both morally and financially. Nevertheless, forgiveness should not be reduced to a mechanical accounting operation, wiping the record clean. It retains a personal dimension, a reconciling not only of the books but also, more importantly, of the bond between us and "everyone indebted [opheilō] to us" (Lk 11:4 [cf. Mt 6:12]).

1.5. The Lord's Supper (Mt 26:27-29; Mk 14:23-25; Lk 22:16-18, 20). The Synoptic Gospels agree that Jesus' eucharistic words of institution identify the cup of wine with his outpoured blood, certifying a renewed covenantal bond with God (see Last Supper). Though no doubt implied in Mark and Luke, Matthew alone explicitly connects this "covenant" (diathēkē) with "forgiveness [aphesis] of sins" (Mt 26:28). Such a covenantal framework enhances the relational, reconciliatory thrust of Jesus' ministry of forgiveness.

2. Matthew.

2.1. Jesus' Name (Mt 1:21). Matthew does not overtly identify Jesus' name as the medium of forgiving sins (as in Lk 24:47; Acts 2:38; 10:43), but he comes close with the angelic birth announcement: "And you will call his name Jesus; for he will save [sōzō] his people from their sins" (Mt 1:21). Building on Jesus' Hebrew name (yēšūa), meaning, "salvation, deliverance, help," this text orients his identity and mission around securing his people's salvation from sins. Such deliverance no doubt includes forgiveness as part of a dynamic, holistic project of rescuing people from the ravages of sin and enabling them to flourish.

2.2. The Sermon on the Mount (Mt 5:21-26, 38-48; 6:12-15; 7:1-5). Apart from the Lord's Prayer (Mt 6:12-15), the first major block of Jesus' teaching in Matthew 5—7 contains no direct instruction about forgiveness (see Sermon on the Mount/Plain). But multiple units reinforce the fundamental duty of overcoming grievances with other persons in the family of God. Before presenting a gift at God's altar, one must "first [prōton] be reconciled" with any offending or offended "brother" (or sister) (Mt 5:21-26); worshiping God is pointless apart from open fellowship with others. Along with pursuing reconciliation, one must also avoid retaliation against oppressors, including proportional responses of vengeance ("eye for an eye"). Jesus, in one of his most radical teachings, advocates total self-surrender to the deeds and needs of others, including evil deeds such as striking a person's cheek or suing for a person's clothing (Mt 5:38-42); though not stated, perhaps Jesus takes the view that only God can execute just and righteous vengeance (cf. Deut 32:35; Rom 12:19). Beyond promoting passive nonretaliation against opponents, Jesus also pushes for positive responses: "Love your enemies, and pray for those persecuting you" (Mt 5:44 [cf. Lk 6:27-28]). These absurd, counterintuitive actions are possible only for "children of your heavenly Father," who reflect their Father's pure, self-giving love for "evil/unjust" as well as "good/just" creatures (Mt 5:45-48). Moreover, patience with flawed human beings, including enemies, springs from honest awareness of our own sinful and hurtful proclivities (Mt 7:1-5).

2.3. Church Relations (Mt 18). In the middle of Matthew's fourth block of teaching, Peter asks Jesus how often he (Peter) must forgive a "brother" who sins against him, suggesting an upper limit of seven times (Mt 18:21). This question follows Jesus' extended instruction about dealing with weak members and strained relations within the church (ekklēsia [Mt 18:17]), calling for removing obstacles that impede struggling "little ones" (Mt 18:1-9), retrieving those who have strayed (Mt 18:10-14), and reconciling the estranged (Mt 18:15-20). Although Jesus does not demand aphesis per se in this section, Peter's query rightly subsumes these concerns for church unity and pastoral care under the "forgiveness" umbrella. However, Peter errs in his quest for boundaries: where he proposes a maximum of seven occasions, Jesus compounds it to seventy times that, which is to say, forgiveness has no expiration date.

Jesus then launches into a parable demonstrating the *hypocrisy of an unforgiving disposition (Mt 18:23-35). The story reflects precarious economic realities in the ancient world. A master-creditor orders a servant who is unable to repay an enormous debt to be sold, together with all his family and possessions, into debtor's slavery (imprisonment); but when the debtor pleads for patience, the compassionate lord “releases” (apolyō) and “forgives” (aphiēmi) him the entire debt (Mt 18:27). In turn, however, this forgiven debtor callously refuses to show mercy to a fellow servant who owes him a much lesser sum. In the end, the master harshly judges the first servant for failing to forgive as he had been forgiven. This emphasis on the social responsibility of forgiving debts, as the Lord has forgiven us, reinforces Matthew’s version of the Lord’s Prayer (cf. Mt 6:12, 14-15). And again, the close linkage of debts and sins involves more than a numbers game; economic “forgiveness,” as surely as other types, has profound implications for human relationships and overall well-being.

3. Luke.

3.1. Zechariah’s Song (Lk 1:76-79). Inspired by the Holy Spirit (Lk 1:67), Zechariah poetically forecasts the prophetic mission of his son, John the Baptist, in parallel terms of “salvation” and “forgiveness”: “to give knowledge of salvation [sōtēria] to his people by the forgiveness [aphesis] of sins” (Lk 1:77). The wider context of Zechariah’s Benedictus imagines such salvation/forgiveness as sociopolitical liberation from oppressive enemies, freeing God’s people to serve their covenantal Lord “without fear” (Lk 1:71-75).

3.2. Jesus’ Sermon in Nazareth (Lk 4:16-21). In Jesus’ first public proclamation in his hometown synagogue, he identifies his vocation with that of the Spirit-anointed, “evangelical” (euangelizomai) prophet profiled in Isaiah. Although this mission does not explicitly include forgiving sins, the common term for “forgiveness” (aphesis) appears twice designating “release” or “freedom” from other enslaving elements: “The Spirit of the Lord . . . has sent me to proclaim release [aphesis] to the captives . . . to send forth the oppressed in freedom [aphesis]” (Lk 4:18-19 [cf. Is 61:1; 58:6]). Moreover, the announcement of the *Jubilee “year of the Lord’s favor” envisages wide-scale remission/forgiveness of debts (Lk 4:19; cf. Lev 25:8-55). The “good news” communicated by Jesus thus encompasses emancipation from physical, psychological, social and economic encumbrances as well as “spiritual” sins. Multifaceted aphesis drives Luke’s holistic vision of salvation.

3.3. Jesus as “Friend of Sinners.” Luke places special emphasis on Jesus’ role as “friend of sinners” (Lk 7:34), especially in contexts of table fellowship. In addition to Jesus’ act of eating with tax collectors and sinners in Levi’s house (Lk 5:29-32), three episodes stand out.

3.3.1. The “Sinful” Woman (Lk 7:36-50). At a dinner party for Jesus hosted by Simon the *Pharisee, an uninvited, anonymous *woman known for her “many [unspecified] sins” (Lk 7:47) lavishly kisses and anoints Jesus’ feet, wiping them with her hair. Whereas Simon looks askance at this woman and likewise at Jesus for accepting her advances, Jesus twice commends her and pronounces that her sins “have been forgiven” (apheōntai [Lk 7:47-48]). The use of the perfect tense here suggests a past and permanent state of forgiveness that the woman did nothing to merit. Her extravagant hospitality toward Jesus (which Simon had failed to show) demonstrates her grateful love for Jesus’ freely granted forgiveness. It also demonstrates her “faithful” (pistis) response to her experience of “having been saved” (sesōken [Lk 7:50]), again expressed in the perfect tense. Luke once again reinforces the link between forgiveness and salvation.

3.3.2. The “Lost” Son (Lk 15:11-32). Told in defense of his controversial practice of eating with “sinners” (Lk 15:1-2), Jesus’ longest parable features a rebellious younger son who abandons his father and squanders his inheritance in worthless pursuits. At rock bottom, however, he returns home, confesses and repents of his sin (cf. Lk 15:7, 10), but notably he does not request his father’s forgiveness. Assuming that he has forfeited his family position, the best he hopes for is employment as a farmhand. But his father will have none of it. Virtually ignoring his son’s confession, the father showers him with gifts and a lavish banquet as signs of full, family fellowship. No probation is required, no conditions laid down, and no formal words of forgiveness uttered. Much to the chagrin of the elder son, the father welcomes his “lost” and, for all practical purposes, “dead” son home again with unstinting joy and love. The emphasis falls more on reconciling and restoring the sinner than on remitting sins.

3.3.3. The Tax Collector Zacchaeus (Lk 19:1-10). When Jesus goes to the house of the diminutive, wealthy chief tax officer Zacchaeus, he draws criticism from the Jericho citizenry for associating with a known “sinner” (Lk 19:7). Although Jesus issues no call for repentance, Zacchaeus pledges to give half of his possessions to the poor and to restore fraudulent excesses fourfold. His use of the present tense (“I am giving [didōmi] to the poor” [Lk 19:8]) may imply a pattern of generous practice before he met Jesus. In any case, though not pronouncing Zacchaeus “forgiven,” Jesus confirms his experience of “salvation” (sōtēria) and reconciled status in the covenant family of Abraham (Lk 19:10).

3.4. “Father Forgive Them . . .” (Lk 23:34). This famous prayer of Jesus uttered from the cross is omitted in some of the best available manuscripts. However, though likely not included in Luke’s original work, it has the ring of an authentic saying of Jesus and fits well in its context. Directed toward Jesus’ executioners, the petition provides a poignant example of loving and praying for one’s abusers (Lk 6:27-28; cf. Mt 5:43-44) and meshes with Jesus’ promise of eternal fellowship with a criminal dying alongside him (Lk 23:39-43). Jesus’ concern for restoring sinful human beings persists up to his final breath.

3.5. The Great Commission (Lk 24:44-49). In his final words to his followers the risen Jesus commissions them “to proclaim in his name repentance for the forgiveness of sins to all nations” (Lk 24:47) (see Mission). This announcement identifies the source of forgiveness as the exalted person (“name”) of Christ, its ground as the disposition of repentance (a key Lukan theme), and its scope as all peoples of the world. Christian forgiveness thus ultimately seeks inclusive, intercultural reconciliation—universal peace on earth (cf. Lk 2:14).

4. John.

The terminology of “forgiveness” is comparatively rare in John’s Gospel. Contrary to popular thought, Jesus never mentions “forgiveness” or “sins” in discussing “new birth” with Nicodemus (Jn 3:1-21) or living water with the Samaritan woman (Jn 4:1-42); likewise in the scene in which Jesus washes his disciples’ feet, which dramatizes acts of humble service rather than rites of removing sin (Jn 13:1-20). But several incidents dealing with sin and sinners provide glimpses of John’s understanding of forgiveness.

4.1. The Witness of John the Baptist (Jn 1:29). The Fourth Gospel does not directly associate John the Baptist’s baptism with “forgiveness of sins” (Jn 1:25-28). Rather, John’s work and witness are strictly preparatory for the coming of Jesus, “the Lamb of God who takes away (airō) the sin of the world” (Jn 1:29). This image portends the linkage of Jesus’ death with that of the Passover lamb (see Jn 19:31-36), a sacrifice that signified national release from slavery, not personal atonement for sins (cf. Ex 12:1-28). Thus, the redemptive function of Jesus’ death provides freedom and restoration from the oppressive, enslaving effects of “the sin of the world” (cf. Jn 8:31-36).

4.2. Jesus’ Encounters with “Sinners” (Jn 5:1-14; 9:1-41). Similar to his response to the Synoptic paralytic, the Johannine Jesus treats both physical and sinful conditions of the lame man by the pool of Beth-zatha. In this case, however, Jesus offers no pronouncement of forgiveness, but rather a final exhortation to the restored man: “Sin no more, so that nothing worse happens to you” (Jn 5:14). Jesus assumes a stronger causal connection here than in the Synoptic story between the crippled man’s iniquity and disability; by the same token, a tighter nexus also emerges between remission of sin and restoration to health. But such a pattern is not absolute in John, as Jesus later dismisses his disciples’ speculation that personal or parental sin had directly caused a young man’s congenital blindness (Jn 9:1-4). After Jesus wondrously gives sight to this man on the Sabbath, the Pharisees render a split decision: some denounce both Jesus and the healed man as “sinners,” the former for breaking Sabbath law and the latter for being “born completely in sins” and testifying to Jesus’ miracle; others, however, give Jesus the benefit of the doubt: “How can a man who is a sinner do such signs?” (Jn 9:16 [cf. Jn 9:31-34]) In any event, the authorities ultimately expel the man from the synagogue, whereupon Jesus seeks and “finds [heuriskō] him,” and he accepts Jesus as the Son of Man and Lord (Jn 9:35-38); here we have the Fourth Gospel’s twist on Jesus’ receiving and restoring “lost” ones regarded as “sinners.”

4.3. The Great Commission (Jn 20:19-23). In John’s only explicit reference to “forgiving sins,” the risen Jesus sends out his followers “as the Father has sent [him],” with authority to remit (aphiēmi) or retain (krateō) the sins “of any persons” they choose (Jn 20:21-23). As in Luke, the disciples’ forgiveness-focused mission is rooted in Jesus’ own God-given vocation and the abiding presence of the Holy Spirit, except that here Jesus imparts the Spirit as he sends them forth (Jn 20:22), whereas in Luke he charges them to wait for this promised gift (Lk 24:49; cf. Acts 1:4-5, 8). The most distinctive, and potentially problematic, element of the Johannine commission is the disciples’ apparent prerogative not to forgive sins. Jesus does not specify any cases that might merit “retaining” sins, thus demanding faithful reliance on the Spirit’s discernment and responsibility to “convict the world concerning sin, righteousness and judgment” (Jn 16:8).

See also MERCY; REPENTANCE; SIN, SINNER; TABLE FELLOWSHIP.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. P. Bolt, “. . . With a View to the Forgiveness of Sins: Jesus and Forgiveness in Mark’s Gospel,” RTR 57 (1998) 53-69; G. Carey, Sinners: Jesus and His Earliest Followers (Waco, TX: Baylor University Press, 2009); J. D. G. Dunn, “Pharisees, Sinners, and Jesus,” in Jesus, Paul and the Law: Studies in Mark and Galatians (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1990) 61-88; L. G. Jones, Embodying Forgiveness: A Theological Analysis (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1995); G. D. Nave Jr., The Role and Function of Repentance in Luke-Acts (SBLAB 4; Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature, 2002); D. A. Neale, None but the Sinners: Religious Categories in the Gospel of Luke (JSNTSup 58; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1991); M. Volf, Free of Charge: Giving and Forgiving in a Culture Stripped of Grace (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 2005).

F. S. Spencer

FORM CRITICISM

Anticipated by the early twentieth-century biblical critic Hermann Gunkel (1862–1932) and developed by his students (Karl L. Schmidt [1891–1956], Martin Dibelius [1883–1947] and Rudolf Bultmann [1884–1976]), form criticism is a methodology that has exerted considerable influence on Gospel studies for much of the past century. Over the last thirty to forty years, however, traditional form criticism has undergone revision, giving way to fresh approaches to the Gospel material. These later approaches, though bearing a family resemblance to classic form criticism in many of their assumptions and methods, are in other respects fundamentally different. Thus form criticism should be understood not so much as a consistent and clearly defined critical approach but as a methodological trajectory that seeks through various strategies to elucidate the relationship between the form of a text (a literary question) and its Sitz im Leben, that is, its “setting in life” (a socio-historical question). This article will concern itself with the origins of form criticism, offer an evaluation of the movement as epitomized in its pioneers, and finally focus on new form criticism as more recently developed by Klaus Berger.

1. The Rise of Classic Form Criticism
2. A Review and Evaluation of Classic Form Criticism
3. New Form Criticism

1. The Rise of Classic Form Criticism.

Classic form criticism is most typically associated with the aforementioned scholars Schmidt, Dibelius and Bultmann; the pioneer form critic in England was Vincent Taylor (1887–1968). Of these the most important are Dibelius and Bultmann, who along with Gunkel each merit his own discussion.

1.1. Gunkel. Although the roots of form criticism, as applied to the Gospels, are many and complex, its taproot and main precursor was Hermann Gunkel. As a New-Testament-turned-Old-Testament scholar, Gunkel focused on reconstructing the discrete sociohistorical settings behind the Psalms and Genesis. Since each psalm operated according to its own specific genre, and since Genesis too was—on the prevailing theory—not really one text but rather an amalgamation of various texts originating from different periods, Gunkel saw important work to be done in establishing a Gattungsgeschichte (“history of genres”). Such a Gattungsgeschichte would ideally begin with an identification of genres within the biblical text and then seek to correlate them in relationship to one another within an evolutionary spectrum.

Gunkel recognized two main literary classifications: prose and poetry. Beneath the heading of prose, he subsumed the categories of myth, folktale, romance, legend and historical narrative; to poetry belonged wisdom writings, prophetic oracles, lyric poetry and hymns, among other categories. Gunkel’s goal was to associate each genre with a particular Sitz im Volksleben (“setting in the people’s life”), that is, a generalized setting that might be thought to recur in the cycles of Israel’s national cultic life. Toward achieving this goal, Gunkel insisted on the importance of ascertaining the specific dynamics bound up in the context of the original oral performance(s). The identity of the speaker and the identity of the audience, as well as the aims and expectations of both in the communicative act, were all crucial questions; they were also questions that could illuminate or be illuminated by the genre and the proposed setting-in-life.

1.2. Dibelius. In the same year that Karl Schmidt published his Der Rahmen der Geschichte Jesu (“The Framework of the History of Jesus”) (1919), Martin Dibelius released Die Formgeschichte des Evangeliums (“The Form-History of the Gospel”—the later English translation appears as From Tradition to Gospel [1935 (orig. 1919)]). In titling his book, Dibelius had in fact coined the term Formgeschichte (“Form-History”) as a take-off on the title of another well-known book by Eduard Norden, which included a similar term, Formengeschichte (“History of Forms”). In doing so, Dibelius seems to have been deliberately setting himself apart from Norden, as if to say that although his predecessor was interested in a history of literary forms, this work would quite differently be concerned with the history of life behind the forms. Though seemingly a slight shift in emphasis, the implications were in fact profound. Self-consciously distancing himself from approaches that took the biblical writers seriously as authors (in the artistic sense), Dibelius instead directed his attention to the social realities that supposedly provoked such literature.

In the opening chapter of From Tradition to Gospel, Dibelius tips his hat not only to Gunkel but also to the seminal counter-Enlightenment figure J. G. Herder (1744–1803). Setting the stage for German historicism (which began to take shape in the mid-nineteenth century and peaked in the opening decades of the twentieth century), Herder, like the historicist movement itself, nurtured a great interest in oral folk traditions. These traditions, according to the philosophical tenets of this broad perspective, would not only faithfully express the “spirit” of the people but would also remain generally impervious to the influence of particular historical events as well as any individual attempts to reshape those traditions. Synthesizing Gunkel’s interest in forms with historicism’s insistence on the staying power of oral communal traditions, Dibelius set out to reconstruct a history of forms as applied to the Gospels. In so doing, he assumed that “the personal peculiarities of the composer or narrator have little significance; much greater importance attaches to the form in which the tradition is cast by practical necessities, by usage or by origin” (Dibelius 1935 [orig. 1919], 1).

Dibelius stipulates three kinds of sermonizing underlying the Gospel material: that which is oriented to unbelievers (Missionspredigt), to believers (kultische Predigt) and to new converts (katechetische Predigt). Within this taxonomy, Dibelius also identified major forms, the most prominent being the paradigm, the tale (miracle stories), the legend, and paraenesis (exhortation). Since these forms had nothing to do with the evangelists, who, again, were seen as nothing but artless compilers in the process, each discrete form was regarded as setting the boundaries for an isolated free-floating unit of oral tradition. Accordingly, the only potentially meaningful unit was each isolated form, at least as it was reconstructed.

Comparing and contrasting Dibelius and Gunkel is instructive. Like Gunkel, Dibelius assumed that the biblical materials were essentially oral folk traditions, and precisely on this account their form and substance must have been almost entirely determined by the social needs of the community. This means that the original impetus behind the isolated Gospel materials could only be recovered on reconstructing the situation of the community (Sitz im Leben) in which these discrete materials first took shape at the oral stage. At the same time, Dibelius also set himself apart from Gunkel in several respects. First, whereas Gunkel’s interest in “form” pertained first and foremost to the issue of literary genre (which thus involved contemplating texts in their much larger finished form), Dibelius applied his own taxonomy not to genre but to hypothesized oral-based entities, which in the nature of the case were relatively small literary subunits. Second, rejecting Gunkel’s twofold concern with aesthetic issues and the position of the individual speaker (intentions, concerns and disposition) in the communicative act, Dibelius drew a tight correlation between form, which supposedly had its own predictable aims, and the theorized social setting (Sitz im Leben). Along the same lines, because a certain setting alone was virtually a sufficient condition for engendering a certain form, recognition of the form could by itself provide the key for reconstructing the social situation. In sum, Dibelius’s approach to the Gospels was one in which the particularities of history (pertaining either to the life and death of Jesus or any specific events befalling the post-Easter community) were largely extraneous to the formation and transmission of the Gospel materials.

1.3. Bultmann. Deeply influenced by both Gunkel and Dibelius but much more closely allied with the latter, Rudolf Bultmann carried forward the form-critical project in his famous The History of the Synoptic Tradition (1963 [orig. 1921]). Like Dibelius (and against Gunkel), Bultmann was suspicious of any readings of the Gospel material that took seriously the aesthetic quality of the material. Such considerations distracted from the main task of reconstructing the Sitz im Leben behind the text. Like Dibelius, Bultmann saw the transition from orality to inscripturation as seamless and unproblematic. For both scholars the biblical text was simply a written distillation of the oral tradition (on which point see the extensive critique of Kelber 1983). Finally, Bultmann shared with Dibelius the assumption that forms were not generated in response to unique historical occasions but instead emerged out of recurring patterns of community life.

Notwithstanding his many similarities to Dibelius, Bultmann also had his own distinctive contribution. First, much more so than Dibelius, Bultmann was interested in the diachronic study of oral traditions as they underwent transformation. Taking his cues from a staple conviction of German romanticism and evolutionary idealism, Bultmann supposed that complexity was largely a function of time, so that the quest for origins coincided with the quest for simplicity. In other words, Bultmann assumed that oral traditions originated in fairly simple form but over time became increasingly intricate and layered. Building on this assumption, Bultmann’s project soon became a task of literary archeology, in which the various levels of an isolated Gospel saying or pericope could be broken down and assigned to various stages in the tradition history—whether to the level of redaction, the ecclesial Sitz im Leben, the setting of Jesus himself, or even prior to Jesus. Bultmann allowed for the reality of mixed forms but was nonetheless methodologically predisposed to separate out incongruities or apparent tensions as they occurred in form or content.

An even more significant difference between Dibelius and Bultmann lay in the latter's ability to integrate form criticism as a component piece of his larger theological project. Already a year before the publication of The History of the Synoptic Tradition (1921), Bultmann had publicly subscribed to Richard Reitzenstein's theory that the outline of the Gospel story was indebted to a Hellenistic mythology, which was in turn a variation of an Iranian myth of the Primal Man. For Bultmann this historical explanation was an attractive option in that it provided a certain theological cash value to his emerging theological program. In revolt against his mentor Wilhelm Herrmann and the broader swath of liberalism that Herrmann represented, Bultmann sought to establish myth—which was by definition historically situated and not to be confused with God's self-revelation or the "reality of God"—as the necessary complement to revelation. If revelation was the hand, then myth was the glove that the hand must wear; or, to change metaphors, if the essence of the kerygma (proclamation) was the corn, then myth was the husk.

In some sense, this husk was disposable even as it was, in another sense, altogether necessary. For Bultmann, Christianity finally came into its own once the simple ethical teachings of Jesus found their way into the Hellenistic framework of Mark, which with its own interest in the miraculous and secret epiphanies seemed to be inspired by the myth of the Primal Man. Indeed, only by assuming this particularized form, which in this case happened to be derived from the Hellenistic environment, could the kerygma of the early church make itself comprehensible to its target culture. By applying form criticism, the student of the Gospels was poised to delineate and ultimately discard the husk of historically conditioned form. Thus Bultmann's form criticism was also closely tied to his program of demythologization (the process of removing the allegedly mythical elements of a narrative in order to discern the narrative's proper meaning). Form criticism not only operated in a way that was analogous to demythologization, but it was also inevitably integral to the process of demythologization. It is for this reason that the term form criticism is sometimes applied to scholarly writing that simply seeks to discount the authenticity of the miraculous (Berger 2005, 2). Given the inevitable circularity between the assumptions and results of Bultmann's approach, attempts to describe it as "scientific," rampant in the literature of the mid-twentieth century (e.g., Doty, 293), must be regarded as spurious.

Finally, it is important to mention Bultmann's application of the criterion of double dissimilarity (see Criteria of Authenticity). This criterion refers to the isolation of authentic Jesus material (i.e., words or deeds that may credibly be traced back to the historical Jesus) by virtue of its discontinuity with both the early church and ambient *Judaism, since it would not be possible to ascribe this same material either to the early church or to ambient Judaism. This criteria also worked with Bultmann's theological endeavor, at least to the extent that he sought to portray Jesus, on the one side, as a Jew who "overcame" Judaism, and, on the other, as a figure utterly distinct from the early church. Bultmann restricted application of this tool to sayings material, particularly parables, while it fell to the post-Bultmannians to apply it more broadly (Theissen and Winter, 112).

2. A Review and Evaluation of Classic Form Criticism.

2.1. Review. Although there are some disagreements among the leading form critics, it is possible to identify a set of operative assumptions associated with form criticism as a movement. The following list of propositions attempts to enumerate these assumptions and summarize the above discussion: (1) Gospel traditions originated in small, isolated units and were transmitted much in the same way as folk traditions; (2) the pure form of traditions tended to become increasingly complex through acquiring layers of accretion; (3) reconstructions of the pure form provide a window into the community's Sitz im Leben; (4) oral traditions were both generated and freely modified on the basis of the community's needs; and (5) material authentic to Jesus can be identified by the application of the criteria of dissimilarity.

In due course, this fifth assumption would move beyond the confines of form criticism as a literary or sociological task and come to play a key role in the study of the historical Jesus (Keith). One could almost say these five assumptions form the five pillars of form criticism. Their validity has been broadly taken for granted for the better part of the twentieth century.

2.2. Evaluation. In the past several decades, scholars of various theological stripes have increasingly questioned form criticism's basic tenets. In some cases, this critique accompanies a plea to modify form-critical procedures; in other cases, one meets an outright repudiation of some (or all) of the key principles of form criticism. Each of the five assumptions listed above has drawn its share of critique.

First, given the dearth of evidence surrounding the origination of Gospel traditions and our equally scanty insight into the mechanics of their transmission, some critics have maintained that the strength of basic form-critical reconstruction (that Jesus traditions began as small, isolated units only to be passed down as folk tradition) has been overstated. For example, in the 1930s British scholar C. H. Dodd challenged the notion of small, free-floating units by arguing that it was possible to trace whole extended narratives of Jesus material back to early eyewitness accounts (Dodd). With the rise of *redaction criticism in the 1950s and literary criticism in the 1970s and 1980s (see Narrative Criticism), others became increasingly doubtful that the individual evangelists were truly as immaterial to the traditioning process as the form critics had made them out to be. Clearly, the Gospel writers were more intrusive than had formerly been thought. They had their own agendas in collecting, selecting, framing and shaping antecedent material. But if this is so, then what is to prevent the possibility of comparable editorial manipulation of the material at an earlier, pre-Gospel stage? (In all fairness, Bultmann granted this possibility, even if he failed to account for it within his schema.)

Moreover, if the evangelists did indeed exert their own shaping influence on the materials, this suggests that the evangelists also harbored their own theological and perhaps even historical interests. And if the Gospel writers were interested in conveying history (as understood on their terms), then it is also reasonable to suppose that these same writers sought out various and more direct lines of access than would be normally available through oral tradition alone (cf. Luke 1:1-4). This possibility is problematic for form criticism, for if, as has been argued recently, any of the evangelists were either themselves eyewitnesses or had contact with individuals who were, this would effectively short-circuit the long and winding chain of transmission that form criticism presupposes (Bauckham 2006, 2008; Evans) (see Orality and Oral Transmission).

The second pillar sketched above (that tradition departs from pure form with time) is also liable to doubt. E. P. Sanders subjected this proposition to criticism by showing that the Gospel tradition (at least in its written form) did not in fact mutate in predictable ways. More recent research, drawing on the oral studies of Albert Lord among others, maintains limits to the aggregation occurring within oral forms (Mournet, 187-91). At any rate, without stronger empirical evidence to bolster the claim, the dictum of Bultmann and Dibelius (but disputed by Taylor) falls flat.

Third, the one-to-one correspondence between form and Sitz im Leben, which form criticism alleges, has also proved controversial. Such controversy in fact entered the discussion very early on (Easton, 80-81). Much more recently, B. Gerhardsson (2005) has argued that since all clear, extant examples of paraenesis (exhortation) within early Christian literature manifestly do not convey the teachings of Jesus (e.g., James, 1 John, sermons within Acts), the argument of the form critics, who ascribe a paraenetic function to so much of the Gospel material, begins to look like a case of special pleading. In summarizing this critique, C. Tuckett (2009, 24) states that such an argument places "a radical question mark against the assumption of the form critics that the Sitz im Leben of a tradition could be deduced from its 'form.'" M. Buss has also argued that form criticism's view of form as a purely socially derived phenomenon is problematic, given the human subject's inevitable tendency to ascribe form in the very act of perception (1999, 310). More recently, drawing on Ludwig Wittgenstein and other philosophers who emphasize the socially embedded nature of discourse, Buss (2010, 213-17) calls for developing a new model of form criticism that is more sensitive to the interpersonal dynamics that obtain in the communicative act. On a general level, although it is true that a given form may make some settings more likely than others, this hardly puts critics in a position where one can be securely inferred from the other—not, at least, with the same confidence that the early twentieth-century form critics exuded. In some sense, form criticism's tight-knit correlation between form and Sitz im Leben has become increasingly implausible not only because it has been deemed reductionistic but also because Western thought has moved on from the kind of positivism that once made such inferences feasible.

Whether and to what extent traditions were subject to modification according to the needs of the community (the fourth assumption) is a point of debate. Stiff challenges to this viewpoint emerged first in the contributions of Gerhardsson (1961), who argued that the preservation of the Jesus tradition finds closest analogy to the tightly controlled methods of rabbinic transmission (see Teacher). A second wave of opposition to the form-critical model has surged in more recent years with the works of scholars who prefer to think of the Synoptic tradition as the end-product of an “informal, controlled oral tradition” (Bailey; Dunn; Mournet). However the transmission of the Jesus material took place in its details, a critical mass of scholars insist that Jesus’ followers preserved traditions about Jesus with a reasonable degree of continuity, so that haphazard revision of those traditions would have been, at best, the exception rather than rule.

Finally, the *criteria of authenticity have also fallen onto hard times. In a famous article, M. D. Hooker laments the intrinsic weakness of the criterion of double dissimilarity, arguing that what was originally designed by form critics as a literary tool can only wreak havoc as a historical tool. The criterion continues to be deemed problematic inasmuch as it unavoidably puts the critic in the awkward and ultimately untenable position of pitting the Gospel writers, who are representative of early Christianity, against their own subject, Jesus himself. Even more vexing is its way of forcing the historical Jesus, who was patently a Jew, into a non-Jewish mold. Due especially to the gravity of the latter problem, Bultmann’s criterion has been broadly modified to what is now sometimes called the criterion of dissimilarity to Christianity (Winter and Theissen; Holmén).

In short, the basic principles of classic form criticism are conspicuously enveloped by a dark cloud of suspicion. Battered from all angles, the major pillars of form criticism, which in an earlier day had been so resilient to criticism, now show signs of buckling. In this light, S. Byrskog (2009, 19) rightly notes that scholars have been forced either to abandon it or to modify it substantively.

3. New Form Criticism.

If not coincidental it is nonetheless striking that classic form criticism would be taken to task on three separate fronts in three highly influential pieces, all penned in the space of three years. First, J. Muilenburg reflected both on the merits and shortcomings of form criticism, opining that in contrast to current trends that undervalue the aesthetic aspect of the biblical text “a responsible and proper articulation of the [biblical] words in their linguistic patterns and in their precise formulations will reveal to us the texture and fabric of the writer’s thoughts” (1969, 7). Soon afterward, E. Güttgemanns (1979 [orig. 1970]) critiqued form criticism as linguistically naive, primarily in its failure to distinguish oral from written modes of discourse. According to Güttgemanns, the Gospel text was an auto-semantic linguistic form, entailing its own universe of discourse as a self-contained unity; form criticism’s fatal flaw consisted in not taking this unity seriously. Finally, J. M. Robinson and H. Koester objected to what they perceived to be the essentialism of their mentor Bultmann (1971, 9). Against Bultmann’s artificially conceived form-critical categories, Robinson and Koester press the case for understanding early Christianity in terms of its trajectories, even as these trajectories came to expression in its diverse literature. In retrospect, the guild of NT scholarship seemed to be preparing itself for new ways of thinking about form criticism. Such “new ways” would ideally give due attention to the Gospels as literature (Muilenburg), respect the autonomy of the Gospel text as something that can produce meaning without recourse to any theorized life behind the text (Güttgemanns), and finally, allow for the considerations of settings not in static terms but as being in a state of flux along a trajectory (Robinson and Koester).

Whether or not K. Berger self-consciously set himself to formulating his new form criticism in direct response to any of these specific appeals, his project certainly expresses a special concern with rhetoric, the self-contained biblical text and historical trajectories—all of which constitute a decisive break with classic form criticism. In the opening pages of his Formgeschichte des Neuen Testaments (“Form Criticism of the New Testament”) (1984), Berger announces that “Form Criticism is the combining of genre-criticism (Gattungskritik) and genre-history (Gattungsgeschichte)” (1984, 9). Genre-criticism involves the identification of literature within certain generic categories according to certain textual markers typical of the genre. Genre-history pertains to the reception of a particular text-type through the course of world history, although Jewish and Greco-Roman analogues will naturally prove to be most useful. Self-consciously retrieving Gunkel and Norden’s unfinished project of Gattungs-research (a project that, it is to be recalled, Dibelius repudiated), Berger insists on the paramount importance of genre (as opposed to oral form), insofar as this literary property, more than any other factor, provides the communicative meeting ground and decisive point of contact between the author and the author’s readers. Toward establishing genre in the biblical texts, Berger follows

Aristotle's rhetorical categories and proposes a taxonomy involving three basic categories: texts designed to motivate or warn its readers (symbuleutic), texts created to impress the readers (epideictic) and texts meant to explain a line of reasoning or course of action (dicanic) (1984, 18-19). As a rule, the Gospels belong to the category of epideictic. As such, the critic must expect that the Gospels are designed to fortify a sense of communal identity by presenting certain idealized "types" as the anchoring model for the community.

In new form criticism, primary attention is given to determining the author's goal and the rhetorical means by which they seek to achieve that goal. Whereas classic form criticism was oriented to the past—specifically to the oral prehistories and the traditions-history surrounding the Jesus tradition (1984, 11)—Berger's project sets its sights on the Gospel writers as they anticipated—in the very act of composition—the future reception of their works, a vision that looked for change in thinking or behavior on the part of the audience. Because he sees considerable interchange between oral and written modalities in the ancient world (with oral sources becoming written texts only to become oral traditions once again) (1984, 16), Berger is able to sidestep a major preoccupation of contemporary scholarship, namely, how transitional shifts from oral to written modes in the formation of the Gospel traditions should affect our overall understanding of the text.

Notably, Berger's approach includes a radical extension of the concept of Sitz im Leben. In classic form criticism the term Sitz im Leben was restricted to generalized social settings behind the putative discrete oral traditions. Later, in the post-Bultmannian period, the concept of Sitz im Leben was extended to include the setting of the redactor, as well as the setting of the historical Jesus (Byrskog 2007, 8-11). Taking this extension to its logical conclusion, Berger conceives of the Sitz im Leben as the typical situation in which the Gospel material is received within the scope of early Christianity. It is neither to be limited to the first rehearsals of the Gospel material nor to any particular receptions thereafter but refers more broadly to a trajectory of reception. The consideration of a text's potential impact on this trajectory of believing communities is meant to serve as a point to which interpretations of text and the immediate setting may be triangulated. On this reasoning, a text's function can in some measure be determined pragmatically by examining how the text functioned in practice.

In terms of specifics, Berger stipulates that a text and situation may be correlated by taking up a five-step procedure. First, there must be some reconstruction of the specific questions that the text is attempting to answer. Second, Berger rules out the one-to-one correspondence between setting and genre: for any given issue, there may be any number of appropriate genres—and vice versa. Third, where an author reproduces a preexisting tradition, it stands to reason that they have an "active interest" in that tradition. Fourth, it is necessary, if possible, to reconstruct the ideological interests of the text's target group. Fifth, Berger recognizes that some genres will fall in and out of fashion in different times and in different places; accordingly, theories of genealogical development are ruled out, and any attempts to plot biblical texts against a reconstructed "genre timeline" must be deemed futile.

To be sure, although his extensive cataloguing of genres may prove taxing for even the most patient of readers, Berger's creative synthesis may well provide the theoretical underpinnings for moving beyond a significant impasse in biblical studies. For too long, those who have attended to the hypothetical world behind the text (i.e., those concerned to reconstruct the Sitz im Leben of one or another stage) have failed to integrate satisfactorily the findings of those who focus on the symbolic world in the text (literary critics), just as literary critics have also generally neglected to bring their results to bear on historical realities. By combining an interest in the rhetorical design of the final text with a related interest in the setting in which such rhetorical designs make most sense, Berger has effectively proposed a model that brings together what post-Enlightenment subspecialization has put asunder. As for the quality and quantity of discussion that Berger's new form criticism may provoke—this remains to be seen.

See also CRITERIA OF AUTHENTICITY; GOSPEL: GENRE; GOSPELS: HISTORY OF INTERPRETATION; HISTORICISMS AND HISTORIOGRAPHY; NARRATIVE CRITICISM; ORALITY AND ORAL TRANSMISSION; QUEST OF THE HISTORICAL JESUS; REDACTION CRITICISM.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. K. E. Bailey, "Informal Controlled Oral Tradition and the Synoptic Tradition," Themelios 20 (1995) 4-11; R. Bauckham, Jesus and the Eyewitnesses: The Gospels as Eyewitness Testimony (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2006); idem, "The Transmission of the Gospel Traditions," RCT 33 (2008) 377-94; K. Berger, Formgeschichte des Neuen Testaments (Heidelberg: Quelle & Meyer, 1984); idem, "Hellenistische Gattungen im Neuen Testament," ANRW 2.25.2 (Berlin: Walter de Gruyter, 1984) 1031-1432; idem, "Rhetorical Criticism, New Form Criticism and New Testament Hermeneutics," in S. E. Porter and T. H. Olbricht, eds., Rhetoric and the New Testament: Essays from the 1992 Heidelberg Conference (JSNTSup 90; Sheffield: JSOT, 1993) 390-96; idem, Formen und Gattungen im Neuen Testament (UTB 2532; Tübingen: Francke, 2005); R. Bultmann, The History of the Synoptic Tradition (New York: Harper & Row, 1963 [orig. 1921]); M. J. Buss, Biblical Form Criticism in Its Context (JSOTSup 274; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic, 1999); idem, The Changing Shape of Form Criticism: A Relational Approach (Hebrew Bible Monographs 18; Sheffield: Sheffield Phoenix, 2010); S. Byrskog, "A Century with the Sitz im Leben: From Form-Critical Setting to Gospel Community and Beyond," ZNW 98 (2007) 1-27; idem, "Introduction," in W. Kelber and idem, eds., Jesus in Memory: Traditions in Oral and Scribal Perspective (Waco, TX: Baylor University Press, 2009) 1-20; M. Dibelius, From Tradition to Gospel (New York: Scribner, 1935 [orig. 1919]); C. H. Dodd, "The Framework of the Gospel Narrative," ExpTim 43 (1932) 396-400; W. G. Doty, "The Discipline and Literature of New Testament Form Criticism," ATR 51 (1969) 257-321; J. D. G. Dunn, Christianity in the Making: Vol. 1: Jesus Remembered (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2003); B. S. Easton, The Gospel Before the Gospels (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1928); C. A. Evans, "The Implications of Eyewitness Tradition," JSNT 2 (2008) 211-19; B. Gerhardsson, Memory and Manuscript: Oral Tradition and Written Transmission in Rabbinic Judaism and Early Christianity, with Tradition and Transmission in Early Christianity (ASNU 22; Lund: Gleerup, 1961 [repr., Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, and Livonia: Dove, 1998]); idem, "The Secret of the Transmission of the Unwritten Jesus Tradition," NTS 51 (2005) 1-18; E. Güttgemanns, Candid Questions Concerning Gospel Form Criticism: A Methodological Sketch of the Fundamental Problematics of Form and Redaction Criticism (PTMS 26; Pittsburgh: Pickwick, 1979 [orig. 1970]); T. Holmén, "Authenticity Criteria," in C. A. Evans, ed., The Routledge Encyclopedia of the Historical Jesus (New York/London: Routledge, 2010) 43-54; M. D. Hooker, "On Using the Wrong Tool," Theology 75 (1972) 570-81; C. Keith, "The Indebtedness of the Criteria Approach to Form Criticism and Recent Attempts to Rehabilitate the Search for an Authentic Jesus," in idem and A. LeDonne, eds., Jesus, Criteria, and the Demise of Authenticity (London/New York: T & T Clark, 2012) 25-48; W. H. Kelber, The Oral and the Written Gospel: The Hermeneutics of Speaking and Writing in the Synoptic Tradition, Mark, Paul, and Q (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1983); T. C. Mournet, Oral Tradition and Literary Dependency: Variability and Stability in the Synoptic Tradition and Q (WUNT 2/195; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2005); J. Muilenburg, "Form Criticism and Beyond," JBL 88 (1969) 1-18; J. M. Robinson and H. Koester, Trajectories Through Early Christianity (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1971); E. P. Sanders, The Tendencies of the Synoptic Tradition (SNTSMS 9; London: Cambridge University Press, 1969); V. Taylor, The Formation of the Gospel Tradition: Eight Lectures (London: Macmillan, 1935); G. Theissen and D. Winter, The Quest for the Plausible Jesus: The Question of Criteria (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2002); C. Tuckett, "Form Criticism," in W. Kelber and S. Byrskog, eds., Jesus in Memory: Traditions in Oral and Scribal Perspective (Waco, TX: Baylor University Press, 2009) 21-38.

N. Perrin

FOURFOLD GOSPEL. See CANON; CANONICAL CRITICISM.

FOURTH GOSPEL. See JOHN, GOSPEL OF.

FRAGMENTARY HYPOTHESIS. See SYNOPTIC PROBLEM.

FREEDOM

The term eleutheria ("freedom") and its cognates in the Gospels is a broad and complex notion that speaks to the dimensions of freedom exhibited by and accessible through Jesus Christ. Although the noun eleutheria never occurs in the Gospels, the adjective eleutheros is used only three times (Mt 17:26; Jn 8:33, 36), and the verb eleutheroō only twice (Jn 8:32, 36), the theme of freedom is more central to the biblical message than the words alone suggest.

1. Freedom in the Old Testament
2. Freedom in the Synoptic Gospels
3. Freedom in the Gospel of John

1. Freedom in the Old Testament.

The OT offers no abstract definition of freedom, but rather conceives of it in concrete terms. The paradigmatic event that served as a model or metaphor for later events and experiences was the exodus from slavery in Egypt. Israel's enslavement was viewed not in abstraction as a status of subjection but as part of the concrete evils of oppression, such as hard labor and infanticide (Ex 1:11-16), that distress the people and evoke God's concern and redemptive action (Ex 2:23-25; 3:7-10; 6:5-7). The exodus serves as God's outstanding act of benevolence toward Israel. From the perspective of Israel, the exodus served as the establishment of the eternal enthronement (i.e., rule, kingship) of God (Ps. 93:1-5), as the basis of their obedience to God in keeping with the covenant established between them (Ex 19:4-6; Deut 6:20-25), and as the grounds for dedication and consecration to the service of their God (Lev 25:42, 55). The paradigmatic event of the exodus becomes both liberation from degrading bondage under an oppressive ruler and freedom for the establishment of endless service of the God who remembers his covenant, redeems from exile and oppression, and gives commandments through which the people of God are sanctified.

2. Freedom in the Synoptic Gospels.

In the NT freedom deepens and extends these emphases on freedom and service. The exodus liberation becomes in the NT a type of Christ's liberation of those enslaved to sin and death. Freedom is deepened to include liberation from our sinful imprisonment, and service is restored to its proper ruler, God. In the Synoptics this is displayed throughout the ministry of Jesus, who liberated slaves of *sin and those held captive by *demons (Mk 5:15) and oppressed by disease and handicaps (e.g., Mk 5:29; Lk 13:12).

Freedom also involves a social critique and vision where domination, enslavement and elitism would give way to mutuality, love, compassion and inclusiveness. Jesus challenged a notion of freedom promulgated by the dominant political forces prevailing in the first-century A.D. Mediterranean world, and he offered instead a freedom that restored the dignity and worth of the human person, for whom true exaltation is found in service to God alone (Mt 23:8-12). The Gospel of Mark is especially attentive to demonstrate how the notion of freedom was exemplified in the life of Jesus (cf. the rhetorical unit of Mk 1:21—3:5) and in the response of the disciples to Jesus (cf. Mk 6:6-30).

Jesus not only creates freedom, but also acts and speaks with freedom, not controlled by the structures and ideologies of his social context. Jesus' entire ministry, including his interaction with the people and practices of social and religious institutions (e.g., Mt 17:24-27), depict him as truly free and as the administrator and representative of God's freedom. Jesus is free to accept the action of God as ruler (Mk 1:15), free from worry of daily needs (Lk 12:22-24), free from worry about enemies (Lk 6:27-30), free from worldly pursuits (Lk 22:25-26). He even describes himself, who is implicitly the most worthy of greatness, as the most remarkable example of service—a stark depiction of true freedom (Lk 22:27; cf. Mt 23:10-11; Mk 10:43-44). With hardly any occurrences of the term eleutheria ("freedom"), the notion of freedom is the subject of Jesus' actions and preaching, and is the root of his entire ministry.

3. Freedom in the Gospel of John.

The depth of freedom is depicted most clearly in the Gospel of John. In John 8:31-36 Jesus declares that by continuing in his word, his disciples will know the truth, and the truth "will make you free" (eleutheroō). The force of the word "truth" in John's Gospel is better conveyed by the word "reality." Truth is the reality seen when all the illusions and delusions of sin are dispelled by the word of God. To be left to construct the world on our own is *slavery, but to discern reality is liberation. This freedom from slavery to truth is personal, and what liberates is the encounter of the reality of things in the person of Jesus, who reflects his Father's divinity and models true humanity.

This freedom is not merely from the illusions of sin, but also from the dominion of the devil. In John 8:37-47 Jesus claims that the actions of the Jews show that they belong to another house, the house of slavery, which is also the house of the devil. Echoing the exodus event and the evil dominion of Pharaoh, where the slaves of Pharaoh were said to be members of the "house of the slaves" (e.g., Ex 13:3; 20:2; Deut 5:6; Josh 24:17; Judg 6:8; Jer 34:13; Mic 6:4), Jesus implies that those Jews who oppose him are under the rule of the devil (Jn 8:44). The freedom that Jesus offers is a liberation that turns slaves into children, and those under the household of the devil into eternal members of the household of "the Father" (Jn 8:38; cf. Is 63:16). This, Jesus declares, is true freedom, offered by means of the sending of a new *Moses (Jn 8:42) and a new Passover lamb (Jn 6:51-58; cf. Jn 1:29).

The freedom to which Jesus' followers are set free by the "truth" is ultimately identical with "life," with Jesus serving as the "way" to both (Jn 14:6). John uses several theological symbols (e.g., revelation, word, truth, life) to describe the positive and negative forms of the liberation that Jesus establishes. Positively, it means freedom for "life." Negatively, however, it means truth or an unconcealing in the sense of unveiling—that is, freedom from falsehood or darkness. The negative form of freedom is displayed in Jesus' *prayer for the unity of his *disciples (Jn 17:20-23). The divine intimacy and in-one-anotherness of the Father and the Son are to be shared among those who know God the Father in Jesus the *Son. Jesus speaks of a personal freedom that can manifest itself only in relationships to others that are reinforced by a genuine openness of love that is rooted in intimacy with God. It is the interrelation of the personal and corporate dimensions of freedom that expresses the real freedom of Jesus and his disciples. This kind of freedom is a liberation from enslavement to self-interest and the devil and also a freedom for the good of others, ultimately manifesting itself in service to God and humanity (cf. Jn 13:3-5).

See also DEMON, DEVIL, SATAN; ETHICS OF JESUS; FORGIVENESS OF SINS; HEALING; SIN, SINNER.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R. Bauckham, God and the Crisis of Freedom: Biblical and Contemporary Perspectives (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2002); J. Blunck, "Freedom," NIDNTT 1:715-21; A. Dawson, Freedom as Liberating Power: A Socio-Political Reading of ἐξουσία Texts in the Gospel of Mark (NTOA 44; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 2000); J. D. G. Dunn, Christian Liberty: A New Testament Perspective (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1993); A. O. Dyson, "Freedom in Christ and Contemporary Concepts of Freedom," ST 39 (1985) 55-72;

F. Herzog, Liberation Theology: Liberation in the Light of the Fourth Gospel (New York: Seabury, 1972); P. M. Hoskins, "Freedom from Slavery to Sin and the Devil: John 8:31-47 and the Passover Theme of the Gospel of John," TJ 31 (2010) 47-63; E. Käsemann, Jesus Means Freedom, trans. F. Clarke (London: SCM, 1969); L. E. Keck, "The Son Who Creates Freedom," in Jesus Christ and Human Freedom, ed. E. Schillebeeckx and B. van Iersel (New York: Herder & Herder, 1974) 71-82; J. D. Levenson, "Exodus and Liberation," HBT 13 (1991) 134-74; B. Malina, "Freedom: A Theological Inquiry into the Dimensions of a Symbol," BTB 8 (1972) 62-76; P. H. Partridge, "Freedom," in Encyclopedia of Philosophy, ed. D. M. Borchert (2nd ed.; 10 vols.; Detroit: Macmillan, 2006) 3:721-25; R. Pesch, "Jesus, a Free Man," in Jesus Christ and Human Freedom, ed. E. Schillebeeckx and B. van Iersel (New York: Herder & Herder, 1974) 56-70; H. Schlier, "ἐλευθερός, κτλ.," TDNT 2:487-502.

E. W. Klink III

FULFILLMENT. See OLD TESTAMENT IN THE GOSPELS.

G

GALILEAN MISSION. See MISSION.

GALILEE

The region of Galilee was the setting of much of Jesus' ministry, and the history as well as the social, economic and religious significance of the region sheds light on the Gospel accounts of Jesus.

1. History and Geography
2. Society and Religion
3. Jesus and Galilee

1. History and Geography.

Originally the Hebrew name haggālīl probably denoted the region around Kadesh northwest of Lake Hula (Josh 21:32; 1 Chron 6:61). Later it referred to the entire region belonging to the tribe of Naphtali, including the eastern portion of Asher and the northern portion of Zebulun and Issachar. The demise of the Northern Kingdom, Israel (722/721 B.C.), brought great destruction to the Jewish population and the immigration of pagan foreigners (2 Kings 17:6; Tob 1:2); thus the name "region of the Gentiles" (gālīl haggōyīm) came into use (Is 9:1). During the Maccabean revolt many of the remaining Jews were evacuated (1 Macc 5:23). The Hasmonean king Aristobulus I conquered Galilee (by now it bore the Greek name Galilaia) in 104/3 B.C., bringing it once more under Jewish domination. He forced the Gentile population to convert to *Judaism (Josephus, Ant. 13.318-19). Under Herod the Great (404 B.C.) and his son Herod Antipas, who ruled until A.D. 39, Galilee enjoyed prosperous times (see Herodian Dynasty). After the short reign of Herod Agrippa I (A.D. 41-44) it came under direct Roman rule (see Rome). The failure of the procurators led to the growth of the Zealots, a nationalistic, *revolutionary movement. Finally, the Jewish War broke out (A.D. 66), which was over in Galilee by A.D. 68. Not until after the fall of *Jerusalem (A.D. 70) did Galilee (Tiberias) become the center of *rabbinic learning.

At the time of Jesus the borders of Galilee ran as follows (Josephus, J.W. 3.35-39): the southern boundary was the north edge of the Plain of Esdraelon. The eastern boundary was the Jordan River from as far north as Lake Hula southward through the Sea of Galilee. The northern boundary was Gischala (probably the place of origin of Paul's parents; see Jerome, Vir. 3.5). The western boundary was Cabul. These borders bounded a territory about 40 kilometers in diameter. Any location could be reached in no more than two days' journey. Geographically, Galilee may be divided into three different areas. Lower Galilee in the south consists of a hilly region with occasional plains. Upper Galilee in the north rises to an elevation of 1200 meters; in NT times it was heavily forested and partially impassible. The Jordan valley and the Sea of Galilee lie ca. 200 meters below sea level. Fertile soil, relatively abundant precipitation and a mild climate furnish good conditions for agriculture.

2. Society and Religion.

In Jesus' time Galilee was an intensively worked export area for wheat and olives, but also for wine. The fishing activity on the Sea of Galilee and the dried fish industry in the town of Magdala were of special significance (Josephus, J.W. 2.608-610; 3.443-445) (see Economics). According to *Josephus, therefore, Galilee was a rich and heavily populated land (Josephus, J.W. 3.42-43; Life 325). The population may be placed at between two and three hundred thousand. Wealth was, however, very unevenly distributed. To be sure, alongside the rich upper class there was a somewhat larger middle class than was common in ancient times. But the majority of the population was lower class (tenant farmers, day laborers). In addition to religiously grounded rejection of the Roman ruling class, social need kindled a mood finding expression in revolutionary activity, especially from the second half of the A.D. 40s onward. The inflexibility and fearlessness of the Galileans was proverbial (Josephus, J.W. 3.41).

In NT times Jews comprised the vast majority of the Galilean population. The view that the area was at that time half pagan is a modern scientific myth. Josephus refers repeatedly to the piety of the Galileans and their loyalty to the Torah. NT references to the large numbers of synagogues in Galilee confirm this (Mt 4:23; 9:35; Mk 1:39; Lk 4:14-15). These references are supported by archeological findings (GBL 3.150712). In the pre-A.D. 70 layers there is an abundance of ritual baths (miqwaot) and ritually clean stone vessels but no pig bones. Nevertheless, in addition to the native Aramaic there was very widespread knowledge of Greek; this is already evident from names like Andrew and Philip among Jesus' *disciples (see Languages of Palestine). Inhabitants of Jerusalem regarded Galilee as a backward locale (cf. Acts 2:7), peculiar first of all because of its dialect (Mt 26:73), in which laryngeal sounds were swallowed. Pharisaism (see Pharisees) attracted its adherents mostly from the middle class of the larger Galilean towns. As conservative country folk, however, most Galileans prior to A.D. 70 had reservations about the innovations of the pharisaical halakah. Occasional disparaging remarks from rabbis indicate that the dislike was mutual (y. Šabb. 15d).

3. Jesus and Galilee.

Prior to his public ministry Jesus lived in Nazareth, located in Lower Galilee (Mt 2:22-23; 4:12-13; 13:54; Mk 6:1; Lk 4:16). He devoted the first portion of his activity to Galilee (Mt 4:23; Mk 1:14, 39; Lk 4:15-16), especially to the areas of Chorazin, Bethsaida and Capernaum on the northwest bank of the Sea of Galilee (Mt 11:21-24; Lk 10:13-15). Matthew was probably not the first to see in this the fulfillment of the OT prophecy of Isaiah 9:1-2 (MT 8:23—9:1) (Mt 4:12-17: Jesus himself performed by this kind of geographical concentration a kind of sign as a covert reference to his messianic claim; see Old Testament in the Gospels). Some Jewish circles expected the inbreaking of the end times to take place in the northern reaches of the promised land. Even if John's Gospel is reliable in reporting Jesus' pilgrimages to Jerusalem, the schematic outline of the Synoptics (first Galilee, then Jerusalem) is justified in locating Jesus' original emphasis in Galilee. Jesus' *parables also testify to an intensive Galilean ministry, for they generally reflect the specific conditions of rural Galilee, as J. Jeremias' work on the parables has effectively demonstrated. Since immediately after the first Easter early Christianity spread primarily into hellenized cities, this is a remarkable indicator of the reliability of the Synoptic tradition.

After a time of preaching the *gospel, Jesus had to recognize that a thoroughgoing conversion of the Galileans was not taking place. He therefore pronounced divine judgment on the chief centers of his Galilean ministry (Mt 11:21-24 par.). The logion found in Luke 13:13 belongs here, too; it cannot serve as proof that Galilean was another term for Zealot in NT times. After this so-called Galilean crisis, and also due to the growing danger posed by the petty king Herod Antipas (Mt 14:13; cf. Lk 13:31-33), Jesus withdrew with his most loyal disciples into regions outside Galilee's borders. These included the "hills of Tyre" (Mk 7:24) and the Decapolis (Mk 7:31) or Gaulanitis (Mk 8:27). This withdrawal results in tensions which reflect a situation that can be traced back to Hasmonean times and the relations between Galileans and the Gentiles of surrounding areas (Mk 7:24-30; cf. Mk 5:1-20). This is a clear indication that authentic local color is in evidence. Both Matthew (Mt 28:16-20) and John (Jn 21) know of appearances of the *resurrected Jesus in Galilee, and Mark must presuppose the same (Mk 14:28; 16:7). So Jewish Christian churches may have formed in Galilee immediately after the first Easter (Acts 9:31; cf. Str-B I.159-60).

See also ARCHEOLOGY AND GEOGRAPHY; ECONOMICS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. A. Alt, Kleine Schriften II (4th ed.; Munich: C. Kaiser, 1978) 361-455; W. Bösen, Galiläa (Stuttgart: KBW, 1985); M. A. Chancey, The Myth of a Gentile Galilee (SNTSMS 118; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2002); idem, Greco-Roman Culture and the Galilee of Jesus (SNTSMS 134; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2005); S. Freyne, Galilee from Alexander the Great to Hadrian (Wilmington: M. Glazier, 1980); idem, Galilee, Jesus, and the Gospels: Literary Approaches and Historical Investigations (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1988); idem, Galilee and Gospel (WUNT 125; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2000); M. H. Jensen, Herod Antipas in Galilee (2nd ed.; WUNT II/215; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2010); E. M. Meyers, The Cultural Setting of Galilee, ANRW II.19.1 (1979) 686-702; B. Pixner, Paths of the Messiah and Sites of the Early Church from Galilee to Jerusalem, ed. R. Riesner (San Francisco: Ignatius Press, 2010); R. Riesner, "Galiläa," GBL 1.40-67; idem, "Bethany Beyond the Jordan," TynB 38 (1987) 29-63; idem, Jesus als Lehrer (3d ed.; WUNT II/7; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1988) 206-10; idem, Bethanien jenseits des Jordan: Topographie und Theologie im Johannes-Evangelium (Giessen: Brunnen, 2002); G. Theissen, Lokalkolorit und Zeitegeschichte in den Evangelien (NTOA 8; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1989) 63-84; J. Zangenberg, H. W. Attridge and D. B. Martin, eds., Religion, Ethnicity, and Identity in Ancient Galilee (WUNT 210; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2007).

R. Riesner

GARDEN OF GETHSEMANE. See GETHSEMANE.

GENEALOGY

A genealogy is a list of the ancestors of a person or group. Although ancestral registers existed in several ancient Near Eastern societies and in the Greco-Roman world, such genealogies were usually brief and typically pertained to royalty. Extended genealogies are found primarily in Hebrew and Jewish circles. The OT contains approximately twenty-five genealogies.

The word “genealogy” (genealogia) appears neither in the LXX (but see 1 Chron 5:1, where the verb genealogēō occurs, meaning to “enroll in a genealogy”) nor in the Gospels. The term occurs only twice in the NT; 1 Timothy 1:4 and Titus 3:9, in both cases the writer warning against genealogical speculation. These passages apparently refer not to genealogies of Jesus, but rather to the OT or genealogies of the patriarchs found in Second Temple literature that some were employing as the basis for non-Pauline doctrine and morally dubious behavior.

Only two genealogies appear in the NT: Matthew 1:1-17; Luke 3:23-38. Both are genealogies of Jesus. While having much in common, they differ in terms of their placement within the narratives of the respective Gospels and in several particulars.

1. Matthew’s Genealogy (Mt 1:1-17)
2. Luke’s Genealogy (Lk 3:23-28)
3. Comparison of the Two Genealogies

1. Matthew’s Genealogy (Mt 1:1-17).

Matthew begins his Gospel with a genealogy that contains a list of generations extending from Abraham to “Jesus, who is called the Christ.” For the names “Abraham” through “Zerubbabel” (Mt 1:2-13a) the list appears to draw on genealogies found in Genesis 4—11; Ruth 4:18-22; 1 Chronicles 1—9, while omitting the names of three kings between Joram and Uzziah (also known as Azariah) in Matthew 1:8 (Ahaziah, Jehoash [also known as Joash], Amaziah) and also Eliakim (also known as Jehoiakim) between Josiah and Jeconiah (also known as Jehoia-kin) in Matthew 1:11. It is impossible to say with confidence whether Matthew developed this portion of the genealogy himself or adopted a preexisting list, while presumably introducing some elements of his own. This preexisting list could be based on sound historical records (see, e.g., Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 3). In the end, the provenance of the list makes little difference for interpretation, since the genealogy fits with the Matthean perspective. The list from Abiud through Jacob (Mt 1:13b-16a) may have derived from a “popular genealogy of the Royal House of David” (Brown) or from genealogical records of the family of Joseph.

The genealogy contains a threefold movement: the heading (Mt 1:1); the genealogical list (Mt 1:2-16); the summary conclusion (1:17). The genealogical list subdivides into three sections: from Abraham to David (Mt 1:2-6a); from David to the deportation (Mt 1:6b-11); from the deportation to Christ (Mt 1:12-16). This subdivision is not indicated within the genealogical list itself, but is suggested by the summary statement of Matthew 1:17.

The heading (Mt 1:1) provides a general introduction to the passage. This verse indicates that the reader is to construe the following list as a “book of genealogy” (biblos geneseōs; the word genesis sometimes means “beginning” [cf. Mt 1:18]). It is arresting that the evangelist identifies this passage as the genealogy “of Jesus Christ,” since OT genealogies typically are named for the progenitor rather than the progeny (e.g., Gen 5:1; 10:1). This practice in OT genealogies reflects the conviction that descendants gain meaning and significance by virtue of the forefather. By reversing the expectations of the heading, Matthew suggests that here the progenitors gain their meaning and significance from their descendant, Jesus Christ.

The heading of Matthew 1:1 contains three christological titles, each one given specific content and supported by the genealogical list that follows. Moreover, Matthew relates the titles in the heading to the genealogical list by way of chiasm (see Table 1).

Table 1. Matthew’s Genealogical Chiasm

Mt 1:1	A	Christ
	B	son of David
	C	son of Abraham
Mt 1:2-16	C'	Abraham (v. 2)
	B'	David (v. 6)
	A'	Christ (v. 16)

Sometimes chiastic arrangements emphasize the middle member (C). But the considerations that often the A/A' members are stressed in chiasm and that Matthew's Gospel does not otherwise explicitly refer to Jesus as "son of Abraham" suggest that this arrangement points to the relative prominence of Jesus as the *Christ. This passage may indicate that Jesus functions as *son of David and son of *Abraham by virtue of his role as Christ, and that his Davidic and Abrahamic sonship is derived from his Messiahship. The evangelist brings the genealogical list to its climax in Matthew 1:16: "Jesus, who is called the Christ." Here is one way in which the genealogy gives specific content to the christological titles of Matthew 1:1: Jesus is the Christ as one who brings salvation history, which began with Abraham, to its climax or goal.

The genealogical list contains several "interruptions" to the underlying pattern "A was the father of B." For example, "and his brothers" is added in Matthew 1:2, 11; and "and Zerah" appears in Matthew 1:3. The most obvious interruption pertains to the inclusion of four *women in the list: Tamar (Mt 1:3), Rahab and Ruth (Mt 1:5) and "the wife of Uriah" (Mt 1:6). One may include also *Mary in this list (Mt 1:16). Several major proposals have been made. First, some have argued that the four women were sinners (e.g., many of the church fathers, including Jerome [see Heffern; Stauffer]), and that they are included in the genealogy to anticipate Jesus' role as savior of the unrighteous (e.g., Mt 9:12-13). Few today hold this view, as the OT does not present these women as sinners, and Jews of the first century A.D. generally held them in high regard.

A second proposal, represented especially by R. Brown, contends that the four women shared two things with Mary: scandalous sexual irregularities in the union with their partners and a commitment to take initiative, with the result that they played major roles in the plan of God, so that "they came to be considered the instrument of God's providence or of His Holy Spirit" (Brown, 73). The combination of scandalous unions and self-initiative may be found in the case of Tamar, but it encounters difficulties with the other women. In addition, it is unclear how Mary took the initiative. Moreover, the connection between scandalous union, initiative of the women, and the Holy Spirit is unclear. Brown sought to identify a complex matrix of features in the attempt to bring all five of the women under a common umbrella, but he was unable to demonstrate that all of the features were present in any one case or to establish the interconnections between these features.

A third proposal maintains that the four women were Gentiles, and their presence in the genealogy points to the universal character of the call to *discipleship to Jesus (e.g., Bauer; Heffern; Keener). This proposal is supported by the reference to "son of Abraham," which may point to Jesus as the one who fulfills the promise to Abraham that in Abraham's son (seed) all the nations of the earth would be blessed (e.g., Gen 22:18), by the naming of Bathsheba in Matthew 1:6 as "the wife of Uriah" (according to 2 Samuel, "the Hittite"), and by Matthew's emphasis on the incorporation of the Gentiles into the people of God.

The difficulty of finding common elements among all four of the women has led J. Hood recently to posit that Matthew wishes to link Tamar, Rahab, Ruth and Uriah. He insists that all of them were regarded as extraordinarily righteous. But the fact that Matthew seems to highlight the presence of women here weakens the appeal of this suggestion.

Matthew concludes the passage with the summary of Matthew 1:17, which infers from the list that salvation history can be divided into three sets of fourteen generations, culminating in Jesus Christ. This conclusion points to the significance of the number "fourteen." Possibly, Matthew wishes the reader to understand this number as a doubled "seven." Matthew is fond of the number "seven," using it consistently, as does the rest of the biblical tradition, to indicate perfection or sufficiency; and at one point he employs a multiple of "seven" to indicate extravagant completeness (Mt 18:22). Hence, the fact that the prehistory of the Messiah is marked by "fourteen" suggests both that Jesus perfectly fulfills the roles of Christ, son of David and son of Abraham, and that his appearance came at precisely the point when the period of preparation was complete.

In addition, the number "fourteen" may express a gematria on the name "David" (i.e., the numerical value of the Hebrew letters of the name "David" totals fourteen). If so, even as the inclusion of the (Gentile) women in the genealogy substantiates the claim that Jesus is the son of Abraham who brings salvation to Gentiles, so the reference to fourteen substantiates the claim that Jesus is the son of David, the messiah-king sent specifically to the Jews to bring them salvation (cf. Mt 1:18-2:10).

The 3x14 schema is possible only because of the omission of four names between David and the deportation (Mt 1:6b-11), as described above. It is complicated also by the fact that one cannot easily discern fourteen generations in the second (Mt 1:6b-11) and third (Mt 1:12-16) segments. As it stands, either the second or the third segment contains only thirteen generations. The reader must count Mary as a generation, or consider that those who follow Jesus (the church) constitute the final generation, or count Jesus and the Christ as separate generations, or count Jeconiah twice because he is mentioned on both sides of the reference to the deportation, the event that marks the break between the second and third segments.

Possibly, the omissions within the second segment represent inadvertent deletions on the part of whoever compiled the genealogy, whether it was Matthew or an unknown person responsible for an earlier form of the genealogy. It is also possible that Matthew deliberately deleted these names in order to construct the symmetrical schema, choosing to extract the three generations after Joram because of the curse laid upon the descendants of Ahab, whose daughter Athaliah married Joram (1 Kings 21:21). In the end, this omission of names forms no real problem, for genealogies often omitted generations on the principle that a grandson or more remote descendant is considered a son (see Mt 1:1).

2. Luke's Genealogy (Lk 3:23-38).

Luke's genealogy consists of a list of seventy-eight names (including "God") moving in ascending order from Jesus through Adam to God. In contrast to Matthew's genealogy, the theological message of this passage does not depend upon a great deal of internal structuring. Many scholars have discerned here the clustering of names in blocks of seven. And some have suggested that the genealogy originally was structured according to eleven periods, each containing seven generations, possibly indicating that the history of the world has been moving toward the twelfth period of eschatological or apocalyptic fulfillment (similar to 1 En. 93; 2 Bar. 53-74; 4 Ezra 14:11). But even if such was the original form of the genealogy, this sevenfold structuring seems not to reflect Luke's own theological emphases. The remainder of Luke-Acts evinces no interest in apocalyptic periodization, and Luke seems to have weakened the effect of the original genealogy by reversing the order so that it reaches its culmination not in the final apocalyptic fulfillment but rather in the beginning, in Adam the son of God.

Thus, the Lukan genealogy in its present form reaches its climax in Adam, and finally in God. This consideration explains its placement within Luke's narrative and its theological function within Luke-Acts. The genealogy follows immediately upon the *baptism of Jesus when God declares, "You are my beloved Son" (Lk 3:22), and immediately precedes the temptation narrative, in which the devil twice addresses Jesus as "the Son of God" (Lk 4:3, 9). As such, the genealogy suggests that the divine sonship that belonged to humanity as a whole but has been profoundly compromised in the fall as a result of Adam's succumbing to temptation is realized through Jesus precisely in his role as the Son of God, who fulfills God's covenant promises to David (Lk 1:26-35) and who inaugurates the eschatological *kingdom of God by his obedience to God through the empowerment of God's Spirit (Lk 3:21-23; 4:1-21). Although Luke-Acts contains no further reference to Adam, this understanding of humanity is expressed in Acts 17:22-31 and is reflected in several strands of NT Christianity (Rom 15:14; 1 Cor 15:22, 45; 1 Tim 2:13-14; Rev 12:9; 20:2).

3. Comparison of the Two Genealogies.

The genealogies of Matthew and of Luke agree in the section dealing with the generations between Abraham and David (with some variation in spelling). They agree also that Shealtiel and Zerubbabel are among Jesus' progenitors, and that Jesus is the son of Joseph. But in addition to the fact that Luke's genealogy is much longer and progresses according to ascending rather than descending order, the individual names in the respective genealogies differ almost completely after the mention of David. Especially prominent is the fact that Luke traces Jesus' Davidic sonship through Nathan rather than through Solomon (so Matthew), and that Luke identifies Joseph's father as Heli rather than as Jacob (so Matthew). The inclination in Luke's genealogy to trace Jesus' line through Nathan rather than Jeconiah may stem from Jeremiah's curse on Jeconiah's descendants (Jer 22:24-30), with the corollary conviction that God chose to bring the Messiah through the nonroyal Davidic line of Nathan. The other differences between the two genealogies have been explained on the basis of levirate marriage (the practice of a man marrying a childless brother or near kinsman and raising children in the name of the deceased relative [see Deut 25:5-10]) or adoption. Some scholars have contended that the differences can be explained by a concern with function rather than strict biological procreation; for example, it is said that Matthew wishes to suggest that Shealtiel and Zerubbabel functioned as successors to Davidic rule rather than to indicate that they were physically descended from the royal line, and that such concern with function over against literal procreation accords with the character and reading expectations of ancient genealogies (Nolland). Although at least some of these explanations are plausible, specific evidence for them is lacking. Scholars have increasingly argued that the primary purpose of the NT genealogies is theological (e.g., Marshall; Brown; Nolland), and thus they contend that the key to understanding the divergences between the genealogies is to probe their distinct christological emphases.

See also ABRAHAM, ISAAC AND JACOB; BIRTH OF JESUS; MARY, MOTHER OF JESUS; SON OF DAVID; SON OF GOD.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. D. R. Bauer, "The Literary and Theological Function of the Genealogy in Matthew's Gospel," in Treasures New and Old: Recent Contributions to Matthean Studies, ed. D. R. Bauer and M. A. Powell (SBLSymS 1; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1996); K. Bornhäuser, Die Geburts- und Kindheitsgeschichte Jesu: Versuch einer zeitgenössischen Auslegung von Matthäus 1 und 2 und Lukas 1-3 (BFCT 2/23; Gütersloh: Bertelsmann, 1930); R. E. Brown, The Birth of the Messiah: A Commentary on the Infancy Narratives in the Gospels of Matthew and Luke (rev. ed.; New York: Doubleday, 1993); A. D. Heffern, "The Four Women in Matthew's Genealogy of Christ," JBL 31 (1912) 61-81; J. B. Hood, The Messiah, His Brothers, and the Nations (Matthew 1:1-17) (LNTS 441; London: T & T Clark, 2011); J. Jeremias, Jerusalem in the Time of Jesus: An Investigation into Economic and Social Conditions During the New Testament Period, trans. F. H. Cave and C. H. Cave (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1969); M. D. Johnson, The Purpose of the Biblical Genealogies: With Special Reference to the Setting of the Genealogies of Jesus (2nd ed.; SNTSMS 8; Cambridge: University Press, 1988); C. Keener, A Commentary on the Gospel of Matthew (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1999); J. Nolland, Luke 1-9:20 (WBC 35A; Dallas: Word, 1989); R. L. Overstreet, "Difficulties of New Testament Genealogies," GTJ 2 (1981) 303-26; E. Stauffer, "Jeschu Ben Mirjam (Mk 6:3)," in Neotestamentica et Semitica: Studies in Honor of Matthew Black, ed. E. E. Ellis and M. Wilcox (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1969); R. R. Wilson, Genealogy and History in the Biblical World (YNER 7; New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1977).

D. R. Bauer

GENNESARET, SEA OF. See ARCHEOLOGY AND GEOGRAPHY.

GENTILES

The inclusion of non-Jews, or "Gentiles," within the covenant community was a contentious issue in the early church (e.g., Acts 10; 15). Not surprisingly, the Gentile mission and Jesus' relationship to Gentiles are significant themes in the Gospel traditions. While the evangelists' assessment of the phenomena is textured and varied, each is concerned to explain the transformation of the church from a predominantly Jewish movement into a multiethnic community.

1. Terminology
2. Gentiles in the Gospel of Mark
3. Gentiles in the Gospel of Matthew
4. Gentiles in the Gospel of Luke
5. Gentiles in the Gospel of John
6. Gentiles and the Historical Jesus

1. Terminology.

The term Gentiles is derived from the Latin word gens ("nation") and frequently translates the Hebrew word gôyim or the Greek term ethnē. In the NT, ethnos (or one of its inflected forms) appears 162 times, approximately one-fourth of which are in the Gospels (39x). Ethnos often refers to non-Jewish nations or individuals (Mt 10:5; Mk 10:42; Lk 2:32), but the term may also denote any group drawn together by common culture or traditions. Indeed, in some contexts ethnos is used in reference to the Jewish nation (Lk 7:5; Jn 18:35) or, more broadly, all nations, including Jews and Gentiles (Acts 17:26). The distinction is significant, and several passages hinge upon the interpretation of this term (e.g., Mt 21:43; 28:19).

It is important to note that the identification of Gentiles in the NT cannot be reduced to the occurrence of a single lexical term. In addition to ethnos, a constellation of other terms are also used to describe those outside the Jewish framework, including ethnikos (Mt 5:47; 6:7; 18:17), dēmos (Acts 12:22), hellēn (Jn 7:35; 12:20), hellēnis (Mk 7:26), laoi (Lk 2:31) and ochlos (Mk 7:33; 8:34). Beyond this lexical terminology, the Gospel writers also employ contextual features to portray the relative foreignness of individuals or people groups. To this end, the evangelists skillfully use vocation (Mt 8:5; Mk 15:39; Lk 7:2), geopolitical space (Mt 15:22; Mk 3:8; Jn 4:5) and other narrative signals (Mk 5:11) to assist in the delineation of cultural identity.

2. Gentiles in the Gospel of Mark.

In Mark's story, the identification of Gentiles traditionally has been understood in limited terms, and many have argued that the Gentile *mission begins only as a consequence to Jesus' death (Mk 13:10; 14). More recent scholarship has questioned this conclusion and drawn attention to the importance of Gentiles and the Gentile mission in Mark's narrative (Wefald; Svartvik; Iverson).

2.1. Mark's Gentile Journeys. For Mark, the Gentile mission is derived, both pragmatically and theologically, from Jesus' ministry. The expansion of the *kingdom and the inclusion of Gentiles are anticipated by Jesus' boundary-breaking ministry (Mk 2:1-12, 15-17, 21-22), the sayings and *parables concerning kingdom growth (Mk 4:21-23, 26-32), and Jesus' reception of Gentiles in the Jewish homeland (Mk 3:7-12). The formal mission to the Gentiles, however, begins when the Markan Jesus traverses the sea and crosses into the region of the Gerasenes (Mk 5:1-20). The presence of swine confirms the Gentile setting, and though Jesus receives a mixed response, the proclamation of the Gentile man prepares for Jesus' return in Mark 7:31-8:9. Subsequent journeys beyond the Jewish homeland accent the importance of Gentile inclusion (Mk 7:24-8:9; 8:22-9:29). Despite the disciples' reluctance to embrace the mission (Mk 6:45-52; 8:14-21), Jesus' movements suggest that the blessings of the kingdom are for those who are pure in heart, irrespective of ethnic identity (Mk 7:24-30; 8:1-9, 22-26; 9:14-29). Although Jesus has come to God's chosen people, he is largely rejected and misunderstood by the religious establishment (Mk 2:1-3:6; 3:20-35; 6:1-6a, 14-29; 7:1-23; 8:11-13; 10:2; 11:15-12:44). The Gentiles are the first to identify him as the one in whom messianic expectations are fulfilled (Mk 7:36-37), and it is in Gentile territory (in the vicinity of Caesarea Philippi [Mk 8:27]) and among Gentile people that Jesus first permits all persons, regardless of ethnic identity, to follow him, if they are willing to deny themselves and take up their cross (Mk 8:34-37).

The structure of Mark's narrative further reveals the evangelist's concern for the Gentile mission. Just as the Jewish mission is inaugurated by the healing of a demon-possessed man (Mk 1:21-28), so too is an exorcism the first miracle in Gentile territory (Mk 5:1-20). Likewise, as Jesus heals the daughter of a Jewish man (Mk 5:21-24, 35-43), he also heals the daughter of a Gentile suppliant (Mk 7:24-30). It hardly seems coincidental, then, that after Jesus multiplies the loaves and fishes among the five thousand (Jews [Mk 6:31-44]), he also performs a similar miracle among the Gentiles (Mk 8:1-9). Although *Israel is given preferential status (Mk 7:27), Jesus' ministry to the Gentiles parallels his ministry among the Jews. In addition, as the Gentile mission gains momentum and Jewish resistance intensifies, the story devotes greater attention to Jesus' foreign excursions while minimizing the activities on Jewish soil (until the passion). The narrative effect is a structural affirmation of Mark's theological perspective: the inclusion of the Gentiles in the kingdom agenda.

2.2. Gentile Inclusion and the New Temple. The inclusion of Gentiles gains additional clarity in the events leading up to the *passion narrative. During the *temple demonstration (Mk 11:15-18) (see Temple Act), Jesus rebukes the religious establishment for turning the temple into a "robbers' den" rather than a place of worship and prayer "for all the nations" (Mk 11:17). The intercalation of the temple episode with the cursing of the fig tree suggests that Israel's place of *worship will be destroyed, and that a new way to God will be established based upon *faith, *prayer and *forgiveness (Mk 11:12-14, 19-25). The conflict with the Jewish leaders, as well as Jesus' concern for "all the nations," continues in the subsequent episode. Although the chief *priests, *scribes and *elders remain disgruntled over the events in the temple, Jesus responds in an enigmatic fashion that confounds the religious leaders and provides opportunity to readdress the motivating issue behind his actions. The parable in Mark 12:1-12 supplies a poignant commentary that explicates the relationship between Jews, Gentiles and the inbreaking kingdom. As a result of Israel's general rejection of Jesus (Mk 2:1-3:6; 3:20-35; 6:1-6a, 14-29; 7:1-23; 8:11-13; 10:2; 11:18; 15:1-15), the Gentiles are made participants in God's kingdom through the *death and vindication of Jesus, the cornerstone of the new temple. This inclusive perspective is further affirmed in the eschatological discourse when the Markan Jesus declares that the *gospel must be preached to "all the nations" (Mk 13:10; cf. Mk 14:9) before the Son of Man returns to gather his elect from "the ends of the earth" (Mk 13:27).

The temple imagery climaxes at the scene of the cross when immediately after Jesus expires, the temple curtain is torn asunder. In accord with Jesus' death, the temple has been cursed, and a new way to God has been opened for all nations. Jesus' final words from the cross—"My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?" (Mk 15:34)—are given perspective in the tearing of the veil and the centurion's utterance. Although seemingly unanswered, the ensuing events, in concert with the broader narrative, supply the reason why Jesus died: the Gentiles have been granted access to God through the death of the Son. That the tearing of the temple curtain forms an inclusio with the tearing of the heavens at Jesus' *baptism (Mk 1:10; 15:38) is carefully orchestrated and has important theological implications. Unlike the tearing of the heavens, which result in the pronouncement by the heavenly voice (Mk 1:11), the tearing of the temple curtain culminates in an affirmation that Jesus is the *"Son of God" by a human character (Mk 15:39). The statement, made by a Roman centurion, not only points to the future character of the church but also is an integral part of the Gentile mission that Mark locates in the ministry of Jesus. Through the confession the centurion becomes the quintessential example of those comprising the new community and provides implicit testimony that both Jews and Gentiles are partakers of the kingdom in accord with divine purposes.

3. Gentiles in the Gospel of Matthew.

Whereas Mark envisions a Gentile mission that begins during the earthly ministry of Jesus, Matthew describes a mission to the nations that is inaugurated only after Jesus has appealed to Israel and given his life as a ransom for many.

3.1. Jewish Preference and Gentile Deferral.

Matthew's story of Jesus is interwoven with fulfillment texts and scriptural allusions (e.g., Mt 1:23; 2:6, 15, 18; 3:3; 4:6, 15-16), and unlike Mark, Matthew begins with a *genealogy that situates Jesus within an ancestral history that traces back through the lineage of Abraham and David. Taken collectively, these features evoke the theme of covenantal promise and illustrate the evangelist's concerted effort to present Jesus from a decidedly Jewish perspective. The Matthean Jesus is Israel's long-awaited Messiah, who has come in order to fulfill the *law (Mt 5:17) and to save "his people from their sins" (Mt 1:21). Accordingly, the ministry of Jesus is geared almost exclusively to the "lost sheep of the house of Israel" (cf. Mt 15:24), and the *disciples, at least during Jesus' earthly lifetime, are precluded from going into Gentile territory (Mt 10:5).

This focus on the Jewish response is even more apparent in light of Matthew's tendency to redact Mark's Gentile mission. For example, although Jesus ostensibly seeks to withdraw to the region of Tyre and Sidon (Mt 15:21-28), it is uncertain whether he reaches the intended Gentile destination, since the woman with the demon-possessed daughter is described as coming out to meet him (Mt 15:22). Mark locates the encounter in foreign territory (Mk 7:24), but Matthew's redaction deflects attention away from the location of the episode. A similar phenomenon occurs in the ensuing scene involving the healing of a deaf man (Mk 7:31-37), which Matthew narrates in a summary account (Mt 15:29-31). Likewise, though Mark narrates an attempted but unsuccessful journey to Gentile Bethsaida (Mk 6:45), Matthew describes a similar account but removes any reference to the geopolitical space, thus downplaying the potential ethnic connotations (Mt 14:22). When the disciples and Jesus in Mark eventually succeed in reaching Bethsaida after a subsequent sea journey (Mk 8:22), Matthew completely omits the scene. Finally, on one of the few occasions where Matthew does depict the healing of a Gentile supplicant, the evangelist reworks Mark in such a fashion as to present a harsher and more negative depiction of Gentiles (Mt 8:28-34; cf. Mk 5:1-20).

The redaction of Mark's Gentile mission is even more striking when juxtaposed with the various Matthean sayings that reflect a pejorative attitude toward Gentiles. Perhaps most revealing is that the utterances are uniformly attributed to the Matthean Jesus. The scenes in which these statements occur are generally concerned with the transmittal of discipleship material, but the prescription of righteous behavior often comes at the expense of Gentile stereotypes: Gentiles are self-serving (Mt 5:47), preoccupied with temporal matters (Mt 6:32), given to meaningless expressions of prayer (Mt 6:7), and persecutors of the righteous (Mt 10:18). Even more striking is the logion in Matthew 18:15-17 regarding church discipline. A member of the community who refuses to heed the admonition of a fellow disciple is to be expelled from the church and treated as a "Gentile or tax collector" (Mt 18:17). In view of this rather unfavorable caricature of Gentiles, as well as the general sentiment in this regard, some have argued that Matthew has no interest in a Gentile mission either during or after the ministry of Jesus (Sim).

3.2. Gentile Inclusion and the Great Commission. To conclude that Matthew's view of Gentiles is entirely pessimistic ignores an array of texts that point in a different direction. Matthew may not idealize Gentiles, but neither does the evangelist depict them in uniform perspective. An appreciation of the entire narrative suggests that Matthew envisions a Gentile mission that commences in consequence to Israel's rejection and the death of Jesus.

In this regard, the opening genealogy is significant and provides a subtle clue to Matthew's overall agenda. Although the evangelist does not provide an explicit explanation, the inclusion of Abraham, the one through whom God would bless the "nations" (Gen 12:1-3), and the four Gentile women (Tamar, Rahab, Ruth, wife of Uriah) most likely foreshadows the inclusivity of the Gospel and the mission to be taken up by the followers of Jesus. Other episodes share this trajectory and paint a more favorable presentation of the Gentiles. After Jesus is born, it is the Gentiles, the magi from the east, who come bearing gifts to present before the "king of the Jews" (Mt 2:1-12) (see Birth of Jesus). Furthermore, Jesus receives Gentiles in Galilee (Mt 4:25), later singles out Gentiles for their exemplary faith (Mt 8:1-13; 15:21-28), and is professed to be "Son of God" (Mt 27:54) by the soldiers at the cross.

These favorable Gentile depictions are frequently set in contrast with negative portrayal of Israel. For instance, Jesus commends a centurion for his "great faith"—a faith that has not been found in Israel (Mt 8:10)—and indicates that the Gentile cities of Tyre, Sidon and Sodom will receive a more favorable response in the judgment than the cities in Israel (Mt 11:20-24). Likewise, after a series of Sabbath controversies with the Jewish leaders (Mt 12:1-14), Matthew indicates through a citation of Isaiah 42:1-4 that Jesus will proclaim "justice to the Gentiles," and that in "his name the Gentiles will hope" (Mt 12:18, 21). Contrary to other Gentile stereotypes discussed above, these texts offer a more positive assessment of Gentiles and openly describe their inclusion within the sphere of God's kingdom (cf. Mt 12:38-41; 21:33-46; 22:1-14).

Although Matthew and Mark envision Gentile missions, their inauguration transpires at different points in salvation history. Mark's mission to the Gentiles is situated in the ministry of Jesus, whereas Matthew's mission, despite several precursors providing proleptic glimpses of the future, begins in earnest after the death and resurrection of Jesus. Simply put, although the Gentile mission finds its ideological basis in the words and deeds of Jesus, for Matthew, the Great Commission (Mt 28:16-20) is the beginning of the mission to the nations.

4. Gentiles in the Gospel of Luke.

Gentile portrayals in Luke's Gospel are not as frequent as those found in Mark, but neither are they as stereotypical as the depictions in Matthew. Although there has been considerable debate about the inclusion of Gentiles in Luke (e.g., Jervell; Sanders), S. G. Wilson has perhaps overstated the matter by arguing that "the most striking characteristic . . . is precisely the lack of any consistent theology of the Gentiles" (Wilson, 239). When the Gentile mission is appreciated across the whole of Luke-Acts, several themes emerge that help to understand Luke's perspective and outlook.

4.1. The Times of the Gentiles. Like Matthew, Luke situates the mission to the Gentiles in the period after the death of Jesus and before the parousia. This period of Gentile witness is to be of unspecified duration and until the "times of the Gentiles are fulfilled" (Lk 21:24). Like the other Synoptic writers, and in line with Paul (Rom 1:16; cf. Acts 13:46), Luke describes Jesus' mission and the mission of the Twelve as being to the Jews first (contra Siker). The geographical focus in the Gospel underscores Luke's theological vision, for in contrast to Mark and Matthew, the narrative concludes in "Jerusalem, where, in accordance with the Scriptures (Lk 24:46), the disciples are commanded to proclaim the gospel to all the nations "beginning from Jerusalem" (Lk 24:47). Furthermore, it is in Jerusalem that Luke resumes the story of "all that Jesus began to do and teach" (Acts 1:1), and it is from this same space that the Gospel begins to spread outward (Acts 1:8). Taken collectively, Luke's concern for Jerusalem offers implicit commentary on the priority of Israel.

Luke omits a sizable block of material from Mark (Mk 6:47—8:26) that includes episodes set within Mark's Gentile mission. The stories of the Syrophoenician woman and the feeding of the four thousand are crucial to Mark's inclusive program. However, while these and other Markan omissions (Mk 10:45; 11:17; 14:9) might appear to downplay the place of Gentiles in Luke, it must also be remembered that several Matthean texts that refer to a mission exclusively among the Jews likewise are absent (Mt 10:5, 6; 15:24). Despite this conflicting tendency, one should not conclude that Gentile inclusion is inconsequential. On the contrary, Luke's story of Jesus begins in a manner that foreshadows Gentile inclusion and ends in a similar vein: Simeon declares through prophetic utterance that Jesus will be a "light for revelation to the Gentiles" (Lk 2:32), John's ministry is introduced as preparing for the one through whom "all flesh shall see the salvation of God" (Lk 3:6), the Lukan Jesus warns of Israel's rejection and looks forward to the inclusion of Gentiles by recounting the ministry of Elijah and Elisha among foreign peoples (Lk 4:16-20), and the narrative concludes with a declaration that the gospel should be preached to "all the nations" (Lk 24:47).

Additional scenes describing Gentile faith and/or inclusion add theological weight to the theme (Lk 7:1-10; 8:26-39; 10:12-16; 11:29-32; 23:47), but Luke's emphasis on God's plan indicates that the encounters and sayings are not happenstance but rather the outworking of divine purpose. Luke's repeated reference to "God's purpose" (Lk 7:30; Acts 2:23; 4:28; 5:38-39) and God's "will" (Lk 22:42; Acts 21:14; 22:14), in conjunction with the repeated use of dei ("it is necessary" [Lk 2:49; 4:43; 9:22; 13:33; 17:25; 24:7]), suggests that Luke understands historical events, including those associated with a Gentile mission, as operating under the auspices of providential control. This perspective is accented by Luke's reference to the Spirit, which at strategic places appears in connection to the Gentile mission (Lk 2:27-32; 4:16-27; 24:45-49). Thus, Luke's mission to the Gentiles not only is granted divine approval, but particularly in Acts it is the divine presence that prompts and confirms the inclusion of Gentiles and the expansion of the church (Acts 10:19, 44; 11:15; 15:28).

4.2. Recipients of Salvation. Luke draws attention to the reception of Jesus' message by those on the margins of society. The poor, sinners, tax collectors and women are of notable concern and illustrate God's compassion for the marginalized and oppressed (Lk 5:27-28; 6:20; 7:36-50; 10:38-42; 13:10-17; 18:9-14; 19:1-10). The gospel is not restricted by gender, ethnicity or class; it is available to all people, especially those deemed outsiders by traditional Jewish standards. Indeed, many have argued that Luke reinforces a status reversal whereby God's kingdom overturns the structures and values of the present age (Lk 1:46-55; 6:20-26).

Within this thematic framework the Gentiles quite naturally fit, and Luke's favorable depiction of Jewish outsiders is mirrored in his portrayal of Gentiles. For instance, in response to an encounter with a Roman centurion, Jesus declares, "Not even in Israel have I found such great faith" (Lk 7:9). Likewise, in a discussion with a legal expert, Jesus tells the story of the good Samaritan in order to illustrate the greatest commandment (Lk 10:25-37). However, Luke's portrayal of Gentiles is not entirely positive, and, as C. W. Stenschke observes, these competing depictions underscore Luke's theological perspective regarding the universal need for *salvation (Lk 9:52-53; 11:30-32; 12:29-30; 17:26-30; 21:20-24). Jesus has come "to seek and to save the lost" (Lk 19:10), and it is through him that God's *mercy and grace are made available to all people. It is therefore not due to Gentile piety that Luke incorporates foreigners into the church's missionary program, but rather because of their anthropological condition and theological need.

5. Gentiles in the Gospel of John.

In terms of Gentile encounters, John's Gospel is decidedly reserved in comparison to the Synoptics. However, this change of focus should not be construed as a shift in theological emphasis. Although in John the universality of the gospel message is not developed via a string of Gentile encounters, the theme of mission emerges from the evangelist's unique theological perspective.

5.1. Christology and Mission. John's prologue (Jn 1:1-18) is, in some sense, the hermeneutic key to understanding the Gentile mission in the Fourth Gospel. In distinction from the Synoptics, John's story of Jesus begins not from the earthly plane but rather from the spiritual and cosmological realm. Jesus is the "word" of God (Jn 1:1), the preexistent one who has come as the revealer of the Father (Jn 1:18), and it is in him that the created order has its origin (Jn 1:3). All humankind, both Jews and Gentiles, is dependent upon him, and through the *incarnation (Jn 1:14) Jesus has come to reveal God's *"glory" and "grace" (Jn 1:14-18). In contrast to the Synoptics, each of which begins by situating Jesus within the covenants and lineage of Israel, John begins by describing the universal significance of Jesus for the entire created realm, including the human sphere.

This failure to distinguish between Jews and Gentiles is a feature of John's cosmic Christology. Just as all things have been created through Jesus, so too are *"life" (Jn 1:4) and *"light" (Jn 1:4-5, 7-9) found in him for all people. As the revealer of God's will, Jesus has come into the world to "enlighten every person" (Jn 1:9). The generic language is indicative of a broad and inclusive theological agenda that makes no distinction based upon ethnic identity. Rather, individual response to Jesus determines one's status before God, for "as many as received him, he gave to those who believe in his name the right to become children of God" (Jn 1:12). Across the narrative, John frequently and deliberately uses terms such as "everyone" (Jn 4:13; 6:40; 12:46), "anyone" (Jn 6:51), "all people" (Jn 13:35) and "world" (Jn 1:29; 3:16, 17; 17:18) in order to highlight the inclusivity of Jesus' mission. The language is linked to John's Christology and the underlying necessity of belief as the sole means through which one attains eternal life and fellowship with the Father and Son.

5.2. Gentile Mission and "the Jews." John's Christology is universal in scope, but the evangelist maintains the distinction between the Jewish and Gentile missions. Although the prologue alludes to Jewish rejection of the "true light" (Jn 1:9-11), the ministry of Jesus begins in Jewish territory and is sustained in the region throughout most of the narrative (e.g., Jn 1:28, 43; 2:1, 13; 3:22; 5:1; 6:1). In this respect, and in accord with the Synoptics, the Jewish mission is given temporal priority by the narrative structure despite the universal implications of the evangelist's Christology.

John's inclusivism finds concrete expression in the encounters with the *Samaritans (Jn 4:1-45) and the royal official in Cana (Jn 4:46-54). There is debate about the identity of the royal official, but the broader context and framing of the Cana-to-Cana sequence (Jn 2:1-4:54) suggests that John has crafted the scenes in order to depict Jesus' interaction with the Gentile world. In some sense, the excursion reinforces the Jewish mission, since the encounter with the Samaritans take place as Jesus and the disciples are passing through the region on their way to Galilee from Judea (Jn 4:3). However, when viewed from a different perspective, the accounts are paradigmatic, for although "salvation is from the Jews" (Jn 4:22), Jesus transcends traditional racial barriers (Jn 4:9) in order to offer the "living water" that leads to eternal life (Jn 4:10-14). In both scenes Gentile responses are entirely positive and, more importantly, depict the "world's" receptivity to the message of Jesus (Jn 12:19-26). As the Samaritans affirm, Jesus is "the Savior of the world" (Jn 4:42; cf. Jn 19:20).

Unfortunately, Gentile inclusion often has been read in contrast to John's portrayal of "the Jews," leading to *anti-Semitism and some of the most horrific events in world history. Although John describes sharp conflict between Jesus and "the Jews" (e.g., Jn 1:19; 2:13-22; 5:16-18; 9:22-23), the fact remains that many "Jews" in the narrative do believe (e.g., Jn 11:45; 12:42). As F. J. Moloney argues, a sensitivity to the contours of the narrative indicate that "the Jews" represent "anyone of any age and any nation who has decided, once and for all, that Jesus of Nazareth is not the Messiah, but a sinner whose origins are unknown" (Moloney, 11). Rather than being a vehicle for ethnic partiality, the Johannine Jesus comes as the "bread" (Jn 6:35, 51), the "light" (Jn 8:12; 9:5), the "resurrection" (Jn 11:25) and the "way, truth, life" (Jn 14:6) to manifest God's presence and to satisfy the deepest longings of all people, both Jews and Gentiles.

5.3. The Role of the Spirit. Just as Jesus is sent into the world by the Father (Jn 3:17; 6:38-39; 12:49), so also the resurrected Christ sends the disciples into the world to do God's work (Jn 20:21). John's commissioning scene includes the bestowal of the Spirit (Jn 20:22-23), which, together with the phraseology of John 20:21, recalls the *farewell discourse in John 14-17. After the resurrection, the Spirit will "abide" with the disciples (Jn 14:17), "teach" them all things (Jn 14:26), guide them into "all truth" (Jn 16:13), and empower them to do even "greater works than these" (Jn 14:12). Given the implications of John's Christology and receptivity to the gospel already displayed by the Gentiles, it may be that the "greater works" include the missional expansion of the church among the Gentiles.

6. Gentiles and the Historical Jesus.

Interpreting the Gentile mission in the Gospels is a challenging task, but analyzing those traditions in light of historical probabilities is even more arduous and has resulted in variegated and diverse conclusions. Due to hermeneutical presuppositions and the lack of consensus regarding which traditions form part of the historical strata, determining Jesus' relationship to the Gentiles is a complex issue that has led to three broad interpretive options.

6.1. Gentile Mission Inaugurated by Jesus. In this minority position, some scholars have argued that Jesus not only anticipated an influx of Gentiles but also was the first missionary to the Gentiles (Spitta; Schnabel). Jesus' concern for those on the margins, his ministry to social outcasts, and his willingness to challenge traditional socioreligious boundaries—themes reflected in each of the Gospels—establish a trajectory of acceptance and inclusion that finds expression in the Gentile mission. Although Jewish people remain in God's elective purview, Jesus deliberately travels into Gentile territory, heals those who were not from the Jewish homeland, and provides the paradigmatic example for the early church to follow.

While this view has some basis in the activities of Jesus, its historical perspective is overly optimistic. The most explicit missional texts appear in post-resurrection accounts (Mt 28:16-20; Lk 24:44-49) and/or in relation to the activities of the disciples after the death of Jesus (Mt 24:14; Mk 13:10). Likewise, those texts that do purport to describe Gentile encounters typically occur at the initiative of the supplicant rather than Jesus (Mk 7:24-30; Lk 7:1-10). In view of the sayings that overtly describe a mission to Israel and the exclusion of Gentiles (Mt 10:5; 15:24)—texts that are typically deemed authentic—this solution is problematic in that it fails to account for the post-Easter, theological overlay in the Gospel accounts. Indeed, if Jesus did engage in a Gentile mission and further commissioned the disciples to do the same, then the struggle to embrace Gentiles in the early church becomes difficult to explain on historical grounds.

6.2. Exclusive Mission to the Jews. Other scholars take an altogether different approach to the Gentile mission. J. P. Meier, for instance, argues that "neither the actions nor the words of the historical Jesus" gave instructions regarding the Gentile mission (Meier, 3:315). Instead, the mission of Jesus was focused exclusively on the restoration of Israel (see Exile and Restoration). Some, such as A. von Harnack, have taken this position to its logical conclusion, arguing that the Gentile mission was entirely the creation of the early church. However, J. Jere-mias, in a brief but important study on the subject, argues that Jesus was not concerned with the Gentile mission because he believed that the ingathering of Gentiles would be accomplished at the eschaton by God's own initiative (e.g., Mt 8:11-12). Following this approach but with a slight variation, S. G. Wilson maintains that there "was no room for a historical Gentile mission" since Jesus expected the kingdom to come at any moment, thus rendering his eschatological perspective incompatible with the notion of a Gentile mission (Wilson, 28).

While these views address important matters related to the historical Jesus (*eschatology, Jewish backgrounds, social location of the early church, etc.), the various solutions adopt a minimalist approach that overlooks texts that have a direct bearing on the Gentile mission (e.g., Mk 13:10). Furthermore, given Jewish expectations about the future hope for Gentiles, it seems inconceivable that the historical Jesus had little, if anything, to say about Gentile inclusion.

6.3. Gentile Mission in Consequence to Israel's Restoration. Taking a mediating position that accounts for the strengths and liabilities of the previous solutions, more recent scholarship has sought to understand the Gentile mission within the scope of Second Temple *Judaism. The starting point for this conversation is the recognition that Jesus ministered primarily to Jews, a point well established in the Gospel traditions (Mt 10:5-6; 15:24; Mk 7:27; Lk 22:30) and further affirmed by the negative depiction of Gentile practices (Mt 6:7; 7:6; Lk 12:30). Although these latter texts likely reflect authentic tradition, the negative evaluations do not necessarily suggest that Jesus was unconcerned with the status of the Gentiles. On the contrary, just as one cannot dismiss the negative depiction of Gentiles (criterion of embarrassment), the sayings and parables that reflect a more favorable attitude toward Gentiles cannot be disregarded without due consideration. In some contexts, Israel's faithlessness is juxtaposed with Gentile receptivity, while in others a more harmonious relationship is envisioned. It is notable that in the vast majority of instances Gentile inclusion is portrayed in relation to the fate of Israel, which generally corresponds with the depiction of the nations in the Second Temple literature. Although the future state of the Gentiles is not uniformly portrayed, T. L. Donaldson argues that there are two common features in the literature: (1) an expectation that the Gentiles would participate in the end time blessings, (2) an assumption that the future of the Gentiles would be "a by-product of Israel's vindication and redemption" (Donaldson, 509). The implication is that if the earthly ministry of Jesus is understood in relation to the restoration of Israel, then the more positive sayings and encounters with the Gentile world correspond with and have precedence in the Second Temple literature. Therefore, it seems preferable to conclude that the focus of Jesus' activities involved the renewal of Israel, and, though he did not inaugurate a Gentile mission, he anticipated and expected an influx of Gentiles in the coming age as part of God's eschatological agenda.

See also ESCHATOLOGY; EXILE AND RESTORATION; HOLY SPIRIT; ISRAEL; JERUSALEM; MISSION; SAMARITANS; WORLD.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. M. F. Bird, Jesus and the Origins of the Gentile Mission (LNTS 331; London: T & T Clark, 2006); idem, Crossing Over Sea and Land: Jewish Missionary Activity in the Second Temple Period (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 2010); T. L. Donaldson, Judaism and the Gentiles: Jewish Patterns of Universalism (to 135 CE) (Waco, TX: Baylor University Press, 2007); K. R. Iverson, Gentiles in the Gospel of Mark: Even the Dogs Under the Table Eat the Children's Crumbs (LNTS 339; London: T & T Clark, 2007); J. Jeremias, Jesus' Promise to the Nations, trans. S. H. Hooke (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1982); J. Jervell, Luke and the People of God (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1972); S. McKnight, A Light Among the Gentiles: Jewish Missionary Activity in the Second Temple Period (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1991); J. P. Meier, A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus (4 vols.; ABRL; New York: Doubleday, 1991-2009); F. J. Moloney, The Gospel of John (SP; Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1998); J. T. Sanders, The Jews in Luke-Acts (London: SCM, 1987); E. J. Schnabel, "Jesus and the Beginnings of the Mission to the Gentiles," in Jesus of Nazareth: Lord and Christ; Essays on the Historical Jesus and New Testament Christology, ed. J. B. Green and M. Turner (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1994) 37-58; D. Senior and C. Stuhlmüller, The Biblical Foundations for Mission (London: SCM, 1983); J. S. Siker, "First to the Gentiles': A Literary Analysis of Luke 4:16-30," JBL 111 (1992) 73-90; D. C. Sim, "The Gospel of Matthew and the Gentiles," JSNT 57 (1995) 19-48; F. Spitta, Jesus und die Heidenmission (Giessen: Alfred Töpelmann, 1909); C. W. Stenschke, Luke's Portrait of Gentiles Prior to Their Coming to Faith (WUNT 108; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1999); J. Svartvik, Mark and Mission: Mk 7:1-23 in Its Narrative and Historical Contexts (ConBNT 32; Stockholm: Almqvist & Wiksell, 2000); A. von Harnack, The Expansion of Christianity in the First Three Cen- turies, trans. J. Moffatt (2 vols.; London: Williams & Norgate, 1904-1905); E. K. Wefald, "The Separate Gentile Mission in Mark: A Narrative Explanation of Markan Geography, The Two Feeding Accounts and Exorcisms," JSNT 60 (1995) 3-26; S. G. Wilson, The Gentiles and the Gentile Mission in Luke-Acts (SNTSMS 23; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1973).

K. R. Iverson

GEOGRAPHY. See ARCHEOLOGY AND GEOGRAPHY.

GETHSEMANE

According to the Gospels of Matthew and Mark, Gethsemane is the location of Jesus' prayer in lonely anguish before his arrest (Mt 26:36; Mk 14:32). The word "Gethsemane" is a transliteration of the Hebrew/Aramaic gat šēmēnē ("oil press"), presumably used here to refer to the site of an oil press in an olive grove on the slope of the Mount of Olives (Mt 26:30; Mk 14:26). John 18:1 speaks of a garden across the Kidron Valley from the city of *Jerusalem. Luke simply places the incident on the Mount of Olives. All thus refer to the same general location. According to the Synoptic Gospels, it was here, immediately following his vigil, that Jesus was publicly betrayed by Judas and arrested.

1. Gethsemane in Matthew
2. Gethsemane in Mark
3. The Mount of Olives in Luke
4. The Gethsemane Tradition in John and in Hebrews
5. The Historicity of the Gethsemane Tradition

1. Gethsemane in Matthew.

Source-critically, Matthew's sole dependence on Mark's Gospel for this episode (Mt 26:36-46) is widely assumed; accordingly, many of the emphases of the Markan account (see 2 below) are relevant to Matthew's account.

Readers of Matthew's account of the unfolding events at Gethsemane may be struck, first, with its christological orientation. From the arrival on the Mount of Olives until Judas's appearance and the arrest (Mt 26:47), Jesus is the primary actor throughout; he takes the initiative at every point even as he struggles with where the events of this night might lead. At a more ultimate level, though, Gethsemane is the unfolding of God's plan as this had been anticipated in the earlier passion predictions (Mt 16:21; 17:12, 22; 20:18-19, 28; 26:2) (see Predictions of Jesus' Passion and Resurrection). This emphasis is signaled in references to the "cup" (Mt 26:39; implied in Mt 26:42), signifying suffering destined by God (e.g., Ps 75:8; Is 51:17, 22; Jer 25:15-38; Ezek 23:31-34), and to the "hour" (Mt 26:45), signifying God's appointed time for Jesus' passion. More centrally, Jesus' three-fold *prayer marks the process by which he discerns and embraces God's will.

Noting Matthew's wording of Jesus' command to his disciples in Matthew 26:36, "Sit here while I go over there and pray," some interpreters raise the possibility that Matthew is consciously alluding to the story of *Abraham and Isaac (cf. Gen 22:5) (e.g., Senior, 76-77; Huizenga). There, in a story noted for its portrait of profound faith, Abraham's servants are given similar instructions. Recognition of this allusion would emphasize all the more Jesus' faithfulness in the midst of his anguish.

Matthew otherwise develops the paraenetic value of Jesus' words and actions in this scene. He brings with him the same three disciples who were present with him at his *transfiguration (Mt 17:1-8). Accordingly, those who witness Jesus' glory are also present at this supreme moment of despair, communicating perhaps more to Matthew's audience than to the sleeping disciples that the path to glory is the cup of suffering (cf. Mt 20:22-23; 26:27, 42). Jesus' instructions to "stay awake" (Mt 26:38, 41) recall his earlier directives to the disciples, who are told to keep watch, like the owner of the house (Mt 24:42-44) and the wise maidens (Mt 25:13). Moreover, Matthew presents Jesus' prayer in terms that closely parallel his version of the Lord's Prayer, both in Jesus' directive that the disciples pray that they might not enter into trial (cf. Mt 6:13; 26:41) and in Jesus' own request, by which he proves himself to be a living example of his own teaching, that "your will be done" (cf. Mt 6:10; 26:42).

In his description of Jesus' anguish (Mt 26:37) Matthew recasts Mark 14:33 (substituting lypeō ["become sorrowful"] for Mark's ekthambeō ["become greatly disturbed"]) to achieve a more direct reference to Psalm 42:5, thus identifying Jesus as the suffering righteous one. This typological identity is developed throughout Matthew 26-27, and here it serves to underscore Matthew's portrait of Jesus' exemplary faithfulness to his Father's will.

2. Gethsemane in Mark.

Over the past century the prehistory of the Markan version of the Gethsemane story has been subjected to extravagant analyses (see Feldmeier, 65-140; Holleran, 107-45). Many scholars, struck by the duplication of almost every detail within the Markan story, have been persuaded that two primitive sources underlie Mark 14:32-42 (e.g., Barbour; Holleran; Stanley). However, the thesis that the Markan story constitutes a very old, pre-Markan traditional unit has recently found new support, even if others have come to regard the scene as a Markan creation almost in its entirety. The debate has led to little by way of a critical consensus. The number of independent witnesses to the Gethsemane tradition (see 5 below) suggests a complex tradition history.

Central to Mark's account is the concrete unfolding of the divine plan anticipated in the earlier passion predictions (Mk 8:31; 9:12, 31; 10:33-34, 45). Although human agents are involved in these fateful events (e.g., Judas Iscariot, *Pontius Pilate, the Jewish leaders), God is the primary actor. This interpretation comes to the fore above all in the portrait of Jesus' prayer as the means of his discerning and submitting to God's will. It is also present in references to the "cup," signifying suffering destined by God (see 1 above), and to the "hour" (Mk 14:41), signifying God's appointed time for Jesus' passion.

Related to this motif, though also emphasizing Jesus' obedience, is the conjunction in this pericope of Mark's *Son of Man and *Son of God Christologies. "Son of Man" has been central to Mark's presentation of Jesus' anticipated suffering (Mk 8:31; 9:12, 31; 10:33-34): "the Son of Man will be delivered up." Now, "the Son of Man is delivered up into the hands of sinners" (Mk 14:41). Jesus' status as Son of God was affirmed by the evangelist in Mark 1:1, then proclaimed by God at Jesus' *baptism (Mk 1:10-11) and transfiguration (Mk 9:7). In addressing his prayer to "Abba, Father" (Mk 14:36), Jesus acknowledges his Father-Son relationship with God. Significantly, this affirmation comes to the fore in the face of suffering and death. Hence, "Son of God" must be understood in Mark against the backdrop of the "must" (dei) of the suffering of the Son of Man. It is as God's obedient Son that Jesus, Son of Man, embraces death as God's will (see Death of Jesus).

The motif of *discipleship failure contrasts with Jesus' obedience. Throughout Mark's Gospel the disciples have demonstrated their incapacity to grasp Jesus' identity and the implications of God's redemptive plan (e.g., Mk 8:32; 9:32; 10:32). Now, as Jesus struggles with God's will, the disciples evidence their continued lack of understanding by their inability to stay awake (and by their subsequent abandonment [Mk 14:50-52]).

Jesus' acknowledged intimacy with God ("Abba" [Mk 14:36]) highlights another pivotal motif, one that gives clearer definition to the significance of the "cup" in Mark 14:36. As R. Feldmeier observes, Gethsemane functions as the crisis point in the passion narrative, indeed in the life of the Son of God. Here, for the first time, Jesus experiences God's silence, a divine estrangement that comes to expression finally in Jesus' cry of dereliction from the cross (Mk 15:34). Gethsemane, then, does not so much demonstrate Jesus' anguish in the face of death as his fear of being abandoned by God.

Mark's account also underscores the paraenetic value of Jesus' words and actions. In his prayer Jesus exemplifies the appropriate response to eschatological crisis. Jesus' command "Watch!" recalls the content of his final discourse (cf. Mk 13:5, 9, 23, 33-37), a connection accentuated especially by these verbal parallels:

Mk 13:36: elthōn . . . heurē . . . katheudontas
(coming . . . he finds . . . sleeping)

Mk 14:37: erchetai . . . heuriskei . . . katheudontas
(he comes . . . he finds . . . sleeping)

Mk 14:40: elthōn . . . heuren . . . katheudontas
(coming . . . he found . . . sleeping)

The disciples, having been found sleeping at this moment, are encouraged by this story "to stay on guard" in anticipation of the final, eschatological woes (see Eschatology).

Finally, we may observe that Jesus' prayer alludes to the OT in ways that contribute to its interpretation. Mark's version of the prayer suggests conceptual borrowing from selected psalmic laments (e.g., Ps 42:9-11; 55:4-8; 61:1-3), pointing to a typological portrait of Jesus as the suffering righteous one.

3. The Mount of Olives in Luke.

Study of Luke 22:39-46 raises important text- and source-critical questions (see Textual Criticism; Synoptic Problem).

3.1. The Inclusion of Luke 22:43-44. The presence or absence of these two verses is crucial to an interpretation of the scene as a whole. The textual evidence is ambiguous, though it is clear that the omission of these verses from so many and diverse witnesses (e.g., P⁶⁹ [apparently], P⁷⁵, Codices Vaticanus and Alexandrinus, and the first corrector of Codex Sinaiticus) could not have been accidental. Some modern interpreters (see Fitzmyer, 2:1443-44; Ehrman and Plunkett; RSV) exclude these verses, noting their uniqueness within the Synoptic tradition, the nature of the manuscript evidence (especially P⁶⁹ and P⁷⁵) and the structure of Luke's account, thus judging them as inappropriate to their context and suggesting that they were added later for the purpose of Christian instruction. Others, however, point to the presence of these verses in Codices Sinaiticus (original and second corrector) and Bezae, for example, as well as knowledge of this tradition among the church fathers (e.g., Justin, Irenaeus, Hippolytus); they also observe the impressive Lukan character of these verses. In addition to the inclusion of characteristic Lukan vocabulary, they draw attention to Luke's well-documented interest in *angels (e.g., Lk 1:11, 26; 2:13, 15; Acts 5:19; 7:30; 8:26; 10:3; 12:7) and Luke's characteristic use of simile ("his sweat was like drops of blood" [Lk 22:44]; cf., e.g., Lk 3:22; 10:18; 11:44; 22:31) (see Brown, 1:181-82; Green 1988, 56-57). These data, along with the fact that the presence of these verses coheres with Luke's interpretation of this scene as a whole (see Tuckett), support the inclusion of Luke 22:43-44.

Moreover, it is not difficult to imagine a rationale for the early exclusion of these verses in the manuscript tradition. The portrait of Jesus contained therein—human, agonizing, needful, requiring angelic support—would have been problematic to some (cf. Gos. Nic. 20 [see Brown, 1:183-84]). Accordingly, they may have been dropped for theological reasons. There is thus good reason for taking these verses as belonging to the initial text of Luke.

3.2. The Source-Critical Question. In writing this story, was Luke dependent only on the Markan parallel (Mk 14:26, 32-42), or did he draw on additional material? The recent tendency has been to highlight Luke's creative use of his Markan source and so to downplay Luke's use of non-Markan tradition (whether oral or written). Four lines of evidence suggest that this conclusion may be overly simplistic, however. First, Luke's linguistic and syntactical deviations from Mark are not easily explicable with reference only to Luke's creative hand. Second, Luke's deletion of Mark 14:33-34 from his account is most easily explained by Luke's aversion to doublets—that is, by his decision to incorporate the record of Jesus' anguish in Luke 22:43-44 instead of, rather than in addition to, the similar Markan material. Third, in Luke 22:42 Luke reports the content of Jesus' prayer with language from the Lord's Prayer as found in Matthew 6:10: "not my will but your will be done." This language is missing from Luke's version of the Lord's Prayer (Lk 11:2-4) and has no parallel in Mark. Finally, the presence of Luke 22:43-44 (no parallel in Mark) speaks for Luke's use of non-Markan tradition. Thus, while in all probability Luke was dependent on the Markan account, he may also have had access to a second tradition (see Holleran, 170-98; Taylor, 69-72; Green 1988, 53-58).

3.3. The Significance of This Scene for Luke.

Primary to Luke's understanding of this scene is the role of Jesus as a model for his disciples. This motif surfaces initially with the use of akolouthēō, a term suggestive of "following as a disciple," in Luke 22:39. Structurally, the scene is bracketed by the commands "Pray that you may not enter into temptation" (Lk 22:40) and "Rise and pray that you might not enter into temptation" (Lk 22:46). As Jesus prays, they are to pray; as he rises, so should they (Lk 22:45-46). Thus, for Luke, this story has a paraenetic edge: the way to stand the test—intense, submissive prayer—is exemplified by Jesus. This theme is not unique to this passage in Luke's passion account; elsewhere we find the disciples "with" Jesus (Lk 22:24-30; 23:26-27, 49) in a way not found in Mark (cf. Mk 14:50-52, for which Luke offers no parallel).

Also of profound importance to Luke's scene is the way in which every aspect of the story is subordinated to the divine necessity of Jesus' suffering and his unreserved submission to God's will. This emphasis is accomplished by the brevity with which Luke presents the scene. The mention of only one time of prayer (compare the threefold pattern in Matthew and Mark) highlights Jesus' firm resolve to be obedient to God. Indeed, just as Jesus' instructions to the disciples frame this story, so his communion with God (agonizing prayer and reception of divine aid) stands as its centerpoint. Again, these motifs are found throughout Luke's narrative (on the necessity [dei] of Jesus' death, see, e.g., Lk 22:19-20, 22, 37; 24:26; on his acceptance of his fate, see, e.g., Lk 22:15-18; 23:27-31, 46).

Luke is also interested in portraying this scene as a cosmic battle. This is evident in his use of peirasmos in Luke 22:40, 46, a term denoting struggle with Satan in Luke (cf. Lk 4:13; 8:13), and in his reference to angelic assistance. In fact, Jesus' passion as a whole is marked by supernatural conflict (e.g., Lk 22:3, 28, 31, 53), though the present scene clearly constitutes the critical point in this struggle.

Some interpreters have understood Luke's presentation of this episode as a central element of Luke's portrayal of Jesus' passion as a martyrdom (e.g., Barbour). The case for this interpretation is strengthened by the observation that martyr tales regularly present their martyrs as exemplary figures. However, Luke's portrait of Jesus in agonizing prayer not only lacks parallels in the martyrological literature, where death is happily embraced, but also stands in clear tension with that literature (see further Sylva; van Henten). Another reading of this story proposes that Luke is especially concerned to further his portrait of Jesus as the Isaianic *Servant of the Lord (Green 1986). According to this view, the necessity of Jesus' suffering, his having been chosen for this fate, his willing obedience and his reception of strengthening aid through a divine messenger are to be read against their background in the Isaianic Servant texts (especially Is 41:10; 42:1, 6; 49:5; 50:5-9; 52:13-53:12). That is, Luke's portrayal of Jesus in prayer on the Mount of Olives strengthens the interpretation that it was to fulfill his role as Servant of the Lord that Jesus had to suffer (cf. Lk 22:37).

4. The Gethsemane Tradition in John and in Hebrews.

The Fourth Evangelist narrates no Gethsemane episode as such, but nonetheless manifests knowledge of this tradition. In John 18:1-2 he places Jesus and his disciples in a garden on the far side of the Kidron Valley, and in John 18:11 Jesus makes reference to the "cup" given him by God, a cup that he must drink. Both details are paralleled in the Synoptic Gethsemane tradition. Furthermore, John 17:1-18 portrays Jesus praying immediately before his arrest.

More significant is the prayer of Jesus in John 12:27-29. The prayer itself, "Father, save me from this hour" (Jn 12:27), has been variously punctuated, as a hypothetical question (NET, CEB) or as a petition (KJV, NEB). Given the note of anguish in John 12:27a (cf. Ps 6:3-4; 42:6; Mk 14:34), Jesus' experience of turmoil is evident either way. Here, a number of important Johannine motifs converge: Jesus' obedience to his mission and thus to God; the "hour" as the time of Jesus' death, the climax of the work for which the Son was sent; and the transparent interpretation of Jesus' death as glorification and exaltation (cf. Jn 12:23, 32) (see Death of Jesus; Glory).

In his attempt to demonstrate Christ's qualifications for the high priesthood, the author of Hebrews utilizes material reminiscent of the Gethsemane tradition. This connection is suggested generally by the observation that the Gethsemane story is the only account in our canonical Gospels that comes close to this portrayal of Jesus praying with "strong crying and tears to the one who was able to save him" (Heb 5:7). In addition, we may observe (1) the connection between Luke 22:43-44; John 12:27-29; Hebrews 5:7: he prayed and was heard; (2) that both John 12:27 and Hebrews 5:7 speak of God saving Jesus; (3) that both Luke 22:44 and Hebrews 5:7 mention his tears. Accordingly, Hebrews 5:7 represents a very early Christian reflection on the Gethsemane story.

5. The Historicity of the Gethsemane Tradition.

Many have doubted the historicity of the story of Jesus' struggle in prayer in Gethsemane, citing as primary evidence the impossibility of obtaining eye-witness testimony from sleeping disciples. On this basis, some have gone on to suggest a derivation from martyrological literature, while others hold that the scene originated in early reflection on the OT (esp. Pss 22:20; 31:9-10, 22; 42:5-6, 11; 43:5; 69:1-2). As previously noted (see 3.3 above), at its key point this scene actually stands in contrast to the martyr tales, whose protagonists gladly go to their deaths. The role of the OT in providing language and imagery for theological interpretation of the story should not be downplayed, but no convincing argument has been put forth to support the notion that the psalms actually gave birth to this tradition (Barbour; Dunn, 18-19).

Given the number of independent testimonies to this episode (Matthew-Mark, Luke, John, Hebrews), the antiquity of the Gethsemane tradition is beyond question. Its fundamental historicity is supported by additional factors. First, the story underscores so profoundly the weakness of Jesus that it is unlikely to have been created out of nothing. Second, the scandalous failure of the disciples in this scene is unlikely to have arisen in the earliest tradition. At the same time, some have argued that the sleeping of the disciples may serve a theological interest in Jesus' prayer, for it highlights the clarity of Jesus' understanding of his task over against the disciples' persistent dullness. This line of argumentation supports even more the historicity of Jesus' prayer of anguish. Finally, we may note the appearance of "Abba" in Mark 14:36, the use of which takes us "back to the very speech and language of Jesus himself" (Dunn, 20).

See also DEATH OF JESUS; PASSION NARRATIVE; TRIAL OF JESUS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R. S. Barbour, "Gethsemane in the Tradition of the Passion," NTS 16 (1969-1970) 231-51; R. E. Brown, The Death of the Messiah: From Gethsemane to the Grave: A Commentary on the Passion Narratives in the Four Gospels (2 vols.; ABRL; New York: Doubleday, 1994); J. D. G. Dunn, Jesus and the Spirit: A Study of the Religious and Charismatic Experience of Jesus and the First Christians as Reflected in the New Testament (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1975); B. D. Ehrman and M. A. Plunkett, "The Angel and the Agony: The Textual Problem of Luke 22:43-44," CBQ 45 (1983) 401-16; R. Feldmeier, Die Krisis des Gottessohnes: Die Gethsemaneezählung als Schlüssel der Markuspasion (WUNT

2/21; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1987); J. A. Fitzmyer, The Gospel According to Luke: Introduction, Translation, and Notes (2 vols.; AB 28, 28A; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1985); J. B. Green, “Jesus on the Mount of Olives (Luke 22:39-46): Tradition and Theology,” JSNT 26 (1986) 29-48; idem, The Death of Jesus: Tradition and Interpretation in the Passion Narrative (WUNT 2/33; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1988); J. W. Holleran, The Synoptic Gethsemane: A Critical Study (AnGreg 191; Rome: Università Gregoriana, 1973); L. Huizenga, The New Isaac: Tradition and Intertextuality in the Gospel of Matthew (NovTSup 131; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2009); D. Senior, The Passion of Jesus in the Gospel of Matthew (Wilmington, DE: Michael Glazier, 1985); D. M. Stanley, Jesus in Gethsemane: The Early Church Reflects on the Suffering of Jesus (New York: Paulist Press, 1980); D. D. Sylva, ed., Reimaging the Death of the Lukan Jesus (BBB 73; Frankfurt: Hain, 1990); V. Taylor, The Passion Narrative of St. Luke: A Critical and Historical Investigation (SNTSMS 19; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1982); C. M. Tuckett, “Luke 22,43-44: The ‘Agony’ in the Garden and Luke’s Gospel,” in New Testament Textual Criticism and Exegesis: Festschrift J. Delobel, ed. A. Denaux (BETL 161; Leuven: Peeters, 2002) 131-43; J. W. van Henten, “Jewish Martyrs and the Lukan Passion Narrative Revisited,” in Luke and His Readers: Festschrift A. Denaux, ed. R. Bieringer, G. Van Belle and J. Verheyden (BETL 182; Leuven: Leuven University Press, 2005) 325-44.

J. B. Green

GLORY

The Gospels follow the use of “glory” (doxa [verb doxazō, “glorify”]) in the LXX and thus presuppose its theological use of the term. In secular Greek doxa has the basic meaning of “opinion, conjecture, reputation” (reflecting its semantic link with dokēma, dokeo) (LSJ 444; von Rad and Kittel). But in the LXX doxa is applied to the honor and reputation not just of persons, but supremely of God and God’s presence. The LXX translates “glory” in the HB (noun kābôd, verb kābēd) with the doxa/doxazō word group.

In the OT the basic sense of glory is “weight, heaviness,” with the extended figurative sense of importance, impressiveness or gravitas. As such, the term can indicate a certain honorable status in the social hierarchy (Gen 13:2; 31:1; Deut 5:16; 2 Chron 32:33; Is 10:3; Nah 2:9). Kābôd is also used in a theological sense to refer to the radiant presence of God and is particularly associated with God’s presence in theophanies (Ex 16:10; 24:16-18; Lev 9:23-24; Is 4:5) and in the tabernacle or the temple (Ps 26:8; cf. Ex 29:43; 40:34; 2 Chron 7:2; Is 46:13; Ezek 8:4, 43:4-5). Isaiah and Ezekiel particularly develop the expectation of a new appearance of God’s glory in the day of Israel’s restoration. In Ezekiel God’s glory leaves the temple to make way for judgment (Ezek 10:18) but returns again in the eschatological temple (Ezek 43:4). Similarly, Isaiah points to a new revelation of God’s glory for Israel in the restoration (Is 40:5; 60:1-19), with an additional emphasis that all nations will experience God’s glory (Is 66:18-19).

1. Synoptic Gospels
2. Gospel of John

1. Synoptic Gospels.

“Glory” occurs fairly infrequently in Matthew (noun 7x, verb 4x) and Mk (noun 3x, verb 1x), but Luke employs it much more often (noun 13x, verb 9x). As in the OT, glory indicates the weightiness of power, authority and social standing. For instance, the devil shows Jesus the “glory” of the “kingdoms of the world” (Mt 4:8; Lk 4:5-6), which points to the grandeur of their power (see Temptation of Jesus). Furthermore, Jesus speaks of the “glory” of Solomon, indicating his kingly wealth and magnificent possessions (Mt 6:29; Lk 12:27). In Luke’s parable of the marriage feast (Lk 14:7-14) glory indicates behavior that brings honorable social status (Lk 14:10; cf. Mt 6:2) as well as honor before *God (implied in the context, Lk 14:12-24). The term can also mean “fame” or “reputation,” as it does in Luke 4:14-15, where Jesus’ teaching produces public praise. As *Israel responded to God’s saving acts by “giving glory/praise” to him (Pss 29:2; 86:9; 96:3; Is 42:12), so also the crowds respond to Jesus’ saving deeds by “glorifying” or praising God (Mt 9:8; 15:31; Mk 2:12; Lk 5:25-26). In the *Sermon on the Mount Jesus says that people will glorify, or praise, God the Father because of the good works of Jesus’ *disciples (Mt 5:16).

As in the OT, the more prominent use of “glory” is to describe some aspect of the divine realm or God’s glory. This is nowhere more evident than in the passages concerning the coming of the *Son of Man. How one responds to Jesus’ call to discipleship will have ramifications at the end of the age, when the Son of Man “comes in the glory of his Father” for *judgment (Mt 16:27; Mk 8:38; Lk 9:26). Luke heightens this glory Christology: “when he comes in his glory and of the Father and of the holy angels” (Lk 9:26). Jesus thus will come in his own visible, divine majesty, and not just that of the Father. In the *transfiguration narrative that follows (Mt 17:1-8; Mk 9:2-8; Lk 9:28-36) the disciples witness a temporary transformation (metamorphoō [Mt 17:2; Mk 9:2]) or unveiling of Jesus' true identity as the divinely authorized Son of God. Although the term "glory" is not mentioned in the account in either Matthew or Mark, the exodus imagery present in all three Synoptic accounts (*mountain, transformation or shining of Jesus' face, clothing becoming white, tabernacles, the appearing of Moses, the voice from the cloud, the fear of the disciples) suggests that the disciples experienced a visual manifestation of the presence of God's glory in Jesus. Luke makes this explicit by saying that the disciples "saw [Jesus'] glory" (Lk 9:32).

The transfiguration (narrated in Matthew, Mark, Luke) follows immediately on a statement concerning the coming of the Son of Man in glory and thus anticipates Jesus' teaching on the coming of the Son of Man in the eschatological discourses (Mt 24; Mk 13; Lk 21). In these discourses Jesus speaks of himself as the Son of Man who will come in/on clouds "with power and glory" (Mt 24:30; Mk 13:26; Lk 21:27 ["great glory"])—that is, with the transcendent qualities of the divine realm. This evokes the Danielic son of man, whom Daniel saw "on/with the clouds of heaven" (Dan 7:13). Matthew expands this tradition when he portrays Jesus as the Son of Man, who will be enthroned in glory as the eschatological judge (Mt 19:28) and who will "sit on his glorious throne" (Mt 25:31 [cf. Mk 10:37]), a description that may suggest influence from the "son of man" traditions found in the Similitudes of Enoch (1 En. 37–71) (Davila, 133). The Synoptics, then, show that Christ's glory is an eschatological concept that will be realized at the end of the age. This is apparent, in yet another future reference to Christ's glory after his death and resurrection, in a request of Jesus made by James and John: "Grant that we may sit . . . in your glory" (Mk 10:37 [cf. Mt 20:21]). Luke 24:26 makes it clear that Christ would "enter into his glory" only after his sufferings.

As opposed to the pattern in Matthew and Mark that associates Christ with the divine glory in the age to come, Luke seems to emphasize Christ's glory not only as a future reality (Lk 9:26) but also as a present one: they "saw his glory" (Lk 9:32). Thus, for Luke, the divine glory is perceptible in Jesus' earthly life and ministry, a notion that brings Luke more in line with the portrayal of Jesus' glory in the Gospel of John (see 2 below). In Luke's *birth narrative the heavenly visitation of the angel is accompanied by the radiant glory of God: "the glory of the Lord shone around them" (Lk 2:9), reminiscent of the divine visitation of God's bright glory in Ezekiel 1:26–28. The angel is accompanied by "a multitude of the heavenly host" (Lk 2:13) ascribing "glory to God in the highest" (Lk 2:14), a declaration of praise to God for the birth of the messianic savior (Lk 2:11) that is matched by the shepherds' later "glorifying" (doxazō) and "praising" (aineō) God (Lk 2:20). The "terrible fear" experienced by the shepherds (Lk 2:9) underlines the theophanic character of the event. Glorifying God is a typical response to Jesus' *healings in Luke (Lk 5:25–26; 7:16; 13:13; 17:15; 18:43). Some of the instances of doxazō ("to glorify") in Luke's Gospel could be understood as "praise," but there are other, more profound occurrences. In response to Jesus' raising of the widow's son from the dead at Nain, Luke says, the people "feared," "glorified God," and said that "God has visited his people" (Lk 7:16). This terminology suggests theophany ("fear" [Lk 1:12; 5:26]; "visited" [Lk 1:68; 19:44; cf. Ex 4:31]); that is, God has appeared in Jesus' mighty act. Luke continues his emphasis on glorifying God in the *passion narrative by uniquely writing that the centurion, after witnessing Jesus' words and death on the cross, responded by "glorifying God" (Lk 23:47), a response that ties the centurion to all of the other like responses to God's mighty salvific acts through Jesus in Luke.

2. Gospel of John.

"Glory" is used more often in John's Gospel (noun 19x, verb 23x) than in any of the Synoptic Gospels, indicating that the concept is of particular importance for Johannine Christology. John carries over the basic uses of "glory" in the OT and the Synoptics, such as glory as social praise, honor, approval and reputation (Jn 5:44; 7:18; 8:50; 12:43), and glory as the radiant presence of God (Jn 11:4, 40; 17:5). Matthew and Mark associate the Son of Man's glory with his future coming, and Luke maintains that Jesus' glory is a future and present reality in Jesus' ministry. In John's Gospel, however, Christ's glory is exclusively a present reality in that John insists that the divine glory is present in Jesus' *incarnation, ministry and *death.

John 1:14 associates the glory of the Logos with God's unique glory, which "dwelt" (skēnoō) in the OT tabernacle (Ex 40:34–35); this is the glory that "we beheld" in the Logos made flesh (Jn 1:14c). John 2:11 makes clear that Jesus manifests his divine glory through his "signs." Subsequently, Jesus' raising of *Lazarus is a "sign" (Jn 12:18) that happened "for the glory of God, in order that the Son may be glorified by it" (Jn 11:4 [cf. Jn 11:40]). Jesus does not seek his own glory apart from God the Father, because God himself glorifies Jesus (Jn 8:50, 54; 12:28). Likewise, Moses (Jn 1:45; 5:46), Abraham (Jn 8:56) and Isaiah (Jn 12:41) bear witness to Jesus' glory. In John 12:41 we are told that Isaiah "saw his glory and spoke about him," recalling Isaiah 6:1, where Isaiah sees the "the Lord" (in both the MT and the LXX). It is likely that John 12:41 is following contemporary targumic traditions of Isaiah in which Isaiah sees "the glory of the Lord" (Tg. Isa. 6:1) and "the glory of the shekinah of the Lord" (Tg. Isa. 6:5) (Chilton, 76; Brown, 486-87). Therefore, since "his glory" clearly refers to Jesus in John 12:41, Isaiah witnesses to Jesus' glory that he shares with God (cf. Jn 1:14; 17:24). This notion is confirmed by Jesus himself in John 17:5: "And now, glorify me together with yourself, Father, with the glory which I had with you before the world was" (cf. Jn 17:22, 24). These are startling Johannine assertions in light of Isaiah's insistence on the absolute uniqueness of Yahweh's glory: "I am Yahweh. . . I will not give my glory to another" (Is 42:8 [cf. Is 42:11]).

The Fourth Gospel uniquely presents Jesus' death as an event that reveals both Jesus' glory (Jn 7:39; 11:4; 12:16, 23) and the Father's glory (Jn 12:28; cf. Jn 13:31-32), so that in Jesus' death the Father's glorification of the Son and the Son's glorification of the Father are inextricably connected (Jn 17:1, 4-5). In John 12 the evangelist combines imagery from "glorified" (doxazō) and "lifted up" (hypsōō) in the event of the cross (Jn 12:23, 32; cf. Jn 3:14; 8:28), recalling the Isaianic Servant, who likewise is "lifted up" and "glorified" (LXX Is 52:13). Jesus' glorification on the cross is the moment, the "now" (nyn [Jn 12:31; 13:31; 17:5]) of eschatological judgment for the world and its ruler (Jn 12:31). Unlike the Synoptics, in John's Gospel the Son of Man fulfills his judgment role in the present of the event of the cross (Dennis). For John, then, Jesus' "death is the ultimate theophany" (Keener, 2:885).

With his impending glorification in view, Jesus assures his disciples that God will continue to glorify himself and his Son in the prayers (Jn 14:13) and obedience (Jn 15:8) of his people and even in the martyrdom of Peter (Jn 21:18-19). The ministry of the *Holy Spirit in the believing community is tied to and contingent upon Jesus' own glorification in his death and return to the Father (Jn 7:39; 20:22). It is only after his glorification, Jesus says, that the Spirit "will glorify me, for he will take what is mine and disclose it to you" (Jn 16:14). And finally, the glory that radiates forth from Jesus' person from all eternity, in his incarnation, ministry, death and return to God, will be shared with believers "so that they may be one, just as we are one" (Jn 17:22). This suggests that the presence of Christ's glory in the midst of his people transforms them into a unity that in turn redounds to the glory of the Father and the Son in the power of the Spirit.

See also DEATH OF JESUS; GOD; TRANSFIGURATION.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R. E. Brown, The Gospel According to John I-XII (AB 29; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1966); B. D. Chilton, The Glory of Israel: The Theology and Provenience of the Isaiah Targum (JSOTSup 23; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1983); J. R. Davila, The Provenance of the Pseudepigrapha: Jewish, Christian, or Other? (JSJSup 105; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2005); J. A. Dennis, "The 'Lifting Up of the Son of Man' and the Dethroning of the 'Ruler of This World': Jesus' Death as the Defeat of the Devil in John 12,31-32," in The Death of Jesus in the Fourth Gospel, ed. G. van Belle (BETL 200; Leuven: Leuven University Press, 2007) 677-91; C. H. Dodd, The Interpretation of the Fourth Gospel (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1965); C. Dohmen and P. Stenmans, "כָּבֹד," TDOT 7:13-22; C. Keener, The Gospel of John: A Commentary (2 vols.; Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 2003); H. G. Liddell, R. Scott and H. S. Jones, A Greek-English Lexicon (9th Revised Edition; Oxford: Clarendon, 1996); J. T. Nielsen, "The Narrative Structures of Glory and Glorification in the Fourth Gospel," NTS 56 (2010) 343-66; G. von Rad and G. Kittel, "δοκέω, κτλ.," TDNT 2:232-55; M. Weinfeld, "כָּבֹד," TDOT 7:22-38. J. A. Dennis

GOD

The word God means "a divine being or deity," but in the Gospels of the NT it refers to the God of Israel, the God of *Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, whom Jesus called "Father" and whom he taught his disciples to address in the same way. The four Gospels are narrative accounts of the ministry of Jesus of Nazareth, but they assume that this God is working and active in and through Jesus, identify Jesus and his mission with respect to God and God's purposes, and often summarize the heart of Jesus' proclamation in terms of the *kingdom of God. The Gospels thus are dependent upon the OT witness to the identity, character and purposes of God, and they continue the narratives recounting God's purposes for *Israel and for all the world. Because of their continuation of the biblical narrative, the Gospels do not so much present Jesus giving new information or instruction about God, but rather present him drawing on particular parts and themes of the Scriptures to proclaim God's *salvation, to show that salvation is now effected in and through the person, words, deeds, *death and *resurrection of Jesus of Nazareth, and how Jesus calls God's people to conform their lives to the purposes and will of God.

1. Terms and Imagery
2. The Contexts of the Gospels
3. God in the Four Gospels
4. Jesus and God

1. Terms and Imagery.

On the whole, the Gospels demonstrate a remarkable sparseness in the descriptive language used for God when compared to Jewish texts of the period, and even when compared to the OT. To be sure, the Gospels employ some important adjectives (e.g., "living") and descriptive genitival phrases (e.g., "the God of Israel") that serve to identify and characterize the God of whom they speak, but such adjectival descriptions are relatively few. But these descriptions, along with the specific terms used for God, demonstrate the singular importance of the OT in shaping the understanding of God in the Gospels.

1.1. Theos ("God"). The single most common term used for God in the Gospels is theos, the Greek word for "God" or "a god." In the LXX, the translation of the OT that shaped the patterns of thought of Greek-speaking Jews and early Christians alike, theos typically renders the Hebrew terms for God, 'ēl and 'ēlōhīm. Theos sometimes also translates yhwh, the four Hebrew consonants of the divine name "Yahweh." Because of the staunch monotheistic commitment of Judaism of this period, a reference to "God" was clearly to the God of Israel, Yahweh. Only one God was designated by theos, God.

In the Gospels theos refers to the God who created the world, the God of Israel, the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. Theos never denotes another deity or idol (cf. Acts 14:11; 19:26; 1 Cor 8:5-6; Gal 4:8). In the Gospel of John the preexistent *Word, who was "with God [theos]," is also called theos (Jn 1:1), and the risen Jesus is addressed as "my God" by Thomas (Jn 20:28) (see 3.4 below).

But because in the ancient world theos, as well as its Semitic counterparts 'ēl and 'ēlōhīm, may refer to a variety of deities or gods, the term needed qualification if it was not to remain the generic term for a deity. Thus, the OT distinguishes the God of Israel from all other would-be deities through a number of descriptive phrases, such as "God of gods," "God of the heavens," "Lord God Almighty," "Most High God," "Almighty God Most High" and "Lord of hosts." With such appellations, many of which are found also in the Gospels in appropriation of OT language, God is distinguished by his power and authority over any other allegedly divine figure and over all creation.

This one God has been revealed to and known by a particular people, as seen in the important and frequent designation "God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob" or "God of our ancestors" and "your God" in reference to Israel. The Gospels continue this pattern, speaking of "the God of Israel" (Mt 15:31; Lk 1:68) or the "God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob" (Mt 22:32; Mk 12:26; Lk 20:37) and employing possessive pronouns that identify God with reference to Jesus' contemporaries or disciples: "your God" (Mt 4:7, 10; 22:37; Mk 12:30; Lk 4:8, 12; 10:27; Jn 20:17 [of the disciples]), "our God" (Mk 12:29; Lk 1:78; Jn 8:54) and "their God" (Lk 1:16 [explicitly of Israel]). These descriptive characterizations bind God closely to the identity, history and worship of a specific people.

1.2. Kyrios ("Lord"). In the Gospels God is also referred to as kyrios ("Lord"). This is the Greek term in the LXX that translates both the Hebrew word 'ādōnāy ("Lord") and also, much more frequently, yhwh, the proper name of God. The name yhwh itself is not transliterated. While in the Hebrew OT, yhwh occurs far more frequently than any other designation, such as 'ēlōhīm ("God") or 'ādōnāy ("Lord"), in the LXX kyrios predominates. Thus, to the reader of the LXX, the Bible of Greek-speaking Jews and Christians, God essentially was known as "the Lord" and, as noted above, somewhat less frequently, simply as "God."

Except for the Gospel of John, which reserves the title "Lord" for Jesus (but see Jn 12:38), all of the Gospels adopt the scriptural designation "Lord" for God. In fact, many of the uses of "Lord" for God are found in quotations of the OT or in phrases familiar from the OT ("word of the LORD" or "angel of the LORD"). On the whole, however, the Gospels apply the term kyrios more frequently to Jesus than they do to God, although at times the referent remains ambiguous (e.g., Mt 9:38; 24:42; Mk 5:19, 13:20; Lk 1:17, 7:6; 10:2). That the Gospels speak of Jesus with an OT designation for God and, specifically, with the term that connotes God's rule or sovereignty demonstrates that they reflect the widespread early Christian conviction that Jesus has been designated as God's agent in the rule of the world, and that God's kingly rule has been inaugurated (Bauckham; Hurtado 1998; Rowe 2006). God has conferred upon Jesus, the Lord, the authority and status to rule (see esp. the quotation of Ps 110:1 in Mt 22:44; Mk 12:36; Lk 20:42; Acts 2:34).

1.3. Patēr ("Father"). Perhaps the most memorable and distinctive characterization of God in the Gospels is the designation of God as "Father," the designation that comes to function in Christian parlance as the regular way of referring to God. The term patēr used for God is spread unevenly across the Gospels (Matthew 44x, Mark 4x, Luke 15x, John 109x). Remarkably, these references to God as Father are found in the Gospels virtually exclusively in the speech of Jesus (the only exceptions are Jn 1:14, 18; 8:41; 14:8). Typically, "Father" is coupled with a personal pronoun, so that Jesus speaks either of "my Father" (Matthew 14x, Luke 5x, John 20x) or "your Father" (Matthew 12x, Luke 2x, John 2x). Only once is Jesus depicted as using the first-person plural possessive, "our," when he teaches the *disciples how they should address God in *prayer (but only in Mt 6:9; cf. Lk 11:2). In John 20:17 Jesus speaks of "my Father and your Father, my God and your God," not simply of "our Father" or "our God." This Johannine pattern reflects the implicit distinction in all the Gospels between the way that Jesus, the *Son of God, and the disciples relate to God as Father. The absolute "the Father" is found relatively seldom in the Synoptics (Matthew 2x, Mark 1x, Luke 3x) but frequently in John (73 x).

The Gospels thus present the use of "Father" for God as a characteristic aspect of Jesus' speech and habit of addressing God. According to Mark, the Aramaic term that Jesus used to address God as Father is abba (Mk 14:36), a term that has been subject to much discussion (Jeremias; Thompson 2000). None of the other Gospels use this term, although Paul notes that Christians, by the Spirit, may call upon God as abba (Rom 8:15; Gal 4:6). Since Paul includes the Aramaic term in a letter written in Greek, it is likely that the term had particular significance, such as it would carry if it had been known to be Jesus' typical mode of address to God. In spite of claims that have been advanced that abba is baby-talk or a child's word for God ("daddy"), the evidence rather suggests that it is simply an ordinary Aramaic designation for "Father" that would have been used by both adults and children (Barr; Thompson 2000). But it remains significant that Jesus used "Father" (rather than "Lord" or "God") as his mode of address to God. Jesus' address to God as Father may denote the filial relationship between the king of Israel and God (2 Sam 7:12-14; Ps 2:), which accounts in part for the designation of Jesus as the messianic Son of God (for the close connection of "Messiah" [see Christ] and "Son of God," see Mt 16:16; Mk 1:1, 14:61; Jn 20:31). But Jesus' appeal to God as Father further speaks of his trust and confidence in God's provision, mercy, care and salvation, such as was predicated of God's fatherly ways toward Israel in the OT (Ps 103:13-14; Jer 3:4, 19; 31:9-11; Hos 11:1). The Gospel of John in particular characterizes Jesus' unique sonship in relationship to God the Father, articulating explicitly what is implicit in the Synoptic Gospels and their accounts of Jesus' own relationship to God.

1.4. Epithets and Imagery. The Gospels reflect a number of biblical epithets for God that articulate the convictions that the God of Israel is indeed the one sovereign God of all the earth. God is the Most High (Mk 5:7; Lk 1:32, 35, 76; 6:35; 8:28), the Mighty One (Lk 1:49), the Power (Mt 26:64; Mk 14:62; Lk 22:69) and the Lord of heaven and earth (Mt 11:25; Lk 10:21). The use of such circumlocutions for God, showing profound reverence for God expressed in the reluctance to even speak the name of God, reflects Jewish sensibilities. Additionally, God can be depicted as or likened, implicitly or explicitly, to a king (Mt 22:2), judge (Lk 18:2; Jn 5:22, 27) and land-owner or employer (Mt 20:1-15; 21:28-30, 33-41; Mk 12:1-11; Lk 20:9-16). The emphasis on God's authority fits with the conviction that there is only one God.

Unlike some OT narratives, in the NT God does not appear in the narrative as an actor, although it is clear that God stands not merely in the background of these narratives but rather is active in and through all that happens in them, particularly in and through the actions and words of Jesus. God's power and authority are demonstrated through saving (Lk 1:47, 49) and delivering people from the powers that bind and oppress, appropriate to God's identity as the heavenly Father, who bestows forgiveness and mercy and knows and cares for the needs of his children. Jesus' proclamation of the kingdom of God presents God as a king whose sovereign purposes are now becoming manifest through Jesus, while also presenting Jesus as the proclaimer of, and designated vice-regent in, that kingdom. God's Spirit anoints Jesus (see the baptismal accounts and Lk 4:18) (see Holy Spirit); the voice of God from heaven authorizes Jesus in the *baptism and *transfiguration (and see Jn 6:27); Jesus' healings and exorcisms demonstrate the power of God to make whole and to sanctify human life (Mt 12:28; Lk 11:20); God sent Jesus (Jn 5:23, 37; 6:44; 8:16, 18; 12:49; 14:24); and Jesus speaks and does the will and works of God (Jn 3:16-17; 12:50). In other words, because God is known through and by means of the mission of Jesus, the Gospels present and characterize God by characterizing Jesus and his work.

The character and actions of God shape the demand made upon his people and the future hope of the people of God. For example, since God made the Sabbath for human beings, human need “overrides” or takes priority over certain aspects of Sabbath observance (Mt 9:13; Mk 2:23-28; 3:1-6; Lk 13:10-17; Jn 7:20-24). God, who makes it rain on both the just and the unjust, calls his people to love their enemies (Mt 5:44-48; Lk 6:27-35). Since God is *merciful and *forgiving, human beings ought likewise to be merciful and forgiving (Mt 5:7; 9:13; 12:7; 18:23-35; 23:23; Lk 6:36; 18:13). In this way, the children of God mirror the character and actions of their heavenly Father. God created humankind as male and female from the beginning, and hence those who are married ought not to *divorce (Mt 19:3-9). Since God is the God of the living, the one who gives and sustains life, one can expect a *resurrection of the dead (Mk 12:26; Lk 20:37; Jn 5:26-27; 6:57). God’s action and character provide norms for the behavior of God’s people and determine the course of events in this world and the next.

2. The Contexts of the Gospels.

Several sociohistorical contexts are relevant for studying the Gospels, including (1) first-century Judaism, with its commitments to the one God of Israel and the Scriptures of Israel; (2) the larger Mediterranean world, in which the Gospels were circulated and read, with the varying religious commitments in that world; (3) the growing early Christian church, consisting of Jewish and increasing numbers of Gentile followers of Jesus.

2.1. The Scriptural Context. No other context is as important for understanding God in the Gospels as is the OT, where convictions about God are couched within the implicit narrative of God’s calling of and covenant with the people of Israel, and the demand for obedience and faithfulness inherent in that calling and that covenant. As already noted, the Gospels do not provide extensive explicit characterization of God. But reading the Gospels in light of the Scriptures, as developed and interpreted by Jewish tradition, does bring into sharper relief the presentation of God in the Gospels and also demonstrates that the Gospels are rooted in Jewish soil.

To speak of God in biblical terms always requires that one articulate God’s identity as the one true God, the God of Israel; God’s character as eternal, living, all-sovereign, righteous judge, merciful and compassionate; God’s action in creating the world and human beings to govern it as his representatives, and in saving and delivering his people from a wide variety of oppressive conditions; and God’s call to the people of Israel to be a holy people set apart for *worship and obedience to him, and to live together in justice, harmony and *peace with each other, so that they might be a light to the nations. The biblical accounts of God’s identity, character, activity and call are presupposed in the Gospels, although emphasized differently in each of them. Before turning to the Gospels, we will briefly examine key elements of the portrayal of God in Scripture, focusing on those aspects that were particularly important in the Jewish milieu of the Gospels.

2.1.1. One Holy God. OT authors frequently emphasize the uniqueness of God (e.g., Deut 4:35, 39; 32:39; 1 Sam 2:2; 2 Sam 7:22; Is 44:6; 45:5, 6, 14, 18, 21, 22; 46:9). Consequently, Israel was to have no other gods besides Yahweh (Ex 20:5; 34:14; Deut 5:7) and was to worship only Yahweh (Deut 6:4-5). Even as the uniqueness of Yahweh demands exclusive worship, so the holiness of God calls for God’s people to be holy (Lev 11:45; 19:2; 20:22-26; Num 15:40) through faithfully keeping his commandments, including those commands that “set them apart” from the nations. But already in the prophetic literature especially of the OT, God’s people are called upon to demonstrate their distinctive calling in the way they live together in justice and integrity. Only then does God honor the worship and sacrifices that are offered (Ps 51:16-19; Is 58:5-7; Hos 6:6; Amos 5:21-25).

The literature of Judaism demonstrates the same insistence upon the unique identity of the one God of Israel (Wis 12:13; Jdt 8:20; 9:14; Bel 41; Sir 36:5; Bar 3:36; 4Q504 1-2 V, 9; 1Q35 I, 6; 2 En. 33:8; 36:1; 47:3; Philo, Leg. 3.4, 82). Because God is one, worship and obedience must be rendered to the one God alone (see Josephus, J.W. 2.117-118). The oneness of God required that there be only one *temple, whose holiness must be preserved in order to honor the holy God (11Q19; Josephus, Ant. 20.181; 20:206-207; J.W. 4.147-154; 5.19-20).

As the conduct expected of God’s people corresponds to the identity and character of God in the OT Scriptures, so too in the Gospels the conduct to which Jesus exhorts people flows from God’s identity. God’s uniqueness calls for exclusive devotion to him (Mk 10:18; 12:28-34; Jn 4:23-24; 5:44; 17:3). The greatest commandment is to *love God with all one’s heart, soul and mind (Mt 22:37 par.), for no one can serve two masters (Mt 6:24; Lk 16:13). God’s kingdom and God’s righteousness are to be sought above all else (Mt 6:33; Lk 12:31). Jesus teaches the disciples to pray that God’s name be sanctified or made holy (Mt 6:9; Lk 11:2). The characterization of the temple as “God’s house” (Mt 21:13; Mk 11:17; Lk 2:49, 19:46; Jn 2:16) demands the relinquishment of cultic practices at other shrines and temples and honor of any other deities. But Jesus also repeatedly emphasizes that what is to set God's people apart is not their cultic practices, or not those alone, but rather conduct that reflects the love, justice, righteousness and integrity that God calls for (Mt 23:23-26; Mk 7:21-23). Jesus thus picks up the biblical and prophetic emphasis on the distinctive moral character of holiness required of God's people.

2.1.2. The Living Creator. Quite regularly the OT insists that the God of Israel is the eternal, living God, who made the *world (Gen 1; Ps 36:9; Is 40:28; 44:24; 45:7; Jer 2:13; Ezek 37:1-16). The designation of God as the "living God" often serves to contrast God, the one who made the earth, with "dead idols," made by human hands from material created by God (Jer 10:8-10; cf. Deut 5:26; Josh 3:10; 1 Sam 17:26, 36; 2 Kings 19:4, 16; Ps 42:2; 84:2; Is 40:18-20; 41:21-24; 44:9-20, 24; 45:16-22; 46:5-7; Jer 23:36). This God is the everlasting God, the first and the last.

The emphases on God as the unique creator, the living and eternal one, are taken over and developed in the literature of Second Temple Judaism to distinguish God from all other gods or would-be gods (see 2 Macc 1:24; Bel 5, 6, 24, 25; Sir 18:1; 4Q504 1-2 V, 9; Josephus, J.W. 2.131; Ant. 8.280; Ag. Ap. 2.190-192). Jewish authors acquainted with the Greek philosophical traditions spoke of God in biblical terms as creator and maker, but they employed the philosophical traditions also to stress that the God of Israel was indeed the source of all life (Philo, Spec. 2.30; Somn. 1.76; Mut. 29; Decal. 61) and the "cause of all things" (Philo, Somn. 1.67). This God, who is neither part of the created order nor coextensive with it, is responsible for its very existence, including the existence of all living things. Such emphases were particularly necessary in the polytheistic or pluralistic contexts in which the Jewish people found themselves in the first centuries before and after the turn of the era.

The absence in the Gospels of an apologetic for God as the living creator indicates that this aspect of God's identity was uncontested in Jesus' immediate context. Instead, God's identity as the living one and creator of all that is not only was assumed, but also became the basis for exhortations to trust in the God who made and provides for the world, whose purposes are demonstrated in and through creation, who will give life to the dead in the resurrection, and who gives life in the present through Jesus (Mt 5:45; 6:26-30; Mk 10:6; 12:26; 13:19; Lk 12:24-28; 20:37; Jn 1:1-3; 6:57).

2.1.3. Sovereign Ruler. Another distinctive characteristic of God, emphasized in the OT and inseparably related to the identity of God as creator, is the all-encompassing sovereignty of God that governs the movements of the heavens and earth, of the angelic hosts, and of empires, rulers and peoples (see Bauckham; Hurtado 1998; Thompson 2001). God's creation of the world further implies God's continued governance of it (see Is 44:6; 40:18, 23; 43:10, 11; 44:8, 45:4, 6, 14, 18, 21, 22; 46:9; 48:12). Indeed, God's "sovereignty is an everlasting sovereignty, and his kingdom endures from generation to generation" (Dan 4:34-35 [cf. Jer 27:5]).

Closely related to God's sovereignty and God's faithfulness is the understanding that God is righteous. God's sovereignty will be manifest in God's judgment of all the earth and its inhabitants, resulting in God's *justice and righteousness holding sway (Pss 93; 96; 99). Ultimately, the twin emphases on God as creator and sovereign come together in the eschatological hope for a new heaven and new earth, so that God's sovereignty brings his purposes for creation to fruition (Is 65:17; 66:22). Because God is righteous, one can expect *judgment on evil or wickedness (or, more precisely, on the wicked) even if present circumstances made it difficult to see that God's just purposes were being carried out (Job; Lam 3:1-19). Once again, the character and the action of God provide the basis for the conduct of God's people. Because God is faithful, righteous and just, God's people are to be faithful to each other, demonstrating justice, integrity and righteousness in all their dealings with each other (of the numerous biblical references that demand human righteousness and integrity, see Gen 18:19; 1 Sam 26:23; 2 Sam 22:21; 1 Kings 3:6; 8:32; 10:9; Prov 8:20; 10:2; 11:4-6, 18-19; 12:28; 13:6).

Jewish tradition shares and sometimes elaborates the biblical emphases on God's sovereignty, particularly in light of the continued subjugation of God's people to pagan powers. Because of their convictions in God's justice, Jewish authors struggled to understand the destruction of *Jerusalem and its temple in A.D. 70, ultimately attributing both Rome's supremacy and Jerusalem's destruction to God's providence (pronoia) and sovereign purposes (Josephus, J.W. 2.390; 6.250, 267-268; cf. Ant. 4.47). Authors of apocalyptic treatises such as 2 Baruch and 4 Ezra, who attributed the fall of Jerusalem to God's punishment of the *sin of Israel, also envisioned the ultimate fall of *Rome as punishment for its iniquity (4 Ezra 11-12; 2 Bar. 39-40). God's righteousness would ultimately prevail.

In the Gospels God's sovereignty comes to primary expression in Jesus' proclamation of the kingdom of God, envisioning both God's gracious rule in the present and the ultimate concrete realization of the purposes of God for his people and for the world. Jesus' instruction to his disciples to pray, "Your kingdom come, your will be done" (Mt 6:10), envisions both the present and future embodiment of God's will among his people (Mt 6:10; 26:42; Mk 14:36). The Gospels also point to God's sovereign freedom in bringing his purposes about in ways that may remain inscrutable to human beings or outside normal human standards of judgment (see Mt 11:25-27; 20:1-16; Lk 10:21; also the quotation of Is 6:9-10 in Mt 13:13-15; Mk 4:10-12; Lk 8:10; Jn 12:40).

2.1.4. Merciful, Compassionate, Faithful. Above all, God was understood to be "merciful and gracious, slow to anger, and abounding in steadfast love and faithfulness" (Ex 34:6 [cf. Num 14:18; Neh 9:17; Ps 86:15, 103:8, 145:8; Joel 2:13; Jon 4:2; Nah 1:3]). One particular form that God's compassion takes is the forgiveness of sins (Ps 103:12). As numerous additional references in Scripture show, God was faithful to his people, covenant and promises (Gen 24:27; 32:10; Deut 32:4; Ps 25:10; 30:9; 36:5; 40:10-11; 54:5 [and often elsewhere throughout Psalms]; Jer 31:3; Lam 3:23; Mic 7:20; Zech 8:8). God's provision and care for his people could be summarized in the designation of God as a Father who provides for (Deut 32:4-6; Jer 3:18-19; 31:9) and as a mother who comforts her children (Is 49:15; 66:13).

Not surprisingly, the scriptural characteristics of God noted here continued to play a large role in depictions of God in Jewish literature and thought. Of particular interest is the development of the "doctrine" of the two attributes, or measures (middot), of God, which becomes more fully developed in rabbinic thought. So, for example, in Mekilta 3:74-77 God is said to have dealt with Moses according to "the attribute of mercy," but with his fathers according to "the attribute of justice." In fact, the two "names" of God—"Yahweh" and "Elohim"—were understood to refer respectively to God as merciful and God as just (Mek. 4:96-101; elsewhere, rabbinic writings speak of the "attribute of punishment" and the "attribute of goodness"). Both traits, mercy and justice, are reflected throughout the Gospels.

In the Gospels God's provision and goodness become the basis for the exhortation to trust in this one who provides, who sends rain and sunshine (Mt 5:45), who clothes the birds of the air and the grass of the field (Mt 6:26-30; Lk 12:24-28), and knows when a sparrow falls (Mt 10:29-31; Lk 12:6-7). In the Gospels the various "parables of harvest, or of the separation of the good from the bad, are parables about final judgment (Mt 13:24-30, 47-50; 25:31-46). God's surprising verdict, however, often was expressed as mercy, as demonstrated in the generosity shown to those who scarcely labored in the vineyard (Mt 20:1-15), or in the gracious treatment of a thoughtless younger son (Lk 15:11-32), or in the justification of a tax collector who pleaded for mercy from God (Lk 18:13). Indeed, the Gospels often illustrate implicitly what James will later make explicit: "Mercy triumphs over judgment" (Jas 2:13). In the Gospel of John God's love for the world underlines the entire ministry of Jesus (Jn 3:16-17). If mercy and justice were thought to be at odds or in conflict with each other, then the biblical witness, confirmed and sharpened in the Gospels, is that God's mercy and love are the final word spoken to the world.

2.2. The Context of the Greco-Roman World. The OT and Jewish affirmations about God shape the content of the Gospels because Jesus was a first-century Jew, and the Gospels provide, above all, interpretive accounts of his ministry and teaching. Hence, the substance of the Gospels' portrait of God manifests, explicitly and implicitly, the fundamental convictions about God found in the Scriptures of Israel. But many of the first readers of the Gospels likely dwelt beyond the boundaries of the geographical areas in which Jesus lived and taught, and beyond the boundaries even of Diaspora Judaism. These readers brought substantially different beliefs and practices to their reading of the Gospels. For early Gentile believers, becoming a disciple of Jesus required a conversion to exclusive worship of the God of Israel, leaving behind the variety of practices, cultic and otherwise, that were such a large part of the ethnic and political identity of citizens and inhabitants of the early Roman Empire (see Gods, Greek and Roman).

It is not easy to depict the views of the deities and the divine in the ancient world in short compass. The pagan world was marked by religious pluralism. Ancient religion was not exclusive. It allowed a diversity of cultic worship and practices at various temples and shrines, directed to various deities. Religion was both private and public, involving festivals, games and processions, as well as sacrifice, prayer and the offering of votives (dedications set up for favors rendered, especially for healing) at the numerous shrines and temples to ancient deities. The gods could be besought for healing (Asclepius) or knowledge of the future (the oracle of Apollo at Delphi). Cultic practices were often localized precisely because they were tied to a specific shrine in a particular locale, but these cults could be transported to other locales with the worshipers. Mystery cults promised initiates a vision of the divine in secret rites and joined them to the service of a cult deity forever (e.g., Apuleius, Metamorphoses). At different times and places in the first century, and especially in eastern parts of the empire, imperial cult flourished (Price).

But the world of the ancient Roman empire also evinces philosophical views that are considerably less anthropomorphic than the descriptions of the gods found in Homer and the Greek myths. Stoicism, for example, emphatically denied that the Homeric depiction of the gods reflected divinity as it really was. The gods or God are good, benevolent, unchangeable and immortal, and not the capricious and sometimes malevolent superhuman beings whom we encounter in popular Greek religion. Stoicism furthermore cultivated a kind of monotheism or unity of the divine realm, but one that might, nevertheless, appear to a modern reader as simultaneously pantheistic and polytheistic (given the fact that the Stoics speak alternately of “God” and “the gods”). When read in such contexts, the Gospels serve not only to present Jesus to their readers, but to socialize their readers into a world view that entails a sole deity whose purposes govern the world and bear on all humankind and who is alone to be worshiped. The Gospels are thus not only narratives of the public ministry, life and death of Jesus of Nazareth, but call for exclusive allegiance to this God made known in the Scriptures of Israel.

3. God in the Four Gospels.

The Gospels have a great deal in common with each other in their explicit and implicit statements about and portrayals of God. That state of affairs is not particularly surprising, given the constancy in the portrayal of God’s identity, character, activity and attributes in the Scriptures, upon which all of the Gospels and the traditions reflected in them rely so heavily. Furthermore, the literature of Second Temple Judaism had tended to draw on and emphasize certain aspects of the biblical characterization of God, including God as unique, living and eternal, creator and sovereign, righteous and just, merciful and forgiving, who would bring his purposes for the salvation of Israel and the world to fruition. In what follows we will examine each of the Gospels individually, noting the distinctive features of the terminology used for God in each Gospel, along with the characterization of God’s identity, attributes, actions and demands as these come to expression within the narrative of each Gospel. To a large extent, the differences among the Gospels in their depictions of God are lodged in the emphases and differences in the varying narratives of the life and ministry of Jesus.

3.1. Matthew. The Gospel of Matthew presents God as the God of Israel, whose mission to gather together his people Israel overflows into the eventual inclusion of the Gentiles. From beginning to end, the ministry of Jesus demonstrates that God is with his people (Mt 1:23) and with the world (Mt 28:19), caring for them as a father cares for his children, offering mercy and forgiveness, and expecting that the behavior of the children of God will reflect God’s very character.

Matthew uses theos for God forty-six times, a number somewhat lower than the other Gospels because Matthew almost always uses the circumlocution “kingdom of heaven” instead of “kingdom of God.” This God is the Lord (Mt 4:7, 10), ruler (Mt 5:34), God of Israel (Mt 15:31) and of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob (Mt 22:32), living (Mt 16:16), and powerful (Mt 22:29; 26:64). Matthew also often uses “Father” for God, showing a definite preference for possessive formulations, and depicts Jesus using “my Father” and “your Father” with reference to his disciples about fifteen times each. Alone among the Gospels, Matthew also regularly uses “Father in heaven” (14x), as well as “heavenly Father” (6x [cf. Lk 11:13]). Matthew’s frequent personal references to “your Father” or “your heavenly Father” underscore the identity of God as a father and his character as one who knows and provides for the needs of his children.

The first appearance of the word “God” in the Gospel of Matthew is found in the interpretation of the name “Emmanuel” as “God is with us” (Mt 1:23; cf. Is 7:14; 8:8). But God has already been active, even if behind the scenes, in the events assumed by this Gospel: God’s angel communicates the will of God to Joseph (Mt 1:20; cf. Mt 2:13, 19), and God’s Spirit works to bring about the *birth of Jesus (Mt 1:18, 21). Matthew’s Gospel opens with the promise that the birth of Jesus signals that “God is with us” (Mt 1:23), recalling God’s promise to Israel, and it closes with the promise that the risen Jesus, who has received all authority from God, will be with his people who go into all the world, “even to the close of the age” (Mt 28:20). God is identified as one who is present with the people of Israel, but also with and in the world, and this movement from Israel to the world happens as a result of and through the ministry of Jesus.

Thus, the promise of the risen Jesus to be present with his people “to the close of the age” forms an inclusio with the promise that Jesus’ identity as “Emmanuel” signals that “God is with us.” Overarching the entire Gospel, then, is the promise of the presence of God and of the risen Lord, who is present “wherever two or three are gathered” in his name (Mt 18:20). But the final words of Matthew's Gospel also contain a commission: go into "all the world" and make disciples of "all nations," a command that Jesus can give because he has received "all authority" in heaven and on earth, presumably and implicitly from God (Mt 28:19; cf. Mt 11:27). In the NT generally, and in Matthew specifically, "all things" (panta) typically summarizes the scope of God's own power and authority (e.g., Mt 19:26, 28; Jn 1:3; 3:35; Acts 17:25; Rom 11:36; 1 Cor 15:27-28; Eph 1:10). The risen Jesus has been given not just a share of God's authority, but "all authority." God wills to be identified with the person and ministry of Jesus, thus binding the recognition of God, and even his identity, inseparably to recognition of Jesus.

Concomitantly with commissioning his disciples to go into all the world, the risen Lord commands that they baptize "in the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit." This climactic commission pulls the threads of Matthew's Gospel together. Jesus, the one whose birth signals that "God is with us," had been conceived by the Spirit (Mt 1:18-23); when he was baptized, the Spirit of God descended upon him, and God declared him to be his beloved Son (Mt 3:16-17); sent by the Spirit into the wilderness, the Son of God is tested with respect to his fidelity to God (Mt 4:1-11); when the disciples are hated because of Jesus, the "Spirit of your Father" will speak through them to bear witness (Mt 10:19-22); God's Spirit is on Jesus so that he may "proclaim justice to the Gentiles" (Mt 12:18); and he casts out demons by the "Spirit of God" (Mt 12:28). God's Spirit so marks Jesus from beginning to end so as to bind the working of Father, Son and Spirit into one work: it is in the name of the Father, Son and Spirit that the disciples then go into the world to proclaim and bear witness to that work.

Turning to the beginning of Matthew, we see that Jesus, who is son of Abraham and son of David, is also presented as the Son of God (Mt 3:17) when the Spirit of God, active in his conception, descends upon him at his baptism. Even as Israel is loved by God, so this Son is designated as "the beloved." But the beloved Son is subsequently led by God's Spirit into the wilderness to be *tempted to turn from wholehearted trust in God (Mt 4:1-10). Jesus trusts in a God whom the Scriptures promise to be one who sustains and instructs his people (Mt 4:4), who is to be trusted (Mt 4:7), and who is worthy of exclusive worship (Mt 4:10). The God of Israel, known through the Scriptures that are spoken by God (cf. Mt 15:3-5; 22:31), who calls for Israel's exclusive worship, is the God whom Jesus trusts fully.

Throughout Matthew's Gospel Jesus will call his disciples to the same radical trust, obedience to God's will and ways, and single-hearted devotion and worship. The pure in heart, those with single-minded devotion to God, will see God (Mt 5:8). This righteous and holy God requires that people walk in the way of righteousness (Mt 5:6; 6:33; 21:32), as Jesus himself does (Mt 3:15), a righteousness that "exceeds" that of the *scribes and *Pharisees (Mt 5:20).

But the God who asks for everything is a loving Father who provides for his children. Early on in Matthew we learn that God is about the business of raising up *children (Mt 3:9) who live according to the will of the heavenly Father, and so are brothers and sisters of Jesus, the son of God (Mt 5:8; 12:48-50). In presenting God as Father and Jesus' disciples as God's children, Matthew presents the ministry of Jesus as the fulfillment of the hopes voiced in Scripture for God to lead his children out of *exile in Babylon, gathering them together, ransoming them from "hands too strong for him" (Jer 31:11) (Mt 1:11-12, 17; Jer 3:4, 18-19; 31:9-11). As a heavenly Father, God cares for his children, even as he does the grasses of the field and the birds of the air (Mt 6:25-32). For God is all-seeing (Mt 6:4, 6, 18; 10:29-30) and all-powerful (Mt 19:26), answering prayer (Mt 6:1-8), bringing the dead to life (Mt 22:29).

Matthew's Gospel repeatedly reflects the OT themes of the mercy and forgiveness of God (Mt 1:21; 26:28). Those who are merciful to others will receive mercy from God (Mt 5:7); those who forgive others will receive forgiveness (Mt 6:12, 14-15; 18:21-35). As the prophets of the OT proclaimed, God desires mercy more than sacrifice (Mt 9:13; 12:7, quoting Hos 6:6). In fact, God is surprisingly generous, dealing with people by means of mercy rather than judgment, and showering them with unmerited blessing. His people ought not then to begrudge his generosity, but instead to be similarly generous (Mt 20:15). This generous God makes the sun shine and the rain fall on the just and the unjust; in imitation of a generous and merciful God, God's people are to love not only their friends but also their enemies (Mt 5:43-45). In this way, they will be "perfect" as their heavenly Father is (Mt 5:48). They are to seek the kingdom of heaven above all else (Mt 6:33); to give to God all that belongs to God (Mt 22:21); to love God with all their heart, soul and mind (Mt 22:37). For no one can serve two masters (Mt 6:24), and God's people are to serve God alone. Matthew thus underscores the OT witness to the one God, showing how that one God is active through Israel and Israel's Messiah, Jesus, for the salvation of the whole world, and calling a people together who will love and worship that one God.

3.2. Mark. The Gospel of Mark highlights the mysterious character of God's ways, leading as they do to the crucifixion of the Son and Messiah of God on a Roman cross. Against human judgment, the way of the cross is the way of God. God's ways remain inscrutable, and his people struggle to comprehend how the Son of God, anointed by the Spirit, should meet his end on a cross. Nevertheless, it is precisely here that God demonstrates that he has torn open the heavens, come down in power, and acts to bring that power to bear in the lives of people for their healing and their redemption.

Mark's language for God is in many ways remarkably sparse. Forms of the Greek word theos appear forty-six times; kyrios, when used of God, seven times; and patēr, four times. Mark's few descriptive epithets and circumlocutions, identifying God as the powerful, unique, living God, who is specifically the God of Israel, are heavily dependent on the OT—for example, Most High God (Mk 5:7), the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob (Mk 12:26), God of the living (Mk 12:27), the Blessed One (Mk 14:61), Power (14:62). Again, drawing on the biblical witness, God is a God who forgives sins (Mk 2:7), created the world (Mk 10:6; 13:19) and unites husband and wife to be one flesh (Mk 10:6, 9). All things are possible for this powerful God (Mk 10:27; 12:24; 14:36), who alone is good (Mk 10:18), who is glorified (Mk 2:12), and is worthy of one's total allegiance (Mk 10:18, 12:17, 12:28-29).

Mark's Gospel contains quite a few statements, however, that have theos in the genitive (theou), modifying or characterizing another noun, including "Son," "gospel" (Mk 1:14), "kingdom" (frequently), "Holy One" (Mk 1:14), "house" (Mk 2:26), "will" (Mk 3:35), "commandment" (Mk 7:8-9), "word" (Mk 7:13) and "way" (Mk 12:14). The last four of these—will, commandment, word, way—fit with Mark's presentation of a God who alone has authority to command the ultimate allegiance of human beings, but whose ways are often mysterious, hidden from human beings, and hard to discern and follow.

From the beginning of Mark's Gospel, the person and ministry of Jesus are related to God. Jesus is presented as and declared to be the Son of God (Mk 1:1, 11), who proclaims the gospel of God (Mk 1:14), announcing that the kingdom of God has drawn near (Mk 1:15). In the citation of Israel's Scriptures, this Gospel makes it clear early on, even if implicitly, that "God" is the God of Israel (Mk 1:2, quoting Mal 3:1; Mk 1:3, quoting Is 40:3), a point underscored later with the quotation of the Shema of Deuteronomy 6:4 (Mk 12:29-30), calling Israel to honor and love the one God. Mark is the only book in the NT to cite this passage. The God whose kingdom and gospel Jesus proclaims is the one God of the OT witness.

God's power in Jesus is manifested immediately in the exorcism of spirits that Mark calls "unclean" (akathartos) (Mk 1:23, 26, 27; 3:11, 30; 5:2, 8, 13; 6:7; 7:25; 9:25 [some English translations render akathartos as "evil"]). In rebuking and casting out these unclean spirits, Jesus shows that the Holy Spirit of God drives out powerful forces hostile to God and God's people, extending the boundaries of God's holiness ever further into the world. God's holiness is now demonstrated not primarily in the observance of cultic regulations so as to protect the holiness of God's temple and people, but rather in the cleansing power of the Son of God that flows from him to others. Even as John baptized or cleansed with water, so Jesus baptizes, or purifies, with the Holy (sanctifying) Spirit of God.

But although God's power in Jesus drives out the unclean spirits as a sign of the coming kingdom, the full manifestation of that kingdom remains future. In the present the working of the kingdom remains mysteriously hidden, and it can be compared to a seed growing in secret or a tiny mustard seed. One day these seeds will yield a harvest, but in the present no one knows how they grow, and they are always in danger of death and destruction (Mk 4:1-11). In other words, even though God works powerfully through Jesus for the healing and purification of his people, there remains a hidden mystery to the ways of God in the world that calls for faith and trust.

Jesus entrusts himself to this powerful God, whose inscrutable and mysterious ways are not always comprehensible to human beings. Nowhere is this point illustrated more fully than in the fact that the path of God's Son and Messiah leads to the cross. Peter's resistance to Jesus' crucifixion demonstrates "human" thinking, which assumes that God's ways are marked by power and triumph. But "the things of God" (Mk 8:33) are plotted along a trajectory that leads to Jesus' crucifixion and to the call to his disciples to similarly deny themselves, take up their cross, and follow him (Mk 8:34). No wonder the ways of God are inscrutable.

Nor are they easy. In *Gethsemane, as Jesus prays prior to his arrest, he implores God to remove the cup of suffering and death that are his lot. Here, unique among the Gospels, Jesus entreats God as "Abba, Father." As noted earlier, Mark uses "Father" for God four times (Mk 8:38; 11:25; 13:32; 14:36), but this is the only passage in all the Gospels that contains the Aramaic term abba, translated for the reader as patēr, the common Greek word for “father.” The well-known prayer runs, “Abba, Father, for you all things are possible; remove this cup from me; yet, not what I want, but what you want.” The prayer underscores the supreme will and power of God. God has the power to deliver Jesus from death, but does not do so. God’s mysterious way includes Jesus’ drinking the cup of death.

In Mark’s Gospel Jesus dies with the words of Psalm 22:1 on his lips: “My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?” This so-called cry of dereliction cannot be read as God’s abandonment of Jesus, because here God’s ways and purposes are here being carried out. The whole of this Gospel has led up to this climactic moment, when “the Son of Man goes as it is written of him” (Mk 14:21). But even so, that cannot lessen the suffering of those, including Jesus himself, who find themselves walking impossibly difficult paths, even if mysteriously within God’s providence. Mark depicts Jesus crying out for deliverance in the agony of death, even as the psalmist cried out when in despair, and as the people of Israel cried out when Jerusalem was sacked and destroyed, and as the persecuted saints would continue to cry out in desperation to God. But the God who has sent his powerful Spirit upon his Son, to announce and embody the saving work of the kingdom of God, does not abandon Jesus to death. At the end of Mark’s Gospel Jesus is not in the tomb; rather, he calls his disciples to continue to follow him as the work of God’s kingdom continues.

3.3. Luke. The Gospel of Luke is, first of all, a narrative account of the ministry of Jesus, but it is also part of a two-volume work that shows how God’s mission to bring salvation to all persons was carried through during Jesus’ ministry and then after his death and resurrection. In Luke’s Gospel God’s gracious purposes are to bring salvation, peace, healing and wholeness to all those “inside” and “outside” the perceived boundaries of God’s people. There are powerful forces and figures opposed to God’s saving work, including demonic spirits, human governments and authorities, and even the religious leaders of the day. But God works both through and in spite of this opposition with his chosen messengers in order that his good purposes for Israel and all the world will be accomplished.

Although Luke-Acts typically is considered as a two-volume work, here we will focus primarily Luke’s Gospel, with some occasional glances at the way in which the narrative begun in Luke is carried out in Acts. Luke’s vocabulary for God is rich and varied. Typical of the Gospels and the NT, the most frequent designation for God is theos (Luke 122x, Acts 168x). God is further identified as the Most High (Lk 1:32, 35, 76; 6:35, 8:28; Acts 7:48, 16:17), Savior who delivers from one’s enemies (Lk 1:47), Mighty One (Lk 1:49), Lord (Lk 4:18), Lord God (Lk 1:32), Lord of heaven and earth (Lk 10:21), Israel’s God (Lk 1:16; 1:68) and thus “your God” (Lk 4:8, 12; 10:27). Luke also frequently uses kyrios (“Lord”) to speak of God (32x), but even more frequently “Lord” or “the Lord” (38x) to refer to Jesus (see Rowe 2006). With such terminology, Luke highlights the power and authority of God, and these characteristics mesh with the narrative portrayal of God as the one who directs the course of history in order to accomplish his gracious purposes. Several of the designations for God are applied or extended to Jesus: he is Savior (Lk 2:11) and even Lord of all (Lk 2:11; Acts 10:36) inasmuch as he is the one through whom God’s saving purposes are accomplished.

This God is the Father of Jesus and also of his disciples. Jesus refers to God as “my Father” (Lk 2:49; 10:22; 22:29; 24:49), “your Father” (Lk 6:36; 12:30) and “the Father” (Lk 9:26; 10:22; Acts 1:4, 7), a designation that Peter subsequently adopts in his Pentecost discourse (Acts 2:33; note also “the heavenly Father” in Lk 11:13). In direct address to God, Jesus uses the simple “Father” (Lk 10:21; 11:2; 22:42; 23:34, 46). No one else addresses God as “Father,” although Jesus does teach his disciples to address God in prayer in that way. In Luke’s Gospel Jesus speaks of God as “my Father” in contexts that underscore his own role of mediating or offering to the disciples what the Father has given to him (Lk 10:21–22; 11:13; 12:32; 22:29; 24:49; cf. Acts 1:4). Furthermore, God cares for, watches over, and is generous to those who are God’s “little flock” and the objects of the Father’s good pleasure (Lk 11:5–13; 12:32).

From its outset, Luke’s Gospel sets forth God’s gracious purposes (Lk 1:30, 68), favor (Lk 1:30, 1:68) and mercy (Lk 1:68, 72, 75, 77) to bring salvation for Israel and all people. In order to accomplish these purposes, certain things must happen (dei, “it is necessary” [Lk 4:43; 9:22; 12:12; 13:16, 33; 15:32; 17:25; 21:9; 22:7, 37; 24:7, 26, 44; also Acts 1:16, 21; 3:21]). God’s plan (boulē) must be accomplished (Lk 7:30; also Acts 2:23; 4:28; see also the forms of the cognate verb boulomai in Lk 10:22, 22:42, 23:51); God’s will (thelēma) will be done (Lk 12:47; 22:42). A variety of words with the prefix pro (“before”), found especially in Acts, signal that the things that happened in connection with the ministry of Jesus had been foretold (prolegō [Acts 1:16], prokatangellō [Acts 3:18; 7:52]), foreknown (prognōsis [Acts 2:23]), foreseen (prooraō [Acts 2:31], proorizō [Acts 4:28]) (Green; Squires).

Providence (pronoia [see Acts 24:2]), fate (heimarmenē) and fortune (tychē) were topics frequently treated in philosophical literature of Luke's day, often in discussions coordinated with human freedom. But for Luke, "necessity" has little to do with the inexorable unfolding of events according to a predetermined fate or fortune, and everything to do with the gracious will of God, who superintends history and accomplishes his purposes for the salvation of all flesh (Lk 1:77; 2:32, 3:8; Acts 15:14-17). God's purposes had been previously announced in the Scriptures and now are in the process of being realized in and through the ministry of Jesus (e.g., Lk 4:17-19) and events subsequent to his life (Acts 2:17-21). These purposes have not yet been fulfilled at the end of Luke's Gospel, with the resurrection of Jesus, or even with the end of Acts, with Paul's preaching the Gospel in Rome (Acts 28:31); they anticipate the continued spread of the "word of God" to all the world.

God oversees and guides the course of history and Jesus' ministry. Indeed, God makes his purposes known in various ways: he sends various messengers, including *angels from his presence (Lk 1:19, 26) and especially prophets (Lk 1:70; 6:23, 26; 10:24; 11:47, 49, 50; 13:28, 34; 16:1, 29, 31; 24:25, 27, 44). In fact, Luke frequently speaks of Scripture as "the law and the prophets" (Lk 16:16; Acts 13:15) or "Moses and the prophets" (Lk 16:29, 31; 24:27; 24:44 includes "and the psalms"), tying God's purposes not just to the Scriptures but also to these ancient worthies and the story of Israel. Particularly distinctive in Luke-Acts is the phrase "word of God" (Lk 3:2; 5:1, 8:11, 21; 11:28; cf. Lk 1:2, 38; 2:29; 8:13, 15; 22:61; 24:19), here used not for Scripture but rather for God's communication, and making his will known through Jesus and subsequently through the apostles he commissioned.

Because God makes his will known through his word, people are to "hear" and "hold fast" to the word of God, to "do" it, and to repent (Lk 8:21; 11:28, 31-32). *Repentance figures prominently in Luke's Gospel (Lk 2:38; 3:8; 5:32; 10:13; 11:32; 13:3, 5; 15:7, 10; 16:30; 17:3-4; 24:47) because God's will serves as the touchstone of human conduct. Still, God is generous with forgiveness (Lk 1:77; 5:20-24; 6:37; 7:47-49; 11:4; 17:3-4; 23:34; 24:47; also Acts 2:38; 5:31; 10:43; 13:38; 26:18) and rejoices over those sinners who repent (Lk 15:7, 10) and expects his people to do the same. Indeed, Jesus calls people to mirror God's mercy and generosity (Lk 6:35-36; 11:4), serving those who cannot repay (Lk 14:12-24), for the kingdom of God belongs to and includes such. The accomplishment of God's purposes elicit praise and *worship, *joy and gladness (Lk 1:64; 2:14, 20, 28, 38); God is to be glorified (Lk 5:25-26; 7:16); he has looked favorably on his people (Lk 7:16), and indeed all are astounded at the greatness of God (Lk 9:43). Jesus exhorts people to love God (Lk 10:27) and upbraids those who do not (Lk 11:42). Here is a portrait of a generous, merciful, forgiving God, who calls people to repent of their sin and turn to the ways of God and manifest a similar generous mercy. To do otherwise is to fall out of step with God's purposes.

But while Luke stresses the point that God's purposes, as foreshadowed in the Scriptures and announced by the prophets, surely will be accomplished, he also makes it plain that God's ways are not unopposed, a point that is joined with the work of the Spirit of God. Mary's song of praise, the Magnificat (Lk 1:46-55), celebrates God's act of salvation, through Jesus, conceived by Spirit (Lk 1:35), an act that will manifest itself not only in the exaltation of the lowly but also in the overthrow of the proud and mighty. Some are filled, but some are sent away empty (Lk 1:53). God's Holy Spirit works not only in the conception of Jesus, but also to inspire the prophetic utterance of Simeon (Lk 2:25-27), who announces to Mary that her son is "destined [keimai] for the rising and falling of many" and to "be opposed" (Lk 2:34). The Spirit designates Jesus as God's beloved Son (Lk 3:22), who is then led into temptation to abandon the ways of God; the Spirit empowers Jesus' proclamation (Lk 4:1-14, 18), but the word of God is rejected or ignored (Lk 8:13). The Spirit of God in and on Jesus is opposed by other spirits (Lk 4:33; 8:29; 9:39), and eventually the Spirit-anointed Son will suffer and be killed (Lk 9:22; 24:7). None of this is outside God's plan as written in the Scriptures (Lk 24:25, 27). God Most High, the Lord of heaven and earth, does not accomplish his purposes by force. God wills peace for the earth (Lk 1:79; 2:11, 29; 7:50; 8:48; 10:5-6; 19:38, 42; 24:36), but God's ways to peace are not unopposed (Lk 12:51).

3.4. John. The God of the Gospel of John is the God who made the world and who gives life to it and all that is in it. This is the God of Abraham, of Jacob (Israel), of Moses. Hence, this God is not unknown. And yet this Gospel continually presses the question of how God is known and, specifically, how the life, deeds, words, and death and resurrection of Jesus testify to this God. Since John's Gospel claims that God is now known through Jesus, and that without the revelation of God in Jesus there is no true knowledge of God, the account of Jesus' life serves as a lens through which God must be seen in order to be comprehended fully. Above all, God is revealed to be the God who, out of his love for the world, gives life to all the world by means of the life-giving work of the Word (see Logos), incarnate as Jesus from Nazareth.

The predominant characterization of God in the Gospel of John is that of Father; more specifically, God is the Father of Jesus, the Son. John uses "Father" about 120 times, more often than all the other Gospels combined. By comparison, "God" (theos) appears in John 108 times. But the pattern of the references is even more revealing of the significance of "Father" in John. God is specifically depicted as the Father of the only (monogenēs, "unique") Son, Jesus (Jn 1:14, 18). Jesus is furthermore called huios ("son") rather than teknon ("child"), the term used more generally for the "children of God." Subsequent references to God as Father occur in this Gospel almost exclusively in the words of Jesus, who refers to God as "my Father," or as "the Father," and most distinctively as "the Father who sent me." A few references to God as Father are found in editorial comments, where again Jesus' unique sonship is in view. For example, in John 5:18 the author states that Jesus was charged with calling "God his own Father, making himself equal with God" (see also Jn 8:27). John also exemplifies the pattern, found in the other Gospels as well, in which it is only Jesus who addresses God as "Father." There are but one or two exceptions to this pattern. In John 8 "the Jews" argue that they have God as Father (Jn 8:41), but this is a claim that Jesus disputes (Jn 8:42). Jesus' address to God as Father remains distinctive and evokes opposition in the Gospel from those who deny Jesus' claim to have such a distinctive relationship to God.

This God is "the living Father" (Jn 6:57), a recasting of the common biblical phrase "the living God" (Deut 5:26; Josh 3:10; 1 Sam 17:26, 36; 2 Kings 19:4; Ps 84:2; Is 37:4, 17; Jer 10:10; Dan 6:20, 26; Hos 1:10 [in the NT see Mt 16:16; 26:63; Acts 14:15; 2 Cor 3:3; 6:16; 1 Thess 1:9; Heb 3:12; 9:14; 10:31; 12:22; Rev 7:2]). This God is characterized or described as true (Jn 3:33), spirit (Jn 4:24) and "only" (Jn 5:44). Otherwise, there is a striking lack of epithets, adjectives and other sorts of descriptions about God (e.g., as God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, Most High, Almighty, heavenly). But John's description of God as "the living Father" and "Father" brings together two aspects of this Gospel's characterization of God that are crucial for understanding the narrative of Jesus: not only is the one God the Father of the Son, but also this God is the God of life, the living one, the creator by whose act all things came into being through the Word (Jn 1:1-13). This presentation of God underscores this Gospel's depiction of Jesus as the one through whom life is given to all the world. The God who gave the world its life in the beginning continues to give it life through the Son.

Although not appearing as a character in the narrative, the Father nevertheless remains active. With few exceptions, the Father acts through and with respect to the Son. Thus, we read that the Father seeks true worshipers (Jn 4:23); works (Jn 5:17, 19-20); loves the Son (Jn 5:20; 10:17; 15:9; 17:23, 26); shows the Son what he is doing (Jn 5:20); raises the dead and gives life (Jn 5:21); gives authority to the Son to have life (Jn 5:26) and executes judgment (Jn 5:27); gives his works to the Son to accomplish (Jn 5:36); sent the Son (Jn 5:37, 38; 6:29, 39, 57; 8:16, 18, 26; 11:42); testifies to Jesus (Jn 5:37; 8:18); set his seal on the Son of Man (Jn 6:27); gives true bread from heaven (Jn 6:32); gives "all" to the Son (Jn 6:37; 13:3; 17:2, 7); "draws" people to Jesus and teaches them (Jn 6:44-45, 65); judges (Jn 8:16); instructs Jesus (Jn 8:28); is with Jesus (Jn 8:29); seeks Jesus' glory (Jn 8:50, 54); knows the Son (Jn 10:15); consecrated the Son (Jn 10:36); hears the Son (Jn 11:41); honors those who serve Jesus (Jn 12:26); glorifies his own name (Jn 12:28); will come and "make his home" with believers (Jn 14:23); will send the Holy Spirit (Jn 14:26); prunes the vine (Jn 15:2); loves the disciples (Jn 16:27; 17:23); glorifies Jesus (Jn 17:1, 24); "keeps" what has been given to the Son (Jn 17:11, 15); sanctifies believers in the truth (Jn 17:17). God is continually acting and active.

And because the action and initiative of God are directed to and through the Son, God is made known through the person and work of Jesus, in his words and signs that bring sustenance, healing and life (Jn 1:18). Although Jesus is the "incarnation of the Word of God, God rarely speaks in John's Gospel. Once a "voice from heaven" (i.e., God) promises that God has and will glorify his name. Typical of John, bystanders do not understand the voice, let alone hear it as the voice of God himself (Jn 12:28-29). Although God speaks and acts, such revelatory activity on the part of God does not necessarily ensure that the revelation will be perceived, in part because God's manifestation is veiled in flesh and in part because human beings need the instruction of the Spirit in order to understand "all truth," including the truth about the incarnation and about God.

John's Gospel places a high premium on seeing, but it also emphatically denies that God has ever been seen by mortals (Jn 1:18; 5:37; 6:46). The only one who has ever seen God is the Son; therefore, the Son can make him known (Jn 1:18; 6:46). When Philip demands, "Show us the Father" (Jn 14:8), Jesus' reply, "Whoever has seen me [the Son] has seen the Father," does not simply equate the Son with the Father, but rather presents the Son as the genuine embodiment of God's revelatory word and as the one who can truly manifest God in the world. The vision of God desired by Philip and others cannot be separated from perception of Jesus as the one who makes God known.

One of the striking features of John's Gospel is the characterization of the preincarnate Word (Jn 1:1) and the risen Jesus (Jn 20:18) as theos ("god"). Additionally, the designation kyrios ("Lord"), the LXX's rendering of yhwh, applies in John exclusively to Jesus (except Jn 12:38, in an OT quotation). The significance of these designations must still be determined in light of John's references to "the one who alone is God" (Jn 5:44) or "the one true God" (Jn 17:3). The predicate theos does not simply equate the Word or the risen Jesus with the God of Israel or identify Jesus as that God. Nor does calling Jesus "Lord" deny the ultimate sovereignty of God. To use Johannine terms, the Son (the Word) is not the Father (God). God is known in and through Jesus, but not simply as Jesus; God's power and prerogatives, especially to give life, are conferred upon and exercised by Jesus. The identification of the Word as God and the acclamation of the risen Jesus as "my Lord and my God" do require the reshaping of one's convictions about God so that this Word is included within that divine identity (Bauckham; Hurtado 1998). That is to say, in Johannine thought one cannot know, honor or believe in God without also knowing, honoring and believing in Jesus, since he is the incarnate Word (logos) of God, who makes God known and who mediates God's life to the world.

4. Jesus and God.

One of the perennial questions regarding the identity of God has to do with the relationship of Jesus to God, particularly when that is considered in light of the church's ecumenical creeds and their christological and trinitarian formulations. The Gospels were written and read in ecclesiastical contexts where Jesus was confessed as the risen Lord (Rom 10:9; 1 Cor 12:3; 2 Cor 4:5; see also Acts 2:36; 10:36; Rom 14:11; Phil 2:11; and note the regular NT references to "the Lord Jesus," "Jesus our Lord," the "Lord Jesus Christ" and numerous other variations). That is to say, the context of the Gospels includes not only the OT, Jewish development of it, and the Greco-

Roman world, but also early Christian confessions about Jesus and the practices of rendering him devotion and homage of the kind that the Scriptures demand be rendered to the Lord God alone. This context has shaped the Gospels and shapes the readers of them. Thus, the Gospels bear witness to Jesus' status as Lord in their virtually fixed identification of him as "Lord" or "the Lord."

Since throughout the Gospels "God" refers almost exclusively to the one God of Israel, however the relationship of Jesus to God is construed, that construal must always take account of the insistence on the unity and singularity of God in the OT and Jewish thought. In recent discussion of the patterns of thought and devotion that characterized earliest Christianity, scholars have spoken of the "dyadic pattern" of devotion (Hurtado 1998) and of the inclusion of Jesus in the divine identity of the God of Israel (Bauckham). The earliest believers in Jesus were not ditheists, believing in two gods; they are more deeply shaped by scriptural and Jewish convictions than by the pagan polytheism of their contexts. Jesus is presented not as a God alongside the God of Israel, but rather as properly included in the divine identity of the God of Israel. The Gospel of John makes this clearest when it presents Jesus as the Word of God incarnate.

Because Jesus is conceived, identified, empowered, and known by the power of God's Spirit, the (christological) questions of Jesus' identity are inseparable from the (trinitarian) questions of the relationship of God the Father, Jesus the Son and the Holy Spirit of God. Various unsystematized tripartite affirmations and accounts in the Gospels, including but not limited to Jesus' virginal conception, his baptism and his miracle-working and exorcistic activity, press the question of how God, his Son Jesus and the Spirit are to be understood together. This material in the Gospels charts a trajectory toward later theological formulations without describing Jesus or the relationship of Father, Son and Spirit in terms that are simply identical with those of later formulations. Nevertheless, the formulations in the Gospels and the characterizations of Jesus in the Gospels are among the NT data that put pressure on the early church to think closely about the identity of Jesus, leading ultimately to its ecumenical creedal confessions.

See also GODS, GREEK AND ROMAN; HOLY SPIRIT; INCARNATION; SON OF GOD; WORSHIP.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. Barr, "Abba' Isn't 'Daddy,'" JTS 39 (1988) 28-47; J. M. Bassler, "God in the NT," ABD 2:1049-55; R. Bauckham, Jesus and the God of Israel: God Crucified and Other Studies on the New

Testament's Christology of Divine Identity (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2008); D. Chen, God as Father in Luke-Acts (SBL 92; Frankfurt: Peter Lang, 2006); F. W. Danker, Benefactor: Epigraphic Study of a Graeco-Roman and New Testament Semantic Field (St. Louis: Clayton, 1982); A. A. Das and F. J. Matera, eds. The Forgotten God: Perspectives in Biblical Theology (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2002); R. Feldmeier and H. Spieckermann, God of the Living: A Biblical Theology, trans. M. E. Biddle (Waco, TX: Baylor University Press, 2011); J. B. Green, The Theology of the Gospel of Luke (NTT; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1995); L. W. Hurtado, "God," DJG 270-76; idem, One God, One Lord: Early Christian Devotion and Ancient Jewish Monotheism (2nd ed.; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1998); idem, God in New Testament Theology (LBT; Nashville: Abingdon, 2010); J. Jeremias, The Prayers of Jesus (SBT 6; London: SCM, 1967); E. Krentz, "God in the New Testament," in Our Naming of God: Problems and Prospects of God-Talk Today, ed. C. E. Braaten (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1989) 75-90; P. W. Meyer, "The Father: The Presentation of God in the Fourth Gospel," in Exploring the Gospel of John: In Honor of D. Moody Smith, ed. R. A. Culpepper and C. C. Black (Louisville: Westminster John Knox 1996) 255-73; S. R. F. Price, "Gods and Emperors: The Greek Language of the Roman Imperial Cult," JHS 104 (1984) 79-95; C. K. Rowe, Early Narrative Christology: The Lord in the Gospel of Luke (BZNW 139; Berlin: de Gruyter, 2006); idem, World Upside Down: Reading Acts in the Graeco-Roman Age (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2009); J. T. Squires, The Plan of God in Luke-Acts (SNTSMS 76; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993); M. M. Thompson, The Promise of the Father: Jesus and God in the New Testament (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2000); idem, The God of the Gospel of John (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2001). M. M. Thompson

GODS, GREEK AND ROMAN

There has been a recent resurgence of interest in the function of Jesus in the religion of early Christians, dealing with crucial issues that have been largely ignored since W. Bousset's Kyrios Christos (1913 [ET 1970]) and the religionsgeschichtliche Schule. This German Protestant movement (c. 1880-1930) sought to understand the religion of both the OT and the NT within the context of other religions (see Klauck 2003, 2-7). Talk of late has been that a "new history-of-religions school" has been established (see Fossum 1991)—that is, an international "group of contemporaries with a shared interest in historical investigation of early devotion to Jesus in the context of the Roman-era religious environment, and a shared conviction that the Jewish religious matrix of the Christian movement is more crucial than was recognized in the older religionsgeschichtliche Schule" (Hurtado 2003, 12).

In reality, this new so-called school represents a forceful reaction against the influential views of Bousset, who famously argued that the Christ cult, or the worship of Jesus as divine, first emerged in early "Hellenistic Gentile" circles. In this pagan, polytheistic environment, particularly the Hellenistic communities in Antioch, Damascus and Tarsus, worship of various deities as kyrioi was already well known, as indeed it was throughout Asia Minor, Egypt and Syria. Such a setting could have provided the crucial atmosphere, model and influence for the early Christian practice (Bousset, 119-52). In contrast, L. W. Hurtado, one of the main proponents of the new approach, seeks to demonstrate that worship of Jesus as one with God emerged and flourished in the earliest church and in the context of dedicated Jewish Christian monotheism, not in a syncretistic Gentile Christianity that had broken with it (Hurtado 2003; 2005). For Hurtado, the earliest Jewish Christians were already thinking of and worshiping Christ in binitarian terms (a belief in a Godhead of two persons), a development that was a unique "mutation" of Jewish monotheism. A more nuanced version of this argument has emerged lately by J. J. Collins and A. Y. Collins, who argue that "ideas about Jesus as preexistent and divine originated in a Jewish context, in the conviction that he was the messiah, although they were subsequently transformed as Christianity spread in the Gentile world" (Collins and Collins, xiv).

In our present context, many of the Greco-Roman parallels that the religionsgeschichtliche Schule attempted to apply to the Jesus tradition are no longer considered valid, and the emphasis on the Jewish roots of the NT in general and of Jesus in particular has rightly gained ascendancy in more recent time, especially since the discovery of the *Dead Sea Scrolls. It would seem, then, that the time is ripe for a reconsideration of the wider Greco-Roman context of the Jesus tradition. A first reason is that it is widely acknowledged that Judaism itself was to one degree or another Hellenized by the first century A.D., even in its Palestinian forms (see Hengel 1974, a classic study). Second, it may be impossible to disentangle the Jewish origins of the idea of Jesus' divinity from their later development and transformation in the world of Gentile Christianity (for a similar argument relating to the historical Jesus and later Christian reflections on Jesus, see Allison). Moreover, as J. Z. Smith has demonstrated, scholars who exclusively emphasize the OT and Jewish background of the NT often harbor tacit assumptions about the pure roots of Christian belief and are unaware of the latent conflicts of ages past that affect and guide their biases.

1. Methodological Considerations
2. Jesus and Dionysus

1. Methodological Considerations.

As we turn now to comparisons between the presentation of Jesus in the Gospels and the deities of the Greco-Roman world, particularly between Jesus and Dionysus, several methodological considerations should be borne in mind.

First, we are not necessarily looking for the “origins” of the image of Jesus in the Gospels. In fact, with respect to history-of-religions parallels (i.e., those outside of the OT and early Judaism), it probably is best to avoid arguments for dependence of one religion on another. A. Evans provides a good example of this kind of genealogical argument, which was characteristic of the original religionsgeschichtliche Schule but now should be eschewed: “The concept of Dionysus as developed in ancient Greek religion and particularly in Euripides’ Bakkhai was destined to play a major role in the formulation of the myths that turned the historical Jesus of Nazareth into a god” (A. Evans, 145). Rather, J. Z. Smith proposes that biblical religions be compared to other religions analogically, wherein the aim is not to find direct relationships. The comparative process serves to highlight similarities and differences. The connections rest in the mind of the interpreter and help the interpreter understand how things might be reimaged or redescribed. The comparison takes place around a particular set of options specified by the interpreter. This approach does not preclude the borrowing of aspects from one religion by another. However, rather than simply explain origins, Smith proposes that the juxtaposition of various facets of two religions leads to greater insight and awareness of each. Nevertheless, it must be emphasized that these comparisons are not merely in the minds of the interpreter. At the very least, the Jesus tradition will have been heard in the context not only of the Judaism of the time but also of the Greco-Roman world in which the authors and their readers lived and breathed and had their being (see further below).

Second, in making comparisons, the interpreter needs to respect the ancient and modern horizons. Hindsight and global perspective are a constant hindrance to the proper understanding of ancient materials; they are a form of “contamination” of our sources that we need to work hard to avoid. For instance, ancient understanding of the Greco-Roman wine-god Dionysus, who is a special focus of the present article, must be shielded from the prevailing modern (mis)conceptions of the god (see Henrichs 1984; 1993).

There is also the possibility of contamination from (later) Christian doctrines (such contamination often is alleged in studies on Dionysus because of his many similarities to Christian ideas [see, e.g., Edmonds]). For instance, in the preface to his important book Rituals and Power: The Roman Imperial Cult in Asia Minor, S. R. F. Price relates, “Growing up in an Anglican cathedral house I naturally acquired an interest in the significance of establishment religion. So, when I finished my first degree in classics and began my research, I chose to study the official cult of the Roman emperor, a subject normally dismissed as mere politics with no religious meaning” (Price 1984b, xi). With the ontological relationship between the members of the triune Godhead as his default starting point, it is perhaps not surprising, then, that Price’s study would be criticized for dealing with the subject of the “divinity” of the Roman emperor in terms of the ontological relationship between the Caesar and the traditional gods (see Witulski, 32–36; S. J. Friesen writes, “The cults of the emperors were not a question of divine ontology. Rather, they were a sign that the emperors functioned like gods in the organization of social life. . . . If we ask whether imperial cults envisioned a divine or human emperor, we have already framed the question inappropriately. Questions of ontological status were not unknown in the Roman world, but they were relatively unimportant in imperial cultic contexts. The crucial issue was the role of imperial authority in creating the kind of society which pleased the gods” [Friesen, 152]).

Another example of contamination from Christian doctrine comes from the supposed parallels between Dionysus and Jesus in reference to so-called sacraments. As D. Obbink explains, according to a well-known theory, not only orgiastic sacrifice, but also ritual wine drinking in honor of Dionysus, was sacramental in character. Under this theory, Dionysiac sacrifice is viewed as communion, with humans sharing in the vital force of the consumed animal, or in the case of libation and wine drinking, in the “blood” of the grape. In parallel with the bread that Jesus broke and identified with his body (Mk 14:22 par.), Dionysiac sacrifice included sparagmos (the rending of a live sacrificial victim) and omophagy (the ritual eating of raw flesh), which E. R. Dodd considered the culmination of the ritual and a kind of Christian communion: the worshipers devoured their own god. Obbink argues, however, that there is little evidence that theophagy was ever associated with the Dionysiac omophagy (on the whole issue, see further Henrichs 1993, 28–29).

If classicists and historians of religion have difficulty in setting aside Christian presuppositions in dealing with their purely non-Christian subject matter, how much more NT scholars will struggle to avoid anachronistically importing unwarranted assumptions into their texts, especially as they then seek to compare those texts with Greco-Roman parallels (see, e.g., Klauck 1986 on comparisons of the Lord's Supper tradition [1 Cor 10–11; Mk 14:22–25 par.] with Hellenistic materials). It can all become quite a vicious circle if one is not extremely careful to respect the separate contexts and the more limited horizons of the texts involved on both fronts.

Third, if, as argued above, the Gospels will have been heard in the context of the broader Greco-Roman world in which their authors and audiences lived, then the possibility of “double-coding” exists in our texts. “Double-coding” (a concept introduced into architectural theory in the 1980s by C. Jencks, referring to the combination of modern techniques with traditional building in order for architecture to communicate with the public and a concerned minority, usually other architects) allows the ancient author to communicate simultaneously with a mass, Greco-Roman audience through popular codes (esp. mythology) and an elite minority audience (e.g., Jewish Christians) through the incorporation of OT and Jewish traditions (similar double-coding is found already in Ptolemaic Egypt [see Stephens]).

In a society where mythology was the cultural currency, Greco-Roman mythology provided an all-encompassing frame of reference for everyday Roman experience. Roman emperors in particular regularly used mythological allusions in order to profile themselves to the broader public, and the Roman people were accustomed to seeing their rulers everywhere presented as figures of well-known myths (see, e.g., Champlin 2003, 84–111 on “the power of myth” used by Nero and other rulers in imperial Roman society). And whenever myths were used in this way, they were not expected to provide an exact fit with real life; a superficial appropriateness was deemed quite sufficient.

Against this backdrop of mythology as cultural currency, there is good reason to suspect that the Gospels portrayed Jesus in ways that would have appealed to their audiences’ propensity to see mythological allusions, even though the primary conduit of meaning in the text undoubtedly was OT and Jewish tradition. For example, in the opening titular sentence of the Gospel of Mark, there are several possible examples of this kind of double-coding. Already the word “gospel” (euangelion) in Mark 1:1 admits of two simultaneous backgrounds. On the one hand, the term primarily refers to the “good news” of the OT and Jewish hope of restoration that Jesus came to embody and preach about the “kingdom of God and the return from exile (cf. Is 52:1–12) (see Exile and Restoration); this was rather specialized knowledge that perhaps only the better-informed Jewish reader would have appreciated. At the same time, however, euangelion (albeit in the plural) is well-known as a technical term of the imperial cult, as seen by its use in the Priene calendar inscription, where it heralds the “good news” of the birth of Augustus Caesar as a universal benefactor and “savior” and as a “god” (see C. A. Evans). Hence, insofar as the Priene inscription refers to the reigning Caesar Augustus as theos within the context of the imperial cult (see Witulski, 31–32), attributing the “gospel” to Jesus Christ is tantamount to calling him theos, on par with the emperor. As G. N. Stanton rightly observes, “The imperial cult was not the source of early Christian use of the [euangel-] word group, but it was the background against which distinctively Christian usage was forged and first heard” (Stanton, 2). It was arguably the secondary reverberations of the term that helped to propel the gospel to a wider audience.

The term “son of God” (huios theou), assuming that it is original to the text, further underscores the case for double-coding in Mark 1:1. On the one hand, the term should be read here, as throughout the Gospel of Mark, primarily in light of OT and Jewish tradition, where it applies to the messiah of Israel (see Collins and Collins; Collins 2000). Again, this understanding requires the “elite” knowledge of the Jewish insider. At the same time, however, especially in the immediate context of euangelion, the term “son of God” would have been read by a Greco-Roman audience in light of its application to the Roman emperor (note, e.g., I. Olympia 53 [Elis, before A.D. 4]: “Since Emperor Caesar, son of God [theou huios], god Sebastos [theos Sebastos], has by his benefactions to all men outdone even the Olympian gods [tous Olympious theous] . . .”).

2. Jesus and Dionysus.

The rest of the present article focuses on comparing the portrait of Jesus in the Gospels with one particular Greco-Roman god, Dionysus. The approach here is similar to that taken by D. E. Aune, who discusses alleged comparisons between Christ and Heracles (Hercules), the epic hero who achieved apotheosis after death. Whereas Aune comes to a negative conclusion about the comparisons with Heracles ("There is no convincing evidence that Heracles imagery played any significant role in the formulation of legendary episodes about Jesus found in the canonical Gospels" [Aune, 19]), I find the comparisons between Dionysus and Jesus more compelling (on the frequent link between Dionysus and Heracles in Greco-Roman tradition, including that in Roman-era Galilee, see, Freyne 2004).

Aune starts with noting that by the middle of the second century A.D. Justin Martyr recognized the existence of formal parallels between the career of Jesus and a variety of Greek gods and heroes, including Heracles. The parallels include virginal conception, death, resurrection and ascension. Elsewhere Justin, apparently threatened by such parallels, defends the uniqueness of Christ by arguing that the similarities between Heracles and Christ were the result of imitation: "And when they tell that Herakles was strong and travelled over all the world, and was begotten by Zeus of Alcmena, and ascended to heaven when he died, do I not understand that the Scripture speaks of Christ, 'strong like a giant to run his race,' has been in like manner imitated?" (Justin, Dial. 69.3). Later, Celsus lists major figures in mythology whom the Greeks thought were originally mortals and eventually became immortals or gods (the Dioscuri, Heracles, Asclepius, Dionysus) but whose divinity was rejected by Christians (Origen, Cels. 3.22); Origen, using the traditional strategies of Christian apologists, attempts to refute the divinity of each (Origen, Cels. 3.42). Aune argues that this evidence indicates that during the second and third centuries A.D. Christians and pagans alike saw Heracles and Christ as religious rivals.

2.1. Early Christian Tradition on Jesus and Dionysus. In the same way, both early Christians and pagans recognized parallels between Jesus and Dionysus, in a religious rivalry that dates from at least the second century A.D. and continues until late antiquity (see Origen, Cels. 2.34; see also Kessler-Dimin; A. Henrichs writes, "After the rise of Christianity, Dionysus had emerged as the leading pagan antagonist of Christ. Dionysus and Christ had much in common. Both had conquered death, both obscured the distinction between blood and wine, and both promised their followers salvation after death" [Henrichs 1984, 212-13]).

Dionysus was one of the most prominent and pervasive gods of the Greco-Roman world. As A. Henrichs notes, "No other Greek god had such an enormous following, or left an equally overwhelming record. Ten thousands of lines of Greek and Latin poetry . . . , hundreds of passages in works of prose, and uncounted inscriptions and art objects from all periods and corners of the ancient world deal with Dionysus and Dionysiac themes" (Henrichs 1979, 6) (for helpful overviews, see Cole; Henrichs 1982; Seaford; LIMC, s.v. "Dionysos"). One reason for his extreme popularity was his divine-human quality, which made him the most approachable and sympathetic of all Greco-Roman gods. Henrichs draws particular attention to "the unmediated tension between human and divine that abounds in the Dionysiac record: 'the contradictory identity of the god who is mortal'" (Henrichs 1993, 18). Indeed, the myth of Dionysus Zagreus "carries the anthropomorphic conception of the Greek gods to its very limits. Dionysus as a god is reduced to extremely human dimensions, which include suffering and even death; but in the end his immortality is confirmed. . . . The striking conceptual correlation of murder victim and immortal god that defines Dionysus as an immortal mortal, a god who has experienced human mortality but whose ultimate immortality confirms his divine status" (Henrichs 1993, 26-27 [italics added]).

No wonder, then, that by the second century A.D. at the latest we see signs of Christians regarding Dionysus and his cult as a definite force to be reckoned with. Christian apologists begin to articulate how Christ and his cult surpass Dionysus and his cult as the true mysteries. For example, Justin Martyr felt compelled to account for the similarities between the figure of Jesus and Greek deities, in particular Dionysus, through the introduction of the doctrine of "diabolical mimicry," which had occurred centuries before the birth of Jesus: the demons said "that Dionysus had been the son of Zeus, and handed down that he was the discoverer of the vine, and they ascribe wine among his mysteries, and taught that, having been torn in pieces, he ascended into heaven. And since through the prophecy of Moses it had not been expressly signified whether he who was to come would be the Son of God, and whether, mounted on a foal, he would remain on earth or ascend into heaven, and because the name 'foal' could signify either the foal of an ass or a horse, they, not knowing whether the predicted one would bring the foal of an ass or a horse as the sign of his coming, nor whether he was the Son of God or of a man, as we said before, said that Bellerophon, a man born of men, had himself gone up to heaven on the horse Pegasus" (Justin, 1 Apol. 54). Similarly, Clement of Alexandria derides a long list of mysteries (Clement, Protr. 2.12.1–13.5), including those of Dionysus; however, in promoting Christianity (Clement, Protr. 12.120.1–2), he is capable of trying to supersede them only by using the vocabulary of the mystery religions, particularly the Dionysiac mysteries as represented in Euripides' Bacchae (see Hanson, 927–28).

2.2. Jewish Tradition on Dionysus and the God of the Jews. We find a similar approach to Dionysus already in early Jewish tradition. From 2 Maccabees in the second century B.C. to the Fifth Sibyl in the second century A.D., we can see evidence of the God of the Jews triumphing over Dionysus and his cult by outdoing or overcoming Dionysus on his own terms—that is, by "out-Dionysusing" Dionysus. This triumphalism is all the more significant insofar as in the broader Greco-Roman world the God of the Jews was actually identified with Dionysus (see J. M. Scott 2008, 48–54). For instance, Plutarch and Tacitus independently provide evidence for a widespread identification of the God of the Jews with Dionysus in the Greco-Roman world (Plutarch, Quaest. conv. 4.6.1–2; Tacitus, Hist. 5.5.4–5), which was based on comparisons between the acts of worship in the two cults. Perhaps aware of such comparisons, Hellenistic Jews both in the Diaspora and in the Palestinian homeland sought to show the superiority of their God over Dionysus (see J. M. Scott 2008, 50n55).

For example, after the war of independence from the Seleucids, 2 Maccabees states that the Jews celebrated the purification of the *temple by carrying thyrsos in a procession marking a new Sukkoth-like festival (2 Macc 10:7). By using the term thyrsos, an ubiquitous Dionysiac emblem normally composed of ivy, in the context of a procession during a festival, the text clearly alludes to the foregoing context. There, the beginning of the persecution under Antiochus IV Epiphanes is described, when the Jews were compelled to wear wreaths of ivy and to walk in the procession during a festival in honor of Dionysus (2 Macc 6:7). Thus, 2 Maccabees frames the crisis period by means of strong references to Dionysus and his cult. The new Jewish festival is obviously meant as a kind of anti-Dionysiac victory celebration to show that the God of the Jews had "out-Dionysused" Dionysus and his devotees. The God of the Jews is greater than Dionysus, and Judaism is the true Dionysiac mysteries.

Another example of this triumphalism is found in 3 Maccabees, whose date is, unfortunately, disputed and could even be as late as the reign of Emperor Gaius Caligula. In any case, the story itself is set in the time of Ptolemy IV Philopator, a renowned devotee of Dionysus who promoted the cult of Dionysus with great gusto. When Philopator returned from Jerusalem and looked for a way to avenge his treatment there, he began a systematic persecution of the Jews of Alexandria, including forced initiation into the Dionysiac mysteries: "All Jews shall be subjected to a census registration and to the status of slaves. Those who object to this are to be taken by force and put to death; those who are registered are also to be branded on their bodies by fire and with the ivy-leaf symbol of Dionysus, and they shall also be reduced to their former limited status." In order that he might not appear to be an enemy of all, he inscribed below: "But if any of them prefer to join those who have been initiated into the mysteries, they shall have equal citizenship with the Alexandrians" (3 Macc 2:28–30). As the story unfolds, Philopator's many attempts to persecute the Jews of Alexandria and then kill Egyptian Jewry as a whole are thwarted by divine intervention. 3 Maccabees alludes to Euripides' Bacchae in order to spotlight Ptolemy IV Philopator as a Pentheus-like theomachos, or "fighter against God," and to emphasize that the God of the Jews has outdone the persecutor by turning against the king the very emblems and instruments of Dionysus by which he had sought to destroy the Jews. In the end, Philopator makes a complete about-face, acknowledges the God of the Jews, and provides a festival for the Jews, who thus are saved, using Dionysiac emblems to celebrate their triumph.

Finally, we may mention briefly Philo of Alexandria's De vita contemplativa as yet another example of the trend that we are observing (see J. M. Scott 2008), although this time it has nothing to do with Seleucid or Ptolemaic persecutors trying to impose the worship of Dionysus on the Jews. Instead, Philo portrays the Therapeutae as exemplary Jewish initiates into the true Dionysiac mysteries who aspire to the beatific vision of God. As Philo puts it, "Carried away by a heaven-sent passion of love, they remain rapt and possessed like bacchanals or corybants until they see the object of their yearning" (Philo, Contempl. 12). The Alexandrian explicitly contrasts the Therapeutae, with their sober, orderly lives of quiet contemplation, to the drunken debauchery that frequently attends the ritualized drinking at symposia and the material luxuriousness often associated with the celebration of the Dionysiac mysteries. Positively, however, Philo describes the Therapeutae as being “initiated into the mysteries of the sanctified life” (Philo, Contempl. 25) through their daily study in their separate chambers, and when they come together as a group, they celebrate a feast together, replete with choir music. As Philo describes it, “Then when each choir has separately done its own part in the feast, having drunk as in the Bacchic rites of the strong drink of God’s love they mix and together become a single choir, a copy of the choir set up of old beside the Red Sea in honor of the wonders that happened there” (Philo, Cont. 85). In order to ensure that his Diaspora Judaism remains competitive and attractive in the marketplace of other religious options, Philo adopts the language and ideas of the Dionysiac mysteries in describing a group that, for him, is exemplary of his own ideals, but he does so without fundamentally compromising his own belief and practice. To the contrary, he thereby expresses the superiority of the Jewish cult over the Dionysiac.

These three examples from earlier Jewish tradition, combined with the aforementioned examples from later Christian tradition, reveal a trend: the God of the Jews and his cult are similar to, but much better than, Dionysus and his cult. Indeed, in several test matches, the God of the Jews and his cult triumph over the competition.

2.3. Jesus and Dionysus in Mark’s Gospel. In view of all that has been discussed to this point, it is appropriate here to explore whether, in addition to the obvious and fundamental OT and Jewish matrix of Mark’s presentation, the Markan portrayal of Jesus also contains Dionysiac allusions intended to appeal to a wider Greco-Roman audience. In keeping with the general cultural expectation that the audience was accustomed to detecting them, we expect to find allusions that have a natural, subtle quality but not necessarily an exact, one-to-one correspondence with reality. Although there is no direct statement that Jesus is the new Dionysus, it is the composite picture of Jesus in Mark’s Gospel that makes it possible that Jesus is implicitly being compared to Dionysus. The more we know about Dionysus, the easier it is to see these accumulating associations in the Gospel. In the following, two examples of what I am suggesting are offered, with the caveat that a complete study of Mark’s Gospel would be required in order to appreciate the full scope of the possible allusions.

First, given the double-coding that we observed in Mark 1:1, Mark’s portrait of Jesus from the very outset implicitly juxtaposes Jesus with the Roman emperor as a god and as a son of a god. In that case, it may be significant that the Roman emperors, like the Hellenistic monarchs before them (see Henrichs 1999, 246-48), often identified themselves with Dionysus. For instance, Philo criticizes Emperor Gaius’s attempted self-identification with Dionysus—that is, “his most godless assumption of godship” (Philo, Legat. 77)—whereby he began likening himself to the so-called demigods, Dionysus and Heracles and the Dioscuri (Philo, Legat. 78). According to Athenaeus, Gaius, like Anthony and many Hellenistic monarchs before him, was named “new Dionysus,” and he actually put on the full Dionysiac outfit and went out in public and sat in judgment dressed in that way (Athenaeus, Deipn. 4.148b-d; on Gaius’s Dionysiac pretensions, see Cassius Dio, Hist. 59.26.5-9; on Plutarch’s critique of Nero for identifying himself with Dionysus, among other gods [Plutarch, Adul. amic. 56e], see K. Scott 1929, 121-22).

Second, Mark’s portrayal of Jesus bears a strong resemblance to the role of Dionysus as the divine Stranger. The idea that the Greco-Roman gods sometimes traveled about in human form and encountered unsuspecting people is, of course, a commonplace in antiquity (cf. Acts 14:8-18 [see Flückiger-Guggenheim]). However, the story of Dionysus is quite distinctive, insofar as it deals with a god who is a mortal by birth and whose consistent characteristic is suffering. Normally, the offspring of gods and human women were regarded as demigods or heroes in Greek tradition (see Burkert, 203-8). There was a “radical separation of the realm of the gods from the realm of the dead, of the Olympian from the Chthonic. Whoever died is not a god; whoever is honoured as dwelling in his grave in the earth must have been a mortal. . . . The gods are elevated as an exclusive group into an ideal Olympus; whatever is left behind is subsumed under the category of demigods” (Burkert, 205). But there is one very important exception to this general rule: Dionysus, who was born of Zeus by a mortal woman, Semele. In Hesiod’s Theogony, Dionysus becomes the last of the Olympian children of Zeus after the latter’s ascent to supreme power and the only Olympian with a mortal mother. Dionysus is thus an illegitimate offspring of Zeus.

By virtue of the unusual circumstances of his double birth (both from Semele and secondarily from Zeus), Dionysus has a marginal status. As J. S. Clay points out, “Dionysos, as the last of the Olympians and, at the same time, the first product of such a union, may be considered marginal from the outset" (Clay, 84-85). An intense indeterminacy dogs Dionysus. "Almost all stories about Dionysos follow the same pattern: the new god arrives as the Stranger (even, or especially, in his native Thebes); he is unrecognized, his divinity denied; he is abused, hunted, confined. Those who finally recognize his power and accept his divinity are rewarded, while his opponents are struck with madness and destroyed, usually in a ghastly fashion. Whether his opponents are Lyncus, Pentheus, Ikarios, the Tyrrhenian sailors, or the daughters of Proitus, the story with its nightmarish regularity is always the same" (Clay, 85). Clay describes "the leit-motif of Dionysiac mythology" as "the myriad difficulties the new and strange god encounters in asserting his divinity" (Clay, 91).

The relevance of this comparative material for Mark's Gospel is clear: Jesus, the Son of God, also appears on the scene as a divine Stranger (cf. Mk 1:1-11); he goes about asserting his divine authority, looking for recognition and acceptance of his divine identity; however, his audiences, even his most intimate disciples and the inhabitants in his own hometown of Nazareth, fail to understand who he is, and he hides them for their obduracy and lack of perception; finally, he is persecuted, hunted, arrested and killed, but not before he had promised to return in triumph and judgment. The basic pattern is the same in each case. Interestingly enough, similar observations were made independently by the classicist J. Taylor in his recent book Classics and the Bible: Hospitality and Recognition (Taylor, 61-68).

We know that later Christians and pagans read the Gospel portrayals of Jesus in light of Dionysus. The question remains whether any of the Gospels intended to present Jesus in this way (see Freyne 2000; Hengel 1987; 1995). The structural similarities between the storyline of Mark's Gospel and the aforementioned pattern and leitmotif of Dionysiac mythology suggest a strong possibility of intentional double-coding on the part of the first Gospel. In that case, we may even ask whether Mark's portrayal of Jesus contains a hint of the triumphalism that we observed above in Jewish and Christian tradition.

See also CHRISTOLOGY; HELLENISM; ROME.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. D. C. Allison Jr., The Historical Christ and the Theological Jesus (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2009); D. E. Aune, "Heracles and Christ: Heracles Imagery in the Christology of Early Christianity," in Greeks, Romans, and Christians: Essays in Honor of Abraham J. Malherbe, ed. D. L. Balch,

E. Ferguson and W. A. Meeks (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1990) 3-19; W. Bousset, Kyrios Christos: A History of the Belief in Christ from the Beginnings of Christianity to Irenaeus, trans. J. E. Steely (Nashville: Abingdon, 1970); W. Burkert, Greek Religion: Archaic and Classical, trans. J. Raffan (Oxford: Blackwell, 1985); E. Champlin, Nero (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2003); J. S. Clay, "Fusing the Boundaries: Apollo and Dionysos at Delphi," Métis 11 (1996) 83-100; S. G. Cole, "Finding Dionysus," in A Companion to Greek Religion, ed. D. Ogden (Oxford: Blackwell, 2007) 327-41; A. Y. Collins, "The Worship of Jesus and the Imperial Cult," in The Jewish Roots of Christological Monotheism: Papers from the St. Andrews Conference on the Historical Origins of the Worship of Jesus, ed. C. C. Newman, J. R. Davila and G. S. Lewis (JSJSup 63; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1999) 234-57; idem, "Mark and His Readers: The Son of God Among Greeks and Romans," HTR 93 (2000) 85-100; A. Y. Collins and J. J. Collins, King and Messiah as Son of God: Divine, Human, and Angelic Messianic Figures in Biblical and Related Literature (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2008); R. Edmonds, "Tearing Apart the Zagreus Myth: A Few Disparaging Remarks on Orphism and Original Sin," CIAnt 18 (1999) 35-73; A. Evans, "Dionysos and Christ," in The God of Ecstasy: Sex-Roles and the Madness of Dionysos (New York: St. Martin's Press, 1988) 145-73; C. A. Evans, "Mark's Incipit and the Priene Calendar Inscription: From Jewish Gospel to Greco-Roman Gospel," JGRJ 1 (2000) 67-81; D. Flückiger-Guggenheim, Göttliche Gäste: Die Einkehr von Göttern und Heroen in der griechischen Mythologie (EH 3/237; Bern: Peter Lang, 1984); J. E. Fossum, "The New religionsgeschichtliche Schule: The Quest for Jewish Christology," SBLSP 30 (1991) 638-46; S. Freyne, "Jesus the Wine-Drinker: A Friend of Women," in Transformative Encounters: Jesus and Women Re-viewed, ed. I. R. Kitzberger (BIS 43; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2000) 162-80; idem, "Dionysos and Herakles in Galilee: The Sepphoris Mosaic in Context," in Religion and Society in Roman Palestine: Old Questions, New Approaches, ed. D. R. Edwards (London: Routledge, 2004) 56-69; S. J. Friesen, Twice Neokoros: Ephesus, Asia, and the Cult of the Flavian Imperial Family (RGRW 116; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1993); R. P. C. Hanson, "The Christian Attitude to Pagan Religions Up to the Time of Constantine the Great," ANRW II.23.2 (1980) 910-73; M. Hengel, Judaism and Hellenism: Studies in Their Encounter in Palestine during the Early Hellenistic Period (2 vols.; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1974); idem, "The Interpretation of the Wine Miracle at Cana: John 2:1-11," in The Glory of Christ in the New Testament: Studies in Christology in Memory of George Bradford Caird, ed. L. D. Hurst and N. T. Wright (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1987) 83-112; repr. as "The Dionysiac Messiah," in M. Hengel, Studies in Early Christology (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1995) 293-331; A. Henrichs, "Greek and Roman Glimpses of Dionysos," in Dionysos and His Circle: Ancient Through Modern, ed. C. Houser (Cambridge, MA: Fogg Art Museum, Harvard University, 1979) 1-11; idem, "Changing Dionysiac Identities," in Jewish and Christian Self-Definition, 3: Self-Definition in the Greco-Roman World, ed. B. F. Meyer and E. P. Sanders (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1982) 137-60; idem, "Loss of Self, Suffering, Violence: The Modern View of Dionysus from Nietzsche to Girard," HSCP 88 (1984) 205-40; idem, "'He Has a God in Him': Human and Divine in the Modern Perception of Dionysus," in Masks of Dionysus, ed. T. H. Carpenter and C. A. Faraone (Myth and Poetics; Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1993) 13-43; idem, "Demythologizing the Past, Mythicizing the Present: Myth, History, and the Supernatural at the Dawn of the Hellenistic Period," in From Myth to Reason: Studies in the Development of Greek Thought, ed. R. Buxton (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1999) 223-48; L. W. Hurtado, Lord Jesus Christ: Devotion to Jesus in Earliest Christianity (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2003); idem, How on Earth Did Jesus Become a God? Historical Questions About Earliest Devotion to Jesus (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2005); E. Kessler-Dimin, "Tradition and Transmission: Hermes Kourotrophos in Nea Paphos, Cyprus," in Antiquity in Antiquity: Jewish and Christian Pasts in the Greco-Roman World, ed. G. Gardner and K. L. Osterloh (TSAJ; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2008) 255-81; H.-J. Klauck, Herrenmahl und hellenistischer Kult: Eine religionsgeschichtlicher Untersuchung zum ersten Korintherbrief (2nd ed.; NTAbh 15; Münster: Aschendorff, 1986); idem, The Religious Context of Early Christianity: A Guide to Graeco-Roman Religions, trans. B. McNeil (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2003); J. Leipoldt, "Dionysos und Christus," in Dionysos (Angelos Beiheft 3; Leipzig: Eduard Pfeiffer, 1931) 43-73; D. Obbink, "Dionysus Poured Out: Ancient and Modern Theories of Sacrifice and Cultural Formation," in Masks of Dionysus, ed. T. H. Carpenter and C. A. Faraone, (Myth and Poetics; Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1993) 65-86; S. R. F. Price, "Gods and Emperors: The Greek Language of the Roman Imperial Cult," JHS 104 (1984a) 79-95; idem, Rituals and Power: The Roman Imperial Cult in Asia Minor (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1984b); J. M. Scott, "Dionysus in Philo of Alexandria: A Study of De Vita Contemplativa," SPhilo 20 (2008) 33-54; idem, BACCHIVS IVDAEVVS: A Denarius Commemorating Pompey's Victory over Judea (NTOA; SUNT; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht; Fribourg: Academic Press, forthcoming); K. Scott, "Plutarch and the Ruler Cult," TAPA 60 (1929) 117-35; R. Seaford, Dionysos (GHAW; London: Routledge, 2006); J. Z. Smith, Drudgery Divine: On Comparison of Early Christianities and the Religions of Late Antiquity (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1990); G. N. Stanton, Jesus and the Gospel (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2004); S. A. Stephens, Seeing Double: Intercultural Poetics in Ptolemaic Alexandria (HCS 37; Berkley: University of California Press, 2003); J. Taylor, Classics and the Bible: Hospitality and Recognition (CLS; London: Duckworth, 2007); T. Witulski, Kaiserkult in Kleinasien: Die Entwicklung der kultisch-religiösen Kaiserverehrung in der römischen Provinz Asia von Augustus bis Antoninus Pius (NTOA; SUNT 63; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht; Fribourg: Academic Press, 2007).

J. M. Scott

GOLGOTHA. See ARCHEOLOGY AND GEOGRAPHY.

GOSPEL: GENRE

The issue of Gospel genre concerns not only the literary nature of the canonical Gospels (not to mention the other texts often called "gospels" in both ancient and modern times) and their relationship to the literary milieu of the first-century A.D. ancient Mediterranean as evidenced in Greco-Roman and in Jewish writings, but also, and even more importantly for this dictionary, how the literary genre of the Gospels affects their portrayal of their central character, Jesus of Nazareth. Therefore, this article will begin with a historical survey of critical debate about the genre of the Gospels and the current scholarly consensus and then go on to consider the implications of this for the Gospels' portraits of Jesus and their respective *Christologies, before concluding with some recent developments and wider issues.

1. Historical Survey
2. Toward a New Consensus: The Gospels as Ancient Biography
3. Four Biographies of Jesus
4. Continuing Debate

1. Historical Survey.

1.1. Traditional Approaches to Reading the Gospels. During ancient and medieval periods the Bible was often interpreted on several levels: the literal meaning provided facts, while an allegorical interpretation related the text to the story of redemption; moral approaches gave ethical instructions, and an anagogical reading applied it to the spiritual pilgrimage. The Reformers rejected all levels except for the literal, and on this basis the Gospels were interpreted as history, telling the story of Jesus, sometimes being seen as biographies. They not only formed the basis for Christian preaching, but also functioned as a source for romantic "lives" such as E. Rénan's Life of Jesus (1863). However, during the nineteenth century modern literary biographies began to explain a person's character by considering the person's upbringing, formative years, schooling, psychological development and so on; furthermore, the subject would be set within the context of the main events of the subject's time. With their relatively shorter length and narrower focus, the Gospels increasingly began to look unlike such biographies, especially as historical and critical analysis developed through the later nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. Therefore, the scholarly focus moved away from the portraits of Jesus in the Gospels to the quest for the historical Jesus (see Quest of the Historical Jesus).

1.2. Form-critical Approaches to the Uniqueness of Gospel Genre. Unsurprisingly, therefore, scholars such as K. Schmidt (1923) and R. Bultmann (1921) refused to recognize the Gospels as biographies about Jesus: these texts have no interest in his human personality, appearance or character, nor do they tell us anything about the rest of his life, other than his brief public ministry of preaching, teaching and healing; furthermore, they conclude with an extensive concentration on the events around his death and its aftermath. Instead, form critics saw the Gospels as popular folk literature, collections of short literary units (pericopae) handed down through the *oral tunnel, strung together by the Gospel writers like beads on a string. Far from being coherent biographies of Jesus, the Gospels were unique forms of literature "of their own genre," sui generis (Bultmann 1972, 371-74). For Bultmann and Schmidt, this unique genre had theological implications about God's revelation of his word in Jesus the Christ, rather than being biographical accounts of the human life of Jesus of Nazareth. In addition, such *"form-critical" approaches to the Gospels meant that they were not read as whole or coherent narratives. Instead, the concentration on each individual pericope moved the focus to the passage's Sitz im Leben ("setting in life") within the preaching of the early church. Meanwhile, the author was regarded as a mere stenographer, recording the stories from oral tradition, rather than as a historian or writer with any literary intentions. The quest for the historical Jesus concentrated instead on peeling back the layers in the pericopae to reveal any authentic sayings of Jesus, on the one hand, and the history of the early Christian churches, on the other hand.

1.3. Redaction-critical Approaches and Gospel Communities. Historical research into early Christian communities required careful study of how Matthew and Luke edited Mark's account (assuming Markan priority), which revealed each writer's theology, purposes and methods as they acted as an "editor" (Redaktor, in German) (see Redaction Criticism). The classic redaction studies were undertaken by G. Bornkamm (1963 [1948]), on Matthew's revision of Mark for use within the new religious community of the church, and H. Conzelmann (1954), on Luke's understanding of the events of Jesus taking place "in the middle of time" between Israel and the church. Such redaction-critical approaches not only restored the intention of each evangelist, but also led to theories about the communities that produced the Gospels. The Gospels were seen as "community" documents, where the history of the community is overlaid upon the story of Jesus, giving a "two-tier" approach to reading them. Therefore, interpretation began to focus on the development of groups such as the Matthean community (Stendahl) or the Johannine community (Brown; Martyn). Thus, both form- and redaction-critical approaches ended up concentrating more on the early Christian communities and churches than on the figure of Jesus himself.

1.4. Literary-critical Approaches and Biographical Narrative. However, the redaction critics' approach to the writers as individual theologians with particular purposes made possible again questions about authorial intention and literary aspirations. The development of new literary approaches viewed them as conscious writers or artists, and attention began to be given to techniques of composition and narrative skills such as plot, irony and characterization, through the work of D. Rhoads and D. Michie, J. Kingsbury and R. Tannehill. Such literary analyses inevitably also raised the issue of the genre of the gospels and their place within first century literature. G. Stanton (1974) first examined the possibility of biographical material about Jesus of Nazareth within the Gospels once more, and later work by C. Talbert (1977) and D. Aune argued against the scholarly consensus about the Gospels' literary uniqueness, which had dominated the twentieth century; instead, the Gospels were once again compared to ancient biographies, and from this came a renewed interest in their accounts of Jesus.

2. Toward a New Consensus: The Gospels as Ancient Biography.

R. Burridge's 1992 monograph on the genre of the Gospels compared them with ancient "lives," arguing that such recent literary, narrative approaches required more undergirding in both genre theory and classical literature if they were to succeed in changing the assumed paradigm inherited from Bultmann and the form critics toward a renewed biographical emphasis on Jesus.

2.1. Literary Theory of Genre. In both ancient and modern literary theory a proper understanding of genre is crucial for the interpretation of any text or any other form of communication. Communication theory concerns three main elements: transmitter, communication and receiver; or, encoder, message and decoder. In written works this becomes author or producer(s), text and audience or reader(s). Immediately the importance of discerning the kind of communication becomes clear. If the sender uses flags to transmit Morse code (through long or short flaps), but the receiver only understands semaphore (where flag position is important), there will be inevitable problems in communication. Both parties must use the same code or language, and so valid interpretation depends on a correct identification of the kind of communication, or genre. We do not listen to a fairy tale in the same way as to a news broadcast; each has its own conventions, expectations and rules. This is even more important in ancient texts such as the Gospels, where we neither know who the author was nor have any external evidence about the first audience or readership. All that remains is the actual communication, the text itself, and any clues that it contains about its literary origin or intended destination.

Thus, genre is a key convention guiding both the composition and the interpretation of writings. Genre forms a "contract" or agreement, often unspoken or unwritten, or even unconscious, between an author and a reader by which the author composes according to a set of expectations, and the reader interprets the work following the same conventions, which provide an initial idea of what to expect. Genre is identified through a wide range of "generic features" that may be signaled in advance through a notice or preface; however, they are also embedded within the text's formal and structural composition ("external features") and its content, style, mood and character ("internal features"). When taken together, such generic features communicate the "family resemblance" of a group of works and thus enable us to identify the genre of a given text and interpret it accordingly, even if we do not know the original author or audience. Works exhibiting a similar range of generic features belong in the same family and may share some features with neighboring genres, while other works may reveal completely different conventions and situations. Therefore, the interpretation of a text, particularly when the original author, audience or situation is unknown, as with the Gospels, can be greatly assisted by comparing it with other works exhibiting the same generic family resemblance.

2.2. The Generic Features of Ancient Biography. Therefore, Burridge (1992; 2004) identified a range of generic features that distinguished ancient biography from neighboring genres, such as historiography or encomiastic rhetoric. To determine whether the Gospels are a form of ancient biography, we must examine the generic features shared by ancient "lives" (bioi): biographia itself does not appear until the ninth-century writer, Photius, while the modern word biography implies the other aspects of psychological, political or sociological analysis derived from this genre's development in the nineteenth century. Instead, we must consider a wide range of ancient texts that were generally known as bioi or vitae in the ancient world, written prior to or just after the Gospels' composition. Drawing on Greek, Roman and Jewish origins, such works form a discrete but flexible genre that developed over the several centuries either side of the birth of Jesus of Nazareth.

From the formal or structural perspective, these works are composed in continuous prose narrative, usually between ten thousand and twenty thousand words, which is about the length of a typical scroll of thirty to thirty-five feet in length. Such a relatively short compass, compared with modern biographies, means that Greco-Roman bioi do not cover a person's whole life in chronological sequence, and they have no psychological analysis of the subject's character. Instead, they may begin with a brief mention of the hero's ancestry, family or city, birth or an occasional anecdote about childhood; but usually the narrative moves rapidly on to the public debut later in life. Lives of generals, politicians or statesmen tend to be more chronologically ordered, depicting their great deeds and virtues, while accounts of philosophers or writers are more anecdotal, arranged topically around collections of material to display their ideas and teachings. While the author may claim to provide information about the subject, often the underlying aims include apologetic, polemic or didactic. Most ancient biographies treat the subject's death in great detail, since it often reveals the true character, gives the definitive teaching, or includes the greatest deed of the subject. Finally, detailed analysis of the subjects of the verbs in ancient biographies reveals another feature. While most narratives have a wide variety of subjects, it is characteristic of ancient biography that attention stays focused on one particular person with one-fourth to one-third of the verbs dominated by the subject, while another 15 to 30 percent occurs in sayings, speeches or quotations from the person (see Burridge 2004, 308-21). This provides the focus for the whole work through the author's interpretation of the person being portrayed.

2.3. The Biographical Genre of the Gospels. Like such works, the Gospels are continuous prose narratives of the length of a single scroll, comprising stories, anecdotes, sayings and speeches within a relatively short space to depict their understanding of the character of Jesus of Nazareth. Therefore, their focus on Jesus' public ministry from his baptism to death, and on his words and deeds, his teaching and his ministry, is not very different from the content of other ancient biographies. The concentration of 15 to 20 percent devoted to the last week of Jesus' life, his *death and the *resurrection, which looked peculiar to Bultmann and the form critics, reflects the similar amount of space given to the subject's death and subsequent events in biographical works by Plutarch, Tacitus, Nepos and Philostratus. Furthermore, verbal analysis demonstrates that Jesus is the subject of one-fourth of the verbs in Mark's Gospel, with a further one-fifth spoken by him in his teaching and parables. About half of the verbs in the other Gospels either have Jesus as the subject or are on his lips. Thus, as other ancient biographies focus on their subject's teachings and activities, Jesus' deeds and words are vitally important for the evangelists' portraits. Therefore, these marked similarities of form and content demonstrate that the Gospels have both the external and internal generic features of ancient biographies and must be interpreted biographically in a similar manner, as particular depictions by the evangelists of the life and ministry, death and aftermath of Jesus of Nazareth.

3. Four Biographies of Jesus.

The biographical genre of the Gospels has a hermeneutical effect in understanding of their subject in christological terms. We noted above that form critics concluded that the Gospels were not really about Jesus; instead, these scholars proposed a wide variety of subjects, such as the *kingdom of heaven, the early kerygma, Christian faith, discipleship and so forth, while redaction critics saw the subject matter closely connected with the particular concerns of the specific community within which and for which a Gospel was written. However, these approaches ignored the Gospels' genre. Reading the Gospels as ancient biography leads us to expect the depiction of one person, the subject, understood by another person, the author. Instead of a form-critical understanding of the Gospels as passion narratives preceded by disjointed pericopae strung together, biographical readings show how each evangelist describes the passion as the culmination of the overall portrayal of Jesus within his Gospel. Furthermore, there is a generic argument for assuming Markan priority, as Matthew and Luke conform Mark's pattern more closely to other ancient lives. Irenaeus applies the traditional images of the four faces of the cherubim (Ezek 1) and the four living creatures around the throne (Rev 4) to the four Gospels' accounts of "the disposition of the Son of God" (Haer. 3.11.8-9). Following this, Burridge (1994; 2005) used these four images—lion, human, ox, eagle—as pictorial ways of understanding the four different christological portraits of the Gospels.

3.1. Mark's Roaring, Rushing Lion. While many ancient biographies include something about the subject's origin, genealogy, family or city and the early years, they move rapidly to the person's public debut in adult life. Mark goes straight to Jesus' baptism by John the Baptist and thus depicts Jesus as fully grown almost from nowhere (Mk 1:9), who then rushes around everywhere euthys ("immediately"); this favorite word of Mark occurs ten times in Mark 1 alone, and some forty times in the whole Gospel, which is about as often as in the whole of the rest of the NT, adding pace and vividness to Mark's portrait. Jesus is misunderstood by everyone, including his family and friends, the authorities (Mk 3:19-35) and, remarkably, his own followers; traditionally, the disciples' failure to understand Jesus in Mark is interpreted as polemic against differing early church groups and leaders with "traditions in conflict" (see Weeden). On the other hand, the biographical hermeneutic understands everything in terms of the portrayal of the central character; thus, Mark shows that Jesus is hard to understand and tough to follow, and therefore readers should not be surprised to find the Christian life difficult sometimes. The interlude of Mark 8–10 shows Jesus as the enigmatic wonder-worker who binds people to secrecy; the eschatological prophet who will die in Jerusalem; the Messiah who will suffer; both *Son of God and *Son of Man. Rather than explaining any conflict between such titles as deriving from different historical traditions or problems in early Christian communities in the form- or redaction-critical manner described above, a biographical narrative approach holds them all together, as the text does, in a complementary tension. This complex portrayal of the main character is further developed as Jesus comes to find Jerusalem and the temple as barren as the fig tree and prophecies that they will face the same destruction (Mk 11–13). He suffers and dies alone in dark desolation, with only a single utterance from the cross: “My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?” (Mk 15:34); yet, for the first time in Mark this causes a human being to recognize Jesus as “Son of God,” but this person is an outsider, the centurion. The passion narrative thus brings to a climax all Mark’s christological themes throughout the Gospel, while even the ending is full of enigma, fear and awe (Mk 16:1–8).

3.2. Matthew’s Human Face: The Teacher of Israel. While Mark’s Jesus is dark and enigmatic, Matthew has a different, clearer atmosphere, akin to his symbol of the human face. Aligning his account more closely to other ancient biographies, Matthew includes brief sections about Jesus’ Jewish background, *genealogy and *birth (Mt 1–2). When he starts his ministry, Jesus is another *Moses, who teaches from *mountains (Mt 5:1) and fulfills the *law and the *prophets, giving his teaching in five great blocks, reminding the reader of the Pentateuch (Mt 5–7; 10; 13; 18; 24–25). Unfortunately, this brings him into conflict with the leaders of Israel. Uniquely in Matthew, Jesus begins by telling his disciples to go only to “the lost sheep of the house of Israel” (Mt 10:6); however, as they reject Jesus and his message while others, such as the Canaanite woman, accept it, a new community is “called” into being, the ekklesia, leaving only woes for the leaders of Israel (Mt 15:21–28; 16:18; 18:17; 23). While Matthew includes most of Mark’s passion narrative, he has a more awesome atmosphere: the cry of abandonment is answered by an earthquake and resurrections; no wonder, then, that unlike Mark’s lone centurion, here everyone realizes that this was truly the Son of God (Mt 27:51–54; cf. Mk 15:39). Finally, the resurrection continues this supernatural atmosphere with further earthquakes and a new Israel on a mountain to receive Jesus’ commission to go to the Gentiles; the one who was described as “Emmanuel” at his birth promises to be with us forever at his final departure (Mt 1:23; 28:1–20). Again, the climax brings all Matthew’s biographical themes full circle in his portrayal of Jesus.

3.3. Luke’s Universal Beast of Burden. Unlike Matthew’s Jewish perspective, Luke begins with a Greek periodic preface to make clear Jesus’ universal significance, and he takes the genealogy back beyond Abraham to Adam, son of God (Lk 1:1–4; 3:38). While Matthew’s infancy stories concern wise men and the royal court, Luke includes the birth of the forerunner, *John the Baptist, and is more interested in women, such as Elizabeth and *Mary, and in lowly shepherds; he also includes a story of the child prefiguring the adult, typical of many ancient biographies, as the twelve-year-old Jesus is about “my Father’s business” in the temple (Lk 2:41–51). He sets Jesus within the historical perspective of both Israel’s history and contemporary Roman rule (Lk 1:5–80; 2:1; 3:1) and employs a threefold geographical structure, with the journey from *Galilee to *Jerusalem (Lk 9:51–19:28) dividing the earlier ministry in Galilee from the final confrontation in Jerusalem. The disciples are depicted more positively and include women (Lk 8:1–2), as well as the mission of the seventy(-two) (Lk 10:1–16), and the crowds are more enthusiastic (Lk 12:1; 23:5). The Pharisees invite Jesus to dinner parties (Lk 7:36; 11:37; 14:1), while the real opposition comes from the powerful religious leaders in Jerusalem. As befits Luke’s usual symbol of the ox, the universal beast of burden around the ancient world, throughout the narrative Jesus is concerned for the poor, the lost and unacceptable, outcasts, *women, *Samaritans and *Gentiles; he is also the person of *prayer (Lk 11:1–4). Thus, the passion narrative shows him concerned for the women of Jerusalem (Lk 23:27–31), praying for forgiveness for the soldiers and the penitent thief (Lk 23:34, 43), and entrusting himself to his Father (Lk 23:46). After the resurrection, history and geography run the other way, from Israel’s past to the world’s future, moving away from Jerusalem (Lk 24:44–47). Luke’s Gospel ends as it began, “in Jerusalem with great joy, in the temple blessing God” (Lk 24:51–52; cf. Lk 1:5–23). Such a clear and balanced biographical narrative reflects a single author, not a community’s interests, and provides a united christological hermeneutic for Luke’s account of Jesus.

3.4. John’s High-flying, All-seeing Eagle. In the OT eagles “nest on high” as symbols of God’s providential care and also his judgment (see Ex 19:4; Deut 28:49; Job 39:27-29), all of which are true of John's portrait of Jesus. To understand where Jesus has come from, he goes back beyond the Synoptics' beginnings with Jesus' baptism, or his birth and precursor, to before time, in the beginning, with God (Jn 1:1-18). Jesus is constantly at center stage, and he is characterized, as in most ancient writing, by indirect means as the author interweaves "signs" and discourse, revealing the effect of prolonged meditation and theological reflection upon the person of Jesus: he is the Son, equal with the Father (Jn 10:30), yet totally dependent on him (Jn 5:19). Again, rather than seeing this as a result of differing sources in the manner of Bultmann, the biographical concentration on the final text allows for a creative tension in the overall picture of the subject. Opposition from Jewish leaders develops through the first half (Jn 2-12); as the tension comes to a climax, Jesus gathers his disciples to his breast, washes their feet and explains what will happen (Jn 13-17). The hour of *glory is also the passion: throughout, Jesus is serenely in control, directing events (Jn 19:11), organizing his mother and his closest disciple (Jn 19:26-27), fulfilling Scripture (Jn 19:28) until finally "it is accomplished" (Jn 19:30). After the resurrection he appears to comfort Mary Magdalene (Jn 20:14), challenge Thomas (Jn 20:26) and restore Peter (Jn 21:15-19). Once again, we have a clear portrait of the subject, as Jesus is in control throughout, from his origins with God through his ministry to the culmination of his death and resurrection.

3.5. Plurality Within the Canon. Given this understanding of the Gospels, these four individual accounts, each concerned with the resolution of its particular themes, have been deliberately composed, not as a by-product of oral tradition or the result of committees or communities, but by four single writers, each of whom wants to portray a particular view of Jesus in the manner of ancient biography. This also helps to explain how the fourfold canon came to be used so quickly in the early fathers. G. Stanton (1997) and M. Hengel have provoked renewed interest in the "fourfold Gospel" and its theological implications. It is suggested that the early church's preservation of four Gospels together may have stimulated the development of the codex in preference to single scrolls. Furthermore, the plurality of the Gospels' witness was both a problem for the church fathers and a gift to opponents such as Celsus, Porphyry and Julian (and in continuing debate with, for instance, Muslims today). This could easily have been solved by choosing one Gospel as "the authorized biography" (as Marcion did with Luke) or combining the four Gospels into a mixed narrative (as in Tatian's Diatessaron). The fact that the early church chose to keep four separate accounts, despite the problem of plurality and possible conflict, demonstrates the recognition that these works were coherent accounts of Jesus written by four authors for the whole church. A biographical reading of the four Gospels within the limits of the canon provides both "a stimulus and a control" for developing our own accounts and portraits of Jesus today (see Morgan).

4. Continuing Debate.

Since the end of the twentieth century the biographical understanding of the Gospel genre has become the accepted scholarly consensus (for a fuller account of how the consensus changed, see Burridge 2004, 252-88). It has been queried by A. Collins, who similarly rejects the unique, form-critical approach but prefers to see Mark more like a historical monograph. Comparisons by L. Wills and by M. Vines of the Gospels with early novels, especially of Jewish origin, have not gained great acceptance. Instead, the biographical genre of the Gospels has been subsequently confirmed in detailed work by scholars such as D. Frickenschmidt. Even L. Hurtado (2003) now argues that the Gospels are "Jesus books" with formal similarities to Greco-Roman bioi, resulting in a clear christological focus. The acceptance of this new consensus can also be seen through debates at various international conferences of the Society of Biblical Literature and the Society for New Testament Studies, culminating in a twentieth-anniversary conference in Barcelona (2012) and another about the pope's interpretation of Jesus of Nazareth (2013). Therefore, Gospel scholars and commentators usually now take the biographical genre of the Gospels as their starting point, while the main debate has moved on to further implications of this approach. The last two decades have seen the widespread acceptance of the biographical genre of the Gospels, but also the fruitful development of several continuing avenues for scholarly debate and research that follow from interpreting the Gospels christologically, as biographical portraits of Jesus Christ.

4.1. Audiences and Eyewitnesses. R. Bauckham has taken the debate about the genre of the Gospels in several interesting directions in recent years. First, in a collection of essays by various scholars developing the idea (Bauckham 1998), he argued that the Gospel's biographical genre reinforced the conclusion that they were written "for all Christians" rather than for specific early Christian communities.

The continuing debate aroused by this is demonstrated by another collection edited by E. Klink. Meanwhile, Bauckham himself has provoked further controversy over the contribution of eyewitnesses to the formation of the Gospels' accounts of Jesus (Bauckham 2006).

4.2. The Gospels and the Absence of Jewish or Rabbinic Biography. It is notable that this comparison of the genre of the gospels has been primarily with Greco-Roman biography. Individual gospel pericopae are often studied alongside rabbinic stories and anecdotes (e.g., compare the question about the greatest commandment in Mark 12:28-34 with the B. Šabb. 31a, where Shammai and Hillel are asked to teach the law to a Gentile enquirer standing on one leg). If the form-critical view is correct that the gospels are a collection of such stories strung together like beads on a string, similar works could be constructed about Hillel, Shammai or other rabbis. Yet Jesus seems to have been the only first-century A.D. Jewish teacher about whom such bioi were written. Both J. Neusner (1984; 1988) and P. Alexander have explored various reasons why the rabbinic traditions contain no works of a similar genre to the Gospels. The rabbinic material contains enough biographical elements (through sage stories, narratives, precedents and death scenes) to enable an editor to compile a "life of Hillel" or others that would have been recognizable as ancient biography. Literary or generic reasons alone are therefore not sufficient to explain this curious absence of rabbinic biography. Burridge has argued that to write a biography is to use a genre that places a person at center stage, where only the Torah should be (Burridge 2000, 155-56). Therefore, the biographical genre of the Gospels is making an explicit theological claim about the centrality of Jesus: the christological statement that God is revealed in the life, death and resurrection of this person.

4.3. A Biographical Approach to Biblical Ethics. This biographical narrative approach to the Gospels makes it clear that the Gospels are not just collections of Jesus' sayings (like the Gospel of Thomas), nor are they letters containing teaching material, as with Paul's writings. However, many approaches to the ethics of Jesus treat the canonical Gospels like sayings or letters, concentrating only on his teaching and words. It was noted earlier that the picture of subjects in ancient biography is built up through both their words and their deeds (see 2.2-3 above). Thus, Burridge argues that in order to find the heart of Jesus' *ethic, we need to consider both his ethical teaching and his actual practice (Burridge 2007). Jesus' ethical teaching is not a separate set of maxims, but rather is part of his proclamation of the kingdom of God, intended to elicit a response from his hearers to live as disciples within the community of others who also respond and follow. In his appeal for the eschatological restoration of the people of God, Jesus' words reveal a rigorous ethic of renunciation and self-denial in the main moral issues. However, such teachings are set within a biographical narrative about his central stress on love and forgiveness, which opened the community to the very people who had moral difficulties in these areas. Hence, he was regularly accused of being "a glutton and a drunkard, a friend of tax collectors and sinners" (Mt 11:19; Lk 7:34). Ancient biographies held together both words and deeds in portraying their central subject often for exemplary purposes (see Plutarch, Ages. 10.2; Pericles 1; Aem. 1). Equally in the Gospels, the readers are exhorted to follow Jesus' example in accepting and welcoming others (Mk 1:17; Lk 6:36); compare Paul's theme of imitation: "Be imitators of me, as I am of Christ" (1 Cor 11:1 [cf. Phil 3:17; 1 Thess 1:6]). As befits a biographical narrative, therefore, we must not just outline the main points of Jesus' teaching; we must also follow his example toward others.

See also CANON; FORM CRITICISM; GOSPELS: APOCRYPHAL; GOSPELS: HISTORY OF INTERPRETATION; NARRATIVE CRITICISM; ORALITY AND ORAL TRANSMISSION; QUEST OF THE HISTORICAL JESUS; REDACTION CRITICISM; SYNOPTIC PROBLEM.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. P. S. Alexander, "Rabbinic Biography and the Biography of Jesus: A Survey of the Evidence," in Synoptic Studies: The Ampleforth Conferences of 1982 and 1983, ed. C. M. Tuckett (JSNTSup 7; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1984) 19-50; D. E. Aune, The New Testament in Its Literary Environment (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1987); R. J. Bauckham, ed., The Gospels for All Christians: Rethinking the Gospel Audiences (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1998); idem, Jesus and the Eyewitnesses: The Gospels as Eyewitness Testimony (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2006); G. Bornkamm, "The Stilling of the Storm in Matthew," in Tradition and Interpretation in Matthew, by G. Bornkamm, G. Barth and H. J. Held, trans. P. Scott (London: SCM, 1963 [1948]) 52-57; R. E. Brown, The Community of the Beloved Disciple (London: Geoffrey Chapman, 1979); R. Bultmann, Die Geschichte der synoptischen Tradition (FRLANT 29; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1921); ET, The History of the Synoptic Tradition, trans. J. Marsh (rev. ed.; Oxford: Blackwell, 1972); R. A. Burridge, What Are the Gospels? A Comparison with Graeco-Roman Biography (SNTSMS 70; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1992; rev. ed., Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2004); idem, Four Gospels, One Jesus? A Symbolic Reading (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1994; rev. ed., Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2005); idem, "Gospel Genre, Christological Controversy and the Absence of Rabbinic Biography: Some Implications of the Biographical Hypothesis," in Christology, Controversy, and Community: New Testament Essays in Honour of David Catchpole, ed. C. M. Tuckett and D. G. Horrell (NovTSup 99; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2000) 137-56; idem, Imitating Jesus: An Inclusive Approach to New Testament Ethics (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2007); idem, "The Genre of Acts—Revisited," in Reading Acts Today: Essays in Honour of Loveday C. A. Alexander, ed. S. Walton et al. (LNTS 427; New York: T & T Clark, 2011) 1-26; A. Y. Collins, "Genre and the Gospels," JR 75 (1995) 239-46; H. Conzelmann, Die Mitte der Zeit: Studien zur Theologie des Lukas (BHT 17; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1954); ET, The Theology of St. Luke, trans. G. Buswell (London: Faber & Faber, 1960); D. Frickenschmidt, Evangelium als Biographie: Die vier Evangelien im Rahmen antiker Erzählkunst (TANZ 22; Tübingen: Francke, 1997); M. Hengel, The Four Gospels and the One Gospel of Jesus Christ: An Investigation of the Collection and Origin of the Canonical Gospels (London: SCM, 2000); L. W. Hurtado, "Gospel (Genre)," DJG 276-82; idem, Lord Jesus Christ: Devotion to Jesus in Earliest Christianity (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2003); J. D. Kingsbury, Matthew as Story (2nd ed.; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1988); E. W. Klink, ed., The Audience of the Gospels: The Origin and Function of the Gospels in Early Christianity (LNTS 353; London: T & T Clark, 2010); J. L. Martyn, History and Theology in the Fourth Gospel (Nashville: Abingdon, 1979); R. Morgan, "The Hermeneutical Significance of Four Gospels," Int 33 (1979) 376-88; J. Neusner, In Search of Talmudic Biography: The Problem of the Attributed Saying (BJS 70; Chico, CA: Scholars Press, 1984); idem, Why No Gospels in Talmudic Judaism? (BJS 135; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1988); E. Rénan, Life of Jesus (London: Trübner, 1863); D. Rhoads and D. Michie, Mark as Story: An Introduction to the Narrative of a Gospel (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1982); K. L. Schmidt, "Die Stellung der Evangelien in der allgemeinen Literaturgeschichte," in Eucharisterion: Studien zur Religion und Literatur des Alten und Neuen Testaments, 2: Zur Religion und Literatur des Neuen Testaments, ed. H. Schmidt (FRLANT 36/2; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1923), 50-134; ET, The Place of the Gospels in the General History of Literature, trans. B. R. McCane (Columbia: University of South Carolina Press: 2002); G. N. Stanton, Jesus of Nazareth in

New Testament Preaching (SNTSMS 27; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1974); idem, "The Fourfold Gospel," NTS 43 (1997) 347-66; idem, Jesus and Gospel (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2004); K. Stendahl, The School of St. Matthew, and Its Use of the Old Testament (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1968); G. E. Sterling, "Luke-Acts and Apologetic Historiography," SBLSP 28 (1989) 326-42; C. H. Talbert, What Is a Gospel? The Genre of the Canonical Gospels (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1977); idem, "The Acts of the Apostles: Monograph or Bios?" in History, Literature, and Society in the Book of Acts, ed. B. Witherington III (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1996) 58-72; R. C. Tannehill, The Narrative Unity of Luke-Acts: A Literary Interpretation (2 vols.; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1986-1990); M. E. Vines, The Problem of the Markan Genre: The Gospel of Mark and the Jewish Novel (SBLAB 3; Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature, 2002); T. J. Weeden, Mark: Traditions in Conflict (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1971); L. M. Wills, The Quest of the Historical Gospel: Mark, John and the Origins of the Gospel Genre (London: Routledge, 1997).

R. A. Burridge

GOSPEL: GOOD NEWS

In the Synoptic Gospels the "gospel" (euangelion) refers primarily to the announcement of "good news" associated with the arrival of God's "kingdom," particularly in association with Jesus' mission and identity as the Messiah (see Christ). Within this broad usage, the specific referent of such good news can change from passage to passage, and the emphasis can change from Gospel to Gospel. The word does not appear in the Gospel of John.

1. Greco-Roman Background
2. Old Testament Background
3. Mark
4. Matthew
5. Luke
6. Jesus

1. Greco-Roman Background.

The first-century B.C. Priene Inscription from Asia Minor provides a relevant starting point for the use of the word gospel in the Greco-Roman world at the time of Christ. In this inscription the emperor Augustus is hailed as a "savior" for ending wars and bringing peace to the empire (OGIS 458) (see Rome). For all the great things that his rule brought, his birth is proclaimed not only as the birth of a god but also as the beginning of "good news" (euangelia [pl.]) for the world. The peace that he brought was "good news" (euangelia) even beyond the hopes of those who were anticipating great things from him.

The word euangelion was also used regularly in the context of a messenger bringing a report of victory. A battle is won, and a messenger is sent to report the news to his people or king. The euangelion in this context is thus the announcement of good news in relation to the battle. These brief examples provide a good sense of the basic use of the word in the Greco-Roman world. A euangelion was good news of some significance, usually in the context of announcement or ensuing celebration.

2. Old Testament Background.

The noun euangelion occurs only three times in the LXX, all in 2 Samuel in the plural (as in the Priene Inscription). In the first instance David speaks with sarcasm and irony of the “good news” brought to him of King Saul’s death (2 Sam 4:10). The other two instances are similar, relating to “good news” brought from a messenger about victory in battle, in this case over David’s son Absalom (2 Sam 18:22, 25). As in broader Greek literature, euangelia (pl. of euangelion) refers to good news of the sort a messenger might bring to a king in relation to a matter of great significance, such as the outcome of a battle. The noun euangelia seems to function synonymously in 2 Samuel 18:20, 22, 27, as well as in 2 Kings 7:9.

The related verb euangelizō/euangelizomai (“to announce good news”) is more common, appearing some twenty times in the LXX. All these references relate similarly to the announcement of good news, often brought at the hands of a messenger. Many relate to the announcement of victory in battle (e.g., 1 Sam 31:9; Ps 68:11 [LXX 67:12]). The “good news” proclaimed in Nahum 1:15 (LXX 2:1) is the destruction of Nineveh by the Babylonians. Although Judah was not involved in the battle, they celebrated the arrival of good news from over the mountains that the people who had destroyed the northern kingdom were now themselves defeated.

The verb is also used in relation to other kinds of good news. Jeremiah 20:15 uses it in reference to the announcement of the birth of a son; 1 Kings 1:42 uses it of the announcement that a new king had ascended the throne. These instances confirm that a euangelion is good news of an outstanding sort, often announced by some sort of messenger, and often on a grand scale.

By far the most important instances of euangelizomai in regard to the NT, however, are those that appear in the later chapters of Isaiah. These generally relate to the return of Jews from Babylon in the late sixth century B.C. and the restoration of Israel (see Exile and Restoration). They are passages that both the Gospels and the rest of the NT cite, and that, indeed, likely reach back into the historical ministries both of Jesus and *John the Baptist.

Isaiah 40:9 referred originally to the announcement of the good news of Israel’s return from captivity in Babylon. This is good news not of victory but of deliverance from captivity and oppression, a sense that euangelizomai has in several places (e.g., Ps 96:2 [LXX 95:2]). Isaiah 60:6 predicts the rise and return of Israel to a glory that will bring the nations to admire it. Isaiah 61:1 speaks of good news for the poor and disempowered of Israel as the ancient ruins of its cities are rebuilt (Is 61:4).

The most important occurrence is undoubtedly Isaiah 52:7, with its image of a messenger coming across the mountains with good news (as in Nah 1:15). The good news is that Yahweh reigns, a reign reflected in the announcement of *peace and happiness for Israel because it is no longer enslaved in Babylon. The beginning of God’s reign, as it were, is like the beginning of the reign of a good king who promises an ensuing peace and happiness. It implies not only the return and restoration of Israel but also its coming glory and prosperity.

3. Mark.

The word euangelion appears seven times in Mark, not including its occurrence in the longer ending (Mk 16:15, which most agree was added later). Most significantly, it appears twice in the programmatic announcement in Mark 1:14–15. The fundamental message of Jesus is thus remembered as one announcing the good news of the kingdom’s arrival. At least an echo of Isaiah 52:7 is unmistakable, particularly given that Mark 1:3 has already quoted Isaiah 40:3 in the context of the introduction of Jesus as Messiah (Mk 1:1) and the preaching of John the Baptist (Mk 1:4–8). Jesus’ mission in Mark thus focuses on announcing the good news of the arrival and reestablishment of the reign of God on the earth.

The Gospel of Mark places this language in an *apocalyptic context. “The time has been fulfilled,” and the commencement of the reign of God is now near (Mk 1:15). In anticipation, John leads a movement of *repentance and washing of *sins to “prepare the way” of the Messiah (Mk 1:4–8). This kingdom of God—the primary content of the good news—will arrive in power even before some of Jesus’ followers have died (Mk 9:1). First, however, the announcement of the kingdom’s arrival must reach all the nations (Mk 13:10), and the eschatological crisis will ensue.

The euangelion in this context is thus the announcement of the good news of the (re)inauguration of God's reign on the earth, with John and Jesus as its heralds. However, Jesus functions within Mark's understanding of the good news not only as herald of the good news, but also as part of that good news. Both Mark 8:35 and Mark 10:29 closely associate suffering for the gospel and suffering for Jesus with each other. The action of the woman who *anoints Jesus two days before Passover will be told in conjunction with the proclamation of the gospel throughout the world (Mk 14:9). This fact implies that the story of Jesus and his death is an intimate part of the good news.

Accordingly, we should understand Mark 1:1 to include the messianic identity of Jesus as a central component of the good news. "The beginning of the gospel" in Mark 1:1 likely refers not to the genre of Mark (since the word was not used in this way at that time), but rather to the good news about Jesus Christ as king. The good news about Jesus the Messiah thus begins in Mark with the story of John the Baptist—some would even suggest in Isaiah (Guelich, 10). While it is unclear whether the royal title *"Son of God" was part of Mark 1:1 originally, the phrase well captures the sense that the good news included the announcement of Jesus' reign as messianic king, in fact the dominant connotation of "gospel" in Romans 1:2.

4. Matthew.

The Gospel of Matthew does not use the word euangelion as frequently as Mark, but it uses the word in more than one strategic location. Matthew 4:23 is a summary of Jesus' activities in Galilee, at the beginning of what some take to be Matthew's central section (Mt 4:17–16:20). We are thus meant to see Jesus' announcement of the good news of the kingdom of heaven as a central feature of his mission, alongside teaching and *healing. With almost identical wording, Matthew 9:35 again summarizes Jesus' activities at the beginning of a section focused on Jesus' *mission in *Galilee and the commission of his disciples to do the same (Mt 9:35–11:1). It is therefore clear that Matthew means for its audience to see the good news of the kingdom as a central element of Jesus' proclamation.

Matthew, in contrast to Mark, speaks of the "gospel of the kingdom of heaven" rather than the "gospel of God" or the "gospel of Jesus Christ." The meaning, however, is generally the same. Matthew 7:22 makes it clear that entrance into the "kingdom of heaven" for Matthew is yet to take place, even though near (e.g., Mt 4:17). The kingdom to come is for God's will to be done on earth as in heaven (e.g., Mt 6:10). The gospel of the kingdom in Matthew must thus refer to the announcement of God's coming reign on earth, to be entered decisively at the time of Christ's return (e.g., Mt 26:29), although in another sense it is already here and growing (e.g., Mt 13:31–33). As in Mark, proclamation of this good news of God's coming reign on earth will spread through the entire world before the end comes (Mt 24:14).

The good news in Matthew thus focuses on the coming reign of God on earth, as in Mark. Jesus speaks of his return to earth to drink the fruit of the vine again with his disciples in his "Father's kingdom" (Mt 26:29). Matthew also retains Mark's implied connection between Jesus' death and the good news. The anointing of Jesus before his death is part of "this gospel" that will be proclaimed around the *world (Mt 26:13; cf. Mk 14:9). Matthew's addition of the word "this" to gospel accentuates the fact that Jesus' death is part of the gospel.

While Mark does not use the verb form euangelizomai, it appears once in Matthew (Mt 11:5). Here, in response to John the Baptist's inquiry about whether he is the Messiah, Jesus tells John's followers to report that good news is being proclaimed to the poor—a clear allusion to Isaiah 61:1. We thus find evidence in Matthew that part of the good news is the restoration of the disempowered and forgotten of *Israel, a theme that is of course prominent in Luke.

5. Luke.

The word euangelion itself does not appear in the Gospel of Luke (it does occur twice in Acts), but Luke uses the verb euangelizomai ten times (15x in Acts). In one instance the word likely refers to the proclamation of John the Baptist's birth to the barren Elizabeth and her husband Zechariah (Lk 1:19). Luke thus can use the word in its general sense. In every other instance, however, "proclaiming the gospel" refers to the varied apocalyptic events unfolding with the arrival and mission of Jesus the messiah and the ensuing kingdom of God.

In Luke 2:10 the angels announce the good news of Jesus' birth, the birth of a Savior, Christ the Lord. The context is highly reminiscent of the Priene Inscription's reference to the birth of the emperor Augustus as the birth of a god and as good news for the world. It seems likely that Luke has presented this scene in such a way as to evoke these sorts of echoes within Greco-Roman culture. The birth of Jesus is on the order of the birth of an emperor. Indeed, it is far more significant than the birth of an emperor.

Helpfully, the book of Acts gives us a fuller picture of what Luke understands the content of the gospel to be, in the light of early Christian proclamation. Acts 8:12, for example, implies an intrinsic connection between the good news of Christ's kingship and the good news of the kingdom of God. Indeed, we should infer that when Acts repeatedly speaks of the proclamation of the gospel (e.g., Acts 5:42; 8:4; 8:25; 10:36; 13:32; 16:10), it refers in shorthand form to the general content of Acts' sermons. These sermons regularly climax in the fact that God raised Jesus from the dead (e.g., Acts 2:32; 3:15; 13:30; 17:31) and enthroned him as cosmic Lord and king (e.g., Acts 2:34-35; 13:33).

The gospel in Luke-Acts thus refers not to any one element of this proclamation, but rather to the good news of all these apocalyptic events, with Jesus at their center. Accordingly, the content of the gospel can include the final resurrection yet to come (Acts 17:18), as well as what was perhaps a more limited scope to what Jesus meant when he referred to the "good news." Luke 20:1, for example, probably refers less to Jesus preaching about himself as to the good news of the kingdom's arrival in general. Similarly, Luke (like Matthew) includes summary statements that give the proclamation of the gospel as one of Jesus' key activities (Lk 8:1; 9:6).

Luke 4:18 is of particular significance to Luke's understanding of what was included in the good news. It is true that Matthew 11:5 (alluding to Is 61:1) mentions good news for the poor as part of Jesus' core mission (see Rich and Poor). Luke, however, inaugurates Jesus' entire mission with an explicit citation of Isaiah 61 (see Jubilee). The opening scene of Jesus' ministry in Luke 4:18-19 shows Jesus reading the Isaiah scroll in his home synagogue in Nazareth. Thus, not only is this pervasive Lukan theme of Jesus' ministry to the poor and discarded of Galilee part of the gospel for Luke, but also Luke places it as the centerpiece of the gospel during Jesus' earthly mission.

6. Jesus.

As we survey the use of euangelion and euangelizomai in the Synoptic Gospels, it seems probable that this language derived originally from the historical Jesus and John the Baptist themselves. None of the Synoptics particularly emphasizes the resonances that their own quotations of Isaiah might have had in the context of an occupied Israel, but it is easy enough to suspect the narrative in which these passages might have originally featured. Israel is alienated from God. In a sense, it exists in a kind of *exile. Into this context comes John the Baptist, urging Israel to repent and cleanse itself in preparation for its return from "captivity" and the enthronement of its king.

John was thus preparing the "way" of the Lord. He was creating a straight path for return from exile. It comes as no surprise to find that followers of John the Baptist in Acts, including many who went on to become followers of Jesus, were called followers of the Way (e.g., Acts 18:25-26; 19:9, 23). Accordingly, language of gospel and the kingdom of God might easily have arisen from reflection on Isaiah 52:7. Jesus was announcing that the time had come for Israel to be restored and for God's rule on earth to commence. In his earthly mission he especially focused on the good news that this kingdom was for the poor and discarded of Galilean society, the "lost sheep of Israel" (the language of Mt 15:24).

See also EXILE AND RESTORATION; GOSPEL: GENRE; ISRAEL; JUBILEE; KINGDOM OF GOD/HEAVEN; SALVATION.

BIBLIOGRAPHY: J. D. G. Dunn, Jesus Remembered (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2003) 383-487; C. A. Evans, "Mark's Incipit and the Priene Calendar Inscription: From Jewish Gospel to Greco-Roman Gospel," JGRCJ 1 (2000) 67-81; J. B. Green, The Gospel of Luke (NICNT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1997) 132-35; R. A. Guelich, Mark 1-8:26 (WBC 34A; Dallas: Word, 1989); W. Marxsen, Mark the Evangelist: Studies on the Redaction History of the Gospel, trans. J. Boyce et al. (Nashville: Abingdon, 1969) 117-50; G. Stanton, Jesus and Gospel (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2004); P. Stuhlmacher, ed., The Gospel and the Gospels (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1991); P. J. Tomson, "The Core of Jesus' Evangel: εὐαγγελίσασθαι πτωχοῖς (Isa 61)," in The Scriptures in the Gospels, ed. C. M. Tuckett (BETL 131; Leuven: Leuven University Press, 1997) 647-58; R. E. Watts, Isaiah's New Exodus and Mark (WUNT 88; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1997); N. T. Wright, Jesus and the Victory of God (COQG 2; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1996) 198-243. K. Schenck

GOSPEL OF JUDAS. See GOSPELS: APOCRYPHAL.

GOSPEL OF PETER. See GOSPELS: APOCRYPHAL.

GOSPEL OF THE EBIONITES. See GOSPELS: APOCRYPHAL.

GOSPEL OF THE HEBREWS. See GOSPELS: APOCRYPHAL.

GOSPEL OF THE NAZAREANS. See GOSPELS: APOCRYPHAL.

GOSPEL OF THOMAS. See GOSPELS: APOCRYPHAL.

GOSPELS: APOCRYPHAL

Gospels are early Christian writings that have as their focus the transmission and interpretation of traditions about the life, death and resurrection of Jesus (see Gospels: Genre). Those not included in the Bible are called “apocryphal Gospels.” Most of these were written after the NT Gospels, but it is clear that some predated the canonical accounts (see Lk 1:1-4). Many have not survived the fate of history; no copies of them exist today. In some cases, knowledge of a particular apocryphal Gospel is available only through the testimony of early Christian writers who had access to it or second-hand information about it. In other instances, copies of all or part of these texts have been discovered. The main interest of this article is the earliest apocryphal Gospels and those that have the closest connections to the NT Gospels.

1. Gospel of Thomas
2. Gospel of Judas
3. Gospel of Peter
4. Papyrus Fragments of Unidentified or Unknown Gospels
5. Jewish Christian Gospels
6. Birth and Infancy Gospels
7. Secret Gospel of Mark
8. Dialogues of the Risen Jesus

1. Gospel of Thomas.

The Gospel of Thomas is a collection of 114 sayings (logia) of Jesus. It has been the object of more study than any other apocryphal Gospel. A complete copy was found in 1945 in Nag Hammadi, Egypt. This fourth-century A.D. Coptic manuscript was unearthed by three brothers who had been foraging near their home and discovered it along with other books in a large clay pot. The codices eventually made their way into the possession of J. M. Robinson, who led a team of scholars that identified one of the texts as the Gospel of Thomas. The first English translation was published in 1979, over thirty years after the initial discovery.

In addition to the complete Coptic version, there are three Greek fragments (P.Oxy. 1; P.Oxy. 654; P. Oxy. 655), the earliest of which has been dated to A.D. 200. These were discovered at the end of the nineteenth century, although it was not until after the Nag Hammadi find that they were identified as portions of the Gospel of Thomas. There are some significant differences between the Coptic edition and the Greek fragments. For example, the order of the sayings differs. Saying 77 of the Coptic text appears between sayings 30 and 31 in P.Oxy. 1. There are also differences in wording. The Coptic version of a saying is sometimes longer than the Greek; in other places, the Greek is more expansive.

The majority view is that this Gospel was originally written in Greek and then later translated into other languages, though others have contended that it was first composed in Syriac or Aramaic. There is general agreement that it derives from Syria, possibly from the area near Edessa. The apostle Thomas was highly regarded in this region during the early centuries of Christianity, a trait also reflected in the Acts of Thomas and the Book of Thomas.

The dating the Gospel of Thomas is debated. The existence of manuscript P.Oxy. 1 indicates that the Gospel of Thomas must have originated before the end of the second century A.D., and some have suggested that it predates the canonical Gospels and was written in the middle of the first century A.D. Hippolytus of Rome, writing around A.D. 200–230, provides the earliest reference to it (Hippolytus, Haer. 5.2.20). The presence of gnostic language and concepts points toward a date sometime in the second century A.D. for the version represented in the Nag Hammadi manuscript. How much earlier the original edition may have been composed is uncertain.

The prologue of the Gospel of Thomas purports to provide an account of “the secret sayings that the living Jesus spoke and that Didymus Judas Thomas wrote down.” There is very little narrative elsewhere, aside from a brief contextual description accompanying some of the sayings (e.g., Gos. Thom. 6, 12, 22, 37, 60, 79, 100). In most such instances the disciples of Jesus pose a question to him that evokes a response. There are no healings, miracles or exorcisms, nor is there a birth story or passion narrative.

Roughly half of the 114 sayings resemble material in the NT Gospels. Representative examples of these parallels can be found in Gospel of Thomas 14 (cf. Mt 15:11), 38 (cf. Jn 7:32–36), 66 (cf. Mk 12:10–11) and 72 (cf. Lk 12:13–14). There is also an intriguing similarity between Gospel of Thomas 17 and 1 Corinthians 2:9, which might simply be based on a common OT background. A few sayings appear in other noncanonical gospels as well (e.g., Gos. Thom. 2 in the Gospel of the Hebrews, and Gos. Thom. 22 in the Gospel of the Egyptians). There is no consensus, though, about the relationship between the Gospel of Thomas and the NT texts. Arguments for the independence of this Gospel sometimes focus on features attributed to oral tradition. The sayings occasionally appear to be grouped by catchwords. For example, “brother” appears in sayings 25 and 26, and “the dead” are mentioned in sayings 51 and 52. Another potential indicator of its independence lies in the fact that the order of the sayings rarely, if ever, matches that of any NT Gospel. It has also been claimed that the Gospel of Thomas often preserves a more primitive form of a saying. Those who have argued for dependence on the canonical Gospels typically have done so on the basis of finding Matthean or Lukan redactional material in the Gospel of Thomas.

In terms of literary genre, the Gospel of Thomas is closest to the hypothetical Synoptic sayings source known as *Q. Both consist primarily of sayings and reflect thought derived from a wisdom tradition. Some have found in the Gospel of Thomas a Jewish wisdom theology, but most have argued for some type of gnostic background. It is uncertain precisely how developed this gnosticism was, and scholars have been generally disinclined to associate the Gospel of Thomas with any one sect. Those suggesting gnostic affinities find evidence in the call to recognize one’s divine origin (Gos. Thom. 50) and in the goal of being the “solitary one” who abandons all that ties people to the physical world (Gos. Thom. 16, 23, 28, 56).

It is possible that the Gospel of Thomas preserves some authentic sayings of Jesus not found in the NT. The parable of the great fish (Gos. Thom. 8) conveys a message identical to that of the parables of the hidden treasure and the pearl of great worth (Mt 13:44-46). Forms of the saying in Gospel of Thomas 82 (“The one who is near me is near the fire; the one who is far from me is far from the kingdom”) are mentioned by several early Christian writers, and this is a potential indicator of authenticity.

The most likely judgment is that the Gospel of Thomas is a second-century A.D. composition, though in some places it preserves traditions from much earlier. It reflects gnostic interests, although it is not necessarily representative of a fully developed gnosticism. In some places the author appears to have been influenced by the canonical Gospels, but most of the sayings derive from elsewhere. It is therefore an important source for the study of the development of Gospel traditions.

2. Gospel of Judas.

The long-lost Gospel of Judas is the most recent apocryphal Gospel to have been rediscovered. Found in 1978, the codex containing it had an eventful journey over the next few decades, being stolen and damaged, sitting in a bank vault for many years, and passing from one antiquities dealer to another, before coming into the possession of experts who could reconstruct its contents and translate its text. It was not until 2006, nearly three decades after its discovery, that the Gospel of Judas was published and made available to the public.

Codex Tchacos, the Coptic manuscript containing this Gospel, was copied in the fourth century A.D., but the original composition came long before this and was originally in Greek. The earliest reference to it comes from Irenaeus (c. A.D. 180), who classifies it as “fictitious history” (Irenaeus, Haer. 1.31.1). Although research on this text is in the early stages, it probably was written in the middle part of the second century A.D. and undoubtedly was the product of gnostic Christianity.

The opening lines describe some of the contents to follow: “The secret revelatory discourse in which Jesus spoke with Judas Iscariot, for eight days, three days before he celebrated Passover.” The prologue then summarizes the earthly ministry of Jesus, noting the miracles that he performed and the great signs of salvation that he offered. It also indicates that Jesus appeared to, and disappeared from, his disciples at will. The main body of this Gospel can be divided into two sections. The first is a dialogue between Jesus and all of his disciples; the second is a conversation between Jesus and Judas, though Jesus does most of the speaking.

When he is with all the disciples, Jesus expresses amusement concerning their practices. He laughs at their taking of the Eucharist and their inability to grasp what is infinitely beyond them, criticizes their confession of him as the *Son of God, and interprets a dream that they have recounted. In each of these instances Jesus is ridiculing non-gnostic beliefs and praxis. The author of the Gospel of Judas clearly stands outside of orthodox Christianity and is engaging in polemic against it by casting Jesus as its opponent. The disciples, as representatives of apostolic Christianity, are on the receiving end of Jesus’ ridicule.

In the second half Judas tells Jesus about a dream in which the other disciples were chasing him and throwing stones at him before he came upon a house surrounded by important people. It is Jesus’ explanation of the dream that serves as the focal point of this Gospel. The secret revelation offered by Jesus centers on a gnostic account of creation and the fall, an understanding notably different from the one in Genesis. He teaches that those who belong to the generation of Seth, the perfect heavenly man, will find knowledge (gnōsis) and be liberated from the constraints of this physical world. At the end of the story Judas betrays Jesus, handing him over to the high priests and scribes and receiving money in return.

A major point of contention among scholars is whether Judas is portrayed as a hero or a villain. Those who published the initial translation argued for the former, while many have subsequently rejected that claim and insist that Judas is every bit the villain here that he is in the NT. Some of this controversy has concerned questions of the proper translation of the Coptic text. For instance, the first edition identified Judas as a “spirit,” while A. D. DeConick and others have argued that this term should be translated as “demon.” Cases such as this have tipped the balance in favor of viewing Judas as a thoroughly villainous character in this text.

The Gospel of Judas provides a fascinating glimpse into the second-century A.D. world of a gnostic Christian sect, a group that was critical of apostolic Christianity. Unlike the canonical Gospels, where in each instance Jesus is a Jewish messianic figure, the Gospel of Judas depicts him as a revealer of gnostic truths. It provides no new historical information about Jesus or Judas or the other disciples, and it reflects knowledge of at least one NT Gospel (cf. Gos. Jud. 58:12-16; Mt 21:46).

3. Gospel of Peter.

Late in the nineteenth century a section of the Gospel of Peter was found in a grave near Akhmim, Egypt. This Greek codex (P.Cair. 10759) from the seventh or eighth century A.D. preserves a portion of the narrative from the closing scene of Jesus’ trial, through the crucifixion, burial and resurrection, to the beginning of an appearance story, at which point the text ends in mid-sentence. A few other manuscript fragments have been proposed as copies of the Gospel of Peter (e.g., P.Oxy. 2949), but this is uncertain because the wording differs significantly from the Akhmim text. The earliest unambiguous reference to this Gospel comes from Serapion, bishop of Antioch, near the end of the second century A.D. In a short tract entitled “Concerning the So-Called Gospel of Peter,” Serapion indicates that most of this Gospel was in accordance with the true doctrine of the church, though certain false teachings had been added to it. Because he knew members of docetic groups who were using it, the bishop was concerned about docetic ideas in the Gospel itself. Recent scholarship, however, has not found explicit docetic characteristics in the extant portion of the Gospel of Peter, though at one or two points such a reading is possible.

Origen, Eusebius, Didymus and Theodoret also were acquainted with this Gospel. Origen states that those who considered Jesus’ brothers to be sons of Joseph by a previous wife found support in it. This might indicate that it contained a birth narrative. Eusebius and Didymus cite the Gospel of Peter as an example of a pseudepigraphal work, a text falsely attributed to an apostle. Theodoret claims that it was used by Jewish Christians.

The question of the Gospel of Peter’s relationship to the canonical Gospels has been a point of contention. J. D. Crossan and H. Koester are among those who consider it to be independent of the NT texts, although the particulars of their conclusions differ from one another. Crossan has suggested that a portion of the Gospel of Peter is in fact the earliest of all the written Gospels, and that it served as a source for the canonical evangelists. Koester rejects this idea but still considers the Gospel of Peter to be independent.

Others have concluded that this work is dependent on the canonical Gospels. One difficulty with this view is that there are very few verbal parallels. Instead, the similarities are present at the level of plot, characters and some of the details. The Gospel of Peter shares features with all four NT Gospels. For instance, as in Matthew, there is a guard at the tomb (Gos. Pet. 8:29—11:49; Mt 27:62-66; 28:4, 11-15). The story of the women’s discovery of the empty tomb is closest to Mark’s account (Gos. Pet. 12:50—13:57; Mk 16:1-8). Both the Gospel of Peter and Luke include Herod in the proceedings of Jesus’ final day (Gos. Pet. 1:1—2:5; Lk 23:6-15). And the Gospel of Peter resembles John by referring to the breaking of legs at the crucifixion (Gos. Pet. 4:14; Jn 19:31-33), Jesus’ tomb being in a garden (Gos. Pet. 6:24; Jn 19:41), and a postresurrection appearance to the disciples during a fishing expedition (Gos. Pet. 14:58-60; John 21:1-14).

Each of these similarities is countered by significant variations from the canonical works. Roman soldiers crucify Jesus in the NT accounts, while Jews do this in the Gospel of Peter. No canonical Gospel describes the resurrection—that is, the actual emergence of Jesus from the tomb. In contrast, the Gospel of Peter includes a vivid description of this event. It also differs by employing a first-person narrative perspective, in particular that of the apostle Peter (see Gos. Pet. 7:26; 14:59-60).

The best way to account for these similarities and differences is to suggest that the Gospel of Peter represents a free rewriting of the canonical works. Its author has reworked the earlier Gospels by clarifying, expanding and revising them in order to make the narrative meaningful within the new situation of him and his readers. It was written near the middle of the second century A.D., at a time when Christians had become a sect distinct from Jews and after the canonical Gospels had circulated widely. This explains the strong anti-Jewish polemics and the attempt to provide a stronger apologetic for the *resurrection.

4. Papyrus Fragments of Unidentified or Unknown Gospels.

Several manuscript fragments have been discovered that contain stories or sayings from unknown Gospels. In several of these instances the content resembles the canonical accounts. The following are the most important fragments.

4.1. P.Egerton 2. The four fragments from this codex have been dated to the early third century A.D., making it one of the earliest extant Christian manuscripts. This also indicates that the Gospel that it preserves likely originated in the late first or early second century A.D. Portions of four or five different pericopes appear in these fragments. The first tells of Jesus in a dispute with experts in the law, and Jesus' statements parallel those of John 5:39, 45; 9:29. On the other side of this fragment is a scene in which the "leaders" attempt to arrest Jesus and hand him over to the crowd. This might be the conclusion of the first controversy story, or there may have been an intervening episode. Following this, Jesus heals a leper in a manner resembling Mark 1:40-44. The next scene describes Jesus apparently performing a *miracle on the banks of the Jordan River, a pericope without a known parallel. In the final episode Jesus is asked whether to pay the imperial taxes, but his reply is not the same as in the canonical parallels (cf. Mt 22:15-22; Mk 12:13-17; Lk 20:20-26). Instead, he quotes Isaiah 29:13 in the same way that he does in Matthew 15:7-9; Mark 7:6-7. The relationship between this Gospel and the canonical works is uncertain. It may be entirely dependent on them or perhaps on the same written or oral sources used by the NT writers.

4.2. P.Oxy. 840. This small piece of parchment includes forty-five lines of Greek text from an unknown Gospel. The manuscript has been dated to the fourth century A.D., though the Gospel that it preserves probably was composed in the second century A.D. In this text Jesus has finished teaching his disciples when he leads them into the temple and is met by a chief priest identified as a Pharisee named "Levi." The historical veracity of this has been questioned, since chief priests typically were not Pharisees. Another anachronism is alleged in the fact that the text implies that all people, not just priests, must immerse themselves in a bath before entering the temple. The remainder of the story involves an exchange between Jesus and Levi concerning purity issues. Jesus is never identified by his name; rather, he is called "the Savior" on three occasions. P.Oxy. 840 includes possible connections to Matthew 23:1-39; Mark 7:1-23; Luke 11:37-52; John 7:1-52; 13:1-30. It shares three common themes with these passages: ceremonial washings, a contrast between inner and outer purity, and conflict with Jewish leaders.

4.3. The Fayyum Gospel (P.Vindob.G 2325). This is a fragment of a third-century A.D. manuscript containing an account in which Jesus tells a group, presumably his disciples, that all will be ashamed of him. Peter insists that he will not do so, to which Jesus replies that Peter will indeed deny him three times before the rooster crows. Clearly this parallels Matthew 26:30-34; Mark 14:26-30, although there are variations in wording among the three versions. Most notably, the Greek words used for "rooster" and "crow" differ from those in the two canonical works. Some have suggested that this passage is from the Gospel of Peter or an excerpt from a Gospel harmony, but the evidence is inconclusive.

4.4. P.Berol. 11710. These portions of two papyrus leaves from the sixth century A.D. were found with a small piece of cord attached, indicating that they probably were part of an amulet worn by a Christian. The text is in Greek, except for the last two lines, which are in Coptic. It contains a brief exchange between Jesus and Nathanael. The disciple calls Jesus "the Son of God" and "the lamb of God who takes away the sins of the world," and Jesus instructs him to "walk in the sun." There are parallels in John 1:29, 49.

4.5. P.Cair. 10735. In this sixth-century A.D. papyrus fragment an angel of the Lord appears to Joseph and instructs him to flee to Egypt with Mary. Following this, the heavenly messenger speaks to Mary. While this probably derives from an apocryphal Gospel, some have suggested that it is an excerpt from a commentary or a book of homilies. In either case, the content has canonical parallels (cf. Mt 2:13; Lk 1:36).

4.6. P.Mert. 51. The wording of this small third-century A.D. fragment is difficult to reconstruct. Sin and baptism are mentioned. It is possible that the pericope resembles Luke 7:29-30.

4.7. P.Oxy. 1224. Two fragments from this third- or fourth-century A.D. manuscript preserve all or part of four sayings of Jesus and describe the anger of the Jewish leaders upon seeing Jesus among sinners. One of the sayings is without a canonical parallel, and the other three are similar to NT sayings (cf. Mt 5:44; Mk 2:16-17; Lk 9:50). It is not possible to determine this text's relationship to the Synoptic Gospels.

5. Jewish Christian Gospels.

Several early Christian writers refer to Gospels that were used by Jewish Christian groups. However, no copies of any such texts are extant. On several occasions the patristic authors quote something from these Gospels. It is possible that one or more originally were written in Hebrew or Aramaic and may preserve authentic sayings or deeds of Jesus. It is unclear exactly how many Jewish Christian Gospels existed, but scholarship today often identifies three.

5.1. Gospel of the Hebrews. The most important discussions of the Gospel of the Hebrews come from Clement of Alexandria, Origen, Cyril of Jerusalem and Jerome. The passages quoted include sayings of Jesus and references to his baptism and resurrection. Apparently, this Gospel depicts Jewish leaders present at the tomb when Jesus is raised. He then appears to his brother James, and the subsequent narrative portrays James as a pious figure. This fits a Jewish Christian context well, since James was held in esteem among the earliest Palestinian Jewish Christians (cf. Acts 12:17; 15:13-21; 21:17-26; Gal 1:18-2:10). This appearance story probably is an imaginative creation based on the tradition preserved in 1 Corinthians 15:7. A saying from the Gospel of Hebrews that Clement of Alexandria quotes twice is very similar to the one in Gospel of Thomas 2 (Clement, Strom. 2.9.45; 5.14.96). This may have been the earliest of the Jewish Christian Gospels, perhaps from the beginning of second century A.D. There are not strong verbal parallels with the NT Gospels, making it uncertain whether canonical sources were employed.

5.2. Gospel of the Ebionites. Epiphanius is the lone witness to the Gospel of the Ebionites, though his testimony is at times not easily understood. He preserves seven excerpts from it. A few describe the lineage of *John the Baptist, his ministry and his diet. Epiphanius also states that the genealogies of Matthew have been omitted. An expanded version of Jesus' *baptism is included, as is his calling of the twelve disciples. Three sayings are quoted, and on one occasion Epiphanius notes that the canonical version has been altered. The first of these sayings appears to combine elements of Matthew 5:17-18; John 3:36. Another is almost identical to Matthew 12:48-49. According to Epiphanius, those who used this Gospel claimed that Christ was not born of the Father but rather was created as one of the archangels. This second-century A.D. composition seems to make use of Synoptic tradition and, to a lesser extent, Johannine material.

5.3. Gospel of the Nazareans. Although some have identified a third Jewish Christian Gospel known as the Gospel of the Nazareans, others have contended that material assigned to this text is better understood as belonging to the Gospel of the Hebrews. If there was a work known as the Gospel of the Nazareans, it possibly was an Aramaic translation of Matthew or, more likely, a targumistic interpretation of it. References to Jesus' baptism, the collapse of the temple lintel, and sayings of Jesus may have been included in it. Jerome indicates that a sect of Nazareans in Syria used a Jewish Christian Gospel during his day, and if the Gospel arose within this sect, it probably originated in the second century A.D.

6. Birth and Infancy Gospels.

Stories about the *birth of Jesus and his childhood years became popular during the early centuries of the Christian movement. Natural human curiosity led people to write imaginative accounts focused on these themes. Two writings are representative of this practice.

6.1. Protevangelium of James. *Mary is the main character in this second-century A.D. text that narrates events before and immediately after the birth of Jesus. The focus is on her purity and virtue. In the opening scene the story of Mary's birth is told, followed by a description of her living in the Jerusalem temple from the age of three until her twelfth birthday. The priests then gather the widowers together and determine that Joseph is to take Mary as his wife, and a short time later they receive news that Mary is pregnant. There is a repeated emphasis on her perpetual virginity; the brothers of Jesus are Joseph's sons from a previous marriage. On their way to Bethlehem Mary gives birth to Jesus in a cave. Interestingly, Origen states that in his day there was a cave near Bethlehem that had become famous among Christians and non-Christians alike as the birthplace of Jesus (Origen, Cels. 1.51). The Protevangelium of James ends with the author identifying himself as "James," who probably is to be understood as the brother of Jesus.

6.2. Infancy Gospel of Thomas. The boy Jesus is portrayed as a child prodigy in this Gospel. Many of the deeds that he performs mirror those done by the adult Jesus in the NT Gospels. It describes his actions up to the age of twelve, which probably indicates an imaginative attempt to elaborate on the tradition found in Luke 2:39-42. The young Jesus makes clay sparrows and brings them to life, and he causes a young boy to wither and another to die. This leads the townspeople to ask Joseph and his family to leave the region. A man named “Zacchaeus” comes to instruct Jesus, though the teacher acknowledges the superior knowledge of the student. Eventually, Jesus restores those he had cursed and performs other miracles. Irenaeus may have had knowledge of this work, which indicates a probable second-century A.D. date for it (see Irenaeus, Haer. 1.20.1; cf. Inf. Gos. Thom. 6:2-4).

7. Secret Gospel of Mark.

The Secret Gospel of Mark is one of the most controversial apocryphal texts discovered in the last century. Information about it comes from a copy of a letter purportedly written by Clement of Alexandria that was found in 1958 by M. Smith in a monastery located in modern-day Israel. Some today doubt its authenticity and consider it a forgery. In this letter Clement claims to know of three editions of the Gospel of Mark. The first is the canonical version used by the churches in worship. A second version is a later, secret edition that Mark wrote after going to Alexandria, which Clement says is “a more spiritual gospel for the use of those who were being perfected.” The third is an altered version of the secret edition. Carpocrates had acquired a copy of the “secret” edition through dishonest means and added material to support his own ideas.

Clement quotes two passages from the secret edition to indicate that it did not originally support Carpocratian teachings. In the first passage, a scene that had been inserted after Mark 10:34, Jesus raises a young man from the dead. The youth looks upon Jesus, loves him, and asks to remain with him, and together they go to the young man’s home. They meet again six days later, and Jesus teaches him about the kingdom of God. The second passage that Clement quotes is a one-sentence allusion to the previous scene.

Several positions have been staked out regarding the question of this letter’s authenticity. Of those who believe it to be authentic, some think that it conveys accurate information about the multiple versions of Mark; others judge Clement to be mistaken. Among those who have concluded that the letter is a forgery, a few have claimed that it is an ancient work. However, the majority who doubt its authenticity suggest that the forgery is much more recent and may have involved Smith himself.

8. Dialogues of the Risen Jesus.

Many early Christian writings include postresurrection conversations between Jesus and his followers. These dialogues often convey secret knowledge and involve the disciples or others posing questions to the risen Jesus. Most are gnostic in nature (e.g., the Gospel of Mary, the Apocryphon of James, and the Dialogue of the Savior), but some represent orthodox beliefs (e.g., the Epistula Apostolorum). The Gospel of Mary tells of the risen Jesus giving instructions to his male disciples, who become troubled over what they have heard. Mary comes to comfort and offer encouragement. Although it is not stated explicitly, this character is best understood as Mary Magdalene. She describes her vision of the risen Jesus, which appears to be a description of the ascent of his soul. When some of the male disciples complain about this, Levi states that Jesus has loved Mary more than all the others.

The Epistula Apostolorum is a second-century A.D. text that employs many traditions from the canonical Gospels. Its opening lines indicate that it is a revelation given by Jesus to his disciples in order to refute the false teachings of Simon and Cerinthus. In the second century A.D. Simon Magus (Acts 8) and Cerinthus were known as leaders within gnostic Christian circles. There is an emphasis on the physical and bodily nature of Jesus’ resurrection and on the claim that the source of true church teaching is the full group of apostles who knew and followed Jesus.

See also CANON; CRITERIA OF AUTHENTICITY; GOSPEL: GENRE; JESUS IN NON-CHRISTIAN SOURCES; Q.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. M. Asgeirsson, A. D. DeConick and R. Uro, eds., Thomasine Traditions in Antiquity: The Social and Cultural World of the Gospel of Thomas (NHMS 59; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2006); A. E. Bernard, ed., Other Early Christian Gospels: A Critical Edition of the Surviving Greek Manuscripts (LNTS 315; New York: T & T Clark, 2006); J. D. Crossan, The Cross That Spoke: The Origins of the Passion Narrative (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1988); A. D. DeConick, The Thirteenth Apostle: What the Gospel of Judas Really Says (New York: Continuum, 2007); B. D. Ehrman and Z. Plese, The Apocryphal Gospels: Texts and Translations (New York: Oxford University Press, 2011); J. K. Elliott, ed., The Apocryphal New Testament: A Collection of Apocryphal Christian Literature in an English Translation (New York: Oxford University Press, 2005); C. A. Evans, “The Jewish Christian Gospel Tradition,” in Jewish Believers in Jesus: The Early Centuries, ed. O. Skarsaune and R. Hvalvik (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 2007) 241-77; P. Foster, ed., The Non-Canonical Gospels (New York: T & T Clark, 2008); S. Gathercole,

The Gospel of Judas: Rewriting Early Christianity (New York: Oxford University Press, 2007); M. Goodacre, Thomas and the Gospels: The Case for Thomas's Familiarity with the Synoptics (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2012); J. V. Hills, Tradition and Composition in the Epistula Apostolorum (HTS 57; Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2008); R. F. Hock, The Infancy Gospels of James and Thomas (Santa Rosa, CA: Polebridge, 1995); J. Jeremias, Unknown Sayings of Jesus (2nd ed.; London: SPCK, 1964); H.-J. Klauck, Apocryphal Gospels: An Introduction (New York: T & T Clark, 2003); A. F. J. Klijn, Jewish-Christian Gospel Tradition (VCSup 17; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1992); H. Koester, Ancient Christian Gospels: Their History and Development (Philadelphia: Trinity Press International, 1990); T. J. Kraus, M. J. Kruger and T. Nicklas, eds., Gospel Fragments (OECGT; New York: Oxford University Press, 2009); T. J. Kraus and T. Nicklas, eds., Das Evangelium nach Petrus: Text, Kontexte, Intertexte (TU 158; Berlin: de Gruyter, 2007); N. Perrin, Thomas, the Other Gospel (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2007); J. M. Robinson, ed., The Nag Hammadi Library (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1996); W. Schneemelcher, ed., New Testament Apocrypha, trans. R. McL. Wilson (rev. ed.; 2 vols.; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1991-1993); M. Smith, Clement of Alexandria and a Secret Gospel of Mark (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1973); C. M. Tuckett, The Gospel of Mary (OECGT; New York: Oxford University Press, 2007).

T. P. Henderson

GOSELS: HISTORY OF INTERPRETATION

The interpretation of the Four Gospels, both singly and as a whole, reaches back to the early centuries of the church. Augustine, Origen and Jerome are just a few of the church fathers whose comments are extant. This patristic tradition of interpretation remained influential throughout the Middle Ages and into the Reformation, when a shift away from allegorical interpretation toward philological and historical inquiry came to be preferred. The modern period has been characterized by an accent on critical engagement with questions of history as well as the sources and redaction of the Gospels. More recently there has been a burgeoning of approaches focused on rhetoric, narrative, intertextuality and social-scientific questions, as well as feminist and minority ethnic perspectives.

1. Synoptic Interpretation in Overview
2. Gospel of Matthew

3. Gospel of Mark
4. Gospel of Luke
5. Gospel of John

1. Synoptic Interpretation in Overview.

The obvious differences among the Gospels have been a strong motivating force behind their interpretation throughout history. The early and Medieval church struggled with these differences, often turning to the allegorical and spiritual meanings of the Gospels, which they perceived to be more crucial than the literal meaning. Augustine wrote The Harmony of the Gospels (De Consensu Evangelistarum) (ca. 400) to defend the Gospels against charges that they contradicted each other as well as the OT; and that redactors elaborated and modified the teachings of Jesus, and elevated his nature from wise teacher to God (Augustine, Cons. 1.7.10–12). He explained discrepancies between the Gospels as deriving from the different emphases of each Gospel, and Jesus using similar sayings on similar occasions.

The Reformation and Enlightenment were marked by a shift from allegorical interpretation to interpretation founded on historical inquiry and philology. The Reformation was concerned with preserving the works of the fathers, incorporating the new humanist emphasis on philology and rhetoric, and addressing the strong theological debates of that day. For example, Calvin continued the citation of the church fathers in interpretation, but also used their works more freely, agreeing and disagreeing with them to justify his own interpretation. His Harmony of the Gospels (1555) illustrates his concern that the Synoptic Gospels should not be interpreted separately but in light of each other. He presupposed that Matthew and Luke occasionally modified their sources for theological ends. What is given is not an entirely accurate account of the teachings and life of Jesus, for sayings were modified and events are not necessarily in chronological order. Calvin thus anticipated several trends in the modern study of the Gospels.

The Enlightenment was concerned with the authorship and provenance of the Gospels, their historical reliability and portrayal of Jesus, and their relationship to one another. H. S. Reimarus (1694–1768) argued that the Gospels offered glimpses of the historical Jesus, but painted their portrait of Jesus as a redeemer after his death. Jesus did not understand his suffering and death as atoning, or anticipate his bodily resurrection and imminent return in judgment. The historical Jesus and the portrait of him in the Gospels do not coalesce, the latter being a creation of his disciples after his death. Reimarus's work was foundational for D. F. Strauss who, in his Life of Jesus (1835; ET 1972), argued that the Gospels were mainly mythological. These inquiries among others led to the *quest for the historical Jesus through *archeology and source analysis.

J. J. Griesbach produced the first synopsis of the Gospels, which made them available to critical comparison (1774), and argued in his commentary on the Gospels that Mark was a shorter version of both Matthew and Luke (1789, 1790). C. G. Wilke (1838) and C. H. Weisse (1838) espoused Markan priority, and this position, along with the assumption of the use of the sayings source *Q by Matthew and Luke, would gradually become a major assumption in Gospel studies to this day. This two-source hypothesis of nineteenth-century source criticism boosted Markan scholarship, for it assumed that Mark was the most historically reliable Gospel since it was the earliest one (see Synoptic Problem).

With the appearance of *form criticism in the early twentieth century, the focus shifted to the units of tradition used by the Gospel writers. It was understood that these units were typically in oral form and molded to the theology and practice of the church, thus precluding complete historical accuracy or a direct link to the historical Jesus in any Gospel (Dibelius 1919, 1933², ET 1965; Bultmann, 1921, 1931²; ET 1963). As form criticism gave way to *redaction criticism in the mid-twentieth century, all the Gospel writers were shown to be creative literary and theological authors who molded the tradition they received. Literary criticism that followed in the late twentieth century did not concern itself with the historical questions of a text but used the text in its received form to analyze the Gospels as literature. Such criticism includes structuralism and deconstruction, and *narrative, reader-response and rhetorical criticisms.

Recently attention in Gospel studies has turned to *feminist interpretation, the study of intertextuality, and uncovering the polemic against imperial Rome within the Gospels. Feminist interpretation reads the biblical text through the lens of feminist theory. It seeks to assess and transform interpretation to address gender, power and ideology that traditional interpretation engenders and maintains, with the goal of making that interpretation more self-aware and inclusive. Intertextuality studies trace how a text used prior tradition and sources to create new meaning, whether that use is as quotations, allusions or echoes. Investigation is also being conducted into the polemic in the Gospels against Roman imperial ideology and its claims to power and allegiance.

2. Gospel of Matthew.

Matthew's Gospel was dominant in the early church, being interpreted and quoted more than the other three Gospels. Its account of the life and teaching of Jesus was the one most widely used. This partially explains why Matthew was placed first in the lists and early collections of the canonical Gospels. This priority was largely due to the understanding that the Apostle Matthew wrote it and because of its usefulness for preaching and teaching. The latter was facilitated by its five discourses of the teaching of Jesus (Kealy 1997).

Papias (ca. 60–130) made this brief and puzzling comment about the origin of this Gospel: "Matthew collected the oracles in the Hebrew language, and each interpreted them as best he could" (Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 3.39.14). While open to many interpretations, it was concluded as early as Irenaeus (ca. 130–ca. 200) that Matthew was designed for preaching to the Hebrews because it shares the Jewish concern that the *Christ be from the seed of David (Papias, Frag. 29).

While most early church fathers assumed that Matthew contained the very words of Jesus, Clement of Alexandria (ca. 150–ca. 215) was the first on record to note that its author had elaborated the received traditions. In his study of the Beatitudes, Clement claimed that to "blessed are the poor" (Mt 5:3) Matthew added "in spirit," and to "blessed are they that hunger and thirst" (Mt 5:6) he added "after the righteousness of God" (Clement, Quis div. 17). Origen (ca. 185–ca. 254) wrote the first extant commentary on Matthew (ca. 248) and assumed that the apostle Matthew was the author writing in Hebrew for a Jewish Christian audience (Origen, Frag. 5151; Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 6.25.3–4).

In the Middle Ages the Franciscan Peter John Olivi (ca. 1248–1298) wrote a commentary on Matthew that is an unusual combination of scholastic and Franciscan interpretation based on patristic sources with an influence by the apocalypticism of Joachim de Fiore (ca. 1132–1202). In the Reformation, Calvin strongly questioned several assumptions in the interpretation of Matthew. He could not see how the Gospel was originally written in Hebrew as seemingly suggested by Papias, since the author quotes the Greek Septuagint. He challenged Augustine's claim (assuming it was Jerome's) that Mark was a condensed version of Matthew but did not further investigate the relationship between the two Gospels. He even anticipated redaction criticism by suggesting that Matthew modified his sources according to theological intent and thus was not necessarily always historically accurate.

Since Augustine (354–430) it had been understood that Mark condensed Matthew, but by the mid-nineteenth century it was assumed that Mark was written prior to Matthew. This new understanding of the formation of Matthew necessitated a reassessment of its authorship and Jewish character. Matthew was no longer understood as the first Gospel, authored by the apostle Matthew, and preserving the most historical account of Jesus' life and teachings. For example, B. Bacon (1918) argued that Matthew gathered Jesus tradition to create his five discourses modeled on the five books of the Pentateuch. Thus the words of the *Sermon on the Mount, for example, were spoken at various times and gathered together in Matthew 5–7. The historicity of these discourses was called into question.

The understanding that Matthew used Mark as a source for his Gospel gave rise to *redaction criticism, which traces Matthew's use of sources to understand better his social setting and theology. Matthew's additions to, deletions from, and modifications of Mark, and his choice of sayings from Q indicate that Matthew had a theological agenda to change the focus of the account from Jesus as a miracle worker to Jesus as a teacher who explicates the meaning of discipleship. One of the foundational redactional works is G. Bornkamm's study of Matthew's account of the stilling of the storm (1948; ET 1963); it traces how, in comparison with the account in Mark that he utilized, Matthew's version moves the focus from Jesus as a wonder worker to one describing the negative and positive nature of *discipleship.

This study and others led to more specific works on the *Christology, ecclesiology and the social setting of Matthew's Gospel and its relationship to *Judaism. Regarding social setting, since Matthew used sources, it is difficult to know what hints of Matthew's social and cultural setting are intrinsic to the sources and which are indicative of his own and his audience. Helpful in this regard is the study of R. Brown and J. Meier (1983), which understands Matthew as intended to help the church of Antioch, Syria, train a large influx of Gentile converts on the nature of discipleship.

To redaction-critical studies have been added literary-critical and *social-scientific studies. Literary studies can be categorized as structuralism, narrative criticism and reader-response criticism. D. Patte (1987) provided a complete commentary on Matthew using structuralism, but did not show clearly how this method would work with other methods in biblical studies. R. Edwards (1985) and J.

Kingsbury (1988²) used narrative analysis to analyze Matthew, moving beyond redaction criticism's focus on how the author used sources to how he composed and structured his Gospel with his sources. The historical context of Matthew is of less interest than how Matthew's narrative tells the story of Jesus through the author's use of characterization, plot and point of view. Narrative criticism anticipated reader-response criticism, for the latter tries to show how the narrative affects the reader's experience without regard to the historical situation. D. Howell (1990) used narrative and reader-response criticisms to argue that the situation of the early Christians is not mirrored in any character or group within the narrative, but in the implied reader. The narrative leads the implied reader to recognize the significance of Jesus and understand him as the model of discipleship.

Social-scientific study of Matthew is difficult because it is nearly impossible to determine where it was written and what was the original audience, and whether internal indications of the social and cultural setting are from the sources Matthew used or are additions he made to address his own and his audience's situation (Balch 1991). Sociological, anthropological and cultural analysis works with models constructed from patterns of behavior observed among a variety of groups across time and space. Interpreters use these models to find comparable patterns and particulars in Matthew (Malina and Neyrey 1988). This approach has found similarities between Matthew's social phenomena and that of agricultural societies. While these studies make broad comparisons, study of the social and cultural phenomena contemporary to and in geographical proximity to biblical audiences provides more detailed comparison. J. A. Overman (1990) argues for similarities of the Matthean community with sects of the same period in Judaism. G. N. Stanton (1992) compares Matthew to the Damascus Document, showing similarities between the Qumran and the Matthean communities, both documents working to justify the separation of their community from mainstream Judaism and to serve as a foundational document for the newly constituted splinter group (see Dead Sea Scrolls).

Among other topics, recent work on Matthew focuses on intertextuality, *feminist readings and polemic against Rome (Aune 2001). Studies of intertextuality explore Matthew's use of allusions and quotations of the Hebrew Scriptures to create early Christian identity, theology and ideology in relationship to Judaism from which it sprang (Hatina 2008). Feminist readings of Matthew continue to examine passages pertaining to women to identify interpretation that disenfranchises women in the church, and to make contributions to the study of Christian origins, early Judaism and Mediterranean culture (Levine 2001). Also studied are Roman claims to power over the whole world and how Matthew challenges that power by providing alternative systems of authority that help mold the identity of his community (Riches and Sim 2005).

3. Gospel of Mark.

Assuming the priority of Mark and the two-source hypothesis, Matthew and Luke are the first interpreters of this Gospel as they incorporated its text into their own. In the first preserved comment on Mark, Papias (ca. 130) said that "Mark became Peter's interpreter and wrote accurately all that he remembered, not, indeed, in order, of the things said or done by the Lord" (Eusebius, Eccl. hist. 3.39.15). This association of Mark with Peter was common in the early church and helped establish the authority of the Gospel of Mark. Its inclusion in Tatian's Diatessaron (ca. 160–175) is evidence of its wide circulation in the second century.

Origin wrote a commentary on Mark using allegory as his interpretative method, but it has not survived. The earliest surviving work on Mark is Jerome's ten homilies on Mark (ca. 394–413). He expounded the literal and spiritual meanings, using allegory to derive the latter. The commentary on Mark by Victor of Antioch (fifth century) uses homilies and commentaries on Mark by earlier scholars (particularly Chrysostom, but also Origin and Cyril of Alexandria) as well as Victor's own additional insights.

Augustine's assumption that Mark was a condensed version of Matthew (Cons.) truncated the separate study of Mark in the medieval period. The first complete commentary on Mark is that of Pseudo-Jerome, (mid-seventh century) entitled Commentarius in Euangelium secundum Marcum. It relies on the works of Gregory the Great (ca. 540–604) and interprets the literal and spiritual senses of Mark using the allegorical method. The commentary greatly influenced the exegesis of Mark because it was attributed to the famous exegete Jerome, even being quoted in the later compilation of patristic comment, the Glossa Ordinaria. The Venerable Bede wrote a commentary on Mark (ca. 725–731) that relies on the works of Ambrose, Jerome, Augustine and Gregory the Great, as well as the allegorical method. Theophylact, archbishop of Achrida (eleventh century), a Byzantine interpreter, wrote a commentary on Mark from the Antiochene tradition with its focus on philology, historical context and literal meaning of the text. In the thirteenth century, Albertus Magnus (ca. 1200–1280) wrote a major commentary on Mark, focusing on the allegorical, anagogical, moral and literal levels of the Gospel. In the Reformation Erasmus published a Latin paraphrase of Mark, which benefited from newly discovered Greek and Latin manuscripts (1523). J. Hoffmeister (ca. 1509–1547) wrote a commentary on Mark centered on the literal meaning, rejecting allegorical interpretation.

As noted above, in recent times Wilke (1838) and Weisse (1838) each argued for Markan priority. This raised the question of the historical value of each Gospel and, being the earliest Gospel, Mark was favored as having the more accurate account of Jesus' life and teaching. This assumption was challenged by the quest for the historical Jesus, with Mark being understood as a theologian who modified his sources for theological purposes just like the other Gospels. For example, W. Wrede (1901; ET 1971) showed the messianic secret in Mark to be a theological construct that tries to reconcile the earthly ministry of Jesus, one that did not fit the messianic expectation of a political and military king, with the belief that he was the Messiah.

In the early twentieth century form and source criticisms demonstrated that tradition was shaped by the practice and theology of the church, making direct evidence of the historical Jesus in any Gospel dubious. This, coupled with the fact that the sources of Mark are nearly impossible to isolate, shifted the focus to Mark's vocabulary, style, ordering of units and key topics in an attempt by redaction criticism to trace how Mark structured these units of tradition into a theological Gospel. W. Marxsen (1956; ET 1969) provided the first redactional study of Mark and demonstrated that Mark did not merely write down tradition but structured and molded it according to his theological goals. C. C. Black (1989) showed how this approach to Mark is vulnerable to the presuppositions of the interpreter.

Since Mark's sources are not easily isolated, there was a turn to literary criticism, which works with the text in its received form as a creative literary work, bereft of interest in sources, audience, situation and the historical Jesus. J. Dewey (1980) analyzed Mark 2:1–3:6, uncovering an elaborate chiasmic structure. M. A. Tolbert (1989) provided a literary-critical analysis of the entire Gospel, bringing to light the literary genius of its author in using characterization to develop a picture of the true nature of discipleship.

Recent interpretation of Mark builds on previous form, source and literary analysis, with the addition of rhetorical and intertextual analysis among many others (Kealy 2008). Rhetorical works on Mark owe much to the work of V. K. Robbins on socio-rhetorical analysis (1984) and subsequent studies that explore how this Gospel draws upon the literary, social and cultural forms and conventions of the Mediterranean world in the construction of its presentation of Jesus. Studies of the intertextuality of Mark focus on its use of the OT to interpret Jesus' ministry and the nature and use of prior Jesus tradition (Hatina 2006).

4. Gospel of Luke.

The early interpretation of Luke often involved its use by heretical sects within the church and the church's response (Kealy 2005). This included the gnostic use of Luke and the response of Irenaeus (Against Heresies [Adversus haereses]) and Clement of Alexandria (Miscellanies [Stromata] books 3-4, 7). In his Antitheses, the second-century heretic Marcion distinguished the Jesus of grace from the God of the OT and law. He whittled down the canon to an abbreviated version of the Gospel of Luke and a collection of Paul's letters, with any portions with which he disagreed removed. Since Marcion only accepted the Gospel of Luke among the Gospels, Tertullian's refutation of Marcion, his Against Marcion book 4, uses portions of Luke and in the process provides the oldest surviving orthodox commentary on Luke. Cyril of Alexandria (d. 444) published a collection of 150 sermons on Luke as a commentary. It is partially aimed at refuting Nestorius in the christological controversies preceding the Council of Chalcedon (451), arguing for the dual divine-human nature of Jesus (Homily 1 on Lk 2:4-8).

In the medieval period, the exegetical work of the Venerable Bede (eighth century) became common reading. He wrote a Commentary on the Gospel of Luke which, in medieval fashion, assembled, simplified and explained the works of previous interpreters, with Ambrose, Augustine, Jerome and Gregory the Great being his favorites. The goal of the interpretation was to help people live a faithful Christian life and assure their salvation. During the Reformation, Erasmus wrote a paraphrase of Luke, In Evangelium Lucae Paraphrasis (1523), which also served as a commentary and illustrated a more philological approach to interpretation, although not completely devoid of allegorical readings. His interpretation was guided in part by his critique of the institutional church's corruption and his own theological agenda.

With the Enlightenment and the rise of the historical method, the historicity of the Gospels came into question. Many interpreters tried to establish that Luke was useful for historical reconstruction by isolating portions that were older and supposedly more historically reliable. B. F. Streeter (1924) argued for a proto-Lukan Gospel composed of Q and L that was independent of Mark, but of about the same date. V. Taylor (1926) argued for a source for the passion account that was of similar date as Mark, which was used as a source for the passion account of Luke.

While the relationship of Luke to the other Gospels and to the quest for the historical Jesus has been one focus, another has been to interpret Luke within the development of early Christianity. Working with the Griesbach Hypothesis, F. C. Baur (1847) understood Luke to be a reinterpretation of Matthew by someone with a Pauline perspective on Christianity, who modified Matthew's more Jewish-Christian focus to one that was more inclusive of Gentiles. Bultmann (1948-1953; ET vol. 1, 1951) argued that Luke-Acts was written from the perspective of salvation history in order to counter the failure of imminent eschatology at the end of the first century, which the delay of Christ's return made evident.

In more recent study, H. Conzelmann (1953, ET 1960) used redaction criticism to further understand Luke's context and theology. He examined the places where the sources of Mark and Q are modified, as well as Luke's literary structure and how sections relate to one another. Like Bultmann, he argued that Luke downplays imminent eschatology. The shift to literary criticism was anticipated by H. Cadbury (1927), who argued for the literary unity of Luke-Acts. Narrative criticism reads Luke-Acts in terms of character, plot and narration, without concern for its original context (Tannehill 1986; Brawley 1990).

The 1970s and 1980s witnessed an ongoing drive to interpret Luke-Acts in the context of the Mediterranean world in order to determine as precisely as possible how Luke-Acts would have been understood in its own time. Literary parallels and anthropological and sociological theory and models were brought to bear on the politics, economics, and social and cultural aspects of the text, including the patron and client relationship, honor and shame, dyadic and individualistic personalities, and many more (Esler 1987; Moxnes 1988; Neyrey 1991).

Among many other subjects, recent interpretation of Luke focuses on feminist interpretation and intertextuality (Kealy 2005). Feminist studies examine the characters and themes in Luke, engaging the paradox that this Gospel shows women participating in ministry outside gender-determined roles while at the same time reinforcing the mindset that women are valuable mainly for their procreative ability (Levine 2004). Intertextual studies focus on the use of the OT in Luke as the source of allusions and quotations, and as patterns and models, drawing on previous work in historical, social and narrative studies (Hatina 2010).

5. Gospel of John.

The letter of 1 John is the initial surviving interpretation of the Gospel of John. First John was written to address a schism involving Gnostic tendencies within the Johannine community and uses the community's original understanding of the Christology and ethics of the Gospel of John as a basis. In 1 John's interpretation of the Gospel of John the division between orthodox and Gnostic interpretation of the Johannine tradition becomes evident.

John's Gospel was popular with the gnostics and Montanists of the second and third centuries, for they found its high degree of conceptualization to blend well with their philosophies. Irenaeus is the first person known to have mentioned John's Gospel, and he used it extensively to argue against the gnostics (Adversus haereses [Against Heresies]). The first known commentary on John was by the Valentinian gnostic, Heracleon (ca. 170). The commentary survives in portions incorporated by Origen in his commentary on John, and those portions demonstrate Heracleon's use of allegory as an interpretive method. Heracleon's commentary prompted Origen to write the aforementioned work to refute the gnostic interpretation of John. His commentary focuses on the literary and historical interpretation as a way to exclude and refute gnostic interpretation, but does use allegory to interpret the Christology and eschatology of John.

The Montanists relied on John's teaching on the Paraclete to justify their emphasis on prophecy. The high Christology of the Gospel made it very useful in the christological controversies of the third through the fifth centuries to affirm the fully human and divine nature of Jesus Christ. Augustine's Tractates on John (In Evangelium Johannis tractatus) provided a theological and practical interpretation of John devoid of interaction with heretical and christological controversies.

The interpretation of John in the Middle Ages preserved the work of patristic interpreters without contributing anything noteworthy. Alexandrian interpretation predominated, with its emphasis on the literal, spiritual and moral aspects of the text. However, the scholastic method, which promoted the literal meaning of the text, continued to make strides in the study of John, as illustrated by the lectures of Aquinas on John given between 1269 and 1272 (ET Aquinas Scripture Series 4, 1980, 1988). On the wedding of Cana, Aquinas describes the literal and historical background, but the mystical sense (the wedding symbolizes the union of Christ and the church, and Mary's presence symbolizes her role in joining the bride to Christ) and allegorical (the six water jars are the six eras of the OT period that made hearts receptive to grace) are in abundance. Theological discussion on the nature of Christ and his work abounds, with reference to the interpretation of Chrysostom.

During the Reformation, Luther and Calvin preferred John over the Synoptic Gospels as having the most sayings of Jesus, and more theology than narrative. They found it useful for bringing people to faith and for debates about the sacraments of baptism (Jn 3:5) and the Eucharist (Jn 6:22–71). Two commentaries from this period blend patristic and medieval interpretation with humanism's concern for philology and the Reformation's concern for theology. Both use the exegetical tradition, but not its allegorical interpretation, although they do rely on it whenever a literal interpretation of a text is difficult. One is by W. Musculus, a former monk and a pastor in Zurich, who wrote Commentariorum in Evangelistam Ioannem (1547). The other is by Melancthon, who wrote Annotationes in Johannem (1523), which is notable for shifting the focus of interpretation from Christology to soteriology and justification by faith alone.

In the eighteenth century, G. Lessing (1778) was one of the first to question the apostolic authorship of John and to argue that the author amplified the nature of Jesus (see Quest of the Historical Jesus). In his Life of Jesus Critically Examined (1835, ET 1972), D. F. Strauss cast doubt on the historical reliability of John, arguing that John had portrayed Jesus as a Hellenistic philosopher to expound his own ideas. When compared with the Synoptic Gospels and Acts, John disagreed because he was historically incorrect and more mythical. By the early twentieth century there was an emerging consensus that John the apostle was not the author of the Gospel of John and the date of this Gospel was the late first century, thus making it less historically reliable than formerly thought (see John, Gospel of).

In the nineteenth and twentieth century there was also a flurry of works on the relationship of John to the Synoptic Gospels. P. Gardner-Smith (1938) demonstrated to the satisfaction of most scholars that the Gospel of John is independent of the Synoptic Gospels, a consensus seriously challenged in the late twentieth century (see Synoptics and John). Still, understanding John as an independent account of the life and teaching of Jesus reopened the question of its historical reliability. C. H. Dodd (1953) argued that all four of the Gospels rely on *oral tradition and all have the possibility of containing historically reliable information.

In the nineteenth century, with its emphasis on the history of religions, it was argued that John was influenced by oriental mysticism, gnosticism and Mandeism. R. Bultmann's commentary on John (1941, ET 1971) represents the culmination of this emphasis. He argued that the Gospel was formulated in the context of pre-Christian gnosticism, relies on a gnostic redeemer myth similar to that in Mandeism, and utilized sources, particularly a signs source. The study of John that followed focused on isolating its sources, particularly the signs source, as well as the assumption that the Gospel was redacted several times before arriving in its current form (Brown 1966, 1970). This attention to sources and redaction led naturally to the study of the community that produced the Gospel and its history as reflected in and which shaped the text—the Johannine school (Culpepper 1975) or Johannine community (Brown 1979).

The twentieth century also hosted a debate about the setting of this community, whether Jewish, Hellenistic or gnostic. At first the latter two prevailed, but with the discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls and obvious parallels with John's Gospel, its Jewish nature was also affirmed. The Gospel was placed in the context of the expulsion of the community from the synagogues and the self-definition shaped by debate with Judaism that followed (Martyn 1968, 1979²; Brown 1966, 1970). This earlier work on the Johannine community and its setting naturally led to social-scientific study of the Fourth Gospel using sociological and anthropological theories to understand the nature of the community, especially its seemingly sectarian nature (Neyrey 1988). Literary criticism was also applied, with its interest in how the narrative works to create meaning through characterization, drama and irony (Culpepper 1983).

Recently feminist interpretation seeks to move beyond using female characters and images as role models to seeing how the narratives incorporating them have the potential to liberate as well as support hierarchy and systems that exclude and marginalize (Levine 2003). Also, recent study shows that John was constructed to confound Roman imperial ideology, especially in the choice of appellations assigned to Jesus that parallel those applied to the emperor, in order to demonstrate that Jesus is the true ruler of the world (Richey 2007).

See also AFRICAN-AMERICAN CRITICISM; FEMI-

NIST AND WOMANIST CRITICISMS; FORM CRITICISM; LATINO/LATINA CRITICISM; NARRATIVE CRITICISM; QUEST OF THE HISTORICAL JESUS; REDACTION CRITICISM; SOCIAL-SCIENTIFIC CRITICISMS; THEOLOGICAL INTERPRETATION OF THE GOSPELS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. D. E. Aune, ed., The Gospel of Matthew in Current Study (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2001); B. W. Bacon, "The Five Books of Matthew Against the Jews," The Expositor 15 (1918) 56-66; idem, Studies in Matthew (New York: Henry Holt/London: Constable, 1930); D. R. Balch, ed., Social History of the Matthean Community: Cross-Disciplinary Approaches (Minneapolis: Augsburg Fortress, 1991); F. C. Baur, Kritische Untersuchungen über die kanonischen Evangelien, ihr Verhältniss zu einander, ihren Charakter und Ursprung (Tübingen, L. F. Fues, 1847); C. C. Black, The Disciples According to Mark (JSNT-Sup 27; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1989); G. Bornkamm, G. Barth and H. J. Held, Tradition and Interpretation in Matthew, trans. Perry Scott (NTL; Philadelphia: Westminster, 1963); R. L. Brawley, Centering on God: Method and Message in Luke-Acts (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1990); R. E. Brown, The Community of the Beloved Disciple (New York: Paulist, 1979); idem, The Gospel of John (AB 29, 29A; New York: Doubleday, 1966, 1970); R. E. Brown and J. P. Meier, Antioch and Rome: New Testament Cradles of Catholic Christianity (New York/Ramsey: Paulist, 1983); R. Bultmann, Theology of the New Testament, trans. K. Grobel (2 vols.; New York: Scribner's, 1951, 1955); idem, History of the Synoptic Tradition, trans. J. Marsh (rev. ed.; New York: Harper and Row, 1963); idem, The Gospel of John, trans. G. R. Beasley-Murray et al. (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1971); H. J. Cadbury, The Making of Luke-Acts (New York: Macmillan, 1927); H. Conzelmann, The Theology of St. Luke, trans. G. Buswell (New York: Harper and Row, 1960); A. Culpepper, The Johannine School (SBLDS 26; Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1975); idem, Anatomy of the Fourth Gospel: A Study in Literary Design (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1983); J. Dewey, Markan Public Debate: Literary Technique, Concentric Structure, and Theology in Mark 2:1-3:6 (SBLDS 48; Chico, CA: Scholars Press, 1980); M. Dibelius, From Tradition to Gospel, trans. by B. L. Woolf from the 2nd ed. (New York: Scribner's, 1965); C. H. Dodd, The Interpretation of the Fourth Gospel (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1953); R. A. Edwards, Matthew's Story of Jesus (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985); J. C. Elowsky, John 1-10 (ACCS 4a; Downers Grove, IL: IVP Academic, 2006); idem, John 11-21 (ACCS 4b; Downers Grove, IL: IVP Academic, 2007); P. Esler, Community and Gospel in Luke-Acts: The Social and

Political Motivations of Lucan Theology (New York: Cambridge University Press, 1987); P. Gardner-Smith, Saint John and the Synoptic Gospels (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1938); T. Hatina, ed., Biblical Interpretation in Early Christian Gospels, vol. 1: The Gospel of Mark (London: T & T Clark, 2006); idem, Biblical Interpretation in Early Christian Gospels, vol. 2: The Gospel of Matthew (London: T & T Clark, 2008); idem, Biblical Interpretation in Early Christian Gospels, vol. 3: The Gospel of Luke (London: T & T Clark, 2010); D. B. Howell, Matthew's Inclusive Story: A Study in the Narrative Rhetoric of the First Gospel (JSNTSup 42; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1990); A. A. Just Jr., Luke (ACCS 3; Downers Grove, IL: IVP Academic, 2003); S. P. Kealy, Matthew's Gospel and the History of Interpretation (2 vols.; Lewiston/Queenston/Lampeter: Edwin Mellen, 1997); idem, John's Gospel and the History of Interpretation (2 vols.; Lewiston/Queenston/Lampeter: Edwin Mellen, 2002); idem, A History of the Interpretation of the Gospel of Luke (2 vols.; Lewiston/Queenston/Lampeter: Edwin Mellen, 2005); idem, A History of the Interpretation of the Gospel of Mark (2 vols.; Lewiston/Queenston/Lampeter: Edwin Mellen, 2008); J. D. Kingsbury, Matthew as Story (2nd ed.; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1988); A.-J. Levine, ed., A Feminist Companion to Matthew (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2001); idem, A Feminist Companion to John (2 vols.; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2003); idem, A Feminist Companion to Luke (Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2004); B. J. Malina and J. H. Neyrey, Calling Jesus Names: The Social Value of Labels in Matthew (FF; Sonoma, CA: Polebridge, 1988); J. L. Martyn, History and Theology in the Fourth Gospel (2nd ed.; Nashville: Abingdon, 1979); W. Marxsen, Mark the Evangelist: Studies on the Redaction History of the Gospel, trans. J. Boyce et al. (Nashville: Abingdon, 1969); H. Moxnes, Economy of the Kingdom: Social Conflict and Economic Relations in Luke's Gospel (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1988); J. Neyrey, The Ideology of Revolt: John's Christology in Social Science Perspective (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1988); idem, ed., The Social World of Luke-Acts: Models for Interpretation (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1991); T. C. Oden and C. A. Hall, Mark (ACCS 2; Downers Grove, IL: IVP Academic, 1998); J. A. Overman, Matthew's Gospel and Formative Judaism: The Social World of the Matthean Community (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1990); D. Patte, The Gospel According to Matthew: A Structural Commentary on Matthew's Faith (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1987); J. K. Riches and D. C. Sim, eds., The Gospel of Matthew in its Roman Imperial Context (London: T & T Clark, 2005); L. B. Richey, Roman Imperial Ideology and the Gospel of John (Washington, D.C.: Catholic Biblical Association of America, 2007); V. K. Robbins, Jesus the Teacher (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1984; 1992²); M. Simonetti, ed., Matthew 1-13 (ACCS 1a; Downers Grove, IL: IVP Academic, 2001); idem, ed., Matthew 14-28 (ACCS 1b; Downers Grove, IL: IVP Academic, 2002); G. N. Stanton, A Gospel for a New People: Studies in Matthew (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1992/ Louisville: Westminster John Knox 1993); idem, ed., The Interpretation of Matthew (IRT 3; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1983; 2nd ed., Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1995); D. F. Strauss, Das Leben Jesus kritisch bearbeitet (2 vols.; Tübingen: Osiander, 1835-1836; ET The Life of Jesus, Critically Examined [3 vols., trans. G. Eliot; repr., Philadelphia: Fortress, 1972]); B. F. Streeter, The Four Gospels: A Study of Origins (New York, Macmillan, 1924); R. C. Tannehill, The Narrative Unity of Luke-Acts: A Literary Interpretation. Vol. 1: The Gospel According to Luke (FF; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1986); V. Taylor, Behind the Third Gospel: A Study of the Proto-Luke Hypothesis (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1926); M. A. Tolbert, Sowing the Gospel: Mark's World in Literary-Historical Perspective (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1989); A. von Harnack, Luke the Physician: The Author of the Third Gospel and the Acts of the Apostles (New York: Putnam's Sons, 1907); C. H. Weisse, Die evangelische Geschichte, kritisch und philosophisch bearbeitet (2 vols.; Leipzig: Breitkopf und Hartel, 1838); C. Gottlob Wilke, Der Urevangelist oder exegetisch kritische Untersuchung über das Verwandtschaftsverhältniß der drei ersten Evangelien (Dresden and Leipzig: Gerhard Fleischer, 1838); W. Wrede, The Messianic Secret, trans. J. C. G. Gries (Cambridge: James Clarke, 1971); A. Yarbro-Collins, Mark, ed. H. W. Attridge (Herm; Minneapolis: Fortress, 2007) 103-19.

D. F. Watson

GRACE. See MERCY.

"GREAT COMMISSION." See GENTILES; MISSION.

GREATEST COMMANDMENT. See COMMANDMENT.

GREEK CULTURE. See HELLENISM.

GREEK LANGUAGE. See LANGUAGES OF PALESTINE.

GRIESBACH HYPOTHESIS. See SYNOPTIC TRADITION.

H

HAGGADAH. See RABBINIC TRADITIONS AND WRITINGS.

HALAKAH. See RABBINIC TRADITIONS AND WRITINGS.

HARDNESS OF HEART

The “hardening of the heart” is a Hebrew idiom that describes spiritual obstinacy before God. The NT condition finds its origin in the OT, where hardening occurs as a covenant curse symptomatic of idolatry. Jesus and the Gospel writers adopted the Semitic concept to describe inner faithlessness and sin. The hardening of the heart implements God’s punitive design for sinners; as sinners distance themselves further and further from God, their hearts grow more and more obstinate. Hardening is an inevitable consequence of alienation from the Creator.

The concept of the heart (kardia) in the Gospels carries over from the OT term (lēb, lēbab), which refers to “all aspects of a person: vital, emotive, noetic, and volutative” (Fabry, 401). Positively, the heart is the place of rejoicing (Jn 16:22), purity (Mt 5:8), *worship (Mt 15:8), forgiveness (Mt 18:35), the love of God (Mt 22:37), *repentance (Lk 1:17) and spiritual awakening upon encountering the risen Christ (Lk 24:32). Negatively, the heart is the seat of lust (Mt 5:28), disobedience (Mt 24:48), obtuseness (Mk 8:17), doubt (Mk 11:23; Lk 24:38), malicious plans (Lk 12:45), fear (Jn 14:1), drunkenness and anxiety (Lk 21:34), Satanic attack (Mt 13:19; Jn 13:2), evil thoughts, murders, adulteries, fornications, thefts and defiling words (Mt 15:18-19; Mk 7:21). In sum, the heart represents the human will, where inner thoughts conceive (Mt 9:4; Lk 1:51; 2:35; 9:47), faith flourishes or dies (Lk 8:12), and people treasure up objects of worship (Mt 6:21; Lk 12:34).

1. Old Testament Background
2. The Synoptic Gospels

3. The Gospel of John

4. Divorce and the Hardened Heart

1. Old Testament Background.

The hardened heart is a notoriously enigmatic subject within the OT: “Why, O LORD, do you cause us to stray from your ways, and harden our heart from fearing you?” (Is 63:17). Crucial OT entry points for diagnosing the problem exist in Isaiah 6:8-10; Jeremiah 7:13-34; 11:1-17; Ezekiel 14:1-11; Psalm 115:1-8; 135:14-18, and Exodus, where God hardens Pharaoh’s heart (Ex 4:21; 7:3; 9:12; 10:1, 20, 27; 11:10; 14:4, 8, 17), Pharaoh hardens his own heart (Ex 8:15, 32; 9:34), and Pharaoh’s heart hardens itself (Ex 7:13, 14, 22; 9:7, 35) (Shupak, 390).

Underlying most accounts is the covenant infraction of idolatry (Meadors). Isaiah’s prophetic call to “render the hearts of this people insensitive” is understood within the context of Judah’s idolatry, which Isaiah denounces explicitly (Is 2:5-11, 17-22) (Beale 1991; Watts). Sensory depletion corresponds with idolatry, so that idolaters become like what they worship: “Their idols are silver and gold, the work of man’s hands. . . . Those who make them will become like them, everyone who trusts in them” (Ps 115:4-8) (Beale 2008; Meadors). Exodus is understandable in this context, where God executes judgments over the false gods of Egypt (Ex 12:12; 18:11; cf. Ezek 20:5-7) and fittingly hardens Pharaoh, the chief priest of Egypt’s amulet-ridden cult (Meadors). Pharaoh’s hardening is conditioned upon sin (Ex 9:27, 34; 10:16-17) that defies God according to the dictates of polytheism and idolatry. Psalm 135 thus transmits the “you become like what you worship” phenomenon against the background of Pharaoh’s sin (Ps 135:8-18) (Meadors).

2. The Synoptic Gospels.

OT usage carries over into the Synoptic Gospels, where Jesus applies the hardening curse to his own generation (Mt 13:13-15; Mk 4:10-12; Lk 8:10). Mark reports Jesus' words as apparently unconditional on the basis of the underlying MT, while Matthew provides the expanded LXX translation, which focuses responsibility directly on the hardened party: "they have closed their eyes" (Mt 13:15). Luke provides a truncated version of Mark.

2.1. Mark. Hardening of the heart occurs three times in Mark (Mk 3:5; 6:52; 8:17-21), while the closely related obstinacy theme occurs once (Mk 4:12). In the context of Mark's literary theological development of Jesus as the *Christ, the *Son of God (Mk 1:1; 8:29; 15:39), hardening characterizes all who fail to recognize Jesus as such. Jesus grieves at the hardness of heart of the *Pharisees whose preoccupation with *Sabbath law blinds them from seeing Jesus as the Christ, even when he *heals the crippled before their very eyes (Mk 3:5). Jesus diagnoses sensory dysfunction as a symptom that debilitates those who hear the word of the gospel but allow the worries of the world, the deceitfulness of riches, and the desires for other things to enter in and choke the word (Mk 4:12, 19). And the disciples themselves display hardness of heart when they fail to connect the feedings of the four thousand and the five thousand (Mk 6:52; 8:17-21) to the dynamic presence of the *kingdom of God and Jesus' identity as the messianic agent of its arrival. In Mark hardness of heart is thus an intellectual impairment that corresponds to deficient faith.

2.2. Matthew and Luke. C. A. Evans has argued that Matthew softened the unconditional language of Mark 4:12 (Evans, 165). The distinction may be more apparent than real, however, in view of the background of Isaiah 1–6, where Judah's hardening is conditioned upon its idolatrous sin (Is 2:5-11). Moreover, Jesus' explanation of the parable of the sower, which follows Jesus' quotation of Isaiah 6:8-10 in each of the Synoptics, consistently explains the hardening curse as a consequence of divided faith. Hardening afflicts those who succumb to Satan, persecution, the worries of the world, the deceitfulness of riches and the deceptions of temporal securities (Mt 13:18-22; Mk 4:13-19; Lk 8:11-14). Hardening thus corresponds to preoccupation with things other than the kingdom of God. Sharing this focal point, Matthew and Luke express the same basic message as Mark.

3. The Gospel of John.

John 12:37-41 attributes the disbelief of Jesus' contemporaries to the fulfillment of Isaiah 6:10. In keeping with the prophetic theme, Jesus' contemporaries, like Isaiah's, were so fixated on external religious ritual that they were blind to fulfilled prophecy even when it occurred in their presence. Already callous, Jesus' audience was predisposed toward cynical rejection of Jesus' signs. Throughout John's Gospel this predisposition reflects the world's preference of darkness to *light: "And this is judgment, that the light has come into the *world, and people loved the darkness rather than the light; for their deeds were evil" (Jn 3:19). The preference for darkness over light is a metaphorical diagnosis of idolatry that comports with a hardening outcome.

The motif of hardening complements John's broader "misunderstanding" theme by exposing the human inability to perceive Jesus' true identity prior to the cross and resurrection (Jn 6:60; 8:27; 10:6, 19-21, 24; 11:13; 12:16; 13:28; 14:5; 16:17-18; 20:9). John's message is that those who reject Jesus because of a preexisting love for evil (Jn 3:19) inevitably will exude a hardened countenance as the consequence of their separation from "the true light, which, coming into the world, enlightens everyone" (Jn 1:9).

4. Divorce and the Hardened Heart.

Jesus identifies the hardened heart as the underlying cause of *divorce (Mt 19:3-9; Mk 10:2-12). Divorce is a concession, not God's original design. That the two become one flesh is God's preference and will. Jesus attributes hardening to the callous disposition of the divorcing party: "Moses permitted you to divorce your wives because of your hardness of heart [sklērokardia]." The divorcing party's hardened state is displayed in disregard for God's design for the covenant of marriage. What God created as one, no person should separate (Mt 19:6; Mk 10:9). Like idolatry, divorce acts upon divisive desires to abandon a covenant partner. The hardened heart epitomizes the perpetrator of both idolatry and divorce, as each willfully betrays a sacred covenant.

See also FORGIVENESS OF SINS; REPENTANCE; SIN, SINNER.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. G. K. Beale, "Isaiah VI 9-12: A Retributive Taunt Against Idolatry," VT 41 (1991) 257-78; idem, We Become What We Worship: A Biblical Theology of Idolatry (Downers Grove, IL: IVP Academic, 2008); C. A. Evans, To See and Not Perceive: Isaiah 6.9-10 in Early Jewish and Christian Interpretation (JSOTSup 64; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1989); H. J. Fabry, "לֵב," TDOT 7:399-437; M. Hengel, Studies in the Gospel of Mark (London: SCM, 1985); E. P. Meadors, Idolatry and the Hardening of the Heart: A Study in Biblical Theology (London: T & T Clark, 2006); N. Shupak, "חֲזָק, קִדְּב, קִשָּׁה, לֵבָב, the Hardening of Pharaoh's Heart in Exodus 4:1-15:21—Seen Negatively in the Bible but Favorably in Egyptian Sources,” in Egypt, Israel, and the Ancient Mediterranean World: Studies in Honor of Donald B. Redford, ed. G. N. Knoppers and A. Hirsch (PA 20; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2004) 389-403; R. E. Watts, Isaiah's New Exodus and Mark (WUNT 2/88; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1997). E. P. Meadors

HEALING

The healing of disease in the Greco-Roman world could take several forms, from surgery to home remedies. While there were significant advances in health care in the centuries leading up to and immediately following the NT period, many could not travel to centers of healing or afford the care of physicians. Modern attempts to account for the prominence of healing in the ministry of Jesus and the miraculous element in the healing stories of the canonical Gospels include literary, medical and sociological explanations. The Gospel writers, however, simply assume the “miraculous nature of Jesus’ healings but place more emphasis on their theological significance as a sign of the inbreaking *kingdom of God than on disease and cure in themselves.

1. Health Care in the Ancient World
2. Jesus’ Healing Ministry
3. Distinctive Emphases of the Gospel Writers
4. Conclusion

1. Health Care in the Ancient World.

1.1. Greco-Roman. During the Greco-Roman period the practice of ancient medicine underwent significant development. Most dominant was Hippocrates, whose influence continued in the first and second centuries of the Christian era through physicians such as Celsus and Galen. To judge from the extensive writings of these and other physicians, healing in some schools began to be separated from philosophy and placed on a more empirical basis, the most important center being Alexandria (Avalos, 56). Celsus, for example, deals extensively with internal and external disorders, the use of drugs and herbal remedies, and even surgery. Ancient surgical procedures existed for setting fractures, treating spinal and other dislocations, cauterizing hemorrhoids and removing bladder stones (Howard, 14-19). Galen made major contributions in anatomical studies and surgical method.

Alongside such medical practitioners, whose services except in extreme cases were too expensive for most (cf. Mk 5:26), were the numerous healing centers, with their temples and rituals honoring the several healing deities renowned throughout the Roman Empire, the most important being the cult of Asclepius. Visitors to these centers found reports of healing inscribed on stone plates, included among which was this affirmation: “Because the help of human physicians had failed, the sick came to the god for whom the impossible is possible” (quoted in Seybold and Mueller, 101). The Isis cult was also widespread and prominent in important centers of early Christianity such as Ephesus, Philippi, Corinth and Rome (Avalos, 53). At the same time, evidence exists that medical expertise displaced reliance upon miraculous healing in some places (Kee, 86).

1.2. Second Temple Judaism. The OT describes health holistically in the sense of total well-being (Hasel). The most important biblical statement regarding healing is found in Exodus 15:26: “I am the Lord your healer” (see also 2 Kings 20:5; Ps 103:3; 147:3). Human intermediaries may convey God’s healing power, but they are never called “healers” (rôp’îm). In fact, since Yahweh was the healer of Israel, the act of traveling to pagan centers of healing would, for many Jews at least, be a denial of faith. Nevertheless, there are indications in certain periods of Israel’s history that other avenues of healing were sought, including physicians, remedies, self-medication, household care and even pagan temples. Some Jews admired physicians for their skill in diagnosing illnesses and their knowledge of medicines that could alleviate pain and heal disease (Sir 38:1-8; cf. b. B. Qam. 85a). Various medicaments were employed for healing, oil being particularly common (e.g., Lk 10:34; cf. Is 1:6; Philo, Somn. 2.58; Josephus, Ant. 17.172) (see Bowie).

The Jerusalem *temple was renowned as a center of atonement but not of healing. The *priests did not attempt to heal illnesses, but rather confirmed a worshiper’s fitness to approach the temple, making judgments on matters of purity and evaluating any conditions that might render a person unclean (Hogan, 24). In the Second Temple period the stringency of purity regulations extended beyond that of the Levitical laws, hindering people with a variety of physical ailments from approaching the temple. The Qumran sectarians, due to theological concerns, socio-economic factors, as well as their harsh desert location, were generally more stringent than their priestly counterparts in *Jerusalem. However, despite a few texts referring to the treatment or prevention of disease (e.g., 1QapGen ar XX, 14-29; 4Q242; 4Q444; 11Q11), there is no evidence that Qumran became a healing center. The Pool of Bethesda, located near the temple in Jerusalem, reputedly provided possibilities for healing (Jn 5:2-7), but crowded conditions there and in other healing centers often prevented those who needed healing the most from obtaining it.

The life expectancy of the average Israelite was perhaps not much more than forty years, with peasants suffering from eye and skin diseases, damaged or missing limbs and a host of other maladies. Those who could not afford the health care available through physicians or healing centers relied on prayer, folk healers, “holy men” or assorted “miracle” remedies. Many probably resorted to a combination of these options. Rabbi Hanina ben Dosa (late first century A.D.) was said to heal by means of prayer, the fluency of which indicated whether or not the supplicant was healed (b. Ber. 34b). Besides such healers, an extensive support network of family members and others within the society contributed to the healing process. This typically included exhortations to pray and to seek help in the wider community (from a healer or at the *synagogue) and sometimes to intercede with a healer on behalf of the sick relative (Pilch, 26, 66-67). Since many Jews commonly considered health problems a punishment from God (e.g., Jn 9:1-2), cures often included religious components. Thus, healing was the outward indication of *forgiveness (Ps 103:3; cf. 4Q242; note b. Ned. 41a: “A sick man does not recover from his sickness until all his sins are forgiven”).

2. Jesus’ Healing Ministry.

Healing occupies a sizeable role in Jesus’ proclamation of the kingdom, with references present in every layer of tradition and sayings form (Blackburn). The healing stories, which have been rigorously analyzed both in terms of form (Bultmann) and narrative (Funk), fall into three categories: healing of disease, expelling of spirits or demons, and resurrections from the dead (Blomberg). From our vantage point, it is difficult to evaluate such stories. Literary studies have tended to understand the miracles in terms of the meaning that they convey rather than as significant events in themselves. Yet all four Gospels present them as historical reports, not simply as illustrative of some theological or spiritual truth. Medical analyses find in some of the maladies similarities to mental or psychosomatic disorders, but the Gospels show little interest in therapeutic method. Sociological studies avoid such etic judgments by emphasizing healing as opposed to cure—that is, the miracles’ effective role in terms of social and political structures. More specifically, these stories illustrate the role of *faith and the restoration of the recipient of healing to the worship of God.

Nevertheless, the miracle narratives, at their most basic level, present the working of God in history in a way that modern science, philosophy and reason find implausible, although contemporary eyewitness reports of exorcisms and similarly miraculous healings are “surprisingly common” (Keener 2011, 2:761). By contrast, Jesus’ opponents were not skeptical of the miracles per se but rather of God as their source, considering Jesus as demonic and a deceiver of Israel employing magical cures. Whatever one may think of the healing stories, Jesus effected cures that were admitted even by apparently skeptical onlookers, both Jewish and pagan, to be miraculous (Evans, 12-14; Keener 2011, 1:22). More to the point, the significance of the miracles, then and now, may lie more in terms of their role as a call to faith because they remain outside the realm of proof.

A variety of afflictions ranging from crippled limbs or blindness to demonic possession are described, but healing is consistently attributed to the power of God at work in Jesus and through the disciples rather than to any specific medical expertise or remedy. While counts of the exact number of healing miracles performed by Jesus vary depending on which stories are considered authentic and which seem to reflect the same event in another setting, a summary of the fourfold healing narratives in Table 1 makes a useful point of reference. In all but three instances the means of healing is specified: a touch and/or a word from Jesus (twenty-one of twenty-eight); sometimes, in combination with these, the use of saliva as an extension of his person (three of twenty-eight); and touching the fringe of Jesus’ garment (once). Summaries mention Jesus healing groups of people but provide few further details (e.g., Mt 8:16-17; Mk 1:32-34, 39; 3:11; Lk 4:40-41). Unlike the accounts of healing uncovered at cultic shrines that had miracles happening routinely within their confines, the Gospels present Jesus’ miracles as surprising, improbable and surpassing what was available through any shrine, holy man or doctor (Theissen, 284, 301). The healings performed by Jesus distinguished themselves from those of other healers, whether Jewish (Honi the Circle-Drawer, Hanina ben Dosa) or Gentile (Apollonius of Tyana) in at least three ways: (1) serving to typify his ministry; (2) containing faith as an essential component; (3) extending the saving power of God in an unmediated manner (Green, 758).

The dominant words to refer to healing in the Gospels, therapeuō (36x) and iaomai (19x), at a minimum, affirm the perceived reality of physical healing

Table 1. Jesus' Miracles of Healing, Exorcism and Resurrection

Category	Description	Reference(s)	Means
Blindness
1.	At Bethsaida	Mk 8:22-26	saliva, touch
2.	Near Jericho	Mt 20:29-34 // Mk 10:46-52 / Lk 18:35-43	touch // word
3.	Man born blind	Jn 9:1-41	saliva mud, word, water
4.	Two blind men	Mt 9:27-31	touch, word
Leprosy
1.	Man full of leprosy	Mt 8:1-4 / Mk 1:40-45 / Lk 5:12-16	touch, word
2.	Ten lepers	Lk 17:11-19	word
Miscellaneous Infirmities
1.	Paralyzed man	Mt 9:1-8 / Mk 2:1-12 / Lk 5:17-26	word
2.	Crippled man	Jn 5:1-9	word
3.	Man with withered hand	Mt 12:9-14 / Mk 3:1-6 / Lk 6:6-11	word
4.	Woman bent over	Lk 13:10-17	word, touch
5.	Ill slave of a centurion	Mt 8:5-13 / Lk 7:1-10	(distant) word / unstated
6.	Severely ill son	Jn 4:46-54	(distant) word
7.	Mother-in-law with fever	Mt 8:14-15 / Mk 1:29-31 // Lk 4:38-39	touch // word
8.	Woman with flow of blood	Mt 9:20-22 / Mk 5:25-34 / Lk 8:43-48	fringe touched
9.	Deaf and mute man	Mk 7:31-37	touch, saliva, word
10.	Man with dropsy (edema)	Lk 14:1-6	touch
11.	Man with severed ear	Lk 22:50-51	touch
Demonic Possession
1.	In Capernaum synagogue	Mk 1:23-28 / Lk 4:33-37	word
2.	After the Sabbath (summary)	Mt 8:16-17 / Mk 1:32-34 / Lk 4:40-41	word / unstated / touch
3.	Near Gerasa	Mt 8:28-34 / Mk 5:1-20 / Lk 8:26-39	word
4.	Epileptic boy	Mt 17:14-21 / Mk 9:14-29 / Lk 9:37-43a	word
5.	Mute man	Mt 9:32-34	unstated
6.	Mute man // and blind	Lk 11:14-16 // Mt 12:22-23	unstated
7.	Mary Magdalene	Mk 16:9 / Lk 8:2	unstated
8.	Syrophoenician woman	Mt 15:21-28 / Mk 7:24-30	(distant) word
Raising the Dead
1.	Jairus's daughter	Mk 5:21-24, 35-43 / Lk 8:40-42, 49-56 // Mt 9:18-19, 23-26	touch, word // touch
2.	Widow's son at Nain	Lk 7:11-17	touch, word
3.	Lazarus	Jn 11:1-44	[prayer] / word

Note: The single and double parallel lines are used to connect either the description listed in the second column or the means listed in the fourth column with the corresponding references in the third column. For example, the healing of blindness near Jericho is with a touch in Matthew and with a word in the other Synoptics.

¹Some consider the stories of the healing of the royal official's son in Jn 4:46-54 and the healing of the centurion's slave in Mt 8:5-13 // Lk 7:1-10 to derive originally from a single event, but significant differences may suggest otherwise (Keener, 1:631-32).

²Mt 9:32-34 is usually considered a doublet of Mt 12:22-23.

³Prayer, though not narrated, is referred to in Jn 11:41.

and its central role in the ministry of Jesus. Also common is (dia)sōzō (18x in the sense of “made well”), suggesting that the healings performed by Jesus comprehended total wellness (spiritual as well as physical). Implied too, if not always explicit, is the individual’s reintegration within the family, as well as the larger society, and restoration to the community of faith. The assurances of Jesus in Luke 7:50 and Luke 17:19, although identical in the Greek (hē pistis sou sesōken se), tend to be translated differently precisely because of this overlap (Gaiser).

Another example of this emphasis on total wellness is Jesus’ healing of the paralyzed man brought to him on a pallet. Assuring the man’s forgiveness becomes the implicit prerequisite for complete healing (Mk 2:1-12 par.). Jesus himself, when impugned for keeping company with tax collectors and sinners, seems to have made the link between healing and saving fairly explicit: “Those who are well have no need of a physician, but those who are sick; I have come to call not the righteous but sinners” (Mk 2:17). In other words, Jesus’ healings seem to have embraced more than physical restoration; they comprehended also a return to wholeness within Israel and a sign of the redemption that his kingdom proclamation offered.

Likewise significant in this respect is the healing specifically of those whose purity and fitness to approach God in temple worship were considered dubious by virtue of their physical ailments (Wahlen, 83-84n75). The connection between forgiveness and cure and the necessity of both in order to experience complete healing is suggested already in the OT (e.g., Ps 103:3; 143:2-3). So if all healing is attributed to God, it is a rather small step to the interrelating of sin with disease on the one hand (e.g., 1QapGen ar XX, 28-29; CD-A VIII, 4) and health with a righteous lifestyle on the other (e.g., 1QS IV, 6; 4Q257 V, 4; 4Q504 1-2 II, 14), as some of Jesus’ contemporaries did. Healing could thus be seen as the gateway for access to God. Not unrelated is the frequent reference to Jesus’ healing on the *Sabbath, making the Sabbath healings particularly significant by reversing the conventional logic (see Lk 13:14-16). Instead of requiring wellness to approach the holy, Jesus seems intentionally to have healed on the holy Sabbath as a sign of the redemption available through his kingdom proclamation. And, although he healed also on other days, it is probably not accidental that we find Jesus healing chronic rather than acute conditions on that day, despite the likelihood that such activity would have been considered impermissible on the Sabbath (Doering, 227-29, 253). Based on Isaiah 58:13, even talking about work could be prohibited (CD-A X, 19; cf. b. Sābb. 113b) and prayer for the sick construed as violating the sanctity of the Sabbath (cf. t. Sābb. 16:22). The saving of life on the Sabbath might not have been questioned (m. Sābb. 18:3; 19:2; t. Sābb. 19:11-17; m. Yoma 8:6), but none of the illnesses that Jesus deals with on the Sabbath seem to be life-threatening. Yet Jesus defends this healing work as an extension of the halakic principle that saving life on the Sabbath is permitted (Mk 3:4 par.; later articulated in t. Sābb. 15:17; m. Yoma 8:6-7; cf. Josephus, J. W. 12.277). To the woman cured of a constant blood flow, Jesus not only assured physical healing but also uniquely addressed her as “daughter” and spoke to her a blessing (“Go in peace”), thereby giving reassurance that her impurity had been removed and her place in Israel’s religious society restored. Through these healings Jesus affirmed the close connection between holiness and wholeness and even recognized *sin as the occasional cause of disease, while at the same time denying personal sin as the necessary explanation for all disease (Jn 9:1-3; cf. Lk 13:1-5).

The disciples too, during Jesus’ ministry, may have expelled demons and performed various healings, but not always successfully nor exclusively (Mk 6:13; 9:17-18, 38-40). The ongoing nature of this work is perhaps hinted at in Mark 6:13 by the use of three imperfect tense verbs (exeballon, ēleiphon, etherapeuon). In any case, the apostles’ use of oil to facilitate apparently miraculous healings suggests their dependence on the spirit power available in the kingdom proclamation, unlike Jesus himself, who seems to have healed the sick and expelled demons more directly (John, 51).

3. Distinctive Emphases of the Gospel Writers.

While each of the four Gospels emphasizes certain aspects of Jesus’ healing work, it is more a difference of emphasis than of substance (Brown). The Synoptic Gospels portray the healings as deeds of supernatural power or authority (dynamis) that witness to the inbreaking kingdom. In John’s Gospel the selected miraculous healings as well as Jesus’ doing the will of God or “works” (erga) become a “sign” (sēmeion) of his messiahship and illuminate the nature of his kingdom. They all disclose that “behind the healing ministry of Jesus and others stands Yahweh the healer” (Green, 758) (see also Hahn).

3.1. Mark. Mark shows that Jesus’ actions belong, just as much as the teachings themselves, to the kingdom proclamation. Jesus’ first activity, immediately after calling four fisherman to begin fishing for people, is set in a synagogue and has Jesus teaching; but, although the people recognize that his teaching is with authority (exousia) and call it “new” (kainē), we are not told anything about what he taught. In short, the expulsion of unclean spirits, as with Jesus’ other miracles, seems to constitute an important component of the messianic teaching (Mk 1:22, 27). Altogether, Mark narrates eight healing miracles, four exorcisms and one apparent resurrection, all of which dominate this Gospel’s portrayal of Jesus up to his entry into Jerusalem. The theme of newness, begun with this first programmatic scene, continues in the subsequent block of healing miracles (Mk 1:40–2:12), with the larger issue again revolving around Christ’s authority. Later Jesus will delegate this same authority to the Twelve (Mk 3:15), sending them in pairs on a mission similar to his own and enabling them to expel unclean spirits and heal by *anointing the sick with oil (Mk 6:7, 13).

Purity also seems to be an important motif for Mark (Neyrey) and figures prominently in the healing stories (see Clean and Unclean). The first miracle, where the unclean spirit must flee before the Holy One of God, is followed in rapid succession by other encounters, all of which (apart from the healing of Peter’s mother-in-law) concern people with physical ailments or other obvious defects that would have hindered their active participation in the religious life of Israel. Jesus frequently touches those whom he heals (Mk 1:31, 41; 5:41; 7:33; 8:22; 9:27; cf. Mk 10:13), or they touch him (Mk 3:10; 5:27–31; 6:56). His confrontation with the demoniac in the region of the Gerasenes (Mk 5:1–20) illustrates this motif: “Jesus can abide what is impure, but what is impure cannot survive before him” (Chilton, 234). Mark thus portrays Jesus not only as immune from defilement, but also as a source of healing and so also of purifying power. Not accidentally, Mark sandwiches the crucial discussion of purity (Mk 7:1–23) between two exorcisms of *Gentiles, thus highlighting the universality of the gospel (Wahlen, 83–85, 101).

In terms of reintegrating those who are healed within the family and/or the larger society, Jesus’ words of address are often significant (Dawson, 87–88). The leper was told to show himself to the priest and offer the requisite sacrifice (Mk 1:44); others were explicitly sent back home (Mk 2:11; 8:26); the Gerasene demoniac was ordered to return to his own people in order to tell them of the mercy that he had received from the Lord (Mk 5:19); within earshot of the multitude, Jesus told the woman with a hemorrhage that her faith had healed her, thus making clear to everyone that she was no longer unclean (Mk 5:34); he told the parents of the dead girl to feed her (Mk 5:43), indicating her return to the normal routine of life.

The two giving-of-sight stories (Mk 8:23–26; 10:46–52) bracket a pivotal part of the Markan narrative that includes the confession at Caesarea Philippi, Jesus’ three passion predictions and the failure of the disciples to cast out an unclean spirit that had rendered its victim unable to speak or hear. The blindness of Israel to Jesus’ messianic teaching has already been introduced (Mk 4:10–13). Now the disciples’ blindness to his warnings about the coming cross, contrasting sharply with Jesus’ success in twice opening the eyes of the blind, suggests that the disciples also fail to comprehend what it means to follow Jesus (a point illustrated repeatedly in this portion of Mark’s Gospel; see Mk 8:32–33; 9:32–34; 10:35–45; cf. Mk 8:18).

Finally, healing in Mark is linked with persevering faith (Marshall, 133) but hindered by unbelief (Mk 6:5) (Twelftree, 100). This lends added significance to Jesus’ lament in view of the soon coming cross, “O, faithless generation!” (Mk 9:19), and points up the tension in Mark between the glorious miracles and the ignominious suffering of Jesus. Despite the fact that no one who asks for healing is turned away, not even the Syrophenician woman in the end (Mk 7:24–30), suffering and death can also be the will of God, as it was for Jesus (Mk 14:36). Above all, Jesus’ death is the means of “ransoming many” (Mk 10:45) because he is the stronger one (Mk 1:7; 3:27) who is able to plunder Satan’s kingdom and free people through the exorcisms and healings (Collins). Ultimately, it seems, if Jesus can be recognized by blind Bartimaeus as the messianic *‘Son of David’ (Mk 10:47–48) and by the Gentile centurion as the *‘Son of God’ (Mk 15:39), even once faithless followers may have hope of their *blindness being healed and their faith restored.

3.2. Matthew. Matthew balances, more evenly than Mark, Jesus’ teaching and healing work (Mt 4:23–24; cf. Mark 1:39) with nine shorter accounts of healing (out of fourteen, including one resurrection) in Matthew 8–9 immediately following the *Sermon on the Mount. Nearly every category of miraculous healing found in the canonical Jesus tradition is present, including the healing of blindness, leprosy, paralysis, fever, chronic hemorrhaging, the expelling of demons, and the raising of the ruler’s daughter from death. Persistent use by Matthew of the verb therapeuō in subsequent chapters reinforces healing as an important theme (Comber). “All” are healed from every possible kind of disease (Mt 4:24; 8:16; cf. Mark's "many"), with even the expelling of demons described as a form of healing (see also Mt 12:22; 17:16). Matthew thus presents Jesus as the healer of Israel: miraculously curing "every disease and every sickness among the people" (Mt 4:23); effortlessly expelling the spirits "with a word" (Mt 8:16, cf. Mt 8:8), recalling the power manifest at creation (Grimm); and fulfilling the promise made to Israel that sickness would be removed from them (Mt 8:17; cf. Ex 15:26; 23:25).

Through the healing stories Matthew also shows Jesus to be the messianic Son of David (see *Christ). Two telling passages contain healing summaries, followed by quotations from the *Servant Songs of Isaiah: the first (Mt 8:16-17), constituting the evangelist's only explicit citation of Isaiah 53, focuses on Jesus as the Isaianic messenger of *salvation (cf. Mt 4:14-17); the second (Mt 12:15-21) cites the very first Servant Song, in which God chooses the servant, commends him (cf. Mt 3:17) and puts his Spirit upon him. Many Matthean themes found just before and after this quotation are thus reinforced, especially Jesus' recognition that openly publicizing the miraculous healings would only engender greater opposition (Mt 12:19, cf. Mt 12:16, 9-14, 23-24) and Jesus' assertion of the reign of God through his possession of the Spirit (Mt 12:18; cf. Mt 12:28). Matthew's narration of the cleansing of a leper as the first miracle story (Mt 8:1-4), immediately after the Sermon on the Mount, reinforces the impression not only that Jesus is law-observant (Twelftree, 107), but also that his healing work stands as a metaphor of salvation for Israel (see Held). Here, as elsewhere in Matthew, the supplicant not only addresses Jesus as kyrios (a double entendre [also Mt 15:22; 17:15]) but also, by falling down before Jesus in *worship, evidences the faith necessary for healing; and Jesus rewards them for their faith (Mt 8:13; 9:29).

At the same time, some hints of Matthean ambivalence toward Israel's healing are noticeable in Jesus' dual citation of Hosea 6:6 (which in the larger context of the chapter in Hosea envisages Israel's future healing but also indicates that Israel is not healed; see Hos 6:1-5, 7-11; 7:1-2). Unlike the Gentiles, who reveal "great faith" such as Jesus did not find "in Israel" and who will come from "east and west" (Mt 8:10-11; cf. Is 49:12; 59:19), the "sons of the kingdom" (the privileged Jewish leaders who reject Jesus?) will be cast out (Mt 8:12). Interestingly, Matthew relates both his quotations of Hosea 6:6 (Mt 9:13; 12:7) to healing: the first instance justifies Jesus' embracing of "tax collectors and sinners" on the grounds of their needing a "physician" (iatros [Mt 9:12]); the second, sandwiched between Sabbath controversies, has the Pharisees asking Jesus directly whether it is lawful to heal on the Sabbath (Mt 12:10). As with his healing of the leper (Mt 8:4), Jesus affirms the *law (cf. Mt 5:17), here enunciating a halakic principle for Sabbath observance: it is lawful to do good on the Sabbath (Mt 12:12). Having explained the right course of action, Jesus heals the withered hand.

The proclamation of the kingdom is closely associated with healing in Matthew, principally in the work of Jesus but also in that of his disciples, whose missionary activity is patterned after his (Mt 4:17, 23-24; 10:7-8). Unlike Mark, who seems to emphasize the intractability of the maladies (Mk 7:31-37; 8:22-26), Matthew, by judiciously retaining only essential details, makes the healings seem effortless. Jesus also encounters significant opposition, first by forgiving as well as healing the paralytic (Mt 9:2-3), next by healing on the Sabbath (Mt 12:9-10), and then finally (and most extensively) by proclaiming the kingdom (Mt 12:22-32). Matthew's Jesus imparts the wholeness necessary for participation in Israel's religious life, breaking through social as well as ritually legitimated barriers—by his healing as well as by his teaching. Even the most serious sources of ritual impurity pose no obstacle for Jesus. He is not disturbed by the touch of a menstruating woman, nor does he himself hesitate to touch the dead (Mt 9:20-22, 18, 25). And yet, as only Matthew explains, when the blind and the lame come to Jesus in the temple, he heals them (Mt 21:14), thus obviating the implicit problem of his potentially defiled listeners remaining in that holy place (Mt 21:14; cf. Mt 15:30-31). Perhaps opening the eyes of the blind and giving life back to the dead is also expressive of a Matthean hope for Israel and of their ultimate salvation.

3.3. Luke. Of the sixteen healing miracles recorded by Luke, four (including one resurrection) are unique to this Gospel (Lk 7:11-17; 13:10-17; 14:1-6; 17:11-19). As in Matthew, the proclamation of Jesus in Luke is characterized in Isaianic terms that include healing, as seen from the programmatic episode in Nazareth (Lk 4:16-21) (see Jubilee). That Jesus' healing work will be a prominent issue is anticipated already in the proverb "Physician, heal yourself!" and the mention of foreigners who received mercy in the time of *Elijah, including Naaman, who was cleansed of leprosy (Lk 4:23-27). The healing of Gentiles finds further development in Jesus healing the centurion's slave (Lk 7:1-10) and a Samaritan leper, who alone of the ten healed lepers returns to give glory to God despite his being a "foreigner” (Lk 17:17-18). Both of these stories highlight the non-Israelite expression of saving faith (Lk 7:9; 17:19). The vital role of faith is emphasized also in the sending of disciples by *John the Baptist to ask whether or not Jesus was the one whom they had expected. According to Luke’s account, John’s disciples see Jesus raising the widow of Nain’s son, healing people of various diseases (including demonic possession) and giving sight to the blind (Lk 7:11-21). Then Jesus asks them to tell John what they have “seen and heard,” making them the first witnesses to the “gospel” (cf. Acts 4:20; 22:15), which fulfills Isaianic prophecy (Lk 7:22; cf. Is 29:18; 35:5-6; 61:1). Although these passages in Isaiah do not mention resurrection, the Messianic Apocalypse from Qumran describes the messianic era in terms of these same passages, adding that the Lord “will make the dead live” (4Q521 II, 1, 8, 12). Still, Luke’s stories of healing, while seeming to comport with his larger framework of prophecy fulfillment, give no evidence of having been shaped to prove that Jesus is fulfilling prophecy through these miracles (Achtemeier). Rather, “Jesus is the Savior who refuses to save himself (Luke 23:35), the physician come not to heal himself (Luke 4:23), the one whose ministry and whose service lead to the cross” (Gaiser, 300).

Luke shows particular interest in those whom Jesus heals as people. He eschews labeling people in terms of their disease, avoiding the one-word descriptors so prevalent in the other Synoptics (see Lk 5:18, 24; 7:12; 8:35; 17:12; 18:35). He includes details important for understanding the impact of the malady not only on the sufferers but also on the larger family structure: the dead boy from Nain is a widow’s only son (Lk 7:12), and the demon-possessed boy is his father’s only child (Lk 9:38); the dead girl was Jairus’s only daughter and twelve years old (Lk 8:42). All four Gospels describe a disciple slicing off the ear of the high priest’s servant, but only in Luke is Jesus unwilling to leave the man in such a state, and restores his ear (Lk 22:51 [the event is so briefly mentioned that typically it is not classified as a miracle story]).

Jesus’ relation to the Spirit is also uniquely presented in Luke (see Holy Spirit). By virtue of his *birth and *baptism, he is Spirit-filled, Spirit-led, and Spirit-empowered to heal as well as to preach (Lk 1:35; 4:1, 14, 18-19). There is no dichotomy between preaching and healing. Twice, in fact, Luke distinctly emphasizes the power of the word of Jesus to heal (Lk 4:39; 18:42) when it goes unmentioned in the other Gospels. The use of the noun dynamis in connection with physical healing emphasizes the power of the Spirit within him to heal (Lk 5:17; 6:19; 8:46). And despite the fact that salvation terminology is found nearly twice as often here as in Matthew and Mark, it is difficult to decide which nuance of the verb sōzō predominates in a given instance: its salvific aspect or physical healing—a fact that perhaps explains why only in Luke 8:47-48 does it appear in close proximity to one of the principal words for “to cure” (iaomai).

Also unique to Luke is mention of Satan’s “fall” (Lk 10:18), which in its immediate context alludes to a process of defeat. Jesus’ *authority over and expulsion of demons, which is also imparted to the disciples (Lk 9:6; 10:9, 17, 19), signifies the intrusion of God’s kingdom and the ensuing clash with Satan’s kingdom (Lk 11:18, 20), a confrontation continued throughout Luke-Acts (Lk 13:16; 22:3, 31; Acts 5:3, 9; 13:8-10; 26:18). The presence of the kingdom is seen not only in Jesus’ expulsion of demons but also in his healing people from the malevolent effects of unclean and evil “spirits” (Lk 6:18; 7:21; 8:2; 9:42; 13:11-14; Acts 5:16). Luke never speaks of the exorcism of illness, but rather as healing from spirit oppression or demonic possession. Most importantly, it is the healing of “all who were oppressed by the devil” (Acts 10:38) that enables them to share in the eschatological salvation brought by Jesus in God’s divine plan.

3.4. John. The Gospel of John narrates far fewer miracles than the Synoptics. It recounts only three healing miracles (Jn 4:46-54; 5:1-9; 9:1-41) and one resurrection (Jn 11:1-44), all of which are unique to this Gospel. John emphasizes their symbolic significance as “signs” (sēmeia) or, as Jesus calls them, “works” (erga), given him by his Father to complete (e.g., Jn 4:34; 5:36). The miraculous healings are explicitly selected to reveal who Jesus is and the nature of his kingdom, leading to faith in him (Jn 20:30-31). In the Synoptic Gospels any spiritual significance that the healings might have is subsidiary to the fact of the healings as acts of divine power (dynameis, a term not found in John). And nothing approaching the Synoptics’ depiction of spirits and demons appears in John. Spirits are never identified as evil or unclean; exorcisms are entirely absent; and “demon” terminology is sublimated into a cosmic conflict between *light and darkness embodied in Jesus and his human adversaries (Jn 7:20; 8:48-49, 52; 10:20-21).

Some see in the organization of the signs an elaborate chiasm with the restoration of the dying son paralleling the resurrection of *Lazarus and the two Sabbath healings of lameness and blindness in sharp contrast to each other (Girard). More likely, the sign miracles progressively unfold to the reader (and even more slowly to the characters who experience and/or witness them) the unique identity of Jesus as the Son and his intimate knowledge of and obedience to the Father. The royal official is classed initially with the crowd of people who had to “see” before believing (Jn 4:48; cf. Jn 20:29). Ultimately, however, he believes and obeys Jesus’ word of command before seeing its fulfillment. The pitiful man at Bethesda does not know who healed him (Jn 5:13) and seems oblivious to the deeper issues provoked by the miracle and disclosed in the ensuing monologue: the healings portend complete restoration, spiritual as well as physical (Jn 5:14, 21, 25)—an idea only implicit in the similar Synoptic healing of the paralyzed man (Mk 2:1-12 par.).

The story of Jesus healing the man born blind reiterates the theme that Jesus’ identity can be understood only by those who believe. The man displays growing discernment, first knowing Jesus just as a man (Jn 9:11), then recognizing him as a prophet (Jn 9:17) and finally worshiping him as the Son of God (Jn 9:35-38) (Howard, 184). The man’s witness also expands from family and friends to Pharisees, and from gentle insistence to bold resolve as opposition mounts, culminating in his exclusion from the synagogue. Readers are made aware that “seeing” the divine signs and “hearing” the word of revelation (Jn 3:32; 6:45) moves people to a decision, either to embrace and walk in the light or to reject it and remain blind (Jn 9:41; 15:22-24). They are also invited to express the highest level of faith and realize the blessing pronounced upon those who have not seen and yet believe (Jn 20:29). Embarking on his final journey to Bethany, Jerusalem and the cross (cf. Jn 11:16), Jesus sets out to wake Lazarus from his death sleep, the most spectacular sign. Only as each of these signs are recognized for what they are—manifestations of Jesus’ *glory and unity with the Father (Jn 11:4; cf. 9:3)—are they truly understood (Hooker, 67).

4. Conclusion.

History attests a variety of support systems and health care centers in the ancient world to facilitate healing. Besides the ubiquitous folk healers with their remedies and “holy men” calling upon their gods, the Greco-Roman world boasted physicians with expertise in the then-modern methods of healing. Mostly, however, these centers, healers and doctors exhibited only limited medical success.

The work of Jesus manifests a new and special quality in that healing takes place fully and easily, unmediated even by prayer, because it flows out of his unique relation to God as Son. Sometimes individuals attributed magical qualities to things as an extension of Jesus’ person, but in all four Gospels healing ultimately comes from God and aims (implicitly if not always explicitly) at the complete restoration of the person physically, socially and spiritually. Jesus’ act of healing on the Sabbath echoes creation, not only in displaying divine power and authority but also in returning individuals to total health on the day that was the first full day of life for human beings in the beginning. It also points to the ultimate triumph of God’s kingdom and, as John makes explicit, eternal *life.

Closely connected with health is the idea of separation from sin because, in the world of Jesus and the Gospel writers, the ultimate, if not the effective, cause of all disease is sin. While sinful practices sometimes bring disease, *repentance and forgiveness are the remedy for sin whether or not disease is involved. At times, physical healing may not be God’s will; rather more important in the face of suffering seems to be submission to God’s will and a willingness for God’s glory to be manifested (Mk 14:36; Jn 9:3; 11:4). In the final analysis, God’s healing power is not circumscribed by national or ethnic boundaries or gender; rather it appears designed to encourage and reward the supplicant’s faith response to Jesus.

See also BLINDNESS AND DEAFNESS; DEMON, DEVIL, SATAN; FAITH; KINGDOM OF GOD/HEAVEN; LAZARUS; LEPROSY; MIRACLES AND MIRACLE STORIES; RESURRECTION.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. P. J. Achtemeier, “The Lukan Perspective on the Miracles of Jesus: A Preliminary Sketch,” in Perspectives on Luke-Acts, ed. C. H. Talbert (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1978) 153-67; H. Avalos, Health Care and the Rise of Christianity (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1999); B. L. Blackburn, “The Miracles of Jesus,” in Studying the Historical Jesus. Evaluations of the Current State of Research, ed. B. Chilton and C. A. Evans (NTTS 19; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1994) 353-94; C. L. Blomberg, “Healing,” DJG 299-307; A. Bowie, “Oil in Ancient Greece and Rome,” in The Oil of Gladness: Anointing in the Christian Tradition, ed. M. Dudley and G. Rowell (London: SPCK, 1993) 26-34; R. E. Brown, “The Gospel Miracles,” in New Testament Essays (New York: Paulist Press, 1965) 168-91; R. Bultmann, History of the Synoptic Tradition (2nd ed.; Oxford: Basil Blackwell, 1968); B. Chilton, “An Exorcism of History: Mark 1:21-28,” in Authenticating the Activities of Jesus, ed. B. Chilton and C. A. Evans (NTTS 28; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1999) 215-45; A. Y. Collins, “Remove This Cup: Suffering and Healing in the Gospel of Mark,” in Suffering and Healing in Our Day, ed. F. A. Eigo (Villanova, PA: Villanova University Press, 1990) 29-61; J. A. Comber, “The Verb therapeuō in Matthew’s Gospel,” JBL 97 (1978) 431-34; A. Dawson, Healing, Weakness and Power: Perspectives on Healing in the Writings of Mark, Luke and Paul (PBM; Milton Keynes: Paternoster, 2008); L. Doering, “Sabbath Laws in the New Testament Gospels,” in The New Testament and Rabbinic Literature, ed. R. Bieringer et al. (JSJSup 136; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2010), 207-253; C. A. Evans, “Authenticating the Activities of Jesus,” in Authenticating the Activities of Jesus, ed. B. Chilton and C. A. Evans (NTTS 28; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1999) 3-29; R. W. Funk, “The Form of the New Testament Healing Miracle Story,” Semeia 12 (1978) 57-96; F. J. Gaiser, “Your Faith Has Made You Well: Healing and Salvation in Luke 17:12-19,” WW 16 (1996) 291-301; M. Girard, “La composition structurelle des sept signes dans le quatrième évangile,” SR 9 (1980) 315-24; J. B. Green, “Healing,” NIDB 2:755-59; W. Grimm, “θεραπεύω,” EDNT 2:143-44; F. Hahn, “Heilung und Heil aus der Sicht des Neuen Testaments,” in Ärztlicher Dienst weltweit: 25 Beiträge über Heil und Heilung in unserer Zeit, ed. W. Erk and M. Scheel (Stuttgart: Steinkopf, 1974) 175-85; G. F. Hasel, “Health and Healing in the Old Testament,” AUSS 21 (1983) 191-202; H. J. Held, “Matthew as Interpreter of the Miracle Stories,” in Tradition and Interpretation in Matthew, ed. G. Bornkamm, G. Barth and H. J. Held (London: SCM Press, 1963) 165-299; L. P. Hogan, Healing in the Second Temple Period (NTOA 21; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1992); M. D. Hooker, The Signs of a Prophet: The Prophetic Actions of Jesus (London: SCM Press, 1997); J. K. Howard, Disease and Healing in the New Testament: An Analysis and Interpretation (Lanham, MD: University Press of America, 2001); J. John, “Anointing in the New Testament,” in The Oil of Gladness: Anointing in the Christian Tradition, ed. M. Dudley and G. Rowell (London: SPCK, 1993) 64-72; H. C. Kee, Miracle in the Early Christian World: A Study in Sociohistorical Method (New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1983); C. S. Keener, The Gospel of John (2 vols.; Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 2003); idem, Miracles: The Credibility of the New Testament Accounts, 2 vols. (Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2012); C. D. Marshall, Faith as a Theme in Mark’s Narrative (SNTSMS 64; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1989); J. H. Neyrey, “The Idea of Purity in Mark’s Gospel,” Semeia 35 (1986) 91-128; J. J. Pilch, Healing in the New Testament: Insights from Medical and Mediterranean Anthropology (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2000); K. Seybold and U. B. Mueller, Sickness and Healing, trans. D. W. Stott (BibEnc; Nashville: Abingdon, 1981); G. Theissen, The Miracle Stories of the Early Christian Tradition, trans. F. McDonagh, ed. J. Riches (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1983); G. H. Twelftree, Jesus the Miracle Worker: A Historical and Theological Study (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1999); C. Wahlen, Jesus and the Impurity of Spirits in the Synoptic Gospels (WUNT 2/185; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2004).

C. Wahlen

HEAVEN AND HELL

In modern parlance, the combination “heaven and hell” often refers to distinct destinations in the afterlife. This combination never appears in this form in the Gospels, however, though the KJV contrasts “heaven” and “hell” at Matthew 11:23 // Luke 10:15 (cf. “Hades” [e.g., NRSV]). Instead, the Gospels use a complex of terms and metaphors to signify the fate of humans after death.

1. Linguistic Considerations
2. Portraits of the Afterlife Outside the New Testament
3. The Gospels and the Afterlife

1. Linguistic Considerations.

In the Gospels ouranos can refer simply to the sky or the air (e.g., Mt 6:26; Mk 4:32; Lk 17:24), or to what we today might call “outer space” (e.g., Mk 13:25). It can signify *God’s domain (e.g., Mt 5:16; 6:9; 23:22; Mk 11:25; Lk 11:13) and the abode of the *angels (e.g., Mt 18:10; 22:30; Lk 2:15; 22:43), and thus be used metonymically for God (e.g., Mt 21:25; Lk 15:18, 21). According to John’s Gospel, Jesus has come from heaven (e.g., Jn 3:13; 6:38) and, for Luke, after his resurrection Jesus *ascends to heaven (Lk 24:51; cf. Acts 1:9-11). Again, these are instances of heaven as God’s abode (cf. Jn 13:3; Acts 7:56). The names of Jesus’ *disciples are written in heaven (Lk 10:20), those who are harassed on account of their association with Jesus have a reward in heaven (Mt 5:12; Lk 6:23), Jesus instructs people to store up treasures in heaven (Mt 6:20; Lk 12:33) and heaven is the destination of those who are raised up at the *judgment (Mt 11:23; Lk 10:15). These few texts reveal that the use of the term “heaven” to signify the postmortem dwelling place of the faithful is uncommon in the Gospels, whether explicitly or implicitly.

Paradeisos appears only once in the Gospels, in Luke 23:43, where it is usually transliterated as “paradise.” Originally the term referred to a “park” or “nobleman’s estate,” and it is used in the Greek versions of Genesis 2—3 for Eden. Given the *apocalyptic notion that the end would recapitulate the beginning, the term came to be employed for the final, paradisaical state enjoyed in the new creation. Paradeisos appears only two other times in the NT—in Revelation 2:7, where it connotes the end-time restoration of divine presence and provision; and in 2 Corinthians 12:4, where it appears in parallel with “the third heaven,” an image that depends on the portrait of the first Eden (i.e., Paradise) as having been kept sealed in anticipation of the end (cf. Is 51:3; T. Levi 18:10–11; Lincoln, 77–84). In Second Temple Jewish literature paradise could refer simply to heaven, the divine abode and place of bliss (e.g., 4 Ezra 4:7–8; T. Ab. (B) 10:3); to the place of heavenly abode immediately upon death (e.g., T. Ab. 20:14); or to an intermediate abode of the righteous (e.g., 1 En. 37–71); but it refers most often to the end-time dwelling place of the righteous with God (e.g., 4 Ezra 7:36; 8:52; 2 Bar. 51:11; T. Levi 18:10–11).

The phrase kolpos Abraam appears only once in the Gospels, in Luke 16:22 (see also Lk 16:23), where it refers to “Abraham’s side” or “Abraham’s bosom,” that is, to the place of honor at the end-time banquet. According to the Testament of Abraham, here “there is no toil, no grief, no mourning, but peace, exaltation and endless life” (T. Ab. 20:14; OTP 1:895).

The Gospels use other terms and images for postmortem life with God, including inheriting the kingdom (e.g., Mt 25:34), eating in God’s kingdom (Mt 8:11; Lk 13:29; 14:15), shining like the sun in the kingdom (Mt 13:43), dwelling in “my Father’s house” (Jn 14:2–3), and inheriting, having and going into eternal life (e.g., Mt 25:46; Mk 10:30; Lk 10:25; Jn 3:16 et passim). In the afterlife, “the righteous are like the angels, they are God’s children and children of the resurrection” (Lk 20:36).

Hadēs in modern translations is sometimes simply transliterated as “hades,” and refers to the place of the dead, the underworld or the netherworld. Evidence from the wider NT world supports a range of possible uses, including Hades as the general abode of the dead, the intermediate abode for all of the dead prior to the final judgment, the intermediate abode of the wicked and the righteous prior to the final judgment (during which time punishments and rewards have already been assessed), and exclusively the place of punishment for the wicked (Bauckham 1998a, 9–96). On one occasion, Luke also uses a term closely associated with hadēs, namely, abyssos, “underworld,” usually transliterated as “abyss,” here with reference to the abode of *demons (Lk 8:31).

Geenna, usually transliterated as “gehenna” or translated as “hell,” refers to the place of punishment at the judgment. The term derives from the name of a valley located on the south slope of Jerusalem, the Valley of Hinnom (Josh 15:8; 18:16), where Ahaz and Manasseh followed the “detestable practices of the nations” by burning sacrifices to Molech and even sacrificing their own sons in the fire (2 Chron 28:3; 33:6; 2 Kings 16:3). Associated with such practices as these, the Hinnom Valley (or Valley of the Son of Hinnom) came to be associated with the most horrific images of divine judgment (Jer 7:30–33; 19:1–13; 32:34–35; cf. Is 31:9; 66:24).

Other images are used in the Gospels with reference to divine judgment in the afterlife, including “the outer darkness, where there will be weeping and gnashing of teeth” (Mt 8:12; 22:13; 25:30), “fire” (Mt 3:10; 7:12; 13:40, 42, 50; Lk 3:9; Jn 15:6; cf. “hell of fire” in Mt 5:22; 18:9; “unquenchable fire” in Mt 3:12; Mk 9:43, 48; Lk 3:17; “eternal fire” in Mt 18:8; 25:41), “eternal punishment” (Mt 25:46) and “God’s wrath” (Jn 3:36).

From the perspective of cognitive linguistics, then, the Gospels generally make use of two primary metaphors in their portraits of the afterlife: (1) Up Is More (and its corollary Down Is Less), in which experiences of verticality map onto judgments about quantity, in this case the quantity of divine *blessing one experiences; and (2) Closeness Is Belonging, in which spatial proximity maps onto relational concepts. With the first metaphor, the afterlife is portrayed in terms of upward or downward movement, typically with reference to regions above the earth’s surface (and so collocated with notions of honor, reward, happiness, good) or to regions below the earth’s surface (and so collocated with notions of debasement, punishment, anguish, bad). God’s abode is “up,” so *mountains are places of divine encounter and revelation (e.g., Mt 5:1; 17:1); God’s Spirit comes down to Jesus and God’s voice speaks from above (Mt 3:16–17); Jesus looks up to *pray (Mk 6:41; Jn 17:1); Jesus anticipates his *ascension (Lk 9:51) and is carried up (Lk 24:51); indeed, God is known as the Most High (Mk 5:7; Lk 1:32, 35, 76; 6:35; 8:28). Contrariwise, Hades is the underworld. Use of this metaphor is captured in Jesus’ pronouncement: “And you, Capernaum, will you be raised up to heaven? No, you will be cast down to Hades” (Mt 11:23; Lk 10:15). With the second metaphor, proximity to God is a benchmark of one’s postmortem experience. For example, those who inherit God’s kingdom are told, “Come!” (deute), whereas those who are cursed are told, “Go!” (poreues-the) (Mt 25:34, 41). This results in proximity or distance from the king, with the one defined as “eternal life” and the other as “eternal punishment” (Mt 25:46). Similarly, those wanting to enter the heavenly kingdom but who have not done the Father’s will are told, “I never knew you; depart from me, you evildoers” (Mt 7:23). In the same way, intimacy is signaled by references to living in “my Father’s house” or eating at “Abraham’s side,” and the opposite by the phrase “the outer darkness” (which also trades on the metaphorical polarity of “light and dark, with light associated with goodness and God, and dark associated with badness or evil, and the devil).

2. Portraits of the Afterlife Outside the New Testament.

2.1. Greco-Roman Views. Although the Greco-Roman world was home to an array of often-contradictory views regarding the afterlife, the major options are easily summarized: death is simply the end of life, after which nothing follows; or at death the soul departs the body and lives on. In the Roman period, the beliefs of many continued to be influenced by Homer on account of the central place of the Odyssey and Iliad in Roman education. He depicted the underworld, Hades, as a dark, gloomy, underground region, the home of the “soul” (not the essential self as in later Platonism, but a ghostly shadow or phantom image of the living person, lacking consciousness, strength and intelligence) of everyone who has died. In the centuries after Homer, ethical reflection would lead some to distinguish between the fates of the moral and the immoral, and metaphysical reflection would lead some to develop an enhanced view of the soul as the center of personal identity. Now understood as immortal, the soul would escape the body in death and either live on independently or inhabit another body. The prospect of death, according to this latter view, was not to be lamented but welcomed as that moment when the soul is liberated from captivity to the body. The shift in thought is striking. At death, for Homer, the self lies on the ground and is buried or eaten by dogs, while the miserable soul journeys to Hades. For Plato, however, the loss of the container-body marks the liberation of the self-soul.

Platonic influence continued into the first-century world of the Gospels, of course, but the primary philosophical schools held different views. For Epicurean physics, the soul was comprised of fine particles that dissipated at death; death was therefore a prelude to nothingness and anticipation of death was no cause for worry. Accordingly, numerous gravestones were marked with this series of letters:

“nf f ns nc”—that is, non fui, fui, non sum, non curo (“I wasn’t, I was, I’m not, I don’t care”). Stoic views of the afterlife are less easy to summarize, but some apparently thought the soul could survive beyond death, some souls indefinitely. Souls might undergo different fates, with some punished and others rewarded. Some held the view that the psychē, or “soul,” was made of aether (which, in the ancient periodic table would have been the stuff of outer space), so at death it did not descend to the underworld but ascended into space. Roman religion was not particularly concerned with the afterlife, however, and apart from certain philosophical groups and the popular belief that a hero or emperor might morph into a divinity at death (apotheosis, deification), the more common view was that death was followed by nothingness. “When death comes, everything will be consumed by earth and fire” (CIL 6.17985a).

2.2. Old Testament and Second Temple Jewish Views. C. Setzer aptly observes, “The theme of the reward of the righteous at some future time is implanted in Israel’s consciousness, while the expression of that reward is a mix of images of bodily and spiritual survival and revivification” (Setzer, 11). She thus underscores both that Second Temple Jewish literature is characterized by an unruly diversity of viewpoints regarding the afterlife, a diversity incapable of synthesis into a single current of thought, and that the promise of rewards and punishments in the next life was integral to making sense of this life.

From the OT Israel takes its bearings from the twin, inescapable realities that human existence is marked by finitude and that death marks the cessation of life in all of its aspects (Morrow). “We must all die; we are like water spilled on the ground, which cannot be gathered again” (2 Sam 14:14). The place of the dead is typically called Sheol (Hades in the Greek OT), often with reference to the fate to which the ungodly are consigned and to which the godly declare their aversion (e.g., Pss 9:18; 16:10; 30:4; 31:18; 49:16; 55:16; 86:13; 88:6; Is 5:14; Job 24:19; cf. Alexander; Block; Johnston). Sheol is the subterranean world of the dead (e.g., Pss 55:15; 86:13; Is 14:15; Jon 2:2), a place of darkness (Job 17:13) where the worm feasts (Is 14:11). In a few poetic texts, the dead in Sheol are called rēpā’im (“shades” [NRSV], “ghosts” [CEB], “the dead” [NLT]; see Ps 88:10; Prov 2:18; 9:18; 21:16; Is 14:9; 26:14, 19), though with no suggestion that the rēpā’im are “alive” or possess a “self.” Here is neither a beatific vision of the afterlife nor the basis for one. Isaiah 26:14, 19 contrast the fate of the wicked, who will be overtaken by death, and the righteous, whose death will be overturned by Yahweh. Scholars have puzzled over whether this is an image of Israel's return from *exile (cf. Ezek 37:1-14) or an early reference to belief in the resurrection of the righteous, or both (cf. Ollenburger). In any case, the first unambiguous OT reference to resurrection comes in Daniel 12:1-3, in which "many of those who sleep in the earth's dust will awake, some to everlasting life and some to shame and everlasting contempt." Additionally, the OT bears witness to other celebrated but exceptional cases: God "took" Enoch (Gen 5:24) and Elijah "ascended in a whirlwind into heaven" in a fiery chariot (2 Kings 2:11).

